Ms Gooding: No, Senator. I'm saying I'm not familiar with the entire details of that case, and I'm going to take up the offer to respond to that on notice. But I am saying that sometimes defence of academic freedom requires us to defend actions and views that may not necessarily coincide with the union's actions and views, because of the primacy of academic freedom both to the nature of the academic profession and as a fundamental part of universities.

Senator SCARR: That's all I have.

CHAIR: Thanks very much. That's all the time we have, and that's all the questions we have as well. Thank you very much for joining us. We will give you a date to return answers to those questions on notice to us.

Ms Gooding: Thank you.

CHAIR: I now welcome, via videoconference, representatives from the Australian Human Rights Commission. Thank you for taking the time to speak with the committee today. Information on parliamentary privilege and the protection of witnesses and evidence has been provided to you and is available from the secretariat. I again urge senators and witnesses to reflect on the terms of the bill and ensure the discussion today is relevant to it. I remind senators and witnesses that the Senate has resolved that an officer of a department of the Commonwealth or of a state shall not be asked to give opinions on matters of policy and shall be given reasonable opportunity to refer questions asked of the officer to a superior officer or to a minister. This resolution prohibits only questions asking for opinions on matters of policy and does not preclude questions asking for explanations of policies or factual questions about when and how policies were adopted. Mr de Kretser, I think it's your first time before the committee. Do you have an opening statement you'd like to make?

Mr de Kretser: I have a brief opening statement. Thanks so much for the opportunity to appear today. I'd just like to acknowledge that we're meeting on Aboriginal land—in my case on the lands of the Bunurong/Boon Wurrung people of the Kulin nation.

Antisemitism is a matter of great concern to the Australian Human Rights Commission. Antisemitism harms people's identity and self-esteem; it creates stigma, shame and fear; it damages people's health and wellbeing and denies them full participation in life; it corrodes social cohesion; and, left unchecked, it can lead to violence. There's been widespread reporting of a significant increase in antisemitism across communities and specifically at universities, and it must be condemned. For example, the commission has heard examples of students reporting witnessing Holocaust denial and hearing antisemitic tropes. Students have told us about the ways in which they have changed their behaviour because of experiences of antisemitism. This inquiry has heard evidence of Nazi graffiti and gestures. The many submissions to this inquiry bear witness to the human impact of antisemitism at universities, and we thank everyone who has shared their submissions. In addition to assisting this inquiry, those submissions will help the commission's work.

The commission's work is strongly focused on addressing racism. The commission's access-to-justice work investigates complaints of racial discrimination and racial vilification under the Race Discrimination Act, and we conciliate those complaints. Complaints that aren't resolved through our processes can be taken for a determination through the federal court system.

Through the commission's policy work addressing racism, we are looking at the prevalence, nature and impact of antisemitism in Australia to highlight the scale of the problem and to provide lasting solutions to address it. For example, the commission is currently working on a national antiracism strategy, which includes our antiracism framework and antiracism public awareness and education campaign. The commission has also been funded by the Australian government, as discussed through this inquiry, to conduct a study into the prevalence and impact of racism in Australian universities. This study implements a recommendation of the Universities Accord and will have a significant focus on antisemitism as well as on broader racism, including racism against First Nations people and Islamophobia. The commission's legislation has strong protections to protect confidential information shared with us through this study.

The commission's also been funded to undertake a program of community engagement and awareness raising about racism to support safety in Jewish, Palestinian, Muslim and Arab communities in Australia. It's a matter for the Australian government and the Australian parliament to consider the most appropriate approach to address the surge in antisemitism and other forms of racism in Australia and what additional steps it may take to address it. The commission recognises the significant concerns that have been raised and the importance of taking action. The proposed judicial inquiry is one way to do this and should be considered within the broader framework of measures designed to address antisemitism and racism more broadly. If the proposed judicial commission is established, the Australian Human Rights Commission would welcome the opportunity to work collaboratively with it in addressing antisemitism in Australia. Thank you.

CHAIR: Thank you very much. As neither of the other commissioners have an opening statement, that leaves us plenty of time for questions.

Senator HENDERSON: Mr de Kretser, I want to draw your attention to Ms Segal's submission. She's the antisemitism envoy. She's been scathing of the Australian Human Rights Commission. She says:

As I have heard from Jewish students, academics and staff, they will only speak of their experiences to trusted advocates like my office or to a forum like a Judicial Inquiry that can take evidence in private and maintain confidentiality. They have no confidence currently in other institutions like the Australia Human Rights Commission (AHRC) to approach their evidence with impartiality and appropriate respect. This calls into question the ultimate efficacy of the Government's referral to the AHRC to study racism at universities including antisemitism.

How do you respond to the antisemitism envoy's concerns?

Mr de Kretser: Thanks for the question. It was good to meet with the envoy recently with my colleague Commissioner Sivaraman. We had a good, constructive meeting. She conveyed those concerns to us. And, obviously, we have seen the concerns from the Executive Council of Australian Jewry and others. It's a matter of concern for us that they are expressing a lack of confidence in our processes. I want to assure them that we take extremely seriously our job to investigate racism in universities. That includes a significant focus on addressing antisemitism in Australian universities. The work of the special envoy and, indeed, the work of this inquiry will assist us in our study. In particular, we will be adopting trauma-informed approaches. I understand the concerns around confidentiality. As I said in my opening, the commission has very strong protections in its legislation around the confidentiality of information shared with us. It is actually a criminal offence under our legislation for commission staff or commissioners to breach that confidentiality. So people sharing information with us should have confidence that that would be handled appropriately within our organisation. Adopting that trauma-informed approach, we will work collaboratively with the special envoy, drawing on the work that she is doing to ensure that it informs our work as well in looking at antisemitism and racism more broadly through our university study and so that people do not have to repeat their stories more than once if they do not want to.

Senator HENDERSON: Going back to the special envoy's criticism of the Human Rights Commission, I've raised serious concerns about the Human Rights Commission's treatment of complaints of antisemitism—that they have not been taken seriously, that arguably serious incidents of antisemitic conduct were not addressed by the Human Rights Commission. I even tackled the former president—not you, I might add, Mr de Kretser—in relation to the Human Rights Commission's failure to outrightly condemn the actions of Hamas. It seems that you have got a long way to go, to regain the trust of Jewish Australians, in relation to this very serious issue. What changes have you made to ensure that you can do a better job?

Mr de Kretser: I should stress, we had a good and honest and frank meeting with the executive of the Australian Council of Jewry. My understanding, and they can speak for themselves, is that they have strong confidence in our investigation and complaints process. As I said in the opening, we have an important role to play around investigating and conciliating complaints of racial discrimination, including antisemitism and racial vilification. People are bringing those complaints to us. If they're not resolved they will go through the federal court system.

In terms of some of the criticism levelled against us around not saying or doing enough around antisemitism or condemning some of the behaviour that you described, that's a matter of concern to us. I accept that those feelings are genuinely held. I've reviewed the material since joining the commission seven weeks ago. The commission has made a number of statements condemning the injustice of what happened on October 7, the brutal violence.

In one sense, it's a matter that concerns us, that the message has not been received properly or in a way that has built confidence in the Jewish community about our position on that issue. I accepted the invitation very early on in my tenure—I think after 3½ weeks—to speak at the Melbourne Holocaust Museum, to make it clear that my position on the rise of antisemitism in Australia should be condemned and that we all have a role to play in addressing it.

Senator HENDERSON: One of the concerns about what I have described as a woefully inadequate response by the government to antisemitism, which is the racism study, is that the report is not due to be handed to government until 30 June next year, which is a farce, because that's after the federal election. Did you make any recommendations to bring forward that work and urgently say to the government, 'We need an urgent response,' not running this out?

I accept there will be an interim report handed down, but for the final report to be handed down after the next federal election is a nonsense, in my view. I would ask you to ask whether there have been any representations to drive further urgency into this work.

Mr de Kretser: I think there's a premise in your statement that the study is somehow inadequate. I don't accept that premise. In terms of the progress and timing—

Senator HENDERSON: That's what Jillian Segal, the antisemitism envoy, said. That's not just me saying that. There are deep concerns, Mr de Kretser, that a racism study, commissioned by the government, by the Human Rights Commission, which does not have the faith of Jewish Australians, to be handed down on 30 June next year is woefully inadequate.

I appreciate you've been commissioned to do this work. I am principally being very critical of the government's response, but I am asking you: did you go back to the government, at any point, and say, 'I think you really need to lift your game. We need an urgent response'?

Mr de Kretser: I wanted to be on the record to say I don't accept the premise that it's woefully inadequate. I might hand to my colleague Commissioner Sivaraman to talk about where the study is up to, in terms of the timing. I think it's 13 June that we're required to deliver our final report not 30 June.

Senator HENDERSON: On 13 June?

Mr de Kretser: That's my understanding. Commissioner Sivaraman will know better than I do.

Senator HENDERSON: Is that correct, Commissioner?

Mr Sivaraman: Correct.

Senator HENDERSON: That will still be after the next federal election. My question is this: have there been any representations by the Human Rights Commission to bring forward the timing of the handing down of the final report?

Mr Sivaraman: There will be a significant amount of work done, in terms of this study, where we have to do the study across 42 universities. Firstly, we have to build a survey tool and we want to convene focus groups, and we'll need to do a literature review—I'll get to the specifics of your questions.

Senator HENDERSON: Sorry, because I have such limited time and I need to move on to other things, I just want to understand this: have there been any representations to bring forward the timing of the handing down of your final report so that this will be handed down in—

Mr Sivaraman: No, there hasn't.

Senator HENDERSON: I apologise, but I've got to move through these questions quickly. I think this is one of the big controversies that I raised at the last Senate estimates. On 13 October, when the AHRC handed down its statement, was that a statement that was viewed and cleared by all commissioners before its release? I'll perhaps direct that to you, Mr de Kretser, even though I know you weren't there at the time.

Mr de Kretser: It's before my time. I think my colleagues will know the background to what you're referring to better than I will.

Senator HENDERSON: I might ask Mrs Finlay. Was that a statement that you viewed and cleared?

Mrs Finlay: In relation to that specific statement—and I'm not meaning to not give an answer—could I take it on notice to remind myself? There were a number of statements, and I want to make sure that I'm giving you accurate information about that.

Senator HENDERSON: Alright. It's the statement of 13 October. It was obviously six days after the Hamas terrorist attack. Then the Sydney Opera House riots occurred on 9 October. Does that help you at all?

Mrs Finlay: It does, but I'd still like, if I may, to take that on notice to make sure you're getting accurate information.

Senator HENDERSON: Thank you very much. I know my colleagues have other questions, so I will share the call.

CHAIR: I have a couple of questions in relation to the study. Can you explain in more detail what work has occurred to date, and what is the proposed program of community engagement going forward? Given that most recent meeting with the Executive Council of Australian Jewry, I suppose you may have changed or adjusted that forward work program. Perhaps I could go to Mr Sivaraman and then to other commissioners or the president about the work program so far and going forward.

Mr Sivaraman: I should note that there are a number of streams of work. Firstly, we'll have to build a survey tool that is actually going to be trauma informed and adequate to assess all of the types of racism that might be complained of or that we seek to investigate across all 42 universities. Secondly, we'll have to procure someone to convene focus groups, because independent to the survey tool, which will be an online tool, we want to have the capacity to hear from people in person. Thirdly, we'll need to conduct a literature review, because a lot of work has actually been done in this area in terms of investigating racism within the university sector. So those will be the three main streams of work. Separately to that, we've written to and we should be very shortly convening an advisory committee that will assist us in those first three streams. The advisory committee will be representative of academics and group organisations. That will help us in terms of ensuring that what we do is the best possible work in those first three streams. There'll also be a special group convened of representatives from the Department of Education and the Attorney-General's Department, who will help us also in terms of this work along with government representatives more generally.

All of that work has started in terms of those three streams plus the advisory committee plus the other group. It took some time from the announcement of the study for the terms of agreement to be finalised and then for the funding agreement to be finalised. I don't think we've actually received the funding yet. Hopefully, that will arrive soon. We've still started the streams of work irrespective of that. Obviously, we are going to need the funding to be able to do the work as we move forward.

CHAIR: In terms of the specific focus on the safety of students on campus, how have you or how do you intend to look into that issue?

Mr Sivaraman: We'll have to look into that in a multiple of ways. It's obviously a really significant issue and one that we take seriously. As the president indicated in a response to an earlier question, we'll be taking a trauma informed approach in terms of the survey tool. That is partly about the safety of people participating in the process and their wellbeing as they participate in the process. So it will certainly be an area of focus for the survey tool, the focus groups and the advisory committee, because we'll be engaging with student representative bodies through that committee as well.

CHAIR: Your submission also notes the development of the National Anti-Racism Framework, which is another piece of work that the commission is undertaking. What has the consultation process brought to light in relation to racism on university campus?

Mr Sivaraman: Part of that framework is a focus on education. In terms of consultations with First Nations communities and through diverse communities and racialised communities, we have had evidence of people experiencing racism in the tertiary sector. For consultations I've done with various community groups—specifically including consultations about education—I've also heard about, and been provided with, data in relation to racism in the university sector. It's clearly an issue that needs addressing, which is why I think this study is so significant and important.

CHAIR: How will the framework tackle racism and promote racial equality on university campuses? Some of the evidence that we've heard today is that antisemitism is on the rise, particularly on campuses, but that there is a broader issue around racism in all forms that representative groups, particularly groups on campuses, are tackling.

Mr Sivaraman: To confirm, is your question specific to universities?

CHAIR: Yes.

Mr Sivaraman: The framework is still being finalised, because we've had some recent consultations, both with First Nations and non-First-Nations racialised communities, that will feed into the recommendations. Our intent is to come up with a series of recommendations per portfolio, so to speak, and to include a series of recommendations in relation to education. That hasn't been finalised yet but I think once that's done we'll be able to communicate more specifically about the changes we think will be necessary.

As a starting point it will be building racial literacy within institutions and understanding how certain communities are structurally disadvantaged—which often then leads into interpersonal racism—and how we collect data on racism. That's a significant shortcoming we've discovered in the consultations and the preparation of the framework.

CHAIR: Do you have a timeframe for when the framework will be completed?

Mr Sivaraman: Yes, we're hoping to launch on 26 November. In fact, I'll be communicating to all of you at the table, and to all of your colleagues, and hoping that we garner your interest for that.

CHAIR: Thank you. That is a very specific date. Finally, in terms of other programs that the commission is running at the moment—initiatives and engagements—are there any others that are relevant to antisemitism on campuses?

Mr Sivaraman: Yes.

CHAIR: I want to indicate that there might be some work that Commissioner Finlay is doing that's relevant, but I'll hand to you first, Commissioner Sivaraman.

Mr Sivaraman: Thank you. There is a project that we're undertaking, which would be funded by the Department of Home Affairs, to look at the increase in racism since the escalation of the conflict in the Middle East. There will be two stages to that.

Firstly, there will be consultation with Jewish, Palestinian, Arab and Muslim groups in terms of what they've experienced. That project has commenced and some of those consultations are being organised. We hope that what we hear there—particularly where it's relevant to universities and what's been experienced at universities—we can feed into the university study.

Secondly, that particular project is a campaign in relation to that racism. Hopefully, the findings and recommendations that we have in relation to the campaign can also feed into the university racism study. So, it's quite advantageous that we've got the two projects, because we'll be able to ensure that, to the extent possible, the data and findings from one are able to be used for the second one.

CHAIR: Okay. Mrs Finlay, does any work that you are doing interact with the work that Commissioner Sivaraman is doing?

Mrs Finlay: In terms of work in relation to racism and antisemitism specifically, that work is led by Commissioner Sivaraman. Of course, the commission will broadly and continuously engage with all sectors of the community and with various groups. We do advocacy. There are a range of things that different commissioners do.

For example, President de Kretser referred already to one engagement that he undertook within the first three and a half weeks, I think, of his starting in the position. I believe at the last Senate estimates I gave, on notice, a list of various engagements that I'd undertaken in relation to both Jewish and Muslim community groups on these types of issues.

So, across the board, the specific work is being lead by Commissioner Sivaraman, but there is broader work undertaken day-to-day by all commissioners and commission staff. And, certainly, from listening to the evidence that's been given at the hearing today and reading through so many of the submissions, it really does reinforce my view, which is expressed in our written submission, that there is a serious issue here with racism—with antisemitism specifically—on campuses. And we need everybody, including the Australian Human Rights Commission, to be playing a really important role, not just in relation to one project or one study but across the board in everything that we do, to make sure the issues are addressed.

CHAIR: Commissioner Finlay, one of the tensions we have discussed today with many witnesses—particularly with academics—has been about the model code on academic freedom and free speech, which is in your wheelhouse. One of the risks that has been put forward by some submitters is that this inquiry could stifle that academic freedom, particularly around freedom of speech.

In approaching this issue, how do you reflect on the tension between wanting to protect people from forms of racism—particularly antisemitism—but understanding that there are some obligations and responsibilities to allow people that freedom to speak, particularly with political communication?

Mrs Finlay: As you've already noted and highlighted, both of those things are incredibly important. It is a very real issue: how do you find that right balance? I wish I had a perfect answer for you. Unfortunately, I don't. But what I can say—from listening to the evidence that's been given before the committee today and previously through the special envoy, and from looking at various submissions—is that we need to be aware of that balance and that tension, but we also need to be aware of a number of the examples that have been given of specific antisemitic behaviour towards Jewish students and Jewish academics. I struggle to identify or characterise some of those things as merely expressions of free speech or academic freedom. I think they do fall fairly and squarely within the zone of antisemitic behaviours. So, yes, we do need to strike that balance, but we also need to recognise antisemitism is not free speech, and that students and staff have a right to be safe on campus. I was particularly taken by the phrase used by the Australasian Union of Jewish Students when they said Jewish students should not have to 'choose between safety and education'. So the balance is important, but we shouldn't allow that to obscure the very real need to ensure that we are addressing the realities of what has occurred on campus and the evidence that we've heard about that.

CHAIR: Thank you very much.

Senator SCARR: Mr de Kretser— noting your relatively new appointment—do you recognise that this is an issue that needs to be considered by this committee: the Jewish community, at this point in time, does not have confidence that the process being undertaken by the Australian Human Rights Commission is the appropriate forum for this issue to be totally ventilated, and there is a need, given the perceptions in the Jewish community, to seriously consider an independent judicial inquiry. Do you recognise the legitimacy and the significance of that point?

Mr de Kretser: I'd say a couple of things about that. I recognise that a number of groups representing the Jewish community have said what you've said. Obviously, the Jewish community is not homogenous and so there is a range of views across the Jewish community, but I accept the views of the special envoy, the Executive Council of Australian Jewry and others and what they've said about that. I hope that we can rebuild that confidence, and I hope that Jewish students and Jewish organisations engage with our important study into racism on university campuses and work with us to address antisemitism and racism more broadly.

In terms of the relevance to your committee's inquiry, I guess that's a matter for you to take into account, in terms of your findings and recommendations around how you weigh up what they have said against the perceived need for a judicial inquiry.

Senator SCARR: On notice, it would be useful to get your response to the submission we received from the Executive Council of Australian Jewry in relation to that issue—their perceptions of the Australian Human Rights Commission. I'd like to give the commission an opportunity the provide a detailed response to that. There was also a concern, raised by the witness representing Muslim Votes Matter, with respect to an engagement with the Australian Human Rights Commission. It would be useful to give the Australian Human Rights Commission an opportunity to respond to that concern.

Mr de Kretser: I'm very happy to do that.

Senator HENDERSON: I want to indicate that both of my colleagues have some questions. I would ask that Senator Reynolds be given a couple of minutes.

CHAIR: That's absolutely fine with me. What I'd convey to you and your colleagues is that we have a hard finish at four o'clock, but however we use that time is fine. Senator Reynolds.

Senator REYNOLDS: President, thank you very much for your evidence here today on the bill. I note from your statement that you have no opposition to the bill and that, if the commission were established, you would work with the commission. Is that right?

Mr de Kretser: It's a matter for government and the parliament to choose the measures that it wants to do in terms of addressing what we agree is a significant rise in antisemitism on campuses. If a judicial commission is established, we will welcome the opportunity to work with that commission collaboratively, as we have with the special envoy and others.

Senator REYNOLDS: I know you've just come into this job, so you've inherited this situation. I was a little concerned with your last answer in particular: 'Well, the Jewish community is quite diverse, and I accept that that's how the envoy feels.' To me that sounded like a very defensive approach to this.

Mr de Kretser: That wasn't intended at all. I was simply trying to reflect that there's a range of views across the Jewish community and I accept that—

Senator REYNOLDS: Given this is something that you've now inherited, in your position as president, and taking in good faith your comments about wanting to do better in future, have you had the opportunity to look back and review how the commission got into this situation? You have, in my opinion, one of the most discriminated-against communities in the world, with a very large community here in Australia, including first generation Holocaust survivors and their families. It was very clear, after 7 October, that this racism had been ignited very quickly. We've heard the stories here today. Yet here we are, almost 12 months later, and you've still got the special envoy and other Jewish organisations expressing a lack of confidence in the very organisation that is supposed to be, as you've said here, focused on addressing racism. No matter which way I look at it, it appears that the commission has been caught being very flat-footed and somewhat impotent over the last 12 months in terms of its action.

I'm coming to my question in relation to your role going forward. Yes, you've got two studies, as Senator Henderson has said, that will be looking into the prevalence and impact. I think that's very good, because you do need studies. But I don't think you need to be an Einstein to realise that the prevalence and impact of antisemitism, not just in universities, is an issue now. So my question, to start with, is in two parts. What self-reflection have you done coming into this job in terms of how the commission got to this point 12 months ago which has now led to this position today? And what are you as the new president looking at now going forward in how to remedy that? Are there cultural issues? How many Jewish staff do you have in the commission versus how many Muslim staff you have? What organisations will you engage with in the future? What are your thoughts on what's gone wrong and what you need to do specifically?

Mr de Kretser: There's a lot in that. I might respond at the outset by stressing that my understanding is that the criticism levelled at the commission has not been levelled at our investigation and complaints and conciliation service. This is critical to me and my understanding. Again, I don't want to speak for others, but my understanding from the information I've received is that there is strong confidence that we are receiving, investigating and conciliating complaints in a very effective, impartial way. That, to me, is an important part of the context in terms of the critical access-to-justice function that we play around helping people who are victims of antisemitism and other racism.

In terms of the express lack of confidence around us more broadly in terms of the issues around statements we may have made or perceived anti-Jewish bias, that is of deep concern to me for all the reasons that you expressed. The history of human rights abuses experienced by the Jewish community over centuries and acutely in World War II, with the mass slaughter of Jews by the Nazis, is the context in which I view the concerns raised by ECAJ and others. It is deeply distressing for me personally that there are those views being expressed when the Human Rights Commission has historically had very strong support and engagement from the Jewish community. I hope to work with Jewish organisations. My colleagues and I—Commissioner Sivaraman, in particular—have met with representatives from Jewish organisations across the country, as well as Muslim and other community groups, in terms of how we can work effectively with communities affected by the scourge of racism to make sure that our institution is the best it can be to deliver on the mandate we've been given by the Australian parliament through the legislation to address racism.

Senator REYNOLDS: Thank you. I appreciate that. In relation to the review, you're looking at the prevalence and the impact. As we've heard, that won't be reporting until next year. But are you doing any other more immediate work to have a look at things like how this happened so quickly, how this antisemitism was ignited so quickly, particularly on campuses? Is that something you are specifically looking at in terms of more immediate action that can be taken?

Mr de Kretser: I'll hand over to my colleague Commissioner Sivaraman to address that. I just want to say that this study is not just looking at the prevalence and nature of antisemitism and racism more broadly on campuses; it's looking at what we need to do to fix it. We met with the education minister, Jason Clare. I met with him two weeks ago out in Bankstown. He was very clear that he did not want the commission simply to deliver a report on what the problem is but to deliver solutions to help the government to fix that problem. Your question relates to what we are doing right now to look at what is going wrong. I might hand to Commissioner Sivaraman to—

Senator REYNOLDS: Just before we do—I'm getting wind-up looks from my colleagues here because of the time—there is absolutely a role, and this is coming back to the purpose of this legislation and to the commission of inquiry, for, yes, advice to government. But we already have laws and, as Commissioner Finlay has said, a lot of this conduct already constitutes breaches of law. So my question is about how this occurred and what we can do now in terms of society, because I don't think we can simply legislate our way out of this sometime next year and have a recurrence of this type of very quick and devastating discrimination and hate. My question with that, if it's not clear—

Mr de Kretser: I agree, I'm just—

Senator REYNOLDS: is about earlier non-legislated action in terms of behaviours and in terms of ways of thinking, because I don't see this as just a legislative solution, which is obviously having a look at this more immediate commission under this bill, but one to address more wide-ranging issues and advise government on legislation next year.

Mr de Kretser: I've heard some of the evidence before this committee about the differential responses across universities, and I've heard, personally, people telling me their own personal experiences of things that have worked and haven't worked for Jewish students on campus. Absolutely, universities now should be adopting those things that work and are best practice, and there is nothing stopping that action right now. That should be done. As Commissioner Sivaraman said—

Senator REYNOLDS: Just to be clear, what you're saying is that your responsibility is to do this review and to come up with some legislative or other government related measures, and it's up to universities and others to act and that the AHRC doesn't have a role in that.

Mr de Kretser: Not just universities, but I understand the focus of this inquiry is a bill into antisemitism on university campuses, so that's why I directed my comments that way. All institutions and communities across Australia have a role to play in addressing racism, prejudice and antisemitism. What we are seeing is a fragmentation of social cohesion in Australia. I've met with MPs across the political spectrum over the last month in Canberra, and something that came up repeatedly was the divisiveness and polarisation of public debate in this country, the harm it is creating and the risk it is creating. I've heard this committee talk about the public safety risks that are flowing from that, and the Australian Human Rights Commission has a critical role to play in being part of the solution and addressing it.

Senator REYNOLDS: Thanks.

CHAIR: Thank you, Senator Reynolds, and thank you to the commissioners and to the president. That's the first time you've appeared in front of our committee, President, but there'll be many more opportunities. We'll see you at estimates, if not before. Thank you, everyone.

CHAIR: We now welcome representatives from the Tertiary Education Quality and Standards Agency, the Department of Education and the Attorney-General's Department. Thank you for taking the time to speak with the committee today. Information on parliamentary privilege and the protection of witnesses and evidence has been provided to you and is available from the secretariat. I urge senators and witnesses to reflect on the terms of the bill and ensure that discussion today is relevant to them.

I remind senators and witnesses that the Senate has resolved that an officer of a department of the Commonwealth or of a state shall not be asked to give opinions on matters of policy and shall be given reasonable opportunity to refer questions asked of the officer to a superior officer or to a minister. This resolution prohibits only questions asking for opinions on matters of policy and does not preclude questions asking for explanations of policies or factual questions about when and how policies were adopted. Thank you all so much for being with us today. Do any of the organisations have an opening statement before we go to questions?

Ms Sheehan: No, we do not.

Dr Russell: We don't need to make an opening statement, but we would like to table some documents which we think would be relevant to our evidence.

CHAIR: Sure. So no opening statement?

Dr Russell: No.

CHAIR: That's good because we have 40 minutes until we have to finish our hearing. Senator Henderson, I will hand the call to you.

Senator HENDERSON: Good afternoon to you all. I just want to address my questions firstly to TEQSA. I raised concerns about the failure of the government to respond adequately to antisemitism on university campuses, and I've been, obviously, led by Peter Dutton and the coalition, calling out with great concern the ongoing failure of the government to do so. I raised the prospect of fines being issued against universities which failed to keep students safe. The Minister for Education responded in the media saying, 'No, we've already got those powers.' Can you please explain what powers you have to fine universities for failing to keep Jewish students safe, particularly in the context of antisemitism?

Dr Russell: I'd be happy to—

Senator HENDERSON: Sorry, let me just clarify this—I'll ask you that again: can you please explain the powers TEQSA has to fine universities for failing to keep students safe, including in relation to antisemitism?

Dr Russell: The concerns about where universities may have failed to comply with their obligations under the higher education standards framework are dealt with in a compliance framework. Part of our act anticipates that TEQSA would use regulatory tools, like conditions and undertakings, to bring providers into compliance or to ensure that they are meeting the standards. There are very limited circumstances under the TEQSA Act where a financial penalty can be applied. One of those circumstances is where a provider fails to comply with or fails to meet the requirements of a condition. But, otherwise, the provisions under the act for which financial penalties apply are breaches to different sections of the act, so not related to providers meeting the threshold standards.

Senator HENDERSON: Just to wade through that response—I understand that it's technical—when the minister says there are powers currently that TEQSA can use to fine universities in relation to failing to keep students safe, is that correct?

Dr Russell: As I said, there's an end point in the compliance framework where financial penalties may apply. I would need to refer you to the minister to clarify whether that was his meaning or not.

Senator HENDERSON: So, in relation to the conditions that are imposed on universities, are there any conditions that would give rise to penalties being imposed on universities?

Dr Russell: Not directly in the conditions. It would be a matter of failure to comply with a condition that could potentially result in a financial penalty.

Senator HENDERSON: So there are no conditions which relate to student safety for any public university? Is that correct?

Dr Russell: Conditions around this type of issue would require universities to do things or cease doing certain things in order to ensure that they're meeting the requirements of the threshold standards.

Senator HENDERSON: So did you impose any conditions on any university in relation to antisemitism?

Dr Russell: We have not at this time.

Senator HENDERSON: Why not, given the shocking spate of antisemitic incidents? Why didn't TEQSA take action to impose conditions on the university, particularly when there were some major failings? We've now had that admission from the University of Sydney vice-chancellor. So why didn't TEQSA, the regulator, seek to impose conditions on universities in relation to their failures to protect Jewish students and staff?

Dr Russell: As we outlined in estimates recently, TEQSA's work in this area has been ongoing and is not concluded. We don't believe that the response that's needed from universities to deal with this is yet over, and our regulatory work in this area is not yet over. We—

Senator HENDERSON: Hang on a minute, Dr Russell. It's been 11 months since October 7. We've seen some shocking, shocking incidents on university campuses where universities have fundamentally failed to keep students safe. You are the regulator. You've got the power to impose conditions on universities, and you're saying that you imposed no such condition. I would put it to you that that's negligent and that you should have taken stronger action.

Dr Russell: So—

Senator HENDERSON: You are the regulator.

Dr Russell: Senator, if I may answer the question, the premise of your question is that the only meaningful regulatory response from TEQSA in this circumstance is to go through a compliance assessment, which is a highly procedural process and often quite lengthy. As we've said before, the stance that we've taken here is that, where we can engage directly and quickly with universities and ensure that, on issues and departures from the standards, the responses that are needed are effected immediately, we've chosen to do that, because we think that's in the best interests of students. That does not mean that the work is over. We've identified where further work is needed, and we continue that work.

Senator HENDERSON: Dr Russell, are you aware that there are numerous Jewish students who no longer feel safe to go to university, whose education is being severely compromised and who have had to make a choice between their own safety and their education? You have power to impose conditions on universities. You have recognised that there have been numerous incidents when there's been behaviour which falls outside so-called academic freedom, which I think is a very gentle way of describing some of the very serious incidents of antisemitism. I would put it to you that not imposing those conditions and taking stronger action is not good enough from the regulator which regulates our universities.

Dr Russell: One of the things that we've heard about in evidence at this inquiry is the importance of having a systemic approach rather than just an approach that is limited to response to individual instances. The approach that you'll see in the documents that we've tabled today is one that has been progressive and ongoing in drawing the attention of universities to quite specific things, many of which have been brought to our attention—

Senator HENDERSON: Dr Russell, why—

Dr Russell: If I may finish my answer: many of which have been brought to our attention in discussion with students about what their experience is and what the problems have been in accessing the existing complaints mechanisms, supports and responses from universities.

Senator HENDERSON: Dr Russell, I would put it to you that, as the regulator, you need to do more than draw the attention of the universities to their obligations. When universities fail students, as they have done so seriously and significantly, I would put it to you that you need to throw the book at universities. You need to be the tough cop on the beat, and I would argue respectfully that your failure to do so has compounded the hurt and distress that many Jewish students and staff have endured since 7 October last year.

Dr Russell: Senator, our work in this area has not concluded. We have focused on what's been necessary in terms of responding to the incidents around protests, but, as those protests and encampments have been disbanded, we are continuing our work and our focus on what is needed in terms of driving reflection, system improvements and responses from universities. That work will continue.

Senator HENDERSON: You've written letters. You've met with various people. I understand that. That's in your submission. But you haven't taken appropriate action as the regulator to say to universities, 'That is not good enough.' Now we've had to do your job for you, with respect, because we've had university vice-chancellors here this morning and they have now admitted of their own volition that they have failed to keep students safe, and this was obvious and evident at the time. I've raised this with you in estimates. What are you doing? I have to say, if I were the minister, I would take a very different approach in terms of expecting high standards of our regulator. Maybe those expectations were not placed on you. But I would put to you that, as the regulator, you must be a feared regulator. When universities fail in their obligations, the regulator must step in and ensure our universities are places of the best educational excellence, places of safety and places where every person can go and be safe and where there is proper cohesion. When universities fail to do so, I would put to you that you have to do more than write letters and have a few meetings.

Dr Russell: What is your question, Senator?

Senator HENDERSON: My question is: why didn't you take stronger action? Did the minister not put to you that he wanted to see stronger action? Was that ever suggested to TEQSA?

Dr Russell: We have kept the minister apprised of our regulatory approach in this and have briefed the minister. We will continue to do so.

Senator HENDERSON: Did the minister ever raise concerns with you that not enough has been done by TEQSA?

Dr Russell: The minister asked a variety of questions to understand the rationale and focus of our regulatory work as these issues unfolded.

Senator HENDERSON: Are you able to table on notice to the committee that correspondence between TEQSA and the minister, please?

Dr Russell: We've had a number of verbal briefings with the minister.

Senator HENDERSON: Yes. You haven't got anything in writing? Wow. That's extraordinary. Maybe you could provide the minutes and details of each meeting you've had with the minister.

Dr Russell: We can provide the details of the meetings we've had with the minister.

Senator HENDERSON: Did you take minutes of those meetings?

Dr Russell: I did not. I was fully focused on the discussion at hand and understanding the minister's questions.

Senator HENDERSON: Did anyone take minutes of those meetings?

Dr Russell: That may be a question for the minister's office.

Senator HENDERSON: So you didn't take minutes. Did you take notes in a notebook?

Dr Russell: I did not.

Senator HENDERSON: You took nothing?

Dr Russell: No.

Senator HENDERSON: Did you make a file note of the telephone conversation?

Dr Russell: It was a Teams meeting. I was focused on the meeting.

Senator HENDERSON: Is there a recording of the Teams meeting?

Dr Russell: No.

Senator HENDERSON: Who else attended those meetings?

Dr Russell: Our assistant director of policy, research and engagement did.

Senator HENDERSON: On notice, could you please check whether anyone took minutes? I am pretty concerned that, if you are having briefings with the minister, and there are certain actions or questions raised, no notes are taken whatsoever by you as an organisation.

Dr Russell: I will check if there are any minutes that we have access to.

Senator HENDERSON: Is it your normal procedure when you have meetings with the minister or anyone else not to take notes?

Dr Russell: Our meetings with the minister have been confined to this issue.

Senator HENDERSON: You haven't met with the minister on any other issue?

Dr Russell: I have not.

Senator HENDERSON: How many meetings have you had with the minister?

Dr Russell: We've had two meetings on this matter.

Senator HENDERSON: How long do those meetings go for.

Dr Russell: About half an hour.

Senator HENDERSON: They were Teams meetings?

Dr Russell: They were.

Senator HENDERSON: Is it your normal practice to take minutes of meetings that you hold as an agency?

Dr Russell: My practice is the same as my practice here, which is to be as focused as possible on the questions and queries as possible.

Senator HENDERSON: Is it your practice as an agency? You are well staffed. How many staff do you have?

Dr Russell: If we are fully staffed, we have 120 across our regulatory and corporate functions.

Senator HENDERSON: When you have meetings, is it your normal practice to take minutes of meetings, including file notes of meetings and telephone conversations, and document the actions you might take as a regulator?

Dr Russell: The nature of the minutes we take is relative to the type of meeting we're undertaking. Often, we try to focus on decisions and actions.

Senator HENDERSON: Alright. As the regulator, I would put it to you that this is highly unusual. On notice, could you please provide to the committee any notes, messages, file notes, notations in your own notebook, scraps of paper or anything in your diary. In relation to your two meetings with the minister, were there any decisions or actions that were made as a result of those meetings? Did you give a commitment that you would take certain actions?

Dr Russell: The minister used that opportunity to press and inquire of us about the nature of the work that we were doing in this area.

Senator HENDERSON: And so you explained—

Dr Russell: I took them as accountability meetings.

Senator HENDERSON: You explained to the minister what you were doing and the fact that you'd engaged with Australian universities, you'd written to them—

Dr Russell: Yes.

Senator HENDERSON: Were there any other actions or decisions made at that meeting? Did the minister ask any follow-up questions or raise any other concerns?

Dr Russell: The minister wanted us to continue this engagement with universities and to continue to draw the universities' attention to the types of issues that we were flagging from the various sources of information that we had.

Senator HENDERSON: To the officials from the Department of Education who are here today: does anyone know anything about these meetings the minister had with TEQSA?

Ms Morton: No.

Senator HENDERSON: On notice—and I note that obviously the secretary of the department is not here—could you please provide the committee with any notes, file notes or other documentation in relation to these meetings and any other actions in relation to the minister's engagement with TEQSA.

Senator REYNOLDS: Can I also add that that's also for any meetings with their offices—so not just for those two meetings with the minister but also for any other meetings that you've had with any of the minister's staff.

Dr Russell: Noted.

Senator HENDERSON: Have you had any meetings with the minister's staff?

Dr Russell: No, there were ministerial staff in those meetings.

Senator HENDERSON: Alright. On notice to the department: could I ask for any records of those meetings. I would also extend that to asking if, on notice, we could please be furnished with a copy of any correspondence to or from the minister or his office in relation to antisemitism in Australian universities.

Ms Morton: I'm happy to take that on notice.

Senator HENDERSON: Thank you. I am straying a bit here. It is not in relation to those present, so this is not a reflection on any of you here. But, in relation to other Senate inquiries involving the Department of Education, we are still waiting for overdue responses, so I would really ask that you please meet the deadline on returning answers to questions on notice, because we can't do our work unless we receive that cooperation.

Ms Morton: Understood. I think the secretary, at previous hearings, has made the point that the department provides responses but it's for the minister to authorise those responses to come to the committee.

Senator HENDERSON: Yes, and I appreciate that sometimes they are caught up, for want of a better word, in the minister's office. But, even still, there is a requirement, and the onus is on the department to provide responses to those questions on notice on time.

Going back to you, Dr Russell, what other steps do you believe universities need to take to ensure that every student is safe on a university campus?

Ms Nieuwenhuis: I'll start, and then Dr Russell may add to my response. In one of the tabled papers, I draw your attention to the interim sector update, because I think that gives a nice summary of the sorts of issues that we continue to work with the sector on.

Senator HENDERSON: Is this the interim sector update?

Ms Nieuwenhuis: That's the one.

Senator HENDERSON: And it's for August 2024?

Ms Nieuwenhuis: Yes. As I said, what we have put on notice to the sector and the ongoing regulatory work that we are doing is across the following domains: institutional policies and procedures—

Senator HENDERSON: Why is there a highlight for 24 August? Is that not a date—

Ms Nieuwenhuis: I'm actually not quite sure. This is up on our website.

Senator HENDERSON: This is on your website?

Ms Nieuwenhuis: Yes.

Senator HENDERSON: Okay.

Ms Nieuwenhuis: It goes to a range of matters that we believe that providers should be continuing to look at, as we move from a response that is about an incident to the deeper systemic issues that we have heard about today and which we have read about in the various submissions. It does go to 'institutional policies and procedures' and whether they are fit for purpose, because a lot of those policies and procedures have certainly been tested during the encampments.

'Academic support and adjustment' goes directly to the student's experience of disadvantage and how that may have impacted their studies, and therefore, again: are university policies, procedures and frameworks appropriate to managing the experiences of students?

We've already talked about safety on campus. You can see the detail there. We are particularly concerned about complaint mechanisms, because we saw through some of the data that we were receiving from providers that once again we weren't able to interrogate that data deeply. We're also concerned that the learnings of providers with regard to sexual harassment, sexual assault and trauma-informed policies and procedures and grievance procedures have not moved across to exactly the same situation here and should be equally as trauma-informed.

Senator HENDERSON: This is one of the reasons the coalition so strongly advocated for a student ombudsman. It's because students were having their complaints not heard. That obviously has been picked up by the government, and now there is a bill before the parliament in relation to establishing the ombudsman. But I will say it's all very well to raise concerns about the complaints process. That is a massive issue. So many Jewish students have told us they've raised serious concerns and they have fallen on deaf ears. So again I say: as the regulator, what are you doing about it? When universities are failing in their obligations, what action is the regulator taking to say: 'That ain't good enough. We expect better of our universities'?

I'm just reading this now. We've got one paragraph heading saying 'Ensuring complaint and support mechanisms are accessible', but what is TEQSA doing when universities fail in those obligations?

Ms Nieuwenhuis: As I said, this interim report, which is on our website, provides a summary of the issues that we are continuing to work with the sector on.

Senator HENDERSON: But you can understand why I'm frustrated? You're flagging these issues, but you're the regulator. Unless you throw the book at the universities when they aren't doing the right thing, they're just going to keep on going the way they are—that is, unless you, as the regulator, say: 'We're looking at what you're doing, how you are treating student safety. We are not satisfied, and therefore we are going to impose conditions to make sure that you can lift your game.' My concern—and I direct this particularly to you, Dr Russell, as the agency head—is that this is not happening. We just haven't seen the appropriate action from the regulator to let universities know that the status quo is not good enough.

Dr Russell: Senator, if I could, I will answer that in several parts. Firstly, I'd draw your attention to the third letter that we have sent to the sector, which really says to the sector that, while the encampments have dispersed, it's clear that the sector needs to reflect on what fell short—the areas in which they fell short. And we have drawn their attention to a number that we think need special attention, including—

Senator HENDERSON: Okay, Dr Russell—sorry to interrupt—

Dr Russell: the area of academic adjustments and trauma-informed complaint services. Now, as I said, our work in this is not finished. We've drawn the sector's attention to this. We expect the sector to own this and to take the opportunity not just to do a surface response to us, in terms of a tick-a-box compliance response, but to properly modify their processes, policies and practices and the education and responsiveness of the staff involved to move those services into a more effective and trauma-informed model.

CHAIR: I have some similar questions about the mechanisms that are in place to protect students. What is the department's role when actions like this take place on universities—in terms of protests, encampments, antisemitism? I just want to confirm what the powers or the role of the department specifically would be—putting aside the regulator.

Ms Morton: As you would be aware, the Department of Education administers the Higher Education Support Act. There are a couple of complementary requirements in that act. There are the threshold standards, which TEQSA is responsible for administering and monitoring compliance with. There are a range of requirements in the Higher Education Support Act in division 19. There are what we call quality and accountability requirements. They range from requirements around fairness. In particular, we have a Support for students policy enshrined within the Higher Education Support Act. That came into effect when legislation was introduced in January this year, I think, which required universities and higher education providers, for the first time, to really offer support—targeted and quite individual support to students—in terms of academic and non-academic support.

So the Support for students policy was announced. Every provider has to have a policy in place. They all do have a policy in place. That policy includes particular elements that go to issues where students have experienced a particularly traumatic event and need particular support in terms of any type of racism that they might be experiencing. There's then an obligation on the provider to respond to those needs of those students and to support them through that process. That is probably one of the major elements of the department's role more recently in supporting students who might be experiencing some form of racism on university campuses.

We also, of course, have included in the Higher Education Support Act the provisions for academic freedom and freedom of expression. That's also been enshrined within HESA. There's also the basic requirement that a higher education provider must treat all students fairly and must have those grievance processes that students can access. If a student has made a complaint and is unhappy with that complaint, the fundamental requirement in the act is section 19. 15. That talks about how an education provider must meet the threshold standards.

TEQSA is able to reflect a bit more for you on what those threshold standards actually are. They include student wellbeing and support, specific standards for grievance and complaints, academic freedom and freedom of speech, and also making sure that the university is able to manage risks with its operations—with its day-to-day operational appropriateness. That's about ensuring they can manage situations that have emerged.

CHAIR: In terms of taking action against universities, that's—

Ms Morton: That's a matter for the regulator.

CHAIR: Understood. While I have your attention, will the Student Ombudsman introduced last week have the powers or the ability to investigate matters around antisemitism and other forms of racism?

Ms Morton: Yes, it will. It will be able to handle any complaint that comes forward from a student or a staff member at a university, or if it's something they wish to raise through that process. It's not just limited to gender based violence but can deal with complaints of all natures.

CHAIR: How will those decisions be enforced? Sorry, I don't want to go into the bill too much, because it will be before another committee, but there will be an enforcement mechanism, I understand?

Senator Henderson interjecting—

CHAIR: Well, I'm not sure who referred it. I think everyone agrees on it, but we're having an inquiry into it anyway.

Ms Morton: As you may be aware, the National Student Ombudsman would be a specific function within the Commonwealth Ombudsman's office. It would operate and act in a similar way. If the NSO received a complaint and investigated a provider about that complaint, the ombudsman would form a view as to whether or not the provider had followed the appropriate legislative requirements and the appropriate policies that were in place, and then would make recommendations to the provider in terms of how they could improve that service.

CHAIR: You both mentioned the model code, or the French code, as it's been referred to today. That was introduced in 2019—

Ms Morton: Yes, that's correct.

CHAIR: by the previous government through legislation, I think. Robert French undertook a review to develop the model code, and there was a subsequent review, as I understand it, by Professor Sally Walker. What did that review say in relation to the terms 'free intellectual inquiry' and 'freedom of speech' as interchangeable terms? I'm not sure who would be best placed to answer that question, but it's something that's come up a bit today.

Ms Morton: I don't know if my colleagues from TEQSA have any reflections on that.

Ms Nieuwenhuis: I think we would need to take the detail on notice.

CHAIR: Sure.

Ms Nieuwenhuis: But, suffice to say here, there was a particular language previously used in the standards that conflated freedom of speech and academic freedom. The French model code separated academic freedom and freedom of speech as two distinct activities, and the Sally Walker review looked at the efficacy of each university's response to the model code and how they had developed on it and assessed whether universities had appropriately integrated the French model code into their policies and procedures around academic freedom and freedom of speech.

CHAIR: Okay. It just might seem—

Ms Morton: Chair, could I just correct myself? I made reference before to staff being able to refer complaints to the National Student Ombudsman. It's only students, my apologies.

CHAIR: That's okay. In terms of the model code—I'm trying to get through this quickly—do universities have a choice about meeting the requirements under the code? Is it a voluntary code?

Ms Nieuwenhuis: The code itself is voluntary, but the universities, under the standards and the Higher Education Support Act, have an obligation to have policies and procedures that meet the requirements of the Higher Education Support Act definition and the Higher Education Standards Framework with regard to academic freedom and freedom of speech. Most universities have adopted the model code in various shapes and forms, but they have fundamentally adopted the model code.

CHAIR: Thank you. That's really helpful. The Attorney-General's Department, thank you for your submission. I'm going to ask some technical questions—maybe the first of the day—about how the inquiry might operate. The submission speaks to the department's administration of the Australian Human Rights Commission Act and the Royal Commissions Act. I was wondering if you could provide us with a comparison of the powers under each act. Not all of them but just the key differences that stand out.

Ms Sheehan: There are some comparable powers across the Australian Human Rights Commission Act and the Royal Commissions Act. I'll try to go broadly to those powers. Both have powers to make findings and recommendations. Both have the ability to compel the production of documents or compel a witness to make a statement, although there are some differences between the Australian Human Rights Commission Act and the Royal Commissions Act on when it would be a reasonable excuse to not make a statement. I would say that's one area where there is a difference between the Australian Human Rights Commission Act and the Royal Commissions Act.

Both can hold either private hearings or private sessions in particular circumstances in order to protect vulnerable witnesses, and both have the ability to ensure that information is protected in terms of preventing the publication of evidence in order to protect witnesses. There are also some similarities in the key offences that apply under both acts. Both have provisions dealing with false and misleading evidence and in relation to the bribery and deception of witnesses and the prevention of witnesses from attending. There are some differences. The Australian Human Rights Commission Act does not have the ability to issue or apply for search warrants, whereas a royal commission can apply for a search warrant to be issued, and there are some differences in relation to the privileges against self-incrimination.

CHAIR: Will the work that the Australian Human Rights Commission is undertaking with the racism study and around antisemitism attract those powers that you just explained?

Ms Sheehan: The commission has a broad discretion under section 14 of the act to make an examination or hold an inquiry that the commission thinks fit. It would be up to the commission to determine how it undertakes its inquiry and whether it needs to hold hearings or compel witnesses to provide evidence, but there's a broad discretion for the commission to use those powers.

CHAIR: One of the issues that have been raised today is the immediacy of the action that's required to protect students and the length of time a commission of inquiry might take. I know that all of these types of inquiries are different, but, from your experience in the administration under the Attorney-General's Department, how long will it take to establish a commission of inquiry like the one proposed in the bill, and how long will it take to finish? There would be a bit of work involved, I would imagine.

Ms Sheehan: It's a little bit difficult to answer, because I think each commission of inquiry or royal commission is unique in terms of the issue that it's examining and how long it would take to conduct that inquiry. The length of time that would be provided for a royal commission would be set out in the letters patent, so it would be a matter for the government at the time to determine how much time to provide a royal commission, and there are differences. We do have the length of time that it's taken for some recent royal commissions, if that is helpful?

CHAIR: Yes.

Ms Sheehan: The aged care royal commission was 29 months. I should say this is the length of time that the royal commission took, not the length of time from the government decision to establish it but the actual work of the royal commission. The disability royal commission was 54 months; the bushfires royal commission was eight months; the defence and veteran suicide royal commission was 38 months; and the robodebt royal commission was 10 months.

CHAIR: Which one?

Ms Sheehan: Robodebt.

CHAIR: Right. My last question is to the Department of Education. We had the Human Rights Commission in front of us before, and they were talking about the funding of the study. Where is that up to in terms of the department's role and the funding of that?

Ms Morton: We have provided the initial funding to the AHRC. It's not something that I would expect the Race Discrimination Commissioner to be aware of. The chicanery of how funding gets transferred within government still remains a bit of a mystery to me.

Senator SCARR: You're not alone!

Ms Morton: We have provided the first payment to the commission. That was a couple of weeks ago, and there will be a further payment made upon delivery of the interim report.

CHAIR: Understood; thank you for that clarification. Senators we have two more minutes. Senator Henderson, do you want the call? Then I will have to wrap up.

Senator HENDERSON: I might leave it at that and put the rest of my questions on notice—you'll be very pleased to hear that, Chair—so we finish on time.

CHAIR: Thank you very much. Thank you to everyone for appearing today. I'll just seek a motion from the deputy chair around accepting tabled documents. We didn't receive very many, but we'll accept those today. I'll also seek a motion to agree that questions on notice be returned by 26 September. That concludes today's proceedings. The committee has agreed that answers to questions on notice at the hearing should be returned by the close of business 26 September 2024. I thank all witnesses who have given evidence to the committee today. I also want to thank Broadcasting and the secretariat.

PRESENT

The Hon. Steve Whan, Minister for Skills, TAFE and Tertiary Education

The CHAIR: Welcome to the second hearing of the Portfolio Committee No. 3 - Education inquiry into budget estimates 2024-2025. I acknowledge the Gadigal people of the Eora nation, the traditional custodians of the lands on which we are meeting today. I pay my respects to Elders past and present, and celebrate the diversity of Aboriginal peoples and their ongoing cultures and connections to the lands and waters of New South Wales. I also acknowledge and pay my respects to any Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander people joining us today. My name is Abigail Boyd. I am the Chair of this Committee. I welcome Minister Steve Whan and accompanying officials to this hearing. Today the Committee will examine the proposed expenditure for the portfolios of Skills, TAFE and Tertiary Education.

I ask everyone in the room to please turn their mobile phones to silent. Parliamentary privilege applies to witnesses in relation to the evidence they give today. However, it does not apply to what witnesses say outside of the hearing. I urge witnesses to be careful about making comments to the media or to others after completing their evidence. In addition, the Legislative Council has adopted rules to provide procedural fairness for inquiry participants. I encourage Committee members and witnesses to be mindful of these procedures. I welcome our witnesses and thank them for making the time to give evidence. All witnesses will be sworn prior to giving evidence. Minister, I remind you that you do not need to be sworn as you have already sworn an oath to your office as a member of Parliament. I also remind Mr Dizdar and Ms Read that you do not need to be sworn as you have already been sworn before this Committee during this inquiry.

Mr MAROUN EL KHOURY, Executive Director, Industry and Investment, Premier's Department, sworn and examined

Mr MATHEW PEARSON, Acting Executive Director, Training Services NSW, NSW Department of Education, affirmed and examined

Mr STEPHEN BRADY, Managing Director, TAFE NSW, sworn and examined

Ms JULIE TICKLE, Chief People and Culture Officer, TAFE NSW, affirmed and examined

Ms JANET SCHORER, Chief Delivery Officer, TAFE NSW, sworn and examined

Mr PATRICK WOODS, Chief Operating Officer, TAFE NSW, sworn and examined

Dr MARGOT McNEILL, Chief Product and Quality Officer, TAFE NSW, affirmed and examined

Ms FIONA RANKIN, Chief Information Officer, TAFE NSW, affirmed and examined

Mr MURAT DIZDAR, Secretary, NSW Department of Education, on former affirmation

Ms CHLOE READ, Deputy Secretary, Education and Skills Reform, NSW Department of Education, on former affirmation

The CHAIR: Today's hearing will be conducted from 9.15 a.m. to 5.30 p.m. We are joined by the Minister for the morning session only, which goes from 9.15 a.m. to 1.00 p.m., with a 15-minute break at 11.00 a.m. for morning tea. In the afternoon we will hear from departmental witnesses from 2.00 p.m. to 5.30 p.m., with a 15-minute break for afternoon tea at 3.30 p.m. During these sessions there will be questions from Opposition and crossbench members only, with 15 minutes allocated for Government questions at 10.45 a.m., 12.45 p.m. and 5.15 p.m. Today we are starting with questions from the crossbench. I want to clear something up before we go much further. Mr Dizdar, last Wednesday I asked you about the HSC Strategy program. You said:

> I've heard a bit of a fallacy around the building that we're getting rid of the HSC Strategy ... It's not the case.

Today it has been reported that the HSC Strategy is being abandoned.

The Hon. ANTHONY D'ADAM: Point of order: This hearing is directed to TAFE. The line of questioning relating to another portfolio is out of order and should not be entertained at this hearing.

The CHAIR: To the point of order: I don't know if I can take a point of order to myself, but this goes to the credibility of the witnesses in front of us. I'm happy to call them back at another time to work out whether they have breached the rules of the committees, or we could just clarify it right now.

The Hon. ANTHONY D'ADAM: Further to the point of order: I think it's actually appropriate that we deal with that issue separate from this particular hearing. If there is an issue about Mr Dizdar's testimony in relation to another estimates hearing relating to another portfolio, then that should be appropriately dealt with in a separate proceeding.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: To the point of order: Obviously there is precedent for fairly wide latitude in budget estimates hearings. If we are talking today about Skills, TAFE and Tertiary Education, I would argue that the HSC and what happens in the final years of school is quite critical to that. I think it is within the scope of this Committee.

The CHAIR: I think that's where I was going with this as well. This is clearly relevant to Skills, so I would like to at least invite a response to the question. Perhaps Mr Dizdar would like to respond to the allegation that has just been put to him.

MURAT DIZDAR: I would be happy to. Good morning to the Committee and the Chair. I stand by what I said because that is factually correct. The HSC Strategy has been a very important unit in the organisation, but it has been delivering support for between 12 and 14 HSC subjects. I don't want to get the number wrong, but there are over 70 HSC courses. We are going to double down on HSC support for our schools that go way beyond the 14 subjects that we were delivering support for with intensity. We actually want to go across all of the HSC subjects. It is true that we are realigning that directorate. It is called the Teaching, Learning and Student Wellbeing directorate. We are moving resources around and making sure that our coverage is a lot stronger and not just limited to 14 subjects. They have been valuable; we have had great feedback on that. But we have also had feedback to say, "What about all the other subjects?" That's what we have determined to do with the new structure.

The CHAIR: Thank you for that clarification. It has been suggested that 245 positions will be lost. Is that correct?

The Hon. ANTHONY D'ADAM: Point of order: I'm going to have to press this issue. This line of questioning relates to another portfolio. I'm going to have to insist that if you have a line of questioning relating to the portfolio of the Deputy Premier, those questions should be directed at a separate hearing. There is opportunity to have further hearings, but this line of questioning is not appropriate for this particular estimates hearing. If you're going to insist, we will have to go into a deliberative because I want that point of order dealt with and we will dissent from it.

The CHAIR: To the point of order: I'm mindful of what you're saying. The witness is within their rights to say that they don't want to answer it on that ground. I'm not quite sure why you feel the need to—

The Hon. ANTHONY D'ADAM: Further to the point of order: It's not up to the witness; it's about whether you have the capacity to ask questions relating to another portfolio under the resolution of the House. This hearing is directed to the Skills portfolio, not the Education portfolio. The line of questioning needs to be contained to that portfolio.

The CHAIR: Out of respect for you, Mr D'Adam, and also because I am appreciative that I am the Chair as well as the person asking the question, I will ask the Clerk for advice and come back to this line of questioning in a future round if I believe that I'm on solid ground. I will now talk about something else. Mr Whan, I understand that there was a case in February in relation to the unfair dismissal of, I think, three members of the teaching staff in TAFE. It was a decision of the Fair Work Commission. For your reference, it is Kildey and Ors v Technical and Further Education Commission [2024] FWC 383. The decision was handed down on 13 February and under that decision it was shown that those three people were unfairly dismissed. Compensation has been ordered and they have been ordered to be reinstated. How much did defending that case cost?

Mr STEVE WHAN: Thanks for the question. I will pass over for the specifics on cost as I don't have that advice. It is a decision which TAFE was disappointed with. I think there was an expectation from taxpayers in New South Wales that public service appointments should be free of any suggestions of nepotism and learners are expected to be taught by qualified teachers. That was the core of this case. TAFE accepted the outcome and is complying with the orders made by the Fair Work Commission to reinstate the three former TAFE NSW employees.

The CHAIR: Sorry, can I just stop you there because I understand you're reading from a statement and it makes it hard to follow. Just at the beginning there, are you saying that TAFE still believes that it has done the right thing in a case that the Fair Work Commission has said it did not?

Mr STEVE WHAN: I might ask Mr Brady to elaborate on that, but I certainly say we do need to be clear that we are free of any appointments which involve suggestions like this. I'll pass to Mr Brady for the specifics of this.

The CHAIR: Yes, I think we need to be very careful in a court case involving individuals where it's already been found they were unfairly dismissed and unfairly treated.

Mr STEVE WHAN: I think we need to look carefully at the reasons for those decisions, but I'll pass to Mr Brady for that.

STEPHEN BRADY: Thank you, Minister. We accept that Fair Work has made a decision and we're acting in compliance with that decision. We still stand by the reasons for the dismissals we made in the first place. We feel strongly that for a teacher to be standing in front of a classroom, and in accordance with the requirements that we have under our regulatory frameworks, that teacher needs to be fully qualified.

The CHAIR: Sorry, can we just go back, though? The Fair Work Commission found that there was no valid reason for these people to be dismissed and you're now relitigating the point—

STEPHEN BRADY: Sorry, I started by saying that I accepted the decision of the Fair Work Commission and that we're implementing that decision.

The CHAIR: I wouldn't now add to the harm that has been caused to these people by continuing to restate the position, the unfair reason—

The Hon. MARK BUTTIGIEG: Point of order: Irrespective of the merits or demerits of those particular individuals' case, the witness is answering a question and it's not really your position to tell him how to answer the question.

The CHAIR: No, that's true. I will just caution you, though, in accordance with the procedural fairness resolution, not to cast adverse reflections on people, particularly where there's been a court case.

STEPHEN BRADY: Accepted.

The CHAIR: How much did that court case cost to defend?

STEPHEN BRADY: I'll pass across to Ms Tickle, the chief people officer.

JULIE TICKLE: I think we will take on notice how much the court case cost. It was a lengthy investigation and many people were called as witnesses and provided information on the case, but in terms of the amount, we'll need to take it on notice because I don't have it in front of me, Ms Boyd.

The CHAIR: Thank you. I understand there was an initial investigation where a law firm was hired. If you could get me the cost of that, as well as the cost of defending the case, that would be very useful. Have there been any consequences for those TAFE managers who were involved in this unfair dismissal?

JULIE TICKLE: By "TAFE managers" do you mean the people who—

The CHAIR: Who made the decision to unfairly dismiss these people.

JULIE TICKLE: The person who made the ultimate decision made that decision based on the investigation and the recommendations from the investigation, so there hasn't been any action taken against that individual, no, because they based their decision on the recommendations from the investigation.

The CHAIR: Is it standard practice to order an investigation of that kind into people? I don't understand. If you have decided that someone has been unfairly or incorrectly appointed, or whatever the case was, is it then common to go and get some law firm to back up that decision? Is that standard practice for TAFE?

JULIE TICKLE: It depends on the complexity of the case. We use a combination of external law firms and we also have some internal resources that carry out investigations. This one had, as I said, a number of people that were called as witnesses and we often use external law firms to do cases like this which are a little bit more complex. I wouldn't say it's standard practice because each case is a single matter and it depends on the circumstances.

The CHAIR: Is there ever any consequence for the law firm when they get it wrong?

JULIE TICKLE: It depends, I guess, on what the circumstances are again. We use law firms on the government panel. We have a variety of law firms that we engage when we need to for investigations.

The CHAIR: Can you confirm that those TAFE managers who were involved in that dismissal are still employed by TAFE?

JULIE TICKLE: I'll need to take the question on notice because the person who made the ultimate decision is still employed by TAFE, but there are a number of TAFE managers you refer to, so I'll need to take on notice the specifics and come back to you.

Mr STEVE WHAN: Chair, I certainly would defend those managers. The issue with the court's decision was about the process, and certainly that's a problem, but I've been briefed comprehensively on what led up to this and there was certainly strong justification for investigating the case.

The CHAIR: Have you read the decision?

Mr STEVE WHAN: I've been briefed on the decision.

The CHAIR: Have you been briefed on the part of the decision where the judge or magistrate—I don't know for Fair Work Commission—said very clearly that there was no valid reason? There were two bits: Was there a valid reason for dismissal and, if there was, or even if there wasn't, was it then done fairly or was it done in a way that didn't cause harm. On both of those counts, for all three, the Justice found that there was no valid reason.

Mr STEVE WHAN: Also, as I said, I would back our TAFE, the TAFE, for taking the action of investigating this case. There was certainly, I think, justification for doing that.

The CHAIR: But you're not going to back the teachers who were unfairly dismissed?

Mr STEVE WHAN: We accept the court's decision.

The CHAIR: Can I ask you hopefully something a bit simpler? Minister, TAFE's training colleges and universities obviously have a role to play when it comes to prevention of domestic and family violence and sexual assault. What sort of primary prevention initiatives are in place in those settings at the moment?

Mr STEVE WHAN: Separate out TAFEs and universities. There are two different aspects to the way that we're engaged with that. Obviously, as TAFE is a New South Wales government body, we have direct responsibility and TAFE obviously has very strong policies in place on harassment and those issues. I'll ask

Mr Brady to elaborate on those. In the university space, we've been working with the Commonwealth closely on the initiatives coming out of the Universities Accord, which include a number of aspects of safety on campus. In my conversations with vice-chancellors—I meet regularly with vice-chancellors—we've emphasised the need for them to take action to implement the action items coming out of the Universities Accord, which we've heard quite a bit about. I can get some more detail on that from the department, but I'll start with TAFE, Mr Brady.

STEPHEN BRADY: Thank you, Minister. TAFE has a sexual harassment and sexual assault policy. In compliance with the requirements of the Public Service Commission, we've established that policy. It has two aspects to it: One is how the policy relates to staff and how staff are protected within the workplace, and the other is in relation to students. We published those policies and procedures at the end of March 2024 and we take our obligations seriously under that. We are also a member of a working group contributing to the Public Service Commission e-learning tool to help inform the rest of the sector and that's due for release later in 2024. I might see if Ms Tickle wants to add anything to that.

JULIE TICKLE: I think the only thing to add is part of that new policy is the positive duty obligations that organisations have. We are continuing to raise awareness around positive duty. We have training in place for employees and they do that training, particularly those who deal with students, and part of our student orientation and induction has some information about it as well. That's probably all I'd add.

The CHAIR: Before we leave TAFE, last estimates I asked basically how many of the TAFE campuses would have on-campus counselling for people who have experienced—in that case I was talking about sexual assault. You came back on notice saying that the campuses with onsite counsellors vary. Do you not know how many campuses have on-campus counselling?

JULIE TICKLE: Our counsellors are across the State, so not every campus has a counsellor that works out of there all the time. But our counsellors move around campuses. For example in the Mid North Coast, where I live, the counsellor looks after three campuses. However, all of the students and employees can access counselling, because we have a counselling service that is available all the time. For employees that includes EAP, but for our students, our counsellors are available. Whether they are on that campus at the time, they can still book a phone consultation with a counsellor. They always have access to counsellors. We have counsellors across the State in regional, remote and metro campuses.

The CHAIR: Are there in-person counsellors? As you said, on a Monday you can go to this campus, or that sort of thing?

JULIE TICKLE: Yes, that's right. If the counsellor covers a couple of campuses, like in the example I gave, they have regular hours. It's actually on their doors. The students can book in to see them.

The CHAIR: Are you in a position to say that every TAFE has an onsite counsellor on some days of the week?

JULIE TICKLE: No, I would not be in a position to say that. We would need to take that on notice and provide more information. What I can say is that every TAFE campus and every student at TAFE has access to counselling. Whether it is in person, via the phone or using Teams, which is the portal we use, every student has access to counselling.

The CHAIR: I appreciate that, and that's good, but the nature of trauma from sexual assault is that people sometimes need to see somebody in person, or they're really not willing to take that step. There are also people who are worried about security concerns, and there all sorts of other reasons. Can you tell me how many TAFE campuses don't have any onsite counselling?

JULIE TICKLE: We would need to take that on notice and come back.

The CHAIR: Thank you, that would be very useful.

Mr STEVE WHAN: Do you want to go to the university side of it, Ms Read?

CHLOE READ: I'll say a couple of things before we get to universities, if that's okay. I just wanted to call out that the Smart and Skilled program—some of those learners will be at TAFE—is fee free for students who are experiencing or have experienced domestic and family violence. Our adult and community education providers similarly provide support to a range of learners who experience disadvantage, including victims of domestic violence. Women make up 63 per cent of those in our adult and community education colleges.

To move to universities, last time we discussed the plan that was published in February 2024 regarding ending gender-based and sexual violence on university campuses. The Australian Government is now in a consultation phase on the shape and scope of the national student ombudsman ahead of releasing legislation to create that ombudsman towards the end of this year. They are also replacing the current voluntary code for universities with a mandatory national code. There is an expert panel being established to design that code and have that in place towards the end of the year too.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: Good morning, Minister and colleagues. It's nice to see some of you twice in one week. Welcome back for another day. I want to start with some questions about TAFE expenses. I will direct them to you, Minister, but I'm happy if you need to seek advice from any of the public servants here with you. I wanted to ask about the travel expenses, specifically for TAFE. There is some information that the Opposition has through a GIPAA. There were a number of interstate trips over the past 12 months. There were 52 trips to Melbourne, seven to Brisbane, two to Perth, 36 to the Gold Coast and also some to Adelaide and Hobart. Can you provide some information as to why there were a number of interstate trips taken and what their purpose was for TAFE staff?

Mr STEVE WHAN: I will pass over for details on that, but obviously we work very closely with other TAFEs and educational authorities around Australia, and participate in quite a number of national processes. Our TAFE expertise is also very valued in many areas. We cooperate in the delivery of a number of courses. For instance, recently one of the programs was introduced in conjunction with South Australia. But I'll pass over to Mr Brady for more detail on that.

STEPHEN BRADY: The first thing I would say in regard to the Gold Coast is that our Kingscliff campus is right next door. Largely that would be movement between campuses.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: I accept that.

STEPHEN BRADY: But to the Minister's point, there is a number of reasons we travel interstate. One would be to go and meet with other TAFEs to share information or to view some of their innovative deliver models. For example, I went to a South Australian TAFE and looked at their facility where they are on campus with university and industry around innovative manufacturing. That is informative in terms of the centres of excellence for advanced manufacturing that we're putting into place. The ability to share information and knowledge and leverage the experience of other institutions is important. We are also engaged in a number of the large reform processes that are happening at both the Commonwealth and State levels. For example, Dr McNeill is on the qualifications reform panel and travels interstate regularly to be part of that. We also attend and speak at conferences. There is a range of different reasons why we've been travelling interstate, but largely it's to do with our interactions with other TAFEs, policy reform processes that are happening and engagement in learning for our senior staff as well.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: You obviously do virtual meetings and things as well, where possible?

STEPHEN BRADY: Absolutely.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: The overall total for travel and expenses for the last financial year was $700,000. Do you know how that compares to previous years?

STEPHEN BRADY: It's a significant reduction.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: I'm happy for you to provide that on notice.

Mr STEVE WHAN: We might take that on notice.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: It would be good to know for the past couple of years. Minister, you mentioned that TAFE NSW's expertise is often wanted to be looked at by other States as well. Do you have any way that you evaluate or assess the outcomes for those trips?

Mr STEVE WHAN: Not specifically. For the reporting that goes to me for the overall budget, I approve all overseas trips, but not interstate trips, obviously. But certainly where there has been participation in a national body, I am generally informed about that. In terms of whether they are value for money, that is really for Mr Brady to work out to stay within the budgets he has been allocated and meet the saving targets on travel that he has been asked to put in place.

STEPHEN BRADY: I'll just say that with the specific saving targets that have been applied for travel right across government, we are complying with those. We are scrutinising all travel arrangements, both intrastate and interstate, very closely. I'm confident that we have a culture where we are examining the need for expenditure and where we can do things online, rather than physically. But there is value in coming together with people, particularly around complex items, to get that understanding.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: Minister, you just mentioned the international trips, and I want to quickly ask you about those. I think there were five international trips in the past 12 months. Again, do you have any detail in terms of the purpose of those trips and what the outcomes were?

Mr STEVE WHAN: I currently approve those individually when they're proposed. I may delegate that at some stage, but we'll see.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: Oversight's not a bad thing, Minister.

Mr STEVE WHAN: I see the reasons why they're going. We have a number of international operations where we deliver TAFE courses in other countries. That's a revenue raiser for TAFE and it's also an important educational opportunity and link for those other nations that are taking advantage of those courses. As part of that, some of the trips were for our experts to go across and make sure that the standards of delivery in those courses are being upheld. Our experts in TAFE also get regular invitations to international forums and conferences. Many of the trips that I have approved are actually funded by other bodies, at no cost to us. In terms of the detail I will again pass over to Mr Brady.

STEPHEN BRADY: That's right, Minister. Under the regulatory requirements for ASQA, if we're delivering internationally, we need to go and ensure that delivery is happening in accordance with the regulatory frameworks. There is a certain amount that is compliance based. There is also going over and marketing and engaging with our partners to make sure that we are sustaining our level of international engagement. Then there is some travel that is, as the Minister said, for attendance at some conferences, which is largely paid for by partners.

The last element would be where we have experts that need to go and do training internationally. Again, that tends to be paid for by partners. For instance, we deliver courses for the hospitality industry, around sommeliers and that type of thing, where we get invited to attend courses in Italy or elsewhere to make sure that our teachers are at the level of knowledge required to actually teach people who are going to be at that level within their industry. Again, that's paid for through the partners, but it comes through our books.

Mr STEVE WHAN: I've recently approved a number going to WorldSkills, which is pretty exciting, as you'd probably be well aware.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: Can I ask just for a bit of clarity? The information we have, I think there was one trip to Abu Dhabi and two to Shanghai for educational exports. Is that going to look at the quality of the courses? What was that about? Then Manila and Beijing, there's one to each of those in the information that we've been given through GIPAA.

STEPHEN BRADY: I think I have to take on notice what the purpose for each individual one was.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: If you could. I'm interested that you just mentioned that—I'm sure everyone would love a trip to Italy to go and talk about wine, and I appreciate, in all seriousness, that it has a benefit. I'm not being cheeky. For those that are overseas trips that are paid for by partners, but obviously still go through TAFE, can you provide on notice the number of those trips in the last 12 months and who the partners were in that relationship as well?

STEPHEN BRADY: Absolutely, we'll take it on notice.

Mr STEVE WHAN: Yes.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: On notice is fine. I don't expect you to have that with you today. Minister, I want to go to one more on expenses. I have to ask you—and you're probably expecting this. We did get some information about office expenses. You had quite a large catering budget, $5,233, which I think is second only to the Premier and quite a way ahead of a number of your colleagues. What was that money spent on?

Mr STEVE WHAN: As you're probably aware, we have the friends of TAFE in the New South Wales Parliament. We hosted a Parliamentary Friends of TAFE event, which was in the Speaker's courtyard. A number of members of all sides of the Parliament came along, along with 100 students, family members and teachers. I don't know if you were able to go, but it was a great event to showcase a number of the things that TAFE did. Our students did the organisation and the emceeing and provided some of the product. At the same time, there was a display in the Fountain Court of the artworks of TAFE students. That entire expenditure was on that event.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: Right, that was what that was for. Okay.

Mr STEVE WHAN: Yes, on the catering for that event.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: Would you be able to provide on notice a breakdown in terms of how much was spent on food, alcohol and other costs, if possible?

Mr STEVE WHAN: The expenditure out of my budget was only on food and the catering costs, not on the alcohol.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: Thank you, Minister. I want to turn now to some of the specifics in the budget. Are you able to tell me what the total Skills budget is for New South Wales in 2024-25?

Mr STEVE WHAN: The 2024-25 Skills budget is $3.2 billion, which is $2.9 billion in recurrent expenditure and $301 million in capital funding. It's a 3.4 per cent increase over the original 2023-24 budget. In TAFE the budget is $2.5 billion, which includes $2.2 billion in recurrent funding and $301 million capital. In 2024-25, around about 79.9 per cent of the Skills budget will be going to TAFE. It's an increase of about 4.9 per cent over the previous year's budget in TAFE, and capital is around about the same.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: So $3.2 billion is your overall budget allocation?

Mr STEVE WHAN: Correct.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: I then want to ask about some of the capital works. In Budget Paper No. 03—I don't know if you've got it in front of you—on page 4-31 where it lists TAFE, it just says "Capital Projects" and "Various" under "New Works". I think there's $88.4 million estimated cost, and the allocation this year is $22.6 million. Are you able to indicate which of the new capital projects are covered through that bucket of money?

Mr STEVE WHAN: I will in general, and then I'll pass over to TAFE to give you some more detail. The breakdown of the capital program for this year is around $90 million for the asset renewal program and $37 million for digital access foundation. There's a specific $17.8 million for Kingscliff campus and $21.6 million for Coffs Harbour optimisation project.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: Sorry, I see that in front of me. I'm really interested in the new works.

Mr STEVE WHAN: So you're particularly interested in the $90 million?

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: Yes, I'm interested in the new works that's at the top of that. All the others are listed on the table and that's easy to see. I'm just wondering what capital projects are new works, or what will be starting under that.

Mr STEVE WHAN: A lot of the work that we are doing is maintenance and upgrades of TAFE campuses. We have some quite serious maintenance problems that have been left in TAFE over the years, so a lot of that is going to maintenance programs. We are doing quite a lot of work in digital, so upgrading wi-fi in many of the TAFEs, which hadn't been upgraded since 2009. There is a very large list of projects under that.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: Can I just ask on that—sorry, Minister. I didn't mean to interrupt you. "Digital access foundation" is listed as a separate item in works in progress; so is "asset renewal program". Is that what the maintenance upgrades fall under? The "Capital Projects", the "New Works"—I'm just really keen to know which campuses or what that part is referring to, as opposed to works in progress.

Mr STEVE WHAN: I'll ask Mr Brady to elaborate on that.

STEPHEN BRADY: Sorry, Ms Mitchell, could you repeat the number that you're referring to?

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: It's page 4-31 of Budget Paper No. 03. Up the top of the table, under "Major Works", it says "New Works", "Capital Projects", "Various". Over the course of the next four years it's an $88 million estimated total cost, and this year's allocation is $22.6 million. I'm curious as to what falls into that "Capital Projects" $22.6 million for this financial year.

STEPHEN BRADY: The $88 million consists of a number of elements. One is there are minor works projects, which consists of a range of small projects, really. I'd have to come back to you with a breakdown of what that is.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: Do you think you could have that this afternoon, if you could try?

STEPHEN BRADY: We'll come back with what we can.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: That would be good. Thank you.

The Hon. RACHEL MERTON: Thank you very much, Minister and officials. Minister, is the Government still committed to the relocation of the Bankstown TAFE?

Mr STEVE WHAN: Relocation and then putting it back? Yes, we are still a part of the project to build a new Bankstown hospital, which will include on the site a new TAFE campus. There is quite a lot of planning that has been going on since I last talked about this at a previous estimates. TAFE has been very closely involved with Health in planning what we need to have in the new TAFE building to cater for the courses that we want to continue to offer there in Bankstown. TAFE has also been looking at the options for the temporary relocation of the TAFE and looking at options within the Bankstown CBD area there.

I think when I talked about this at my first budget estimates in this portfolio, I talked about understanding that the people who are at the Bankstown TAFE, for many of the courses that we had, needed to have access in a very close proximity to public transport. We're still very focused on that. Planning has progressed quite a long way. We've got a strong idea, working with Health, of what will need to be included in the new TAFE buildings and the new opportunities that might come from being co-located with a health facility and also with a facility that has a large element of hospitality as well. I can ask Mr Brady to elaborate further on that.

The Hon. RACHEL MERTON: I'm happy to maybe in the afternoon session, if that's okay. I'm conscious of everybody's time. Minister, I appreciate the planning work and what you've mentioned there. Is there any thinking around the estimated cost of relocating the TAFE?

Mr STEVE WHAN: For specifics, I'll ask Mr Brady to elaborate on that aspect of it. Obviously, the budget overall—

The Hon. RACHEL MERTON: Have costs been part of the planning in terms of the discussion? That's all. We're just wanting to know the costs on some of this stuff.

Mr STEVE WHAN: They're not finalised yet, but obviously there's a budget been announced for the actual hospital development, and we expect the TAFE costs to be included within that. I'll pass over to Mr Brady for detail on that.

STEPHEN BRADY: You're exactly right, Minister. We're in the middle of scoping, still, of the service delivery for our requirements within Bankstown. We're in close engagement with Health Infrastructure. We need to develop a business case together. There will be a single business case that we're anticipating going forward to Government that covers to the delivery of the combined TAFE and hospital on the campus. I can't give you a number now. We're still in the process of doing the planning. But what will need to be covered through that is obviously the relocation of the existing delivery to a temporary location and then relocation back into the new combined campus in Bankstown.

The Hon. RACHEL MERTON: Mr Brady, given that the Minister—recognising the varied courses and the range of courses on offer currently at Bankstown, will there be one or several temporary sites for the relocation?

STEPHEN BRADY: We anticipate going out to market for interest in the local Bankstown CBD to see what is available. Our strong preference would be to have a single site but you would appreciate that it is a fairly large footprint that we need and we anticipate there will be a limited number of spaces that could accommodate us on one space. It may be necessary to have more than one space but our strong preference would be to have a single space.

Mr STEVE WHAN: There are some courses which need outdoor space, which we would be looking at putting somewhere else.

STEPHEN BRADY: I think we flagged previously that it's likely that, for instance, our animal veterinary related courses will move to Padstow, so we'll accommodate that in other ways.

The Hon. RACHEL MERTON: Are there any costs known as to the new campus—reinstating the campus onto the existing site?

STEPHEN BRADY: Not at this stage. You would appreciate that planning a combined TAFE and hospital facility is a complex exercise and that that work is underway.

The Hon. RACHEL MERTON: So there is no budget provision or there have been no budget proposals put forward?

STEPHEN BRADY: I think the Minister mentioned there was an initial budget that was part of the announcement. We're now doing the detailed work around our requirements and, if there is a need for a different budget, then that is something which we'll discuss with the Government.

The Hon. RACHEL MERTON: I'm aware that—I think it was in 1999, and this is pre-me in this Parliament—the $1.3 billion was committed to the new Bankstown Hospital. My questions today are for you in your capacity here as the Minister for Skills, TAFE and Tertiary Education. Is there any budget provision within Skills, Training and TAFE for the TAFE—for the temporary relocation and the reinstatement of the TAFE?

Mr STEVE WHAN: For Bankstown TAFE?

The Hon. RACHEL MERTON: I'm not talking Health; I'm talking Bankstown TAFE.

Mr STEVE WHAN: No, there is no provision within the Skills budget for any of the costs related to the change to Bankstown. We would expect that to be covered in the Health allocation.

The Hon. RACHEL MERTON: As part of the $1.3 billion for the new hospital?

Mr STEVE WHAN: As part of the overall cost of the project.

The Hon. RACHEL MERTON: Is there any indication, just for families, for students—the time frame on this?

Mr STEVE WHAN: Time frames? Not at the moment. Mr Brady might be able to elaborate on what information we may have got from Health about this, but we will be obviously planning to give as much notice as we can. But Mr Brady might have a time frame on this.

STEPHEN BRADY: I think we're still working through that detail. The challenge obviously for TAFE NSW is, with our academic calendar, we don't want to be moving in the middle of a semester. We very much will want to move and minimise the disruption on students. That means that we need to be planning around that calendar. At this stage, until we've got the clarity around where we can move to, what level of fit-out would be required so we can continue to deliver our courses, it's very hard to say exactly what the time frame is.

The CHAIR: Minister, under the previous Coalition Government the TAFE model was getting less and less interactive with actual teachers and resulted in a lot of curriculum assessment materials and other things being outsourced. I understand that has now got to the point where sometimes content has no context in the classroom at all. Have you put in place any changes for that? Are there any moves afoot to try to bring teachers back into curriculum development?

Mr STEVE WHAN: There's probably a long and complex answer to this, but I'll start on it and we'll see how we go. We've obviously just undertaken the VET review, which is really seeking to set the direction for our vocational training in New South Wales. A key component of that was about recommending that we look at the structure of TAFE so that it is able to better—and we are moving to a new operating model, which is designed to enable our TAFE to actually better interact with its relevant industries but also to re-engage with local communities. We're in the process of that.

There are a number of elements of this. I'll get Mr Brady to elaborate on some of this, but there is a lot of complexity that I've discovered in TAFE for teachers in terms of the curriculum development process because, when you have nationally accredited programs, it comes with a lot of admin that teachers have to do, and every time there's a change to an element of the curriculum or a qualification, that's actually quite burdensome for TAFE teachers. There is a huge amount of TAFE teachers' time which is actually taken up in assessment, in ticking off on an apprentice's qualifications, in changing their courses to meet changes that happen to the national standards and curriculums and those sorts of things. A lot of what's coming out of the VET review will help us to simplify some of that over time and give teachers more opportunity to teach face to face in classes.

The CHAIR: Is the VET review finalised? Is it public?

Mr STEVE WHAN: The VET review was released a couple of weeks ago—the final report. It's pretty big. We had six recommendations in the first one, 21 in the second with—I counted—61 different points in them. So there is quite a lot in it. We've also got some fairly—some of the systems which TAFE uses need to be continued to be worked on in terms of the admin that teachers have to go through. I think there's some pretty big challenges there. But we certainly accept that there is a lot of complexity in the way that teachers have to go about changing and modifying curriculum. One of the elements of the VET review was to allow TAFE to trial being a self-accrediting organisation and we'd like to trial that with the centres of excellence in manufacturing. That, I think, recognises the complexity that comes out of the national process. Universities obviously self-accredit. TAFE hasn't been allowed to do that but, as the biggest educational provider in Australia, we think that it's reasonable for them to be moving down that path. There's quite a lot to unpack. I'll ask Mr Brady. He might be able to give a more concise summary than me.

The CHAIR: I'll come to Mr Brady in a minute. Under the previous Government there was a statement of where they were going with this, and it appears a lot through the eTendering records, which I find interesting. The statement is, "TAFE NSW is reimagining its approach to developing training product, moving to a multi-tier, multi-channel approach to ensure an improved and efficient approach to training product development at scale", which I take is shorthand for, "We're going to do a lot of online courses." Has that approach changed? Have you given any directions, Minister, to change that approach? Or are you still building on that?

Mr STEVE WHAN: I'm not sure about that fairly wordy little explanation that they put in there about it. We certainly haven't moved away from doing online delivery where it's appropriate. That's quite important for us to be doing that and we're offering a number of short courses and micro-credentials via that aspect, so there's quite a lot of development going on in terms of developing credentials which meet the needs of learners more directly—obviously, alongside the traditional apprenticeships and certs and traineeships. They're all very important, but we're very conscious of the need to be providing an educational product in a way which is accessible for people around the State.

I think out of the VET review we will see some positive work over time, both on the structure of TAFE and the way that it delivers, making sure that we do reduce some of the workload by—in some ways we had a halfway model. We didn't really have a statewide model for TAFE. We are moving to change the operating model to enhance local engagement but also to allow us to work more closely with industry, to be more responsive to industry in the way that things change to try to get better sharing of some of the expertise that's around. I go around to a lot of TAFEs obviously and talk to people working in particular areas. They'll often say, "Well, I hear such and such down in the south of the State is doing this. I wish we could do that sort of thing." There's this opportunity to actually much better share some of the best practices going around as we move through. Perhaps Mr Brady might be more familiar with the words that you used from the previous Government. He might elaborate on that.

The CHAIR: Can I just focus that question then? As you may know, I take a particular interest in the use of consultants, and I love to look through the eTendering website as a pastime. One of the things that drew my attention is actually a contract variation with Ernst & Young, and it falls under this product development program. This variation was published on 9 May this year, and we've gone from just over $820,000 to an amended contract amount of just over $2 million but where the duration hasn't changed. What is that work that EY is doing? Why are they doing it and are they doing it in consultation with teachers? What's the deal with that?

Mr STEVE WHAN: I'll ask Mr Brady to answer.

STEPHEN BRADY: Thank you, Ms Boyd. I think we have spoken at previous hearings about the use of consultants in product development. Certainly what we're doing is looking very closely at the way we produce new training product and assessments. The challenge we have had in previous years has been a very high rate of change in the training packages coming through from the Commonwealth. We had a centralised model of product development which struggled to keep pace, hence we are having to leverage the use of external parties. We've been changing that model over the past couple of years, and our operating model actually accelerates that change to enable greater use of our teaching workforce.

Teachers are experts in their field, and we draw on them as subject matter experts. But beyond that, there is a capability, particularly with some of our longer-standing teachers who have a full teaching qualification, to be engaged in curriculum development. The model we're moving towards is having a multi-tiered approach. We have very complex changes done within our central team using subject matter expert teachers. But for the less complex changes, we're actually leveraging those teachers more and more. Part of their duties is not only delivering teaching and assessment but also delivering work towards curriculum development. I might ask Dr McNeill to talk a little bit more about it. What that's doing is enabling us to use less external resources.

The CHAIR: Why have we got double the amount going to EY then under this contract variation?

STEPHEN BRADY: I think if we explore that, you'll see that it's coming down actually.

The CHAIR: But it's double from 9 May this year.

STEPHEN BRADY: I think we need the detail.

MARGOT McNEILL: Yes. Thank you for the question. As Mr Brady explained, this has been a process for us where we're continually driving down our reliance on external partners because we work very closely with them to make sure that we always have TAFE NSW subject matter expertise from the teachers but also project oversight. I'll take the Committee back a couple of steps though, because our primary requirement in the product development space is to make sure that the materials are going to be ready in the very complex environment that the Minister explained. In some cases, we have externally imposed changes to the training packages which we need to respond to very quickly. We're not always able to do that relying on our internal sources of our teachers and our own internal project teams. Therefore, we rely on others. If I talk about the training package changes, that's really only one of the sources of changes we have. So, for example—

The CHAIR: Sorry, can I just draw you back to this though? Ernst & Young were hired. We had an original contract duration from 1 September 2022 to 1 September 2025. We have an amended contract with a duration of the exact same time. Why was that three-year contract worth $820,000 when it was first signed and now as of 9 May it is up to $2 million?

MARGOT McNEILL: It would be because we have additional requirements to meet these changes. For example, where the building changes, building codes change for specific courses. If Ernst & Young—they're one of the 31 providers on the panel that we have to work with us as external partners.

The CHAIR: The way that I understand e-tendering to work is that there's a tender put out for a specific scope of work. If there was to be an expansion of that scope, then you would consider that as a separate thing. It would be an additional amount that would go under an additional contract. There's no explanation as to why this has just increased.

MARGOT McNEILL: I'll have to come back to the Committee with that information on notice for the specifics about that contract.

The CHAIR: That would be very useful.

MARGOT McNEILL: But it will be because of the external changes we have experienced.

The CHAIR: Right. In which case, there should have been another contract process undertaken or a registering on eTendering of an additional amount. There's no explanation in this. There's another one here to a Strawberry Solutions company. This is a 3½-year contract from 1 September 2022 to 24 February 2026. This one has gone from $460,000 to $2.2 million. That's over four times the increase in value. Both of these were registered with eTendering on 9 May. How can that be such an increase under the same contract?

MARGOT McNEILL: Again, I'll have to come back with the details on notice. But it will be because we work with those external partners on the material development.

The CHAIR: Minister, does it worry you, the lack of transparency over these sorts of contracts?

Mr STEVE WHAN: I don't think there's a lack of transparency in terms of us knowing what they're doing. I think that's pretty clear within TAFE. There are some jobs that we have to do.

The CHAIR: It's not being conveyed to the public.

Mr STEVE WHAN: In terms of not being able to provide that information, we'll do our best to provide that information for you.

The CHAIR: I'm hearing that some of the micro-courses that have been generally well received—people like the idea of being able to do a micro-course—have some sort of product placement or reference to—

Mr STEVE WHAN: You mean advertising?

The CHAIR: Yes—particular companies and things in it. Is that true?

Mr STEVE WHAN: I'll ask Mr Brady to answer that.

STEPHEN BRADY: I'm certainly not aware of that, Ms Boyd, so if you could provide us with specifics we'd more than happily look into it.

The CHAIR: That's certainly not the intention though?

STEPHEN BRADY: No.

The CHAIR: Who has been doing those micro-courses? Who has been creating those? Sorry, "short courses" I think you call them.

Mr STEVE WHAN: TAFE creates them but I suspect we do have partners in a number of them.

STEPHEN BRADY: For instance, in our institutes of applied technology, we develop those in conjunction with industry and with university partners. An individual micro-credential could be developed by one of the universities or it could be by us or it could be a combination with industry. Although, TAFE NSW, we do a lot of our own micro-credentials as well in other areas. There's a range of ways in which they get created.

The CHAIR: Are you able to provide me perhaps on notice with the 31 providers that you have creating these products and how much each of their contracts are?

Mr STEVE WHAN: Along the lines of the EY and Strawberry Solutions ones that we had before?

STEPHEN BRADY: Right, okay.

Mr STEVE WHAN: Yes.

The CHAIR: That would be really useful. It's a welcome thing to have online courses and to have that option for people. I think the concern comes when people feel that's replacing face-to-face teaching. What effort is made, particularly with these online courses packaged up by other providers, to make sure that they can be adapted for the particular needs of the region that they're being delivered in? Even for simple things like places with high levels of CALD communities and First Nations communities, what's done to adjust the curriculum?

Mr STEVE WHAN: I will hand that over to Mr Brady in a moment, but we're certainly very conscious of the need for additional support for many parts of the community and wraparound support. It's a very strong focus out of the VET review, and it has been a strong focus of government policy for the whole training sector, not just TAFE. We made a significant change in allowing people to combine the assistance if they were in different disadvantaged groups rather than only being able to access one element of the assistance, which is really important in terms of enabling wraparound support for people. Obviously in terms of delivery, we're also very conscious of where things are being delivered and what the markets are. I understand people saying that they don't always like online delivery. Some people love it; some don't. But it is designed to extend our availability rather than replace. I'll ask Mr Brady to elaborate on that.

STEPHEN BRADY: I think it's important to appreciate that there are a range of different delivery modes that we use. As a vocational education provider, a lot of what we teach requires hands-on experience. There are motor skills required. The example I tend to use is that you can't learn to strip down a heavy diesel engine online. A lot of our courses are delivered face to face. There may be an element of online in there. It might be, for instance, a work health and safety element or an induction element, which we can absolutely do online as part of any course. We then have online courses where they're delivered by a teacher in an online classroom, so there's a cohort that's together through the delivery of that course and the teachers are there supporting them.

Mr STEVE WHAN: Which is live, so they actually get the interaction directly with the teacher. I have seen some of those in action. They're very good.

STEPHEN BRADY: And those students might be anywhere around the State coming together in a cohort with that teacher. And then there is self-paced learning, where you can register at any time, log in and engage in the course and progress with the course at your own pace and there is support available to you as you progress. The suitability of those we really judge around the nature of the course that's being delivered. As I said, there are some courses where you absolutely have to have the practical element and then there are others where that's not so much the case. We take into account the nature of the cohorts that we're delivering to—some require more support that others. We have been looking at, in that self-paced area, the way in which we develop the curriculum to make sure it makes it as easy as possible for the student to engage. We also have educational support officers who can lend support to learners where they hit a road bump. There are a range of supports there to support learners through. It's not the case that we're trying to replace instructor-led or teacher-led training with online. That's definitely not the case.

The CHAIR: Is there additional support, then? I understand that TAFE had a multicultural plan that ran from 2020-22 and there were multicultural coordinators and other people. I have lost track of where that got to. I'm not sure I ever saw any review of whether it met its targets.

STEPHEN BRADY: We had our diversity and inclusion council meeting yesterday, where we discussed the development of our new multicultural plan, which will be launched in December of this year. We still have our multicultural support network in our campuses. We still obviously support a lot of learners who have English as a second language. They're wraparound supports for those individuals. I might ask Ms Tickle if she'd like to add anything to that.

JULIE TICKLE: Yes, certainly. Our multicultural plan, as Mr Brady said, is being released in December. We extended the multicultural plan that we had from 2020 to 2022 because of COVID. We work very closely with some of the communities, particularly in Western Sydney, where we have a higher multicultural population. As an example, in Bankstown campus, they partnered with Canterbury and Bankstown-Lidcombe hospitals and Metro Assist and they supported a refugee and newly arrived migrant health career pathways program. We also have the AMEP or Adult Migrant English Program. We provided training to just over 18,000 migrants through that program. Another program that we delivered successfully with Nepean Hospital was a job readiness program, where 39 people gained employment from multicultural refugee communities at the end of that program. Our multicultural plan, which we saw yesterday, is in draft to be delivered in December. Our multicultural staff network has been very involved in the development of that plan.

The Hon. RACHEL MERTON: Minister, I return to Bankstown TAFE. Could just confirm that, in terms of the relocation of the Bankstown TAFE, there's no funding budget provision within the training budget for the relocation of the Bankstown TAFE?

Mr STEVE WHAN: That's correct.

The Hon. RACHEL MERTON: In terms of future budgets?

Mr STEVE WHAN: I couldn't say whether, once we have finalised everything, there might be an element that that budget might sit within our budget but, at this stage, there has been nothing allocated directly to the Skills budget for that project.

STEPHEN BRADY: Our discussion with Health and Health Infrastructure is that that will be part of the overall project budget.

The Hon. RACHEL MERTON: Minister, is there any budget provision or has there been a budget proposal put forward by you in terms of the building of the new Bankstown TAFE on the proposed hospital site?

Mr STEVE WHAN: No. As Mr Brady is suggesting, we would expect it all to be a part of the one proposal that goes for consideration by the Government.

The Hon. RACHEL MERTON: The $1.3 billion committed to redevelop the Bankstown hospital is relevant to the Bankstown hospital, in terms of Health. Is there a precedent here that TAFE can somehow fit in the back blocks of the new hospital?

Mr STEVE WHAN: It's going to be an integral part of the site and we're working very hard with Health to make sure that the projects are delivered together. We are planning together with Health. It is a single project and our consistent conversation with Health and myself with the Minister is that this is a hospital and a TAFE project and that that's the way it's progressing.

The Hon. RACHEL MERTON: But there is the absence of any reference to TAFE, in terms of a $1.3 billion and in terms of Health. The money has gone to Health. It's for the new hospital.

Mr STEVE WHAN: The allocations are indicated with Health but, in all the announcements around it, it has continually talked about TAFE as well. I am comfortable with where we're at, at the moment, on the project.

The Hon. RACHEL MERTON: Are there any documents that you could table to say that TAFE is part of this health precinct?

Mr STEVE WHAN: I believe there have been some publicly available media releases about it and we continue to have discussions with the NSW Health and Health Infrastructure about the proposals. Mr Brady is in—I don't know how regular communication, but he is in regular communication with them.

The Hon. RACHEL MERTON: Minister, the department of health report as to why the redevelopment of the Bankstown hospital is required is because the Bankstown area is likely to grow by 21 per cent to nearly a million people. The increased health needs need to be met, hence the case for the new hospital. What does that say, in terms of the training needs in the south-west? If health needs are increasing with 21 per cent and nearly a million people, what about training?

Mr STEVE WHAN: Mr Brady can elaborate on this, but we are planning for the future needs of the area in the proposal that we have put in with Health.

STEPHEN BRADY: Absolutely. Bankstown is a critical location for us, given not only the growth in that population but also the demographics. There's a strong migrant population. We know from our experience that a lot of those learners will stay within their communities and won't travel a long distance to go to training. It's important that we have a strong base in the Bankstown area and that we're there and able to accommodate growth. Our planning is not for necessarily what we're delivering today but it is what we will need going forward as well.

Mr STEVE WHAN: I think it's pretty exciting that we're going to have a new TAFE at Bankstown. I think that's a really exciting prospect. I think it's a positive all round.

The Hon. RACHEL MERTON: Minister, in summary—and please correct me on this—we've got no time frame for the relocation; we've got no temporary site for the relocation, whether it's a single site or a multiple site; we've got no budget provision in the current budget or future budgets; and there has been no budget proposal put forward to support the TAFE. What do we know?

Mr STEVE WHAN: That characterisation is not quite right. We know that there is a budget provision for the hospital project, which includes the construction of the TAFE and includes the relocation of the TAFE while construction is underway. We have been exploring the market already to see what options are there for the temporary location for TAFE, and we'll progress to the market more formally when the project is given the go-ahead. Mr Brady can talk a bit more about the timing on that.

STEPHEN BRADY: I think we're anticipating going out to the market very soon to establish what capacity there is in Bankstown CBD for temporary facilities. We'll have an answer to that, which then helps us to build the cost base and the timings in order to inform the business case to come forward to government.

The Hon. RACHEL MERTON: What do students know?

STEPHEN BRADY: We've communicated to students the fact that there is the project. We have communicated our commitment to the Bankstown CBD, that there will be a relocation and temporary facility, and that more information will be made available as it comes to light.

The Hon. RACHEL MERTON: In terms of the $88.4 million in the budget papers in terms of new works—

Mr STEVE WHAN: That does not include Bankstown.

The Hon. RACHEL MERTON: So Bankstown TAFE is not part of that?

Mr STEVE WHAN: No, it's not, and I wouldn't want it to be because we would want lots more in our budget if we were including Bankstown. I'm comfortable with the fact that it is going as a single project with Health.

The Hon. RACHEL MERTON: Is there precedence here, where we've got money committed to a new hospital and then, all of a sudden, it's going to include a new TAFE campus?

Mr STEVE WHAN: It's not all of a sudden. From day one, when the Government announced the Bankstown site, we've talked about it being a new TAFE as well. That has been very clear from the Government's original announcements on this, and it has been consistently clear from my discussions with the health Minister and from TAFE's discussions with Health.

STEPHEN BRADY: That's correct.

The Hon. RACHEL MERTON: Minister, is there any precedence for this?

Mr STEVE WHAN: I'd have to ask others. There is certainly precedence for co-located facilities; I'm not sure of the single-budget approach.

STEPHEN BRADY: I think, given that the intention is to build a hospital on an active TAFE campus, we have to take a whole-of-government perspective. We know the importance of the Bankstown community for Health but also for Skills, so taking a single view and a single business case is the only sensible way that you could do this. Health needs that land in order to be able to build that hospital, and we need that land in order to be able to deliver skills in Bankstown. Bringing the two together is the sensible way forward.

The Hon. RACHEL MERTON: Minister, what's the latest on Gosford TAFE?

Mr STEVE WHAN: The Gosford TAFE project has had a business case done for it, but the Government hasn't decided to fund that at this stage.

The Hon. RACHEL MERTON: So Gosford TAFE wouldn't fall within that $88 million bucket of money that we're to learn about?

Mr STEVE WHAN: No, that's not included in that.

The Hon. RACHEL MERTON: Do we have a time frame in terms of Gosford TAFE?

Mr STEVE WHAN: I'll ask Mr Brady to elaborate but, no, at this stage it is not funded by Government. We have a business case that is there, but at this stage it is not funded to progress.

STEPHEN BRADY: It's exactly as the Minister said. The business case, as you'd be aware, is predicated on moving onto the old Gosford council chambers site. We have agreed with the council to extend the arrangement we have, which potentially gives us access to that site. That remains an open consideration for the Government. We are looking at where there are other ways that we can shape the timing and the cost of the project, but we still believe it's an important business case for TAFE NSW.

The Hon. RACHEL MERTON: Minister, at an earlier estimates you reported that you "expected to give certainty on the project".

Mr STEVE WHAN: I can't yet.

The Hon. RACHEL MERTON: Is there anything you can elaborate on that?

Mr STEVE WHAN: No, I can't yet. I'm sorry about that.

The Hon. RACHEL MERTON: Minister, in terms of trying to gain certainty on this, was a budget proposal considered for Gosford TAFE?

Mr STEVE WHAN: I'm not going to go into any considerations in Cabinet or ERC. Suffice to say we have extended the option with the council on the site and we will continue to talk within Government about the project.

The Hon. RACHEL MERTON: Have you held discussions with the council relating to the proposed site?

Mr STEVE WHAN: I haven't directly, but TAFE has continued to negotiate with council over it.

The Hon. RACHEL MERTON: Have you held discussions with the member for Gosford? I think she has been rather vocal and supportive of this.

Mr STEVE WHAN: I have certainly been talking to the very strong advocate in the member for Gosford, Liesl Tesch.

The Hon. RACHEL MERTON: What do we know about the student cohort on the Central Coast in terms of their training needs?

Mr STEVE WHAN: I'll ask Mr Brady to elaborate on that. We have a number of facilities on the Central Coast, obviously, and there is growing demand there. We have a couple of challenging areas. Ourimbah is one where we have a TAFE as well. We are going through a process statewide of attempting to plan for our future needs in TAFE on the basis of the skills that we know are going to be needed over time, rather than on historical provision and the availability of teachers. That's going to be a process which is really important to planning, delivery, localising, and making sure that we understand the local communities and their skills needs over time. It's actually quite a big change. The Central Coast will be a part of that. We've done some significant planning in terms of thinking about Gosford, but we're also thinking about what to provide at the other TAFE campuses in the area. We are about to start work on a new facility at Wyong, is my understanding.

STEPHEN BRADY: It's an animal care facility that's well underway.

Mr STEVE WHAN: There are a number of things we are providing on the Central Coast. Perhaps Mr Brady can elaborate on the planning for the future needs there.

STEPHEN BRADY: We are very much trying to take a view that all our infrastructure and digital capabilities should be driven by our training needs. We are taking a longer term planning approach where we are looking at not only what we are delivering there today but what will be needed into the future. That looks at all the data that's available to us from NCVER and ABS et cetera, from a top-down perspective, about what's driving training needs analysis. We are then engaging with local communities around what's required in those local areas and planning as a network of campuses. For instance, as the Minister said, we've got the Gosford campus and we've also got Wyong and Ourimbah in that area. How do we deliver the skills required across those sites? We're trying not to duplicate but also making sure we're cognisant of the travel distance for students to get to courses that they want to do.

The Hon. RACHEL MERTON: I think this afternoon it would be good to learn more about this. Minister, just in summary, in terms of the Gosford TAFE, we've got a growing student cohort there. We've had investment in terms of universities and other training facilities, but we've got no budget commitment for a new TAFE at Gosford and no time frame.

Mr STEVE WHAN: I can confirm at this stage that we have no budget commitment for the relocation or new TAFE at Gosford.

The Hon. RACHEL MERTON: In terms of the existing TAFE facilities at the moment, what do we know about that? I've had reports from teachers there that the conditions are appalling and "you owe it to us to give us a responsible and safe place of work".

Mr STEVE WHAN: We know that that campus, like many, was allowed to run down significantly under the previous Government. I am certainly also hearing that it is an old campus and in need of work.

The Hon. RACHEL MERTON: Have you visited the Gosford TAFE campus, Minister?

Mr STEVE WHAN: I have not visited that current campus, no, at this stage. Mr Brady can elaborate on that.

STEPHEN BRADY: We are investing to maintain that campus in a state where it's fit for delivery, so we are ensuring that that essential maintenance occurs. There is $700,000 being spent at that campus this financial year. Depending on the timing with relocation, we've got plans going forward about how much we would need to spend to maintain the campus. But certainly, it is an environment which is aged. It is challenging because it has been built on the slope of a hill, with a significant road running through the middle of the campus. Absolutely, we as an organisation would look forward to relocation, but we are investing to maintain the suitability and safety of the site for delivery in the meantime.

The Hon. RACHEL MERTON: In terms of relocation, a business case has been prepared?

Mr STEVE WHAN: A business case has been prepared for consideration. Obviously this is a project which, like all projects, needs to be seen in the context of the overall Government priorities and budget position. To be very clear, there was no forward allocation to this project made when we came into government, even though I understand there had been some community discussions about it. No commitment had been made to it.

The Hon. RACHEL MERTON: I'm aware of the work—like the member for Gosford, the member for Terrigal has been very active on this.

Mr STEVE WHAN: The member for Gosford and the Minister for the Central Coast have certainly spoken to me extensively about this project. They are very strong advocates for this project, and I suspect that they will continue to be. I have heard the member for Terrigal talking in Parliament, but he certainly did not get an allocation of funds to get the project going when he was a part of government.

The Hon. RACHEL MERTON: In terms of next steps, in terms of Gosford TAFE, it's on the list and under review?

Mr STEVE WHAN: As Mr Brady said, we've agreed with council to extend the option over the site. That enables us to continue to talk about whether or not the project could fit into the Government's priorities in the medium term.

The Hon. RACHEL MERTON: In terms of budget allocation, would Gosford TAFE fall under new works?

Mr STEVE WHAN: If there was an allocation to it, it would appear, I suspect, with its own line item because it would be a very major project, but it's not in there at the moment.

The Hon. RACHEL MERTON: On one hand we're just propositioning, if there was a commitment to the Gosford TAFE, possibly a line item, how it would be addressed in the budget, but when we come to Bankstown TAFE there's nothing.

Mr STEVE WHAN: Very different projects. Let's be really clear about this. If we're building a new TAFE, as TAFE on a block of land that TAFE owns, then it appears in our budget. The Bankstown project is a project that's being done jointly with Health. We've made it very clear from the outset that that is the way the process is going. It will have an allocation for the project overall. We've been absolutely clear about that.

The Hon. RACHEL MERTON: In terms of the materials or the agreement or the references that you've made that the $1.3 billion for the new Bankstown hospital will include the new Bankstown TAFE—could they be made available to the Committee, in terms of the materials, the agreement, the reference?

Mr STEVE WHAN: We will take on notice the public information that's been provided and provide that information and any other information we're able to release at this stage.

The Hon. RACHEL MERTON: Minister, is it fair that students and families in the south-west feel like the Bankstown TAFE relocation in the hospital precinct is a downgrade—a downgrade to TAFE?

Mr STEVE WHAN: That would be totally unjustified.

The Hon. RACHEL MERTON: A downgrade to the campus?

Mr STEVE WHAN: No. I totally reject that. It's a great opportunity to get a new TAFE.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: With no money for it.

Mr STEVE WHAN: A fantastic opportunity to get a new TAFE. We will have an entirely new building. We'll be able to really leverage on the opportunities of being on the same campus as a hospital in terms of our health—TAFE is really critical in the provision of health training in New South Wales. We'll have the opportunity to really work directly with the health campus. We'll also have some other really interesting opportunities we can explore in terms of hospitality, for example, because the hospital will inevitably have a number of hospitality businesses and activities going on. I think there are some fabulous opportunities. I think people who are interested in the future of the Bankstown TAFE should be really excited about it—very positive.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: Minister, just to pick up on that, you've said in answers to my colleague you don't have a separate budget, you're not quite sure exactly how much you'll get from the Health funding. How can you be confident that you're going to be able to offer everything that you're saying when you actually have a zero budget allocation at this point?

Mr STEVE WHAN: As with all projects, there is a process of doing planning and then going out and getting cost estimates of how much it's going to end up as. We're very comfortable with the elements of the TAFE. As you've heard from Mr Brady, we're actually planning for the future provision of training through TAFE in Bankstown and catering for future needs with this facility, and we're very comfortable with the fact that Health is engaging with us on that with Health Infrastructure. I don't think there is any concern at all. In fact, I'd probably be more worried if we were talking about two separate budgets building on the same site with two separate planning processes. I'd expect it to be managed as a project on the site.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: With respect, you've been in and around politics for a long time. You've got two agencies working on this. Health ultimately is stumping up the funds, from what you're saying.

Mr STEVE WHAN: The Government is stumping up the funds.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: But if they have health service delivery as their ultimate goal, how can you give any guarantee that the TAFE won't be an afterthought and you'll just get the dregs of what's left in the budget?

Mr STEVE WHAN: The taxpayers of New South Wales are stumping up the funds. Whether it appears in the Health budget or our budget as a single line item makes no difference, as long as the funds are there to deliver the services that we're planning for. We're intimately engaged in the planning for those services, so I'm absolutely confident that out of this the people of Bankstown will get an excellent facility. They'll get one that's capable of providing for the future needs of the area and we will be providing them with continuing educational opportunities through a temporary location.

The CHAIR: In my little three minutes, if we could come back to the multicultural services, I understand that there was a so-called CALD coordinator in certain regions, but not in all regions. Can you give me an update on how many there are and which regions they're currently in?

Mr STEVE WHAN: Ms Tickle?

JULIE TICKLE: I will have to take on notice the number of CALD coordinators we have, but I can explain where the decision is made to have them in certain regions. We try, and our employees—our goal is to mirror the communities we serve with our employees, so we have CALD coordinators in areas where there are high migrant populations. Many of our CALD coordinators service Western Sydney for that reason.

The CHAIR: I understand that there are five regional areas with none at all. Is that because we don't have any need out there? You would still think that there would be a significant portion of students coming from that culturally and linguistically diverse background.

JULIE TICKLE: I would need to correct the record there, Ms Boyd, because at the moment we have five regional areas in total. Our new operating model is moving towards going away from regional areas and having clusters of communities. At the moment, as it is today, we have five regional areas, so we do have CALD coordinators in some of those regions.

The CHAIR: Maybe you could come back and tell me where you do and where you don't.

JULIE TICKLE: Sure, yes.

The CHAIR: That would be really useful. Similarly, I understand there are Aboriginal education engagement coordinators. How many are there of them and where are they?

JULIE TICKLE: Yes, certainly. That's a team under the senior managers Aboriginal education and engagement. There are six of those across the State and each one of those has a team of Aboriginal education coordinators and Aboriginal student support officers underneath them, so we have them across the State as well.

The Hon. RACHEL MERTON: Minister, if I could just return to the Bankstown TAFE, and I recognise the enthusiasm that you have—

Mr STEVE WHAN: Great opportunity for the area.

The Hon. RACHEL MERTON: As you just said, a great opportunity, but as we established earlier, in terms of the growing cohort in terms of the south-west and hence the case for the hospital redevelopment, I'm just wondering how would we address a growing student cohort on a new campus on reduced land.

Mr STEVE WHAN: Our planning is looking at future demand.

The Hon. RACHEL MERTON: The campus is getting smaller, that's all.

Mr STEVE WHAN: The land on the campus is, but the buildings not necessarily.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: Will you have less square metres of teaching space in the new facility?

Mr STEVE WHAN: Mr Brady can specifically answer that, but we will plan for the future growth of area as part of this campus. Obviously, the building designs haven't been finalised yet. Some of the land on the campus will be taken up by the hospital, but that doesn't necessarily mean there'll be less building space. I think Mr Brady can answer specifically on that.

STEPHEN BRADY: Thanks, Minister. If you look at the Bankstown campus at the moment, the buildings range from 1960s brick buildings, which are not fit for purpose whatsoever, through to a range of facilities. I don't think there's been anything new constructed on that campus for decades. So it's a good campus, it's delivering for the community at the moment, but from a floorspace perspective it's fairly inefficient because it's spread out across quite a large land area, which is what creates the opportunity to have the hospital and the TAFE on the one spot. What that campus doesn't have at the moment is anything relating to trades. I think it had automotive there quite some long time ago. It has spaces which are quite suited to a vertical campus. It does work around retail, it does work around health and beauty, around care—so they're all things that can easily be accommodated within more of a standard sort of building, rather than having specialist delivery spaces that require a different footprint.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: In really simple terms, do you anticipate having more or less square metres of teaching space in the new campus?

STEPHEN BRADY: I'll take that on notice, but it's not our intention to reduce. I have mentioned we do have some veterinary care on that campus at the moment. We think that—it's currently in a high-rise building—it's not really suitable. We would look to move that to one of our other nearby campuses. So there may be some changes to the delivery, but it's not our intention to reduce.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: If you're going to move something like vet services, it's obviously going to be less, isn't it? It has to be.

STEPHEN BRADY: I give the example of something that is probably not in a great location at the moment.

Mr STEVE WHAN: It's really about whether we are offering courses and the number of people we'll be able to service. If we can do that more efficiently with a better layout then we will. We're catering for future growth in the area and for future educational demand. That'll be the focus of what we're doing.

The CHAIR: Sorry, time is up. I will just check whether the Government members have any questions.

The Hon. MARK BUTTIGIEG: No, we're all good.

The CHAIR: We will take a tea break. We're going to have a short deliberative, so if we could clear the room for that, that would be great. We will be back at 11:15.

(Short adjournment)

The CHAIR: Thank you for returning. I'm just going to come back to you briefly, Mr Dizdar. It's been reported today that the New South Wales education department is proposing to axe 245 positions. Is this true?

MURAT DIZDAR: That's not quite an accurate representation. If you're referring to today's article, it's referring to a division within our department—it's a very important division—called Teaching, Learning and Student Wellbeing. We've begun a consultation process with our staff and indicated to them that we're making changes to that division. They're very important changes because they come off the back of a new plan for public education, as well as this Government's priorities, which, as the Secretary, I need to be able to meet. We wanted to remove duplication of resources. We wanted to get better alignment of some of the areas. We are moving some of the areas to other areas in the organisation. But in terms of what's quoted in the paper, it said something like 245 positions. I'll just put it on the record that about 140 of those positions are vacant and not filled and were temporary. We will look at consolidating those. They are not people who are already in roles.

The paper also may not have picked up that in headquarters we have roles called non-school based teaching staff. These are teachers that come from the field—merit selected—and they are predominantly temporary appointments. They are for a year to upwards of three years to provide their expertise in areas that are needed. Then those people have a permanent position in the department because they are teachers in our system or executives in our system. They go back to those positions. We're not looking at the number that was quoted in the paper. We are looking at having a strong division in these areas: in curriculum, in student wellbeing, in inclusion and wellbeing, in specialist programs and in teaching and learning. For the record, I want to back in the comments I made at the Education budget estimates hearing. They are accurate. We are looking to expand our HSC support.

The CHAIR: Just to clarify, you said that 140 of the 245 potential positions were vacant already?

MURAT DIZDAR: I'm rounding out numbers.

The CHAIR: Does that mean that there are 105 positions that are potentially going to be lost then?

MURAT DIZDAR: No.

The CHAIR: How many positions are at risk?

MURAT DIZDAR: The paper quotes about 245 positions. I am saying to the Committee that about 140 of those are vacant. There are about 100 roles that we are looking at. Some of the roles are lift and shift.

The CHAIR: How many?

MURAT DIZDAR: Let me unpack that for the Committee. We grab the team and move it to another area. If you would like an example, in the current division, we have people who are supporting government preschools. We now have an entire division called Early Childhood Outcomes, led by deputy secretary Mark Barraket, who you met at the last estimates. We're picking up that team and moving them to the early childhood division so that we're aligned in all the work we're doing around early childhood. Another example is that we've got Aboriginal education curriculum officers who are currently in that division who we are picking up and moving to the Aboriginal education communities division so they are aligned and working simultaneously. All up, there are only about 30 roles, or thereabouts—if I've got it wrong I'm happy to come back on notice, because I don't want to get the number wrong—across that entire division where we will be working with individuals around their placement.

The CHAIR: Are they teaching roles? Is that 30 teachers?

MURAT DIZDAR: It's a mixture of teaching and non-teaching roles.

The CHAIR: So it's not proposing to axe 245 positions; it's proposing to axe about 30 positions?

MURAT DIZDAR: No, 245 was quoted in the paper. I'm on record saying that about 140 are vacant, not utilised and not required. I think it's really important to get the balance right between the support arm—how many roles you've got in the headquarters—compared to what you've got on the ground. The Committee may or may not know—this is in annual reports—that just four years ago the headquarters was 5,635 positions. In four years it went to 8,000 positions. It grew enormously, with a backdrop where we dropped 25,000 enrolments and are wrestling with what a teacher shortage looks like. I make no excuse for wanting more of our expert practitioners on the ground, serving our children daily in classes. But I also want to get the balance right with the support that I provide. I think this model does that.

The CHAIR: In the previous estimates you said the HSC strategy was doing a great job and that having those teachers not in the schools, but actually supporting all of the other teachers, was making a huge difference.

MURAT DIZDAR: It is.

The CHAIR: How does that then gel with you now saying that those people need to be not doing the HSC strategy, but doing something different?

MURAT DIZDAR: That's a fair question, Chair. I stand by the HSC strategy. It's been doing great work. But I've also got an entire arm called curriculum. We're moving the HSC strategy into the curriculum area because you get duplication. You'll have an individual who is charge of stage four and five history in the curriculum team, which is years seven to 10. Then you'll have another arm that is doing the HSC history. We are able to bring it all together under the curriculum arm and make it easier. Plus, as I said earlier in the morning—and I think it's important you get this detail and I've just had it confirmed—we were delivering 12 to 14 subjects by way of HSC support, and we are going to expand the number of subjects that we support.

The CHAIR: Sorry, because I am genuinely confused—please believe me when I say I am genuine in my confusion—you said that the HSC strategy was great and wasn't going anywhere, but today we've heard that actually you're not having the HSC strategy anymore in terms of having these people sitting within the department, supporting teachers. How do those two statements go together?

MURAT DIZDAR: Let me simplify it. When you're talking about a large division, the operational arm can get a little confusing. We are going to keep our HSC work. We are going to expand the number of subjects we support. We're going to move that in alignment to an area called curriculum in that division.

The CHAIR: With fewer people? Finally, can you just confirm from what you were saying before that we are looking at about 30 positions across the teaching and learning division that will be made redundant?

MURAT DIZDAR: We're not looking at making them redundant. We are looking at working with 30 positions—and whoever those relevant people are—around what their placement in the organisation will look like, and if it's not available in the organisation, what it would like across the public service.

The CHAIR: I'm going to leave that for now. I don't profess to be any less confused, but I'll leave it for now.

MURAT DIZDAR: Sorry, I tried. I live it operationally everyday, so I tried to simplify it and make it understandable. I am happy to unpack it further if I haven't been able to do that for you.

The CHAIR: Minister, I understand that there was a learning technology services team that was sitting within TAFE that got made redundant just before the financial year; about 99 positions were scrapped. Can you give us any information on that and the process that was followed?

Mr STEVE WHAN: There is some reform underway in TAFE, but I'm not aware of 99 positions being—

STEPHEN BRADY: I think this refers to the organisational change we made early in the financial year, Minister. We looked across a range of our support functions for where there might be opportunity to streamline and improve support, and the learning technology group—I say it's a group; there is a team—was part of that. They've been doing some work around some of the support services. We've just reorganised to ensure that other teams are supporting the teachers. We found the opportunity to streamline and reduce cost.

The CHAIR: So 99 people did lose their jobs?

STEPHEN BRADY: Sorry, it wasn't 99 people in learning technology services. Ms Tickle?

JULIE TICKLE: That change was consulted with employees between 26 June this year and 16 July. There were 63 back office employees impacted; 42 of those permanent employees are going through a declaration of excess process. However, all of those employees are going through the government mobility scheme at the moment. As you would know, the Government has a scheme where public servants are going into a mobility pool and, if suitable, they're offered positions in other areas of government. So far, with that particular change, we have placed five people, and eight further people out of that 42 permanent employees that were declared excess, or were to be declared excess, are going through that process to be placed as well.

Of the 63—so that was the 42 permanent employees—there were also nine temporary employees, and 12 employees are still with us but we've moved them back to substantive positions. The team that you referred to, though, Ms Boyd, is advanced learning technologies. This plan was made up of those people but more people as well. So there weren't 63 people in that team. That team provided technology support—as in their name, advanced learning technology support. For example, they did a lot of work when we had COVID and we had to get all of our teachers to use the Teams platform and that sort of thing.

We made a decision that we no longer needed the focus on advanced learning technologies. A lot of our teachers are using that technology very well now, and we have other parts of the business that support our teachers with the technology. For example, each of our teaching teams has a dedicated group of people called Skills Teams Education Excellence Specialists, and they also support the teachers with technology. It's not that we've removed technology support for teachers in this change.

The CHAIR: I've seen some of what that team was working on, particularly the virtual reality stuff, which seemed to be incredibly useful—everything from learning to swim to other sorts of services that would help people, particularly people who are coming to Australia as migrants and a bunch of other people. Does that mean, then, that that sort of technology development isn't going to be a feature of TAFE anymore? I don't understand why it was scrapped.

Mr STEVE WHAN: No, it's not my understanding that we're dropping any functions at all in this process. Ms Tickle can elaborate on that.

JULIE TICKLE: Yes, that's right. We're not ceasing virtual and augmented reality in our delivery, no. Not only those people did those technologies.

The CHAIR: I understand that Meta donated 1,000 VR headsets to that team. What has happened to those headsets?

JULIE TICKLE: I'm not able to answer that question. I'm not sure if you can.

STEPHEN BRADY: I think they're in a range of different parts of the organisation. For courses that have already been developed using virtual reality, they're being used—I remember seeing at one of our CLCs that I visited, they're demonstrating the online delivery of that virtual training. A range of them are in use. I couldn't account for where the 4,000 are at the moment. I'd have to take that on notice.

The CHAIR: It was 1,000.

STEPHEN BRADY: Yes, 1,000.

The CHAIR: This 26 June to 16 July consultation period for these redundancies, is that a standard period of time for someone to be told that they've been made redundant? What does that consultation look like?

JULIE TICKLE: I wouldn't say there's a standard period of time. It depends on the complexity of the change plan and what's being proposed. The consultation process for this particular change plan was with those impacted employees and they were given the opportunity to provide the impact that that had on them, obviously, and the impact that it had on their work at TAFE. The period of time was adequate for the size of the change plan, with 63 people impacted overall.

The CHAIR: Under that eight-week mobility period, who will be out of a job by the end of that? How does that work?

JULIE TICKLE: It's still in progress, so I couldn't tell you what the end result will be. As I said, there were 42 people that were to be declared excess. They're in the mobility process at the moment. Six have been confirmed placed, and we've got a further eight out of the 42 going through the placement process at the moment, and it looks like they will secure a role in another agency. It just depends—in terms of how that process ends for those people—how many at the end will be made redundant.

The CHAIR: So there are about 34 of them that don't necessarily have a position?

JULIE TICKLE: They're in the process at the moment. That's what we've got so far. It doesn't mean that the others won't find a place in another agency. They're going through the process at the moment.

The CHAIR: If I could turn to something a little different. I've been hearing quite a few concerning stories around lack of accessibility in universities for people with disability. In particular, I was told of one university where the student collective had bought a bunch of temporary ramps, like little ramp things, so that they could loan them out to people in wheelchairs so they could actually get into rooms that had little steps and stuff. What is being done to make our universities fully accessible? Has there been an audit? What is the department doing?

Mr STEVE WHAN: To start with, obviously the universities are established under State legislation, but their governance is up to the universities. They operate independently to the State Government. We don't have a role in running the universities per se or setting those standards. The Federal Government is the main regulatory body for the universities, so they would be working with the universities on setting standards in place. Obviously I would expect universities to be living up to the standards we expect of every institution in our State and, indeed, access our rules which exist in many of our planning instruments. I'm not aware of detail—what I'm saying to you is that we don't have a day-to-day involvement in telling universities what they should be doing in that space. Perhaps Ms Read might like to add.

MURAT DIZDAR: I might just add before Ms Read jumps in. The Minister is spot-on. They're administratively autonomous, but that doesn't preclude them from relevant legislation on work health and safety grounds, for example, for their staff and their students. Obviously they've got total responsibility for the teaching and learning. Just like I would in my space for public schools, I'd have to make whatever adjustments were required at a particular school. If there was to be a new build, like I've indicated in previous estimates, I would have to make sure full inclusion and accessibility was available there. But I'd have a footprint that goes all the way back to 1884, so I'd have to also make adjustments. The same would apply to universities. If you do have particular concerns, I think they should be—we should bring them to the attention of the vice-chancellor of each of those universities. I'm not sure if they'd be across what they are. I think the whole State would expect what reasonable adjustments were needed to be made.

The CHAIR: I think part of the problem is that we sit in this kind of gap between regulation and people don't know who is the prime regulator for issues like this, so nothing gets done.

Mr STEVE WHAN: As the secretary said, they've got to comply with all of the same standards that the rest of society has to comply with.

The CHAIR: Yes, which, unfortunately, aren't very high.

Mr STEVE WHAN: Sure.

CHLOE READ: If I can just add that there are also some specific elements of the Higher Education Standards Framework that TEQSA, as the regulatory body, have in place that speak to equivalence of opportunities and speak to things like the learning environment. Also, while the national student ombudsman is being set up as a result of that work we talked earlier on—gender-based and sexual-based violence on campus—they're intended to be a student ombudsman fulsomely, not just for one specific issue. Some of those matters about complaints, and whether students feel that they understand the avenues of complaint and how to get complaint resolution, I think that will help in this instance as well.

The CHAIR: What about TAFE in terms of accessibility of TAFE facilities?

Mr STEVE WHAN: I'll ask Mr Brady, but we certainly expect TAFE to also have accessible buildings, noting that many of our buildings are over 100 years old and most of them are over 50.

STEPHEN BRADY: That's right, Minister, thank you. Absolutely, our infrastructure very much looks at inclusive design standards when we are looking at new builds. We do have an access advisory group from our staff and students that informs us around any issues on campus. Part of the work we do around our minor works every year is improving access. It's a really critical part of what we do. We had a whole range of lift replacements in the last couple of years to make sure we can increase accessibility. We have a diversity inclusion council, as I mentioned earlier, where we have our chairs of our employee resource groups, who are leading our staff in the inclusion space, come and report directly to our executive around issues. We make every effort we can to ensure that our staff and students with disability can get the full experience, the same as every other staff and student member.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: Mr Dizdar, I'll come back to you with some of the questions that the Chair was asking as well. Could you clarify—I think you said 140 of the roles were vacant at the moment, roughly?

MURAT DIZDAR: Technically it's 141.6 FTE.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: So 140.

MURAT DIZDAR: That's why I rounded it out.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: Do you know how many of those have been vacant for a year or more?

MURAT DIZDAR: I don't have that with me. I just know that they're vacant.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: Could you take that on notice? You just mentioned there is a bit of change and those roles are often only—people have moved into them for a year or so. I'm wondering how many have been vacant for 12 months.

MURAT DIZDAR: So the ones that I was saying, whether it's a year, two or three—that's the NSBT workforce, the non-school based teaching workforce. They come in on one-, two- or three-year contracts and they maintain permanency as either a classroom teacher, a head teacher—

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: But none of those are in those 141.6 roles, or are they? Are any of those NSBTs the 141.6?

MURAT DIZDAR: I don't have the breakdown between NSBT or general GSE roles. But 141 of the 245 that is being quoted are vacant—some for lengthy periods, some for shorter periods.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: Could you take on notice how many have been vacant for 12 months or more?

MURAT DIZDAR: I can do that.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: How many staff currently work in the HSC Strategy team?

MURAT DIZDAR: I don't have that. It's a large team. I don't have that figure in front of me.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: Of the 105 positions that are currently still there and not vacant, what is the proportion of that that is part of the HSC Strategy team?

MURAT DIZDAR: I'm not going to have these figures. Let me take them on notice, if it's okay with you.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: How many will be transferred into that new curriculum division? Is it all of them?

MURAT DIZDAR: No, it's not all of them. Let me get you that figure.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: Are they still going to be called the HSC Strategy team within the new curriculum division?

MURAT DIZDAR: I don't want to get that wrong. Let me find that out as well.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: Do you think you might be able to have some of that data by this afternoon for us?

MURAT DIZDAR: Maybe, yes.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: Okay, I'll come back to that after lunch.

MURAT DIZDAR: If we do, I'll certainly table it. If not, we'll turn it around quickly with the supplementary questions.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: The Best in Class team—are they part of those 105 positions as well?

MURAT DIZDAR: Best in Class was what it was called when it was kicked off. You'll remember that was in your time. From there, the terminology changed to "expert teachers". There was a little bit of friction with the titling of that, and it was at the request of both the people performing that and the partners. It is the same group of people.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: Are there about 70 teachers in those roles at the moment? That was some of the latest data that I could find, but I didn't know if that was still current.

MURAT DIZDAR: I don't have it at my fingertips, Ms Mitchell. But this was the team that I'm referencing today that was providing support across the State for between, I'm told, 12 and 14 subjects—important support, support well received. But under this new model that Mr Graham and I are moving to, we want to increase the number of subjects that we're going to provide support for. What we also want to achieve—because we've been hearing this from our partners, from the federation, the primary principals, the secondary principals—is support for those that are teaching HSC for the very first time, because that can be challenging, as well as teachers who are teaching the HSC but it's out of their subject area. You can sometimes have a HSIE teacher, for example, who is geography and business studies trained teaching modern history for the first time for HSC. So we not only want to increase the number of subjects but also go to those two areas that I just tabled—and that was not being provided at the moment.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: What I'm just trying to break down, though, is are the Best in Class/"expert teachers", as they're now called, separate to the HSC Strategy team?

MURAT DIZDAR: No, that was the team.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: That's part of that as well?

MURAT DIZDAR: Yes.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: As I said, I think there were close to 70 teachers in that Best in Class from the data that I could find, which is a couple of years old, but there might be updated figures. You're saying that there are 105 positions that aren't vacant, and 30 roles that—I think you said before to Ms Boyd—you're looking for movement. Does that leave you with about 70-odd positions to go into that curriculum? I'm trying to work out whether we're actually going to have more or less people supporting teachers in the classroom and how that is all going to play out. It's just not very clear. I agree with the confusion, that's all.

MURAT DIZDAR: Can I have another go, Ms Mitchell? I do want to make it clear.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: Please, if it is going to help, go for it.

MURAT DIZDAR: I think 245 was quoted in the paper, and I'm saying 141.6 of that is vacant. In round terms it is about 100 more positions. Only about 30 of those or thereabouts are ones where we're going to have to look at options for individuals and those roles. With the HSC arm that you're referring to and the Best in Class—that's one and the same—we'll be moving less positions into the curriculum area, but we have an army in the curriculum area. We'll be getting that one team to now go from 14 subjects or thereabouts to an expanded subject range and deliver through the curriculum, with the new curriculum rollout, the HSC support.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: We might come back to this this afternoon. But any figures you've got, potentially, this afternoon in terms of exactly how many there are currently—I think you said the HSC Strategy team was quite large.

MURAT DIZDAR: Quite a large team, yes.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: But is that 70-odd then? Is that what the rough figure would be?

MURAT DIZDAR: Let me get the numbers, if that's okay.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: We'll come back to that.

MURAT DIZDAR: I only had the global numbers of the entire division, which I was trying to unpack for you.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: I think we might come back to this. I want to pivot into other changes within the department in your area, Ms Read. Again, there has been some public reporting about I think up to 67 roles within the Education and Skills Reform division no longer being there or being moved. Can you outline what is happening in that space?

CHLOE READ: We've just finished consultation for—we've got a change we'll be announcing the final structure for tomorrow. There are about 30 ongoing positions in that change that were proposed to be removed. As a result of the consultation process, that number is going to change. But I will take on notice by how much because we won't have finalised that structure until tomorrow.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: If you could provide that on notice that would be good. Minister, what involvement did you have in terms of the changes within that part of the department? Were you briefed, consulted?

Mr STEVE WHAN: The education department changes have been managed by the Deputy Premier. I've obviously been briefed about impacts in the Skills area, but the decisions were made by the Deputy Premier and the secretary.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: But surely, Minister, this division helps with the support for apprentices, for trainees in schools and TAFE, is my understanding. But you don't, as the TAFE and skills Minister, really have any final say? It all goes to the Deputy Premier, is that what you're saying?

Mr STEVE WHAN: It actually rests with the secretary. The secretaries are responsible for the management of their departments. I've been informed about the arrangements in the department. I'm confident in the quality of the work that has been done there and will be.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: Did the Deputy Premier speak to you about it at all? Did she ask for your advice or input on those decisions?

Mr STEVE WHAN: I was briefed on the proposals and they've been going through a consultation process.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: Briefed by the Deputy Premier?

Mr STEVE WHAN: No, I get a regular briefing from the secretary.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: So you didn't have any discussions with the Deputy Premier about this at all?

Mr STEVE WHAN: Not directly, no.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: Can I ask then how this is going to feed into the VET review? You talked about the final report earlier. Obviously there are a number of recommendations, as you rightly said, but there are some that talk about better integration between schools and SBATs, NESA, what you are doing around HSC, subject choice and how you can better support students with careers advice. I think there are about three or four recommendations that go to that. How are you confident that you will be able to implement some of those recommendations, given that we are hearing today quite substantial changes to the HSC strategy team and cuts in Ms Read's division. Is that concerning to you at all?

Mr STEVE WHAN: I'm confident that we have the team in place that can help us deliver the VET review. I have no concerns about that at all. The department's structure in terms of the way that it focuses itself on the job is very much moving to implement the Government's policy priorities, which is what we want it to do. The VET review offers a number of really important challenges for us. You have highlighted some that I have been particularly keen on as well in terms of the links between high schools and vocational training. There will be elements of that where—for instance, you would be aware of the Educational Pathways Program and the RIEP program. They're not everywhere in the State. There is some great work in there.

We'll be working through the VET review and our response to the VET review to see how we can better deliver programs that make those linkages and how we can make more consistent, I guess, the link between high schools and vocational training. It is not particularly consistent around the State at the moment. We need to make it so because we need, as we know, nine out of every 10 high school graduates to go onto some sort of further training and four out of every 10 of those to be in vocational training.

We haven't responded to the VET review yet. We still have to do that work. There is a lot in it. But I am confident that we will be able to get that very strong focus. I have the secretary and the department come and see me at least every fortnight to update me on how things are going with the skills side of the portfolio to address any issues. It is a very good process and I'm confident that we will be able to implement some of those really important recommendations out of the VET review. I would love to talk some more about the VET review if you want to ask me some more questions about it.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: Maybe I will. Don't worry, I've got some more for you, Minister.

Mr STEVE WHAN: I'll hand over firstly to Ms Read.

CHLOE READ: The two programs that the Minister just mentioned as part of this change are coming together. The Regional Industry Education Partnerships team has been sitting with training services. They connect industry and schools together, looking for opportunities for schools and schoolchildren to understand local employment opportunities and what is in their local area. The Educational Pathways Program is currently sitting in a different part of my area, because they grew up at different times, essentially. We are bringing those together so that schools get a single coherent offering.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: All back in under your area?

CHLOE READ: Yes, in that instance, no change to the numbers in the Regional Industry Education Partnerships team, but they're coming together with the EPP team so they can deliver those kind of more consolidated and more streamlined services for schools so schools don't have to know "Do you do this? Do you do that?" They can just look for one part of support from the department.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: Minister, you did just mention that you haven't had a formal Government response yet to the review, and I appreciate it only came out in the recent weeks. What is the time frame in terms of a Government response?

Mr STEVE WHAN: Later this year, around November or December, I'm expecting a Government response to come out.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: In the interim—Ms Read just talked about some of the work that will continue, and I appreciate some of the recommendations do go to continuing work that has been in place frankly since we were in government as well. Some of these aren't new. Will you be doing any work on some of the recommendations, mainly probably those out of the interim report because you've had that a bit longer? Are there any updates on that you can give us?

Mr STEVE WHAN: Yes. We are working on a number of recommendations out of the interim report. We were asked to do a new TAFE charter. The work has been done on that. We are doing a new operating model for TAFE, which is moving TAFE to a faculty model, so it means that we'll have statewide faculties in particular areas where they can build a closer relationship with industry and enable them to stay more up to speed, I guess, more consistently across the State. We are moving to re-engage with local communities and emphasise that engagement. That's part of it. We are also undertaking the recommendation around the review of the assets that we have around the State and matching those with demand over time. There are a number of those angles that are actually already going.

There are a few really important things out of the VET review which I have been highlighting, which are down the track. It certainly talks particularly about better regional-based planning for skills, so looking at the future skills needs for regions and trying to align that with the sort of teaching resources that we have. As you'd be aware, there is a shortage of TAFE teachers in many areas. We need to be working very hard to try and make sure that we are actively seeking teachers in the areas, which regions are telling us is their future skills needs rather than just offering what we happen to have available at the time.

There are a number of aspects of it that we are actively working on. There is work that we are undertaking on most of the other aspects of the interim review recommendations at the moment. With the final review, I'd say that we'll be able to divide it up into a few different categories, being things that we can respond to immediately and things where we need to do a bit more consultation. I'm sure you've had a look at some of the recommendations. Some of them need a little more work to determine how you actually go about implementing them. I think we'll be able to split it up into three categories.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: We look forward to the Government response later in the year. The budget for the review was $2.2 million. Was that the final cost?

Mr STEVE WHAN: I don't think we have the final cost yet, but I'll ask the department and we'll be able to provide that.

MURAT DIZDAR: We're going to finalise it for the annual report but we're not expecting it to be anywhere near that.

The Hon. RACHEL MERTON: Minister, if I could just touch on skills—and we are continuing to hear about the skills shortage and the impact and the consequence. Minister, were you part of the New South Wales Government's decisions to address the housing crisis by accelerating supply and committing to the National Housing Accord to build, which was reported, 377,000 new homes across New South Wales by 2029?

Mr STEVE WHAN: Yes. It's a Government policy priority that has been announced. We do have a number of cross-portfolio consultations going on with the skills needs. It certainly fits in. I forgot to mention in answer to a previous question that one of the things that we will have out later this year is a New South Wales skills plan, the first one since 2008. The construction sector is one of the priorities that will be in that skills plan. We're also working very hard to recruit teachers, with pay to learn in that space. As I mentioned, internally within the Government we have a focus on the skills needs for that construction sector and also some other key sectors like the transition to renewables and the care sector. There are a range of areas where we have higher skills shortages where we are taking a cross-government approach. Perhaps, Ms Read, do you want to add some more on the construction skills side?

CHLOE READ: Yes, happy to. We have a range of initiatives in place to make sure that we deliver on the skills needed across, as you say, different sectors, and I think housing added to also the national priority list and the national skills agreement. As an example, the top five apprenticeships in the State include electrotechnology electrician, carpentry, plumbing and engineering fabrication trades, so all skills that really gear themselves towards being able to deliver on those housing commitments. In addition, we have things like the women in trades work, so looking to make sure we connect more women into those sorts of trades and apprenticeships that will be so vital to delivering those commitments on housing.

Mr STEVE WHAN: As Ms Read just mentioned, I asked for construction housing to be included on the national Skills Priority List, which it has been in response to that. I'm also responsible for skilled migration. We have the department represented here. That will also integrate with our skills plan, which will be released later this year.

The Hon. RACHEL MERTON: Minister, I have reports from the construction industry—relating to apprenticeships and trainees—that there were changes to the incentives that were in place. Those changes, I'm informed, came into place on 1 July. The construction sector were then reporting that there has been a significant decline in the number of applications for apprenticeships and traineeships. They are reporting 30 per cent. Would this concern you?

Mr STEVE WHAN: It would concern me. I can't confirm those figures. I have anecdotally heard from some builders that they are taking on less because they are a bit less confident about the industry at the moment, but there is certainly huge demand out there. The incentive side of things from the Commonwealth Government has tended to be a program which has been a bit inconsistent over the years. It has stopped and started, depending on what the political priority might have been at time or things like that. The Federal Government is currently doing a review of employer incentives for apprenticeships. Our submission to that review emphasised the need for there to be a consistent regime of incentives which people could predict and which didn't result in us getting waves of massive demand followed by lowering demand, so that we can actually plan our servicing to cope with that. Perhaps Ms Read might want to add to that.

CHLOE READ: Of the incentives that you refer to, there were two programs, one after the other. There was the Boosting Apprenticeship Commencements program that the Commonwealth instituted, I think, in 2021 as a COVID response. That was some significant wage subsidy from employers to encourage them to take on apprentices at that really disrupted time when we had COVID uncertainty. That segued into continuing apprenticeship completions, so continuing those subsidies for those who had commenced under the previous program.

There was a set of incentives that concluded in the middle of the year, as you note. But I believe they extended the incentives in place for priority occupations. That would include construction, Mr Pearson? Yes, Mr Pearson nods at me. As the Minister mentioned, the incentives review is underway with the Commonwealth. In the meantime, I note that we have made sure that we extended fee-free apprenticeship and traineeship access for New South Wales learners in the last budget, so making sure that the learners themselves don't have a barrier to taking up an apprenticeship or traineeship.

The CHAIR: I come back to close off on the disability adjustments and things in TAFE and universities. I'm told that quite a number of students are dropping out of university because of a lack of disability provision and adjustment. I understand there is a division in responsibilities between the Federal Government and the State Government on this. But we learnt in our PC 3 inquiry in relation to children with disability in educational settings that there is zero oversight of the provision of academic adjustments in universities. It's up to a university as to how they implement things like whether or not a student is required to write with a pen instead of using their laptop and those sorts of basics things that they would get adjustments for at school. What is in your power to do, Minister, in relation to those things?

Mr STEVE WHAN: Unfortunately, with universities, not a lot. Directly ringing up universities and saying—obviously, in TAFE, where we do have direct responsibility, we do endeavour to give quite personalised support and responses to students who have needs. I have had a number of items of correspondence come across my desk of people who have raised issues and have had them dealt with individually to make sure that they are getting the assistance that they need. With universities, in terms of reasons why people drop out, those figures and that sort of information is collected by the universities and by the Federal authorities. There is a big gap between what the State Government is responsible for and able to deal with. I do regularly talk to vice-chancellors. I do, on occasions, raise issues which are of concern. I can't tell them what to do, but I ask them for their responses. Perhaps the department can add to what the Federal regulatory authorities for universities can do in this space.

The CHAIR: Before you do that, given that there is this overlap and responsibility between the States and the Federal Government for universities, is there a forum where Ministers meet regularly to discuss these issues?

Mr STEVE WHAN: There is. Going back a step, the 10 universities in New South Wales are established by Acts of the New South Wales Parliament, so some of their governance comes to us. Two positions on their boards are appointed, and we have diversity as a very important element on those and educational backgrounds as important selection criteria that we put in place on those. In terms of the Commonwealth, we do have ministerial councils where we discuss things like the Universities Accord and the implementation of that, where we talked about the safety on campus issues and the work that was being done in that area, and what State governments could do to support. As I say, it's a very limited engagement that we have because of the Federal authorities, but there are regulatory authorities at a Federal level who have the capacity to make more. There is going to be a—what's the position that has been created?

CHLOE READ: The national student ombudsman.

Mr STEVE WHAN: And the commission as well?

CHLOE READ: The tertiary education commission.

Mr STEVE WHAN: Yes, the tertiary education commission, is going to be created as well, which may be able to have a role.

The CHAIR: I'm asking, Minister, is there a capacity for you to advocate to your Federal counterparts in relation to trying to close the gap on disability, given that it is such a problem?

Mr STEVE WHAN: There's certainly capacity to advocate. If there's information which is showing—I haven't seen any figures that you're talking about, but I'd be more than happy to see them and raise the issues.

MURAT DIZDAR: I also just want to add that I know the vice-chancellors in New South Wales would take the matter very seriously because they carry the responsibility for the full teaching and learning sequence, which starts at course offerings and content, and goes to enrolments and progression, and completion and awards. They would take the matter of meeting student and staff need by way of adjustment, I'd suggest, very seriously. That's why I think they would welcome information, if you've got it, on particular sites or particular student experiences on particular campuses. I think they would be alarmed to hear that there are students that are dropping out and not raising these concerns for these concerns to be met. It's not my experience, when working with vice-chancellors, that they wouldn't take this matter seriously. I'd just suggest, Chair, if you do have particular instances from particular universities, I think they would really benefit from being made aware.

The CHAIR: I'll give it a whirl between now and next budget estimates of writing to them all with my list of examples.

MURAT DIZDAR: One other mechanism is they know, and they're fully aware, that their annual report has to be tabled in Parliament. Meeting student need is an aspect of that. Those annual reports are audited by the New South Wales Auditor-General. That might be another angle as well.

The CHAIR: Mr Dizdar, in relation to the 30 ongoing roles being cut potentially from the HSC strategy team, how many are temporary roles? I understand there are the permanent ones, but how many temporary contractors are there in that team?

MURAT DIZDAR: Chair, I just gave the global numbers for the division. I don't want it to be confused with the HSC Strategy team. I don't have those numbers. Ms Mitchell asked for those too. If I've got those this afternoon, I'm happy to table them. This is a very big division, and this division has the following areas. It's got curriculum, student wellbeing, inclusion and welling, student support and specialist programs, and teaching and learning. It is the largest division in the organisation. The global figures—the paper referenced 245 positions. I'm letting the Committee know today that 141.6 of those are vacant, so that leaves—I don't know; I'm rounding it out—100 positions. Of those 100, we're of the view that there are only about 30 that we'll need to case-manage.

The CHAIR: And the 141.6 that are vacant—is that work currently being done by temporary contractors?

MURAT DIZDAR: No.

The CHAIR: So that work's just not being done; it's just those positions are vacant and have been vacant for some time.

MURAT DIZDAR: No, because they haven't necessarily needed to have been drawn upon. That entire building, called the corporate headquarters, has gone from 5,635 to 8,000 in four years. We've had a commensurate drop in enrolments at the same time with a teacher shortage. Some of those roles have remained vacant because they're no longer required.

The Hon. RACHEL MERTON: I will just pick up the issue of the skills shortage and where we left off. We had established that there had been a 30 per cent decline in apprenticeships and traineeships reported by the sector. Ms Read, I thank you for your comments on that. Minister, in light of the skills shortage, the National Housing Accord, the quotas and what New South Wales is set to deliver in terms of the number of new constructions, is there anything that you, as the Minister, can do to make it easier for employers to take on first-year apprenticeships and boost commencement rates?

Mr STEVE WHAN: Firstly, I think the 30 per cent figure came from you; we didn't confirm that. We don't have a figure along those lines.

The Hon. RACHEL MERTON: Just to confirm that confirmation of a decline was noted.

Mr STEVE WHAN: We haven't seen a decline in our enrolments in TAFE in those areas. In fact, I think they're some of our most popular courses.

STEPHEN BRADY: They're still very strong. I think there is a distinction between trainees and apprentices.

Mr STEVE WHAN: In the apprenticeship side of things, we're obviously working very hard to try to promote apprenticeships. That's part of the importance of building the links between secondary and vocational education. It is challenging. You'd be well aware, I'm sure, that part of the challenge is making sure that parents see the value of these careers for their young people, so that they're also encouraging their young people to go into what are fantastic and well-paid careers with great long-term prospects. That's part of our ongoing work. I'll come to your question about the cost and things in a moment, but obviously some of the things that we do link with schools through the Educational Pathways Program, the RIEP program and also the YES Program. There are a range of things where we're trying to give young people experiences so that they can see what those might be like—building on the old work experience programs that have been around.

As Ms Read said, we've extended, in the last budget, the fee-free—completely free—apprenticeships. We're working on our delivery around the State with TAFE to make sure that we make it as easy as possible for people to access their courses. That means we certainly recognise that, for many areas of the State, we have barriers of distance. We work with apprentices and employers around block release and elements of their course that they can do without having to come physically. We have the Kingswood IAT, which specialises in construction. That's working with tertiary institutions and industry to design courses which can help us to overcome some of the skills needs and respond more quickly to the skills needs around the State. That's a really important model.

In terms of that side of things, we don't provide financial incentives for employers to take on apprentices; that's more in the realm of the Federal Government. We wouldn't have the administrative ability to do that because that's more in their space. I'm aware that there are a number of excellent group training organisations around who are working in that area, and I talk fairly regularly to them as well. We'll do whatever we can to remove barriers to people coming in and make it as cheap as possible for them to participate in the courses. We are still seeing really high demand in carpentry and electrotechnology but, as you say and as we know, the demand in the community keeps going up. That's obviously because there is a huge amount of work being done on infrastructure, as well as big demand in housing, as well as an increasing demand in the transition to renewables, all calling on the same skill sets. We will be working very hard to try to address that.

At the same time, we have quite low unemployment. In fact, Monaro, which I represent, has the second lowest unemployment in the State at 1.2 per cent. That means that there are a lot of people out there contesting the same market for those young people. One of the focuses out of the VET review, which I think is really important for us over time—I talked a bit before about the help we give to people who are from disadvantaged backgrounds or who are less able to access to education. The VET review has a strong focus on how we can improve that so that we're continuing to access that base of people who might otherwise not go through and complete skills training.

I will give you an example: The Government is working as a whole at the moment on the REZs, with the renewables, recognising that there is a massive demand in that electrotechnology and civil construction space. Part of what we're trying to do there is to ensure that we're working with industry throughout our upcoming manufacturing centres of excellence, but also with local communities about how we get up-front and in the communities and overcome some of the barriers that might be there to getting apprentices. For example, is there better use we can make of group training organisations when projects tend to be only a couple of years, so that they can transition from one to the other and those sorts of things? We're very actively working in those spaces at the moment.

MURAT DIZDAR: Ms Merton, can I just also add that the Premier has also charged us with the election commitment to deliver an additional 1,000 apprentices and trainees across government. Under the Government at the time, there was a decline in those apprentices and trainees in government from 2.8 per cent in 2019 to 1.7 per cent in 2022. Under that election commitment he has charged us to reverse what that looks like and to run hard and work across all agencies. We're making good, groundbreaking inroads there, given that the public service is a large employer.

The Hon. RACHEL MERTON: Mr Dizdar, I'm happy to pick up that up this afternoon. I'm just conscious of the time.

MURAT DIZDAR: Just because it was on apprentices and trainees, I thought it was another important deliverable.

Mr STEVE WHAN: It's another excellent program.

The Hon. RACHEL MERTON: Minister, in terms of what would be within your powers, we are receiving reports of a decline in applications in terms of apprenticeships or traineeships—or whatever the classification is that is relevant to what we're seeing. Could you do anything more as the Minister?

Mr STEVE WHAN: At the moment we're not seeing a decline in people coming to TAFE for those apprenticeships. I've heard anecdotally some of what you're talking about from local builders, but I'm not seeing the decline flow through. We'd certainly be encouraging builders to be taking on apprentices. As I said, the things that we do, which I outlined in some depth there, are around making it easier for the apprentices, reducing or removing costs for them participating in courses, and helping those employers to link with our schools to build the young people's knowledge of what they might be coming into. One of the things, interestingly, that Ms Read mentioned before was, for example, the work on women in construction—trying to make sure that we're working with the large construction companies to ensure that worksites are welcoming places and appropriate places for women to participate in. There's a lot of work which is going on with industry in those spaces. The only area that we don't go into is financial incentives for employers because that's the domain of the Federal Government.

The Hon. RACHEL MERTON: Minister, in terms of industry engagement, you mentioned that you've received similar reports to myself from builders and construction. Is there a strategy in terms of your engagement with the industry? Do you meet with the peak bodies?

Mr STEVE WHAN: Yes, I've met with the HIA and I meet with builders around the place at various times, and also obviously our TAFE teachers who are working in that space. One of the important reasons why we're moving the operating model or proposing to move the operating model to a new structure is so that we've got people who work really consistently all the time with industry and are actually getting that feedback. Hopefully, over time we'll also encourage them—frankly, the biggest immediate challenge for us is getting enough teachers. As you'd be well aware, it can be somewhat more lucrative to be out there actually practising your trade in the building industry than it is to teach at TAFE, so we need to continue to encourage to do that. But we will be actively working out of the VET review on building the attractiveness of the construction trades for young people and for their families, and continuing to get the feedback from industry on that.

The Hon. RACHEL MERTON: Minister, in terms of the construction trades you make reference to, who would you have met with last in the construction trade sector?

Mr STEVE WHAN: I obviously speak to a lot of our trade teachers, but I've met with HIA and I've been at a number of business events.

The Hon. RACHEL MERTON: Sorry, the HIA?

Mr STEVE WHAN: Housing Industry Association, I believe. We've been to a number of businesses—the other day to Agriweld at Dubbo—so I've been to a number of businesses who are employing apprentices and talking to them about various—

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: Why didn't Stephen go with you to Dubbo?

Mr STEVE WHAN: I think you had him stuck here in estimates, actually.

The Hon. RACHEL MERTON: He's got to earn his money.

Mr STEVE WHAN: He was stuck here in estimates, but it's okay, we talked to him.

The Hon. STEPHEN LAWRENCE: It's important work.

Mr STEVE WHAN: Yes.

The Hon. RACHEL MERTON: Any other industry groups or construction groups within the sector who you might be meeting with?

Mr STEVE WHAN: Off the top of my head, I can't tell you what other groups. You mean peak bodies?

The Hon. RACHEL MERTON: In terms of whether it's the plumbers or the electricians—these are guys who are critical to the construction trade.

Mr STEVE WHAN: I've certainly spoken to the electrical peak body, NECA. I've met with them. I was out at the plumbing industry centre recently where we're building a Hydrogen Centre of Excellence, so I've met with that group. I've met with the Plumbers Union. There's a range of different peak bodies who I speak to about various—and I have to say there hasn't been one that's come in the door so far who hasn't said that they are in skills shortage.

The Hon. RACHEL MERTON: Are there any targets or goals in place in terms of skills?

Mr STEVE WHAN: Out of the VET review we're obviously trying to set ourselves up with a structure which can actually service the future skills needs. What there will be in the skills plan, which as I said will be released later this year, will be a series of measures which we report against. So, I guess, after the skills plan comes out, you'll be able to see. We're out consulting on the skills plan at the moment. Do you want to add, if you've got more to add?

CHLOE READ: Yes. There are already targets in place on things like the industry skills legacy program, so we talked about women in construction before, trialling new higher targets in that space, and then also having ongoing targets as part of that program. The draft performance and wellbeing framework that was released as part of the New South Wales budget proposes some particular targets in the skilled outcome piece of that that includes, I think, from memory, people employed after training and also certificate III achievement. Finally, just in the national space, the outcome framework that's intended to sit alongside or underneath the National Skills Agreement is something that we're developing across States, Territories and the Commonwealth. I think that's due to come to Ministers towards the end of this year, so that will give us a kind of national lens on some of those targets too.

The Hon. RACHEL MERTON: Thank you. So, confirming the skills plan later this year?

Mr STEVE WHAN: Yes, towards the end of the year I'd probably say at this stage.

CHLOE READ: Yes.

The Hon. RACHEL MERTON: Minister, if I could just ask about the domestic manufacturing centres of excellence, I understand in the 2023 election campaign NSW Labor promised to create three manufacturing centres of excellence. I'm just checking what progress might have been made relevant to the Western Sydney training centre.

Mr STEVE WHAN: I can tell you that you can expect something quite soon announced on that.

The Hon. RACHEL MERTON: We'll be there.

Mr STEVE WHAN: Actually you asked earlier on about the $88.4 million in the budget papers for works. That includes an allocation of capital for the manufacturing centres of excellence.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: How much of that 88?

Mr STEVE WHAN: Some 65.8, which is State and Federal funding.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: Do you have the breakdown of what's State and what's Federal?

Mr STEVE WHAN: No, not that we can—

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: On notice maybe?

Mr STEVE WHAN: We'll take that on notice. We're not building grand buildings for this. It's going to be mostly about the courses that are being provided, so there isn't a large capital budget for this; it'll mainly be for equipment, fit-out and things. The focus for these is very much about the course offerings and working with tertiary institutions and business and industry. There's a recurrent aspect to it. We are linking in very closely with the Federal Government on these projects and you will start to see some announcements quite soon.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: Sorry, Minister, you said 65.8 of the 88 that I asked about earlier. That's obviously all a State allocation, is it, that 65?

Mr STEVE WHAN: No, that includes some Federal money.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: I think there are three proposed locations.

Mr STEVE WHAN: Correct, yes.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: Is that for all three or is it just the Western Sydney one first?

Mr STEVE WHAN: That's all three.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: And $22 million is allocated this financial year, from what I asked about earlier, so I'm just trying to work it out. Over what years will that 65.8 be available if only $22 million is this year?

Mr STEVE WHAN: That's capital, so obviously the recurrent cost is there as well.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: Yes, but the capital that I asked about earlier for new works, which was $88 million over four years—you're now saying 65-point-something is part of that. Is that right?

Mr STEVE WHAN: That's correct.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: But it's only 22 this financial year—$22 million in the budget papers.

Mr STEVE WHAN: That's right, yes.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: So how much of that 22 will be going to these three centres and what is the breakdown?

Mr STEVE WHAN: Of that, $20.6 million is for the manufacturing centres of excellence.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: Do you have a breakdown of how much for Western Sydney, for Hunter and for Illawarra of that 20—

Mr STEVE WHAN: How much of the capital?

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: Yes.

Mr STEVE WHAN: We'll take that on notice.

The Hon. RACHEL MERTON: Minister, in terms of progress relevant to the training centres, what is currently in place?

Mr STEVE WHAN: For the manufacturing centres of excellence?

The Hon. RACHEL MERTON: Yes.

Mr STEVE WHAN: We've been working through the planning for them, essentially. As I said, we will be making announcements soon. Mr Brady can talk a little bit more about what we have, if he'd like to elaborate on that.

STEPHEN BRADY: Thanks, Minister. Certainly we've done quite a lot of work around the educational models for the centres of excellence, drawing on our experience with the institutes of applied technology. Through these centres we're looking at a combination of skill sets, some of it relating to traditional apprenticeship programs, but also going beyond that to look at higher apprenticeships. We've worked closely with industry to understand what are the new types of skills and skills combinations that they really need in a rapidly changing manufacturing environment. We have two streams of higher apprenticeship we're seeking accreditation from TEQSA for at the moment. These higher apprenticeships will give qualifications—

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: Sorry, accreditation from whom? For Hansard.

STEPHEN BRADY: TEQSA, the higher education regulatory body. We're seeking accreditation for those higher apprenticeships at the moment. One stream will seek to combine traditional manufacturing capabilities with digital-type skills, so bringing together into that new world, gen 4 manufacturing type space where there's a lot of data requirements, there's a lot around programming of machinery, et cetera. In the other stream we're looking at bringing in more T-shaped skills, so bringing in some of the leadership and critical thinking skills that you need in a rapidly changing environment. We've worked closely with major organisations in industry to design those courses to make sure they're meeting their needs. On top of the apprenticeships, that's the second type of education model. The third will be partnering with universities and industry to develop more micro-skills and micro-credentials so that people who are already predominantly in industry will have the opportunity to upskill and advance their knowledge base to meet the changing needs that are occurring as technology in particular impacts manufacturing.

The Hon. RACHEL MERTON: In terms of student numbers when the centres are operating, do we know anything about that?

Mr STEVE WHAN: My memory is that we're aiming for 1,000 a year, but we'll come back to you and confirm that.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: How many, sorry?

Mr STEVE WHAN: A thousand.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: Across all three?

Mr STEVE WHAN: Yes.

STEPHEN BRADY: I believe that's right. Can we come back?

Mr STEVE WHAN: I will confirm that.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: In terms of the time frame—and I appreciate there is some initial capital in this year's budget—when would you anticipate these three centres to be up and running. What is the time frame you are working on?

STEPHEN BRADY: We're anticipating our first enrolments at the beginning of 2025.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: In all three at the same time, or is there a staged delivery approach?

STEPHEN BRADY: Let me come back to you on that as well. I think there is some staging in terms of the timing, but there will be some core units that will be applicable across all three.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: Mr Brady, picking up on what you said about the educational modelling, I'm assuming that there is the intention to do slightly different courses at the different centres based on industry connections et cetera?

STEPHEN BRADY: Yes, absolutely.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: Can you provide any information around what sort of conversations you're having with industry in each of the three areas and where you foreshadow those linkages will be made?

STEPHEN BRADY: Certainly. We've held round tables in the Hunter, Illawarra and Western Sydney with industry and universities and really explored what training needs they see in their local areas. Those centres will have focuses that meet those needs. In Western Sydney we see a very significant advanced manufacturing base, so it'll tend to target those direct manufacturing elements. When we're thinking about the Hunter, there is obviously the transition of the Hunter economy due to energy changes. It will be manufacturing based, but it will be focusing on the manufacturing needs in a transitioning economy, particularly around green energy. In the Illawarra there is a range of industrial drivers. There is still some very heavy manufacturing down there that is advancing with technology. We have been partnering with some large organisations such as BlueScope to understand their needs. There is quite a bit of defence manufacturing happening down in the Illawarra as well. The focus there will be around manufacturing, heavy manufacturing and defence.

The Hon. RACHEL MERTON: Minister, I will just raise—and Mr Dizdar touched on it before—the 1,000 New South Wales public sector apprenticeships and traineeships program. I was wondering if you had an update on the number of students enrolled in the program?

Mr STEVE WHAN: Yes, it's going extremely well. I can give you numbers. The second round of it has been promoted just over the last few weeks. From memory, there are 440 places up for grabs over that across a really large range of government agencies across the State.

CHLOE READ: Yes, that's right.

Mr STEVE WHAN: There are some particularly big ones in the energy sector and health sector. Recently I visited four young people who were doing traineeships over at Royal North Shore Hospital in—where were they?

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: Pathology. I've got your media release. I'm happy to help.

Mr STEVE WHAN: Thank you. They were in pathology. That was great. I made a point before about convincing parents. I asked all four of them how they got into it and one of them said, "My brother-in-law gave it to me and told me to enrol", and the other two said, "Mum made me." They were all enjoying it.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: It's good advice. Do what your mother tells you.

Mr STEVE WHAN: It's a very important area to go into to. Our first year of that has been very successful. As I said, 440 of those are up for grabs at the moment. We've also had a really good response from the agencies across government to taking them on. We've also put benchmarking in place to make sure that they are actually in addition. We actually set a benchmark for the existing level of apprentices and trainees in government and we'll be measuring it to ensure that we're going for the full 1,000 above that over the three years.

The Hon. RACHEL MERTON: Minister, are there any indications of retention or the success of the program so far?

Mr STEVE WHAN: Not yet, no. It's too early. Even our trainees are still in their traineeship period, so we aren't able to measure that yet. Is that correct?

CHLOE READ: Yes, that's right.

The Hon. RACHEL MERTON: So it is a three-year program in terms of the 1,000 new public sector apprenticeships?

Mr STEVE WHAN: Correct. There will be 1,000 in total over the three years. Obviously some people will be doing a single-year traineeship and some will be doing a three-year apprenticeship. There are obviously differences in those time frames.

MURAT DIZDAR: Without round two and the number the Minister gave, we're about a third of the way there.

The Hon. RACHEL MERTON: Is the program funded for the three-year period?

Mr STEVE WHAN: Yes, it is. There was a $93 million allocation in the initial year.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: I want to ask about the 1,300 apprentices and trainees in local government. Will that be available to all local government areas? How is that going to be delivered?

Mr STEVE WHAN: As I understand it, at this stage it's being delivered by the Office of Local Government. We're obviously talking to them about delivery because we think we've been really good at delivering the 1,000. But it is my understanding that all local governments in New South Wales will be able to ask for those—

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: Who is actually delivering it then? Are you funding it?

Mr STEVE WHAN: No, it was funded by a specific allocation to the Office of Local Government.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: The $250-odd million was the funding allocation. But that's gone to the Office of Local Government and it is doing the implementation?

Mr STEVE WHAN: Correct. It is a bit different to the 1,000.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: My question—and I'll get to it—was around how that's a $250 million allocation for 1,300. You've got $94-odd million for your 1,000. Can you explain how it is different as best you can?

Mr STEVE WHAN: It is quite a different model because the local government one is providing wage. That is my understanding. Perhaps I will pass over to the department.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: Sorry, what do you mean by providing wage?

CHLOE READ: We might need to take that on notice. I don't have enough detail on the local government quantity in comparison.

Mr STEVE WHAN: The bottom line is that the Office of Local Government is administering that program.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: Are there guidelines or allocations that come with that? Are these questions better directed to Minister Hoenig?

Mr STEVE WHAN: Yes, they need to be directed to Minister Hoenig.

MATHEW PEARSON: My understanding is that they're still working on the guidelines, so it's a couple of months away.

Mr STEVE WHAN: We obviously expect to be providing some of the training through TAFE.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: That was going to be my next question. In terms of the TAFE component of those roles, how does that work for funding? Will some of that $250 million come back for those students? How does that work in practice?

CHLOE READ: I think we will need to take the specifics on notice for the Office of Local Government. I know we are working with them closely on it and we are helping with advice on how apprenticeships and traineeships are structured and the different ways you could do this. But there are lots of different approaches they could take. We might just come back on notice on the specifics of how things will flow between us. But obviously we are really keen to support them in the delivery of that commitment.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: Yes, and share the expertise, I would imagine, rather than having—

Mr STEVE WHAN: We've got regular meetings set up with them over the next couple of months.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: I appreciate what you've just said about taking it all on notice and that a lot of it goes to local government, but is there any time frame for when they hope to have those 1,300 apprentices? Is it within this term of government or over the next four years? Do you know how long the funding is meant to last and the time frame to get to 1,300?

Mr STEVE WHAN: We'll probably direct that question to Ron Hoenig.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: I have a couple of quick questions about Queanbeyan TAFE. Minister, do you know how many students you currently have enrolled at that campus?

Mr STEVE WHAN: I know that it's well used. I visited a bricklaying class there the other day.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: Did you learn anything for a bit of DIY at home?

Mr STEVE WHAN: I have had a go at bricks before; mine are nowhere near as neat as theirs. We also have a number of the migration courses—English as a second language courses. We've got hairdressing there and a range of others. Have we got some information on the actual numbers?

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: I'm after how many are enrolled and also the face-to-face courses and any changes in the last 12 months, at Queanbeyan specifically.

Mr STEVE WHAN: I don't believe there have been any changes in the last 12 months.

STEPHEN BRADY: No.

Mr STEVE WHAN: We'll take on notice the actual numbers enrolled.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: And what face-to-face courses are currently on offer as well at that campus?

STEPHEN BRADY: We'll take that on notice.

Mr STEVE WHAN: Yes, sure.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: On notice is fine. I want to touch briefly on some of the quantum research issues. Microsoft recently made a decision, which you're probably aware of, to close their research facility at Sydney university. Are you across that? Were you briefed on that at all?

Mr STEVE WHAN: I visited the quantum facility at Sydney university recently, but, no, I wasn't briefed on Microsoft's decisions in relation to it.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: I think in July they made some announcements around closing their facility on that university campus. Was there any concern or impact around—my understanding is that Microsoft is also a partner in applied technology at Meadowbank as well.

STEPHEN BRADY: That's right.

Mr STEVE WHAN: They are.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: Has there been any impact on that from Microsoft?

Mr STEVE WHAN: No, they're a very active partner, indeed. We very much appreciate Steve Worrall's leadership of the digital compact, which has been producing some really good results in New South Wales, and also his leadership of the—

STEPHEN BRADY: Skills Board.

Mr STEVE WHAN: —Skills Board.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: Because he's the chair of the Skills Board as well, yes.

Mr STEVE WHAN: He's the chair of the Skills Board. But, no, the Meadowbank facility has been going from strength to strength. That's my summary of it.

STEPHEN BRADY: I'd also say that Microsoft has established a data centre academy with TAFE NSW. It's one of only a few in the world, so a strong commitment with Microsoft as a partner, leading industry.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: I think it was July this year they're exiting the research facility at Sydney university, but if they're still doing the other work and that's not impacting TAFE, then that's reassuring. More broadly, my understanding is that the Sydney Quantum Academy was funded by the previous Government, I think, in 2019, and there are four universities, I believe, as part of that. Do they have any further funding allocated to them beyond what's already there, do you know?

Mr STEVE WHAN: I'm not aware of any capital funding allocated for the quantum group.

CHLOE READ: I don't think the funding was part of this portfolio. I think it came through another bit of—

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: Yes, it was $15.4 million in 2019. My understanding is they got a 12-month extension, but they're not sure of ongoing funding. Who would that fall under?

Mr STEVE WHAN: It's not something that has been raised with me by them.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: Ms Read, you just said that you didn't think it was part of this—

CHLOE READ: I don't think it's us. I think it might be the Chief Scientist. I'm happy to take it on notice.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: Take it on notice, yes. That would be good.

CHLOE READ: I'll see if I can find out.

Mr STEVE WHAN: As I said, I actually visited the building just a few weeks ago, and they didn't raise funding concerns with me in my visit. They're welcome to, obviously.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: The Chair asked some questions about the TAFE restructure, in general. I think, Mr Brady, you said before it's about streamlining, and obviously the anticipated reduction of cost. Is there a predicted headcount reduction within that restructure?

Mr STEVE WHAN: There are two processes going on. There was the change to the operating model, which was a bit different to the questions that were being answered before about overall headcount. I just want to be completely open about that.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: Sure.

Mr STEVE WHAN: The change to the operating model is about changing the way TAFE operates, putting in place a structure, just it was focused on industry, as I said before. There are some changes to staffing that go along with that. There will be more teachers and less in some of the administrative side of things.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: Is it a 200 headcount reduction in support staff? I've seen that figure. Is that accurate?

STEPHEN BRADY: No.

Mr STEVE WHAN: No, there was a figure which was reported overall. Out of the operating model, 664 positions are directly affected, so they go through and fit into new jobs. From the information that I've got at the moment—and consultation is just concluding on this, so people have had the opportunity to raise issues with the mapping of their job match to a new one and all those sorts of things—I'm expecting that there would be a net of around 80 employees who are eventually affected by losing their job, but a lot of other employees who actually had their jobs changed or their section changed or who they report to changed was just a part of the restructure.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: With those 80—I think, Ms Tickle, you were talking before about seeing whether there are positions for them within other government agencies—they would fall into that category as well?

STEPHEN BRADY: That's right.

JULIE TICKLE: Yes, that's correct.

Mr STEVE WHAN: They will also go through the established mobility provisions that the Government has.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: Again, mainly administrating, accounting, IT roles. Is that what you're talking about when you say non-teaching-based staff?

Mr STEVE WHAN: We'll go to Ms Tickle for that.

JULIE TICKLE: Just to clarify, there are 664 positions impacted and 505 employees, so positions and employees are different. "Impacts" means that they can be reappointed, their role can change or they can go through a placement process; that's the whole descriptor. There are 239 less positions proposed, which is a net reduction of 80 employees. These people are across three areas. The changes impact our product and quality group, which is proposed to be changed to the education quality group; and our student experience group, which will go into two new areas proposed. One is called the learning and teaching group, which is where all the teachers sit, and one will be called student support and community group. The roles are a mix of administrative roles in those areas. There are no teachers planned to be reduced. In fact, we're adding 14 more head teachers through this plan. No teachers or frontline student support resources—so that includes education support officers and assessors. There's no reduction planned anywhere there.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: In terms of the 80-odd employees that you expect to be impacted—and I appreciate what you said about trying to find them other positions—do you have a breakdown in terms of how many of those are regionally based versus metro?

JULIE TICKLE: We have just concluded consultation, as the Minister said, on 23 August. We're currently going through all of the feedback. It's unclear where those roles will eventually go from—if they in fact do, because they go through mobility. We've got 156, I think, learning locations across the State and a really high percentage of our roles are location agnostic, so you can do the role from anywhere across the State. It's really hard to tell in terms of what the end result will be. But we have just under half of our employees working in regional and remote locations at TAFE. Certainly there are some roles that are in those numbers that are impacted that are regional. But in terms of what ends up happening, we can't answer that yet because we're still going through all of the feedback.

Mr STEVE WHAN: The reason we're doing this is to set TAFE on a path where we can be more efficient providers and hopefully grow over the future and provide more education. I got pretty consistent feedback from people that the model that we had before wasn't very practical, including from some of your colleagues, who had complained to me about their local areas. The expectation here is that the TAFE will, with this new model, be engaging with communities and listening to their communities, and that the faculties will be able to more directly engage with industry and be more responsive and up to date with industry. It's certainly not my intention to keep TAFE in a constant state of change, which they have been in over quite a lot of years. But we do need to get the base model right to move forward.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: What's the time frame of having this restructure all sorted and in place and everyone having that certainty?

STEPHEN BRADY: Ms Tickle was saying our consultation with staff just finished last week.

JULIE TICKLE: On 23 August.

STEPHEN BRADY: We're waiting on the final feedback from our unions, which will come in tomorrow. We'll consider that feedback. We've had over 4,000 pieces of individual feedback so there's a bit to get through. We've been working our way through that. Our intention is that we will be able to have finalised the placement processes et cetera so that we can step into first term of 2025 with the new model in place.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: So day one, term 1 next year is what you're working towards?

STEPHEN BRADY: Absolutely.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: This might be linked, but I think there were some changes in June in terms of pausing recruitment on non-teaching roles. Did that tie into this restructure? Is that why that happened?

Mr STEVE WHAN: Ms Tickle?

JULIE TICKLE: In June we talked to our employees about pausing recruitment on a couple of areas. One of those areas was in casual teachers because we've been undertaking a workforce stabilisation program and moving many of our current part-time casual teachers into permanent and permanent part-time employment. We really wanted to make sure that we were maximising that opportunity and pause, where possible, recruitment of casual teachers. There was no pause or stopping of any permanent or permanent part-time teachers—in fact, we were ramping that up—but in other areas there was a pause requested in terms of looking at our resourcing.

This was certainly not directly related to the operating model but it certainly—we often do this to take stock of the resources, make sure that we've got them in the right areas and that sort of thing. There was not a freeze on recruitment, and I do want to make that clear for the record. What we instead said is that more consideration needed to be taken by line managers and we escalated the approvals to higher executive management to make sure that we were putting priority recruitment first.

Mr STEVE WHAN: That is consistent with the Government's priority, which is to reduce insecure employment and get more teachers into permanent positions, more TAFE employees into permanent positions. We've been getting a really positive response to that.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: Do you have any data, Minister, on how many you've converted from casual to permanent or temporary permanent?

Mr STEVE WHAN: I can tell you that, in percentage terms, we've gone from in June 2022 having 50.8 per cent permanent in our teaching ratios to now 57.8 per cent.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: I'm happy for it to be on notice, but do you have the raw figures as well?

Mr STEVE WHAN: The raw figures? We've exceeded our initial 500 target and we're going out again talking to employees about another round of people who have expressed interest. We'd be expecting—at the moment it would only be a guess, but was it around 800 or something?

JULIE TICKLE: No, we exceeded our target of 500 for this semester. We converted, between new people coming in through Paid to Learn and existing people, 540. As the Minister said, we're going out for the next round now. We expect there to be quite a number. There's around, I think, just under a couple of thousand people that we're looking at eligibility for conversion at this time.

The CHAIR: That does bring us to 12.45 p.m. I will check if the Government members have any burning questions.

The Hon. MARK BUTTIGIEG: No, we're all good. The Minister is far too thorough.

The CHAIR: Very thorough. Thank you very much, Minister, for your time. That concludes questioning with you today.

Mr STEVE WHAN: Thank you—and thank you to all the team, who've worked very hard.

(Luncheon adjournment)

Professor MARK SCOTT, Vice-Chancellor and President, University of Sydney, affirmed and examined

Professor ANNAMARIE JAGOSE, Provost and Deputy Vice-Chancellor, University of Sydney, affirmed and examined.

The CHAIR: I welcome the additional witnesses to the hearing.

The Hon. SUSAN CARTER: Good afternoon, Professor Scott. Can I take you to the university's 2032 strategy, which identifies an aspiration for transformational, student-focused education. It notes:

> Regardless of where and how they learn, our students are confident in their abilities, sure of their personal goals, and feel that they belong.

I then take you to a comment I received from one current student: "In the bathrooms, in the lectures, in the courtyard—everywhere you look, you're not accepted. It's hard to speak up and try to hold a conversation when it feels like the institution you believe in and require support from betrays you." Is this the transformational education that the University of Sydney aims to provide?

MARK SCOTT: Thank you for your question. The University of Sydney is committed to providing a transformational experience for every student who elects to study with us. We want a supportive environment. We want an inclusive environment. We want an environment where students can explore their interests, make new friends, engage with broadening experiences and engage with faculty, because we know all of those things are key to excellent engagement in learning, success in learning and a pathway through. It's a large and complex institution. If any students do not feel as supported as they want to be, we want to be able to help identify the causes of that and work with them. Our student support team is extensive.

The Hon. SUSAN CARTER: If I could just take you up on that. What attribute of this student would you identify that made them feel so unaccepted at your university, bearing in mind this is a comment from this year?

MARK SCOTT: It's been a complex year on campus, there's been no doubt about that. If this is a—

The Hon. SUSAN CARTER: Yes, and what attribute of that student do you think is what made them feel so—

The Hon. STEPHEN LAWRENCE: Point of order: I'm not exactly sure how asking a witness to engage in some process of inference or speculation in relation to an anonymised statement is actually relevant to the terms of reference of this inquiry.

The CHAIR: I will uphold the point of order. If you could get to the point, Ms Carter?

The Hon. SUSAN CARTER: I'm happy to move on. I'm happy to say that this was a Jewish student and they were made to feel that way by their experiences at the university, which I'm sure you would not welcome, as I certainly would also not welcome. I'm interested in a lot of the university's policies, which are very well developed for a range of students, which is very appropriate. As one example, the university's commitment statement on LGBTIQ+ practices states that in order to achieve "a safe and supportive environment for all, ongoing targeted action is required". Is ongoing targeted action required to create a safe and supportive environment for Jewish students?

MARK SCOTT: Let me go to the year that you've referenced. I think it's been a challenging year on our campus; I think it's been a challenging year on university campuses across Australia and around the world. I can tell you that I've met numbers of times, in groups and individually, with Jewish students and staff and with Palestinian students and staff. I've never encountered an issue which has generated more grief and anguish, anger and concern as over the issues that are taking place in the Middle East now. The events of 7 October, the ongoing conflict in Gaza and the genuine distress that it's caused for members of our community—I've never been around an issue where I've seen more people just tearful and so grief stricken by what they have seen happen and by their own personal connection to that; those who have family and friends in Israel, those who have family and friends in Palestine.

The Hon. SUSAN CARTER: I think we can acknowledge all of that. What did the university do to support those students?

MARK SCOTT: Let me talk on that. Immediately following 7 October we wrote to students and staff to express the university's shock and to indicate the fact that we stand against racism, terrorism and violence in all its forms. I've written to our community—

The Hon. SUSAN CARTER: Can I just inquire about that a bit, please?

The Hon. STEPHEN LAWRENCE: Point of order: The witness was asked what the university has done in relation to what is obviously a highly sensitive and complex topic. The witness got a sentence or two into that answer and had referenced only one matter. I would suggest that is not a reasonable opportunity, particularly given the breadth and nature of the question that was asked. If one asks a question, one can expect an answer.

The Hon. SUSAN CARTER: To the point of order: I was seeking to elucidate part of the answer that I was given so that we could tease it out more fully.

The CHAIR: It is appropriate for there to be a robust discussion between the witness and the member, and for the member to be able to redirect if the answer is straying. However, in this case the answer had only just begun. Given the nature of the topic, it would be good if we could take the pace out of this a little bit and allow Professor Scott to respond.

MARK SCOTT: Thank you. I can indicate that there have been over 20 communications from me and senior members of my team to the community around creating a supportive, safe environment since 7 October. We've identified and emailed students of Palestinian and Israeli citizenship. We stood up an incident response team to manage what was a complex and evolving situation. My office convened a community of practice to ensure a coordinated response to issues that were being raised with us by staff and students. Members of my executive team met twice daily, at times, during the year as we were developing an operational response. We reviewed a significant number of policies as they were tested through the year, including our advertising on campus policy and our ICT resources policy. The policy around when and how flags can be used on campus was raised and worked on.

We significantly increased our security presence on campus. We made 24/7 support for students and staff available through security and health and wellbeing teams, including information being available around security escorts. We increased levels of counselling, including, when students felt they needed it, special considerations around exam arrangements and other kinds of assignments as well. I held an all-staff town hall meeting only days after the Hamas attacks and reiterated our expectation of civil discourse and a zero tolerance approach to racism and antisemitism. We shared information to our staff on how to report incidents of racism, harm and abuse, including that which occurred online.

The Hon. SUSAN CARTER: With respect, Professor Scott, the question I asked originally was did you believe that targeted, ongoing action was required to support Jewish students? I've heard of many actions. Is targeted, ongoing support needed to make sure that Jewish students feel safe on the campus of the University of Sydney?

MARK SCOTT: I have had representatives of the Jewish community—staff and students—express to me areas of concern that they had. They've written to me. I've met with them in groups and I've met with them individually. Many of the processes—

The Hon. SUSAN CARTER: Again, I thank you for telling me what you've done.

The Hon. STEPHEN LAWRENCE: Point of order—

The Hon. SUSAN CARTER: The question was—

The CHAIR: Order! I'll hear the point of order.

The Hon. STEPHEN LAWRENCE: I would suggest that the witness was being directly relevant to the question that he was asked, and he should be given a reasonable opportunity to answer the question and not be interrupted.

The Hon. SUSAN CARTER: To the point of order: I've had to ask the same question effectively three times—is targeted support required for Jewish students on campus? That question has not been answered by the witness yet.

The CHAIR: We do have plenty of time, so let's try and take a breath. With that feedback, Professor Scott, if you could respond.

MARK SCOTT: Sure. I would've thought it's inherent in the answer that I've already given that Jewish staff and students expressed concern. Many of these initiatives that we implemented were in response to issues that they had raised that we then investigated and we then responded to.

The Hon. SUSAN CARTER: One of the things that you put in place was, I believe you said, security escorts?

MARK SCOTT: The availability of security escorts—can I say that for many years, even since I was a student, we've run security buses and other sorts of support, but we did say that if anyone was concerned about their safety or there were any issues involved that they felt they needed security support for, then that would be available. I must make it clear—

The Hon. SUSAN CARTER: Can I just ask you a specific question about that? Would that mean that if a Jewish student felt unsafe walking past the encampment on the way to lectures, a security escort would be available to assist them?

MARK SCOTT: What it would mean—without getting into specifics of it, this was a service that was not just available for Jewish students but any students, and many of the issues that I've outlined about concern—

The Hon. SUSAN CARTER: Can I reframe? Would any student who felt unsafe walking past the encampment be able to ask for a security escort so that they would feel safe walking to class?

MARK SCOTT: I believe that they would be able to talk with our security, and if that was a feeling of some support that they needed, then I hope our security team would engage around that if necessary.

The Hon. SUSAN CARTER: But you can't tell me that that's what's—

ANNAMARIE JAGOSE: Perhaps I could just jump in and add here, we did actually circulate the security contact number to students broadly and we did encourage them if they felt unsafe on campus. That arose in specific relation to engagement with the Jewish community, Jewish staff and Jewish students who reported feeling unsafe, a condition that we could well empathise with.

The Hon. SUSAN CARTER: Thank you both, but I don't believe the question has been answered. What does a security escort mean? Does it mean that a student who felt unsafe could be escorted to class?

ANNAMARIE JAGOSE: It could mean that, yes.

The Hon. SUSAN CARTER: Did it mean that?

MARK SCOTT: I don't have the precise detail of that engagement there. It's a service that's—

The Hon. SUSAN CARTER: You'll understand my frustration, Professor Scott, because you tell me that this is what you're putting in place to support students that you acknowledge need targeted support in these circumstances, yet most of what you've said is communications and, when I ask about a specific example, you don't know the details of that specific example. If I could perhaps ask another question. If as a woman I felt that there was a climate of sexual violence on the campus, do you think it would be a sufficient response to a climate of sexual violence to say, "We'll provide you with security escorts to walk past the predators"?

ANNAMARIE JAGOSE: Perhaps I could answer this question as a woman—

The Hon. STEPHEN LAWRENCE: Point of order—

The CHAIR: I'll hear the point of order.

The Hon. STEPHEN LAWRENCE: It's just an inherently speculative, rhetorical and provocative question that has no relevance to what is going on here. It's comparing two things that frankly it's not useful to compare in this context.

The Hon. SUSAN CARTER: To the point of order: There are many ways in which students can feel unsafe.

The Hon. STEPHEN LAWRENCE: That's true.

The Hon. SUSAN CARTER: Having been a female student myself, I know there are many times when one feels unsafe, and I also know that there have been issues with which the university has struggled in relation to sexual violence on campus. I think it is directly comparable to say that at a time when a student feels unsafe because of culturally what's happening at the university, is the answer security escorts or is the answer broader than that?

The Hon. STEPHEN LAWRENCE: Further to the point of order: This is obviously, as has been clear from the evidence, inevitably going to be a case-by-case basis, so to pose rhetorically whether persons fearful of sexual predation could expect a particular thing as if that casts light on this question of the encampment and the response is a question designed not to garner relevant evidence but to simply provoke. It is out of order, I would suggest.

The Hon. SUSAN CARTER: I couldn't disagree more strongly with your characterisation of that question.

The CHAIR: I will rule on the point of order. I do think the question is provocative. If there is information that you are seeking, if you could be more direct with what the question is and the information you're seeking, that would be helpful.

The Hon. SUSAN CARTER: Do you believe that if students feel there is a climate of violence, Professor Scott, the appropriate response is to provide somebody to walk them past that violence?

MARK SCOTT: Let me start by answering that and then the provost may have some views as well. I think it is a very significant oversimplification of the detailed university response to the complexities we're dealing with to suggest that our only offering was a security escort. A security escort was available—

The Hon. SUSAN CARTER: Excuse me, for clarification, I was not suggesting that was the only response. I was asking if that was an appropriate response.

MARK SCOTT: I'm saying that if our students felt that they would like a security escort, then of course the appropriate thing for us to do was to provide that. There were other things that students asked for. There were many other things that we acted on as a consequence of our engagement with students.

The Hon. SUSAN CARTER: Perhaps we can move onto something else because we're getting bogged in the weeds.

MARK SCOTT: But perhaps the provost—

The Hon. SUSAN CARTER: No, if we could move onto something else. When did you become aware that Hizb ut-Tahrir was active on your campus?

MARK SCOTT: In our engagement since 7 October, we were constantly in touch with New South Wales police. One of the things I'd say about our campus—

The Hon. SUSAN CARTER: Sorry, it was a very specific question, Professor Scott.

The Hon. STEPHEN LAWRENCE: Point of order—

The Hon. SUSAN CARTER: When did you become aware that Hizb ut-Tahrir was active on your campus?

The CHAIR: I'll hear the point of order.

The Hon. STEPHEN LAWRENCE: It might've been a very simple question, but that doesn't necessarily mean that it's a very simple answer, and the witness was a sentence or two into the answer. I suspect there was about to be a bit of nuance in the answer because it's not a simple answer, even though my friend might think it's a simple question.

The CHAIR: I would suggest that we allow Professor Scott to answer and then, if you feel he hasn't answered the question properly, you can ask again.

MARK SCOTT: Since 7 October, the University of Sydney has been in constant contact with the police, and the safety of our community has been our absolute top priority at all times. One of the issues we had to deal with on the encampment in particular is the porous nature of the university's environment. There are 28 entry and exit points to the University of Sydney campus, as far as I understand it. We are anything but a gated community, and so we were aware at the time of the encampment that some of our students and staff were there, students and staff from other universities but also outsiders around that. That's why we had this ongoing engagement with the police to constantly seek assurances from them about the external influences that they understood might be on our campus, and we were assured by police that we would be notified by them about any extremist, violent or radicalised behaviour of groups on campus that we needed to be aware of.

In early May, we received a phone call after a rally suggesting that Hizb ut-Tahrir may have been a presence on campus. This was referred to our security team that is in constant contact with the police. After the 60 Minutes report and the reporting in Nine media, I then sought another meeting with New South Wales police and protective services particularly looking at the issue of Hizb ut-Tahrir. In the briefing that I received then, I explicitly raised Hizb ut-Tahrir and we sought and received assurances about being notified of any relevant information on the encampment that related to extremist, violent and radicalised behaviour. We've also received briefings in the University Foreign Interference Taskforce from the most senior intelligence officials in the country, senior government officials, and those briefings have continued. If there is concern around Hizb ut-Tahrir or other groups that may have been at different times on the university premises, we have engaged with the group that is expert on any of these groups, and that is New South Wales police, counterintelligence and other national security agencies.

The Hon. SUSAN CARTER: So you acknowledge that Hizb ut-Tahrir were active on campus.

MARK SCOTT: No, I have not said—if you pay close attention to my answer—

The Hon. SUSAN CARTER: So you're saying that Hizb ut-Tahrir was not on campus.

MARK SCOTT: No.

The Hon. STEPHEN LAWRENCE: Point of order: Clearly the witness was attempting to respond to what also occurred to me as being a mischaracterisation of his previous answer. He should be able to do that, particularly on a topic such as this that my friend is seeking to wade into.

The Hon. SUSAN CARTER: Perhaps I could get the direct answer to the direct question that I asked. Were Hizb ut-Tahrir active on campus? Professor Scott, a yes or no would suffice.

The CHAIR: I will rule on the point of order. The witness was just half a sentence in. Again, we will just try and take some of the heat out of this. We have plenty of time.

The Hon. SUSAN CARTER: We don't, actually, with respect, Chair.

The CHAIR: You do because I was going to give you more of my time, but maybe I'll rethink that.

The Hon. SUSAN CARTER: That's very kind.

The CHAIR: We will allow Professor Scott to respond.

MARK SCOTT: Of course, I have seen the reports of Hizb ut-Tahrir's presence on Australian university campuses. I recall the 60 Minutes and Nine media reports. As I indicated, there was a phone call that raised the question as to whether, in fact, they were on campus. I put the question to police and authorities when we met with them after that report about Hizb ut-Tahrir. There was a general conversation about Hizb ut-Tahrir's activity in the community. But what I took from that meeting was, again, the assurance that, if we had things we needed to be concerned of around extremist violence or radicalised behaviour of groups, the police and intelligence units were around campus and would let us know.

I would say about Hizb ut-Tahrir that it's a question perhaps for Parliament, in some respects. If this was a declared terrorist organisation that was illegal, if the Parliament had declared Hizb ut-Tahrir an illegal organisation, then of course they would be banned from campus. They are not. Therefore, there is no, as I understand it, limit on how that group can operate in protests and rallies and encampments and in other such activities anywhere in and around the city or around the State or, as I understand it, anywhere in the country. If they were on campus, there was no mechanism in the sense for us to stop them being on campus as they are not a banned group. The key test for me, which is the way we continue to frame it with police and intelligence authorities, was were they concerned about extremist, violent or radicalised behaviour with groups that were associated with the encampment that we needed to be aware of. We were repeatedly assured that they were not.

The CHAIR: I obviously come from a different perspective in relation to the encampment. I understand that there was a difficult set of decisions that needed to be made by each university. Different universities were dealing with very similar issues. Was there coordination between universities to share approaches or is there a forum for that?

MARK SCOTT: Yes, there are a number of groups that would meet and discuss these matters. It's quite a close grouping of New South Wales vice-chancellors. There are 11 universities. I notice that 10 are missing today from the hearing, but they are here in spirit, I am sure. We would meet amongst New South Wales vice-chancellors and talk about what was taking place in different universities. There was an encampment at Newcastle. The University of New South Wales was on semester break at the time the encampment started, so they clearly didn't have one. Also, Universities Australia and the Go8 universities—the big research intensive universities—had more of the encampment. So, yes, we discussed how we were managing the tension. The tension is a clear one.

We are committed to doing two things. We are committed to freedom of speech and we are committed to academic freedom. We are implementing the model code that was identified in the French report on free speech, and the University of Sydney was regarded as an exemplar of that. We recognise, as the French report said, that free speech at times will mean that people will feel shocked and offended by the actions of others. At the same time, even though protests might be rowdy or spirited, they cannot interfere with the rights and the freedoms of others. It is how we balance that commitment to free speech and academic freedom that has been part of the culture of the University of Sydney for more than 100 years—but recognising that these are distressing times. There would be people on our campus who were upset that the encampment was there and who were opposed to the views that were being articulated there.

Can I add, there were Palestinian students who also came to me with similar arguments to Jewish students. They did not feel as welcome and accepted on campus as they would want to be. Managing that was a complexity for us. It's very complex to hold those dual commitments of free speech and the safety and wellbeing of our community at the same time. And, yes, we are all learning from others. We also learnt extensively from the experience of universities overseas. One of our clear commitments here—if you look at what happened in the United States when they tried to clear those encampments and they called riot police on campus, those encounters with the police turned out to be very violent in many circumstances. On the day after, the crowds were bigger, the violence was more widespread, the destruction was clear and, in some circumstances, the universities and the police totally lost control of those circumstances.

We had three options that we were working on. One was to not escalate violence or harm, and that was to try and make sure, if at all possible, we didn't have police in riot gear on campus arresting students and staff. Another option could have been to wait it out and pretend it wasn't there, but it clearly was there. It was a big presence on our front lawn and upsetting to members of our community. What we decided to do, as other universities did, like the University of Melbourne and the University of Queensland, was talk to the students at the encampment. There were many things that they wanted us to do that we couldn't possibly do. There were some things that we engaged substantively with them on. The approach that we took, I think, was informed by the experiences of other universities in Australia and also informed by what we were seeing overseas. If you go to many overseas universities now, including, as I understand, Oxford and others, the encampments are six months on and still going.

The CHAIR: Do you think mistakes were made, in hindsight?

MARK SCOTT: It's a very fair question. I can tell you that we had teams, as I said, working 24/7 and executive teams meeting twice a day as we were trying to manage what was a complex and quite raw situation for many. The question I asked was did we make reasonable decisions, given what we knew at the time. One of the things we have done is we have commissioned a review by Bruce Hodgkinson, a senior counsel who is an expert in health and wellbeing in safe workplaces, to review our policies and our practices and our processes to think through a little bit on our experience but also to look ahead and to think through have we got these settings right. Are there things that we can learn from this experience that can help us make sure that we can try and manage, I think, this tension that does exist between free, robust speech that is a hallmark of a university but also an environment where all feel safe and affirmed and included—psychosocial safety, if you like. Psychosocial safety is clearly a new area of the law and I think we are all learning about how you deliver that effectively in an environment that is committed to free speech.

The CHAIR: You talk about free speech as being the consideration on that one side, but I guess a lot of students involved in those encampments would also view what they were doing as expressions of solidarity with people who weren't having solidarity expressed with them by the major parts of the mainstream media et cetera. I guess that's the other tension, isn't it? It's not just free speech; it's also symbols and showings of solidarity. Was that considered as part of that process?

MARK SCOTT: I think that's one of the reasons why—and I appreciate that well-meaning people will disagree on this—we felt that this protest, which was a different style of protest and I'll talk about that in a minute, fell into broad traditions of the university. If you go back in the university's history, there were big crowds protesting conscription, the Vietnam War, nuclear disarmament and apartheid in South Africa. There's a long tradition at the University of Sydney. Political economy was an issue that students protested on—the way we were teaching economics. These are all issues for which there's a long tradition of protest. Some of the students I spoke with on the encampment had family in Gaza, they knew people in Gaza, and we have people in the university who have lost family in the Gaza conflict. Of course they were often so genuine and heartfelt in their grief at what they were seeing on the television sets every night. I think they also felt solidarity with the student movement around the world. Often you've seen that at university. Students around the world are protesting and they wanted to be part of it.

What we needed to say to them, "You're able to protest. There are rights and responsibilities that come with that. Part of that responsibility of exercising that right to protest is exercising that right in a way that does not infringe on the rights, health and wellbeing of others in the university community." I would say as well that I think the nature of the encampment was a challenge for us. The protests at lunchtime in the quadrangle—these are well known to us—encampment came back on the back of the Occupy Wall Street original campaign and others that followed. This is different. We are not set up for 24/7 protests; we are not set up to be a campsite at night. There were health and wellbeing questions that we were aware of for students who were camping over.

We didn't have facilities set up for them to camp overnight. We were worried about fire risk at times. We were worried about health risks for them at times. We had significant security in place for them too. Managing all of these complexities—to allow free speech to happen, to protect the broader community, to protect those who were in the encampment, and to make sure we understood or were appreciative of the challenge that was created, in that we didn't always know who was at the encampment because, fundamentally, it's a public space—these were all things that the leadership team were engaged with around the clock for seven months.

The CHAIR: Can I ask you what the demands of the encampment were?

MARK SCOTT: Yes, let me talk to those. It took some weeks for the encampment to articulate those. That reflects that there were numbers of different groups up there—the Students' Representative Council, a number of other student activist groups, and the Muslim Students' Association—and they finally did come together on some demands. I can tell you that some of those demands we simply could not agree to and didn't agree to. They wanted us to cease university partnerships with universities in Israel, to cut back on the ability for our academics to work in exchange with some Israeli universities, and they wanted us to stop university exchanges with Israel. All of these things we felt fundamentally worked against the commitment we have as a university to work in partnership with global universities, to allow academics freedom, and we are a great believer in the opportunities of students travelling, seeing the world and taking advantage of those kinds of partnerships.

But there were some things that we did do. They were targeting defence and security contracts that we had in research and we said, "No, we're not going to scrap those." But one of the points they made was that our defence and security contracts were not as transparent as they probably should be. We looked into it and we agreed with that. If I looked online at the information that the University of New South Wales or the Australian National University put up, they were far more detailed than the University of Sydney. We agreed to be as transparent as we can be around our defence and security research contracts. That information is now going up online. There was also a question about the money the university has invested in endowments and our future fund, and other matters that earn an income back to the university. They asked if some of that money is invested in defence and security industries. We said that we appreciated there wasn't transparency around that, so we did what a number of United States universities have done.

We said we'd put together an eminent panel—there could be student representatives and staff representatives on that—to look at that defence and security investment, and to provide advice to the University of Sydney Senate that finally determines that investment policy. Dr Simon Longstaff, the head of the Ethics Centre, is heading that committee that's doing that review. We have a number of other eminent Australians who are business leaders, from the military, and student representatives too, who are providing that review. That review will take place by the end of the year. We expect that that advice will go to the senate and then the senate will decide. So on the negotiation, as you would want, there was detailed and substantive engagement around the substance. There were some things that we felt we couldn't do in the interests of the university and our key principles; there were other things we could engage in, and they were the things that we agreed to do.

The CHAIR: In terms of weapons manufacture and the investments in weapons manufacture, I know that was a common demand of many universities. It's not, "Yes, we're going to cut ties with weapons manufacturers," and it's not, "No, we won't." It's more, "We're going to do a review and see."

MARK SCOTT: I think I'd frame it this way. You're talking about the investment side. Do we have investments in firms that are involved in defence-related industries? To what extent is that a significant investment? What's the nature and form of that investment? What have other universities done about that? And what would the recommendation be to the senate about that? If you look at our investment policy, already there are a number of industries that we don't invest in. We don't invest in the gaming industry or in alcohol and tobacco. There has been a divestment from fossil fuels in recent years.

Then there are other things that are banned. Cluster munitions is identified specifically as something that we can't and won't invest in. The investigation will be: What are those investments? How are they structured? What do we know about those firms? What is appropriate for university policy on that? But finally, the decision about how and where the university invests, in a governance level, lies with the university senate. This group will provide advice and then the university senate will come up with its decision. I imagine the report that they write will be publicly released. I imagine the university senate's response, as a consequence of that, will also be publicly released. So far greater levels of transparency on the back—

The CHAIR: When will that be done by?

MARK SCOTT: I think we are expecting the first meeting of that committee—that review group took place last week, I believe. They are meeting now and doing that work. We are expecting that their report would go, firstly, to the senate investment committee and then probably to the senate as a whole, we expect, by the end of the year.

The CHAIR: Just to clarify, I think there has been some mischaracterisation about the encampments being somehow about Jewish students. I understand that, regardless of the intent of the encampment—and also acknowledging that people within that encampment may have had different intents—the actual intent of the encampment did have demands. Some of those demands, although not met, have been heard, and something is being done about some of that. My final question on this is how much harder did the misinformation coming from the right-wing media and commentators make your job during this?

MARK SCOTT: That's a complex question, I think. What I would say is that it has been a very heightened time. As I said earlier, there was genuine, heartfelt distress from students and staff. I have met with leaders of the Muslim community and leaders of the Jewish community, some of whom I've met in different guises and different roles over many different years. I think they would both say that this is as raw and demanding and complex a time as they have ever had to deal with. The media and commentary—many in the room won't be shocked to hear that when you look at media reports, at times you wonder that question as to whether that is as complete and accurate as you would like it to be. I did feel that the university's attempt to de-escalate the risk of violence, to bring a peaceable solution to an encampment, to deal with a volatile environment—which was highly fraught on all sides—and to bring a peaceful solution was a worthy aim, worth working towards, and worth engaging with students on. It was pleasing that we could de-escalate without there being violence, which was what we worked towards. I sometimes thought some of the nuance of that—that that is a goal worth working towards—was not always reflected in media coverage.

The Hon. SUSAN CARTER: Professor Scott, I'm interested in your remarks about de-escalation and I agree that de-escalation of violence is always a worthy goal. I'm reflecting, though, on the SafeWork NSW claim that the university has received from a number of staff claiming that the events of the encampment and the associated disruption of lectures and meetings and various other events meant that the university was a psychologically unsafe environment for Jewish staff and students. Did your policies de-escalate the psychosocial violence that was connected with the protests, the chants and the encampment?

MARK SCOTT: The first thing I need to say on the reference you made to SafeWork is that, with the most recent information that I've received, the only thing we know about that is the report that appeared in this morning's newspaper. So if, in fact, there has been a complaint that has been lodged, the university has not been officially notified of that. However, I can assure you that, if there is to be an investigation, the university will fully cooperate with that, as we are completely committed to an environment that delivers safety, health and wellbeing, including psychosocial safety, for all who operate within our community, and if there are some people—

The Hon. SUSAN CARTER: Professor Scott, can I just ask you a specific question about that on psychosocial safety. Students have reported:

> I do not feel safe on campus and actively struggle to learn when faced with the reminder that people are openly allowed to call for my death in the next room.

How does that help the psychosocial safety of students?

MARK SCOTT: I would want to see the specific nature of that allegation.

The Hon. SUSAN CARTER: So, Professor Scott, you're suggesting that there were not groups of people moving through the campus, making claims and chants, such as "Globalise the intifada", and that Jewish students would not have read that as a call for their death?

MARK SCOTT: Let me—

The Hon. SUSAN CARTER: Are you suggesting it didn't happen, Professor Scott?

The Hon. STEPHEN LAWRENCE: Point of order: The witness was about to answer the question and then he was subjected to another barrage of rhetorical statements. He should just be allowed to answer.

The CHAIR: Yes. I think also, when there's a lot of assumptions embedded in the question that might want to be refuted, we should be allowing the witness plenty of time to respond. Please go ahead.

MARK SCOTT: I would say that the university, whilst allowing free speech and academic freedom, has hardly been passive around issues where we feel there has been a breach of our policy, where we feel there has been harassment and intimidation, and where we feel that there have been examples of our policies being breached. We have dealt with cases where there was an antisemitic image on a banner, when inappropriate banners were used, when there was unauthorised entry into a building, when there was an attempt to disrupt traffic on City Road, where lectures were interrupted, where university email was misused—a whole series of issues that we looked at and that we have investigated and where complaints have been upheld and we have taken disciplinary action. In some of the complaints that we dealt with, where there were specific complaints around specific issues, we have been able to follow that through and uphold. I appreciate, though, that some of the complaints we received were complaints that were quite generalised about the fact that the encampment was there and students were unhappy the encampment was there. They didn't like its presence at the front of the universities.

The Hon. SUSAN CARTER: Could I ask a specific follow-up on that? When students contacted you, was the word they used "unhappy" or was it a stronger word about them having to walk past the encampment to get to class?

MARK SCOTT: I'm talking generally.

ANNAMARIE JAGOSE: Perhaps I could jump in here. We definitely saw a spike at the University of Sydney in relation to staff and student complaints associated with the protests going on on campus across this period.

The Hon. SUSAN CARTER: Specifically, were they complaints about being unhappy, or were there stronger terms being used in these complaints?

ANNAMARIE JAGOSE: As I was about to say, those complaints were generally framed in pretty stern ways around antisemitism specifically—about 260 complaints and about a quarter of those maybe indicating antisemitism as the grounds for complaint. We take complaints exceptionally seriously at the university and have very clear processes organised around justice for both the person making the complaint and, if there is an actual person at the other end of the complaint—for both of those things. It involves searching down evidence, it involves interviewing, it involves a lot of detail—

The Hon. SUSAN CARTER: I'm very grateful for the discussion of the process.

ANNAMARIE JAGOSE: My point is that what we found in the large majority of the complaints that used the word "antisemitism" as the grounds for making the complaint, the entire basis of that allegation rested on something like, "There was a protest", "There was a pro-Palestinian protest", "There was a Palestinian flag displayed at the encampment." Our assessment—

The Hon. SUSAN CARTER: Was there also a jihadi flag displayed at the encampment?

ANNAMARIE JAGOSE: There was no jihadi flag displayed at the encampment.

The Hon. SUSAN CARTER: I've seen photos of it, with respect, Provost.

ANNAMARIE JAGOSE: There was a lot of representation in the media that there was a so-called jihadi flag on our campus. We took advice from experts. We're very comfortable that it was a Shahada flag. It was simply a flag testifying to Muslim faith. It doesn't breach any of our protocols—in fact, it goes to the heart of our commitment to diversity on our campus. That, however, suggests the kind of inflammatory environment in which we were operating, in which people—sometimes organs of the media—would claim that all types of terrorist activity were being represented on campus, which was blatantly untrue.

The Hon. SUSAN CARTER: Were there people walking through Eastern Avenue chanting slogans, such as "Globalise the intifada"?

ANNAMARIE JAGOSE: I believe there might have been exactly that slogan.

The Hon. SUSAN CARTER: And what do you understand that slogan to mean?

ANNAMARIE JAGOSE: There are some wide variety of representations and interpretations around such slogans. I'm not going to sit here and make my own personal sort of choice. What I would reflect, however, as a provost, as somebody who has to deal with complaints in a very even-handed way, is that there is no consensus—critical, academic or popular—around what those statements mean and people have very heated interpretations of them, which are often, and unsurprisingly, shaped by their personal histories.

MARK SCOTT: Can I add to that, because there's been quite a lot of discussion around the language of rallies and protests, and I'd appreciate the opportunity of discussing it with you.

The Hon. SUSAN CARTER: Professor Scott, before you do, could I take you to a statement that you are recorded to have made in Honi Soit in November 2023, where you said that a case for global intifada carries the reasonable imputation that the meeting may be linked to support for terrorist activities. Do you stand by that statement?

MARK SCOTT: Yes, so let me talk about that—

The Hon. SUSAN CARTER: Sorry, do you stand by that statement?

The Hon. STEPHEN LAWRENCE: Point of order—

MARK SCOTT: Well, in the context—

The CHAIR: I will hear the point of order. I suspect I know what it is.

The Hon. STEPHEN LAWRENCE: It is not appropriate in this context to cross-examine in that sort of discourteous way. The witness was clearly about to answer the question. It's a complex issue. He should be allowed to expound upon it, I would suggest.

The Hon. SUSAN CARTER: It's a simple question: Do you stand by your statement?

The CHAIR: I uphold the point of order. Again, if we could just take the heat out of it and allow the witness to respond.

MARK SCOTT: In the days after 7 October, a rally was attempted to be organised by what I recall was an unauthorised group, an unofficial group, at the university. The rally was the call to global intifada. It was accompanied by an image of a tank crossing over the border into Israel on 7 October. The university's leadership and I believe also the university student union came to the view that the juxtaposition of the language and the image seemed to be inciting terrorism, supporting terrorism, invoking support around that. It was the two together that we felt, at that time, were inappropriate. I had made it clear in notes to staff, and emails to staff and students, that we did not believe that free speech extended to supporting acts of terrorism and to supporting Hamas. Therefore, we cancelled that meeting. There was some criticism in some circles that we cancelled that meeting, we did so unapologetically. But it was the combination of both that seemed particularly powerful and manifestly inappropriate, hence our decision.

The Hon. SUSAN CARTER: Do you believe the words "globalise the intifada" could be reasonably interpreted by a Jewish staff member or Jewish student as suggesting a call for personal violence against them, their loved ones or their families?

MARK SCOTT: Yes, some Jewish staff and students have expressed to me their concern around phrases like "intifada". The other one that has been much discussed is, "From the river to the sea". They have found them deeply offensive and deeply concerning.

The Hon. SUSAN CARTER: In terms of free speech, does that raise concerns for the university's free speech policy? If somebody else finds something deeply concerning and personally threatening, does that then not call for a free speech discussion?

MARK SCOTT: Let me address that, but I would be keen to engage the provost on this issue as well. That is why I said, publicly and regularly, that I really wished those phrases would not be used if they are causing such distress to some in our community. It would be my wish that they not be used. The fact that we then have to deconstruct them, and debate their history, their meaning and their context when some people find it very distressing, I said that I would prefer that they not be used. However—and I think this is very significant and I think it's very significant for members of Parliament to reflect on this—I cannot find a jurisdiction in the country that has banned the use of those phrases. Those phrases are used—

The Hon. SUSAN CARTER: With respect, Professor Scott, are you hiding racism and antisemitism behind the cloak of the law?

MARK SCOTT: No.

The Hon. STEPHEN LAWRENCE: Point of order—

The Hon. SUSAN CARTER: What is your responsibility to the safety of students?

The CHAIR: I'll hear the point of order. Also, your time is up.

The Hon. STEPHEN LAWRENCE: That's not a question. It's a discourteous rant, I would suggest. It should be ruled out of order.

MARK SCOTT: I would appreciate the opportunity to address the issue.

The CHAIR: Please do.

MARK SCOTT: We were in a situation for some of those where rallies were held on weekends here, with thousands of people surrounded by New South Wales police, where those phrases were used and no action was taken. Those phrases were used at rallies that appeared outside this Parliament, and no action has been taken because lawmakers have not come to a view that that represents hate speech and that language should be banned. The complication around having a different standard and free speech being less available at a university than elsewhere in the community is a challenging confrontation of the traditional view, which would be that there is more licence for free speech at university than elsewhere. That is why university vice-chancellors wrote to the Federal Attorney-General seeking advice on this matter, wondering whether in fact lawmakers at a Federal level or State level want to intervene precisely on this matter.

Let me reinforce that there is no jurisdiction in the country that has banned these phrases. That is not to say that there may not be some circumstances where we would take action around that. I could see a scenario where if Jewish students were standing together and they were being targeted and surrounded by protesters citing these phrases, that that would feel direct and intimidatory and possibly antisemitic.

The Hon. SUSAN CARTER: And if Jewish students are sitting in a classroom and this is coming past them—

The CHAIR: Order! It is not your time for questions.

MARK SCOTT: When protesters intervened in classrooms and attempted to take them over, we took action against those students. We have suspended students from the university who have disrupted with their protests.

The Hon. SUSAN CARTER: How many?

The CHAIR: Order! I think what you are saying is very sensible, that words such as those really do mean a different thing depending on the context and the circumstances. It's not as simple as saying that particular words—as we've just heard—are somehow racist, when they may mean a completely different thing to a different bunch of people. Is that what you're trying to say, that there is context around this?

ANNAMARIE JAGOSE: Perhaps I will come in here, if that's okay. I think there is always context and it is really useful to think about what the context is. I think the vice-chancellor has given a couple of examples where context determined a decision in relation to a juxtaposition of images and words. The other piece that I would say here, however, which has also been very exercising of the university leadership, is that in times like these when certain student and staff demographics feel particularly anxious, as if a hostile world is facing them, I think we have made every effort to listen really carefully and non-defensively to what they're saying. That does not take away from our absolute commitment to academic freedom, which is core to a university. But I think when we hear from our staff and students on both polarised sides of this conflict that they feel less confident coming onto campus than they have previously, we listen hard to that. It affects us and we feel like that's not right.

We have also done a lot of work outside this very formal complaints-based system, which we have to have—it's more of a judicial piece. There is also a hugely important cultural piece. We have done so much work in this space, before and after 7 October, in terms of trying to take seriously our responsibility to educate our students about how to talk about issues when you have conflicting and maybe even contradictory viewpoints on how to extend empathetic understanding to someone who stands for something that you don't stand for. We've got online and face-to-face training for students. We've trained a lot of our tutors and a lot of our student peer mentors, who deal with large numbers of undergraduate students.

This semester we've launched a civic campus initiative, which is pulling together expert academics to really put our heads together to say, "What does a contemporary twenty-first century university want to stand for?" It will not step away from academic freedom, which any academic will passionately think is the absolute heart of the university. But around that, what can you wrap around in terms of a culture where people are more culturally capable and competent in a society that seems to be rapidly polarising? How can a university try to deliver on its social mission by holding that intermediate space of deliberative conversation that is respectful, that can listen empathetically and that can bear to tolerate a view that is not its own? As old as I am, I have to say, that task is way harder than I ever thought it was going to be. It's a very difficult set of skills to teach. I don't think there is a quick fix.

The CHAIR: In the educational context, it's being able to teach people critical thinking. It's very easy to say, "You can't do this and you can't talk about this." My experience with young people is that they are very good at having nuanced conversations about things. I'm going to move to a completely different topic in the time that we have left. Because I have the opportunity of having you here, I want to ask you, Professor Scott, about the university's approach to people with disability. We just had an inquiry where we looked into the experiences of children with disability in educational settings, and it did cover some aspects of university and TAFE experiences.

As part of that and following that, I have had a lot of students contact me from the University of Sydney, as well as the University of New South Wales and UTS, in particular. They are saying that they have students leaving at quite an alarming rate because of a lack of accessibility or their needs being met. The examples I have been given include things like the university not always having wheelchair access to every room or blind students not being able to have bluetooth stethoscopes because they cost too much. It's those sorts of things, where everything is just really difficult. I was asking the Minister about that this morning, and it seems that universities are governed primarily by the Federal jurisdiction but by the State when it comes to these anti-discrimination provisions. Does it concern you that those sorts of comments are coming to my office?

MARK SCOTT: Yes, it does. Central to our 2032 strategy is that we are a truly diverse community. We have a number of initiatives in place to drive that, and students with disability are absolutely central to that. We've got a disability inclusion action plan that is currently underway. There are a series of initiatives that are in place—flexible working arrangements, reasonable adjustments for staff with disability and support for students in the classroom with disability. We remain fully committed to this. We measure our number and our data. You make reference to our physical infrastructure. That is challenging, I must say. Thirty per cent of the University of Sydney is heritage listed. We have some brilliant, bright new facilities where disability access will have been centrally built into all of that construction and that planning. The retrofitting has been more extensive, but when we are doing retrofitting, certainly disability access forms part of that.

Through our Senate People and Culture Committee, there's a detailed monitoring of numbers of students with disability and staff with disability and the flow and pattern of that over time. I'd say that I don't think I've seen data that indicates that we've had flight of students with disability or staff with disability away from the university, but we're not seeing the growth of the level that we'd want to see congruent with levels in the community. I'm not sure if the provost wants to add to that.

ANNAMARIE JAGOSE: I would say that, since 2013, we've had a very robust multi-year physical infrastructure plan, as Mark says, to bring up much of the heritage architecture, which is largely done by quite physical things like ramps and wheelchair hoists and the like. The thing that I think is probably even more centre for us is thinking about disability and mental health, which is very prevalent and a growing identification amongst our student group, especially undergraduate students who identify and make themselves known as having a disability which might be, for example, an anxiety disorder.

Just numerically, that is a much greater disability component for the university, which we address through a whole bunch of student wellbeing initiatives, including some very practical orientations around learning assessment adjustments made for students—for example, special considerations or lengthier periods in an exam or working to have a customised staggering of assessment dates—in a way that a student without that disability identification wouldn't have. I guess there are those two pieces, to me. I've been at the university since 2011 and, physically, I can see the campuses made a very large jump forward. I think the challenge for us—I mean, I think we could always do more; I'm certainly not suggesting we are perfect in this space. But I think the real challenge for us will be addressing and engaging with that mental health piece. I think that will be a bigger challenge.

The CHAIR: Do you keep data for the reasons why people are quitting their courses? Would you have any visibility over the numbers of people who were quitting because of their disability needs not being met?

ANNAMARIE JAGOSE: We watch our retention rates very closely at a large demographic scale, so we would notice, for example, if we had a spike in a particular area or even a unit of study or a course of study where, idiosyncratically, a large number of students were not finishing—were leaving the university. We don't, to the best of my knowledge, have any kind of mechanism that would pick up those individual students unless they had already made themselves known to, say, a student wellbeing unit or were working with a counsellor in a disability adjustment plan or some such thing like that.

MARK SCOTT: I'd add as well that I think one of the things that we pick up in this area of diversity is the need to build the confidence and the trust in our community so that staff and students with disability will happily identify that they have disability and talk to us on that and feel that they'll be well supported in our community through that identification. We suspect that there is an under-reporting of disability within our community, so we're trying to interrogate that as well. The more insight we have on the needs of our staff and students, the better equipped we'll be able to be to reach out to them with support that they might find meaningful and supportive.

The CHAIR: That does bring us to three o'clock. Thank you very much to both of you for your time. I know that it's unusual for us to call university reps, so it has been incredibly useful. You are now excused.

The Hon. RACHEL MERTON: If I might be able to pick up on the Bankstown TAFE from earlier today, Mr Dizdar. In terms of the costing of the relocation of the Bankstown TAFE to a temporary site before its reinstatement at the hospital site, I understand that the previous Government had discussions in this space and the costing was about $200 million to $300 million. I'm wondering whether you may have knowledge of that.

MURAT DIZDAR: I might let my TAFE colleagues jump in. I think we heard clearly from our Minister this morning and Steve, as head of TAFE, that we're working very closely with Health. This is a whole-of-government project that has got a Health component, with a TAFE component. It's being packaged together for delivery. They're in productive discussions. The budget of this sits with our Health colleagues. It is a TAFE I know well. In my career, I spent four years at that TAFE, sharing the premises on the school site when I was regional director of south-west Sydney. I'm taking you back to my working knowledge around 2012, and I visited many of the facilities there when we were in partnership. I think there will be a tremendous opportunity to have modern facilities here on the TAFE site. I think there will be a period where it will be difficult—because we're going to be on a temporary site—delivering continuity but the end result, when we move back onto that campus with modern facilities, will be a great fillip for that community.

The Hon. RACHEL MERTON: Specific to my question, Mr Brady, was it $200 million to $300 million?

STEPHEN BRADY: A detailed business case for the relocation is under development now. We hadn't done one prior to now, so I'm not sure where that number comes from, but it certainly doesn't have any veracity to it.

The Hon. RACHEL MERTON: I guess I established with the Minister this morning that there's no money in terms of the TAFE budget for the relocation or the re-establishment of the Bankstown TAFE and that this is going ahead on the understanding that, we are told, there's an agreement with Health. I'm just wondering if you might be able to elaborate on what that agreement is or whether there are any documents or anything to substantiate this arrangement.

STEPHEN BRADY: We're in detailed discussions with our colleagues at NSW Health and Health Infrastructure on a very regular basis around the planning et cetera. One thing that we have to work through for that is the site ownership. Currently, obviously the TAFE campus is owned by the Minister in his role. As we move forward into the new arrangement, where we're building a hospital and a TAFE on the site, the ownership of that land will need to be considered. We are actually working through, with our colleagues, a form of understanding about how those mechanics are going to work, but it's very clear—I met with my counterpart in Health Infrastructure online I think in the last two weeks, where we clearly discussed the need to develop the joint business case, the fact that a joint business case was the best approach and that the initial relocation was part of that overall business case, and it would come from the bucket of funds that are allocated for the overall project. As far as I'm concerned, we've got a very clear understanding, and that'll be documented sometime over the next few months.

The Hon. RACHEL MERTON: Mr Brady, I'm looking for something a bit more substantial about an agreement in place. The $1.3 billion for the hospital—there's no reference to TAFE.

STEPHEN BRADY: No, but it's on TAFE land. It's pretty hard for them to build a hospital without land, and there's clearly a TAFE there. The understanding—the discussion that we've had with Health and Health Infrastructure and the meetings that I understand the Minister has had with his counterpart is that this is a whole-of-government solution for the community of Bankstown that requires a skills outcome as well as a health outcome.

MURAT DIZDAR: If I can just add, what's clear is that rather than have two separate business cases, both agencies are going to partner together—both Ministers—and bring forward to Government one business case that covers a build of a hospital, that covers a relocation of the TAFE temporarily and that covers the re-institution of that TAFE on that premises.

The Hon. RACHEL MERTON: What's the timing again on that document being finalised and publicly available?

STEPHEN BRADY: The agreement between ourselves and Health Infrastructure?

The Hon. RACHEL MERTON: Yes.

STEPHEN BRADY: As I said, it's only within the last two weeks that we discussed the details of that. It's something which we'll work through. I don't have a specific time frame for you. I think the important part for Government is how we work towards the funding decisions. Obviously, there's a budget there of $1.3 billion. We need to step that through for Government about how that's going to work, the scope of the service delivery for both organisations. Probably the most significant milestone will be coming through the budget process as we clarify those arrangements. But we do anticipate being able to move forward, as I said, getting the expression of interest out into the market for the temporary accommodation—and start to move forward on that planning and commitment so that we can look at what sort of fit-out we require, what do we need in order to be able to have that continuity of service delivery, which is critically important. Whilst the really major milestone coming forward is actually the development of a detailed business case for the combined facilities, we will not be waiting for that to be completed, I don't believe, until—we'll be taking action on the interim relocation based on the budget that's already available within Health for that interim work.

The Hon. RACHEL MERTON: In terms of community concern on this, the issue is there has been no public information that the $1.3 billion is going to cover the TAFE. People are concerned that the hospital is coming onto TAFE ground, so the TAFE is clearing out and there is no reassurance here that TAFE is actually going to be a part of this.

STEPHEN BRADY: With respect, I think if you go back to the press releases put out by Minister Park and Minister Whan when the Bankstown site was announced, it made very clear that there was an ongoing commitment to TAFE in the Bankstown CBD.

The Hon. RACHEL MERTON: Is there precedence for a situation like this, where TAFE loses the land, loses the campus, the temporary relocation not known, the budget not known, the reinstatement of the new TAFE and the time frame not known, but we sit back and we say, "Look at a ministerial press statement"? Is there precedent here?

STEPHEN BRADY: Ms Merton, I think—

The Hon. RACHEL MERTON: In terms of process and how these joint arrangements happen, what is the precedent?

STEPHEN BRADY: I don't recall us having built a hospital on a TAFE campus in the time that I've been in the role, so I can't really point to a precedent. What I can say is that this is clearly a situation where a whole-of-government solution is required. It's not a case of TAFE dealing with its land in its own interests solely and it's not the case that Health can come and build a hospital on our campus without our collaboration. There's clearly a need for the two agencies to work hand in glove to deliver a whole-of-government solution for the community of Bankstown and that's exactly what we're doing.

The Hon. RACHEL MERTON: The concern is people say, "Hang on a moment, TAFE hasn't got a seat at the table with Health." Then—

STEPHEN BRADY: With all due respect, that's not right.

The Hon. RACHEL MERTON: —they'll say, "Budget blowouts". Let's say the cost of the hospital is more than the $1.3 billion. What reassurance is there that the kids in the south-west are going to have a new TAFE campus?

STEPHEN BRADY: I can only reiterate that the press release that was issued—the statement by the responsible Ministers at the time was that there would be a continuing TAFE presence in the Bankstown CBD. And that's exactly what we're working to.

MURAT DIZDAR: It's also what the business case will go to, Ms Merton.

The Hon. RACHEL MERTON: And we're awaiting the joint business case. Is that currently underway?

MURAT DIZDAR: That is what is being developed.

STEPHEN BRADY: Correct.

The Hon. RACHEL MERTON: The time frame on the joint business case is?

STEPHEN BRADY: I'd have to come back to you on the specifics of that if I can.

The Hon. RACHEL MERTON: Alright. Mr Brady, you have well spoken about the current teaching infrastructure at the Bankstown TAFE as it stands today in terms of the hairdressing, the child care—and I think there's some other sort of business services.

STEPHEN BRADY: Yes.

The Hon. RACHEL MERTON: Given the history of the TAFE being 50 years, the growing student cohort in the south-west, are we thinking those facilities will be moved to the temporary site when we know it? It may be a single site or multiple temporary sites and possibly those facilities will be reinstated at the hospital precinct.

STEPHEN BRADY: That's our intention. Our intention is that we maintain the strong presence in the Bankstown CBD. One of the things I would say is our adult migrant education program is a very large part of what we deliver in the Bankstown community and a very large proportion of our student population have English as a second language, so it's a critical part of supporting that local community that we engage those learners, that we can help them engage with the local community and be a part of that community because they have the confidence and the language capability, that we can put them on the path to vocational training and get them engaged in employment. A large part of what we do in the Bankstown TAFE is work with those communities to not only teach them how to speak English but also start to engage them in training that leads towards a job outcome. That's certainly what we intend to continue to do.

The Hon. RACHEL MERTON: Mr Dizdar, in terms of communication, what do students know? Mr Brady, you were just highlighting some of the cultural groups and the language and cultural environment. What do they know?

STEPHEN BRADY: They know our commitment to the Bankstown CBD. We've developed a detailed communications plan that will work with local—

The Hon. RACHEL MERTON: You have developed a plan?

STEPHEN BRADY: We had developed an initial plan. We'll revise that as the time frames et cetera become clearer. That plan talks to us working with local multicultural groups as well as with our teachers and staff on the campus to make sure that they're clear and feel supported with respect to not only the final campus design and delivery but also the moves because there'll have to be a decant from the current campus to the new campus and then from that interim campus back into the final facility.

The Hon. RACHEL MERTON: An initial communication plan? What do they know today?

STEPHEN BRADY: They know today—with all due respect, there has been a statement that we'll be working with Health to deliver a combined health and TAFE campus in the Bankstown CBD, that we will be continuing the delivery of TAFE courses in Bankstown, that there'll be a temporary facility, that we'll be moving to the final facility which is intended to be on the combined campus. Until we have more information, which is coming out of the planning process that we're undertaking now, there's not a lot more I can say to them.

The Hon. RACHEL MERTON: So that statement—to be issued?

STEPHEN BRADY: Communications were issued back when the initial announcement was made.

The Hon. RACHEL MERTON: In the form of a ministerial joint press release?

STEPHEN BRADY: There was that but we also issued communications to our staff. We'll make further communications as more information becomes available. At this point I can't say exactly when we're going to relocate. I can't say where. So there's really not a lot for me to say until such time as we progress particularly this piece of work around the interim relocation.

The Hon. RACHEL MERTON: What do you envisage some of the impacts might be on the students if we're saying, "You're going to a temporary site, not sure where or how long, and then you're going to come back when we reinstate the campus"?

STEPHEN BRADY: The initial impact will be telling them what the timing is for us to have the interim relocation: where the location of their current studies will be, talking to them about the period of the likely interim facility, and then the likely time for them to move back onto a full campus. It's really important to make sure that there is confidence about the continued delivery of their courses, about the location and their wayfinding, to make sure they can find their courses. That is all part of what we will be looking at in the communications plan that we finalise as we get closer to having that clarity of location.

The Hon. RACHEL MERTON: Earlier we were speaking about the priority in terms of skills training in New South Wales. In terms of the interim arrangements on this—the cost of that—how are we going to manage the continuation of the training?

STEPHEN BRADY: I'm not 100 per cent clear on what your question is. There will be a cost of renting, fitting out of the new facility. There will be the relocation cost of picking up equipment or whatever needs to go across, of communicating to people. The teachers who are currently being employed will still be employed. That cost will be very, very similar, if not the same. It's really that location, relocation, communication and the physical fit-out that will be the cost of that.

The Hon. RACHEL MERTON: In terms of changes to jobs or job losses or gains—too early?

STEPHEN BRADY: There is no intention here that there would be job losses. This is really looking at how we develop and deliver the facility with a minimum disruption to teaching.

The Hon. RACHEL MERTON: Mr Brady, I might look at the Gosford TAFE campus. I'm wondering what arrangement is in place in terms of the identified site for a new Gosford TAFE campus? Is there a contract in place on land?

STEPHEN BRADY: The intended new facility, if we get approval, is the current—well, it's the old Gosford City council chambers on Mann Street. I don't know if you are familiar with it? It's currently vacant. We have an agreement with Gosford City council that we can acquire that land. That agreement expired at the end of July this year. Prior to its expiry we agreed with the council to extend that for a further—I think 12 to 18 months. I will have to come back to you with the timing on that. It is 12 months. Thank you, Patrick. We have the agreement with the council that we can exercise that arrangement so that we can take ownership of that land. It's currently still owned by the council. It's under their care and maintenance until such time as we do, or if we do, take control.

The Hon. RACHEL MERTON: Mr Brady, in terms of the growing student cohort and envisaged training needs, is there a pipeline in place as to where new campuses or expanded campuses by TAFE may be required?

STEPHEN BRADY: Great question. I think I started talking this morning about our longer term approach to planning at TAFE NSW. What we are trying to do is really drive our planning from the point of view of what are the training needs in local communities? That takes a "top down and a bottom up" approach. Top down, we are very much looking at the data that comes through from NCVR, which is the national VET statistical body. So taking that data and combining that with ABS data and any other data we can get. It will be informed by the NSW Skills Plan, when that is published at the end of the year. That will give us an overall picture of the training needs across the State.

We then need to localise that. We are driving a lot of local community engagement as recommendations out of the VET review progress. There is further emphasis on regional skilling. We will bring together those pieces so that we get a really strong understanding of not only where the priority skills are but also where in New South Wales we need to deliver those skills. That will then drive us to understand what is the physical infrastructure we need in order to support that? As well, what is the digital infrastructure? Because that is critically important. Also, what are the teaching resources we need? What is the quantity and skill sets of the teachers we have and where in in order to be able to support those localised skills requirements?

From a physical infrastructure perspective, that then gives us an understanding of not only what have we got today but also what are we going to need into the future? We are doing that, informed by some campus master planning that Mr Woods' team is leading. That's looking not just at each individual campus but looking at a network of campuses that support a local community. That allows us to understand, based on the training needs that we've identified through our training portfolio strategy, what's the type of physical infrastructure, how do those campuses work together in order to be able to support those local communities? That gives us the ability to build a longer term plan about where we need to invest, how much we need to invest et cetera.

The Hon. RACHEL MERTON: What we might know so far from some of this work, does the Central Coast look like it may be an area in need of an expanded campus or a new campus, or in terms of the students?

STEPHEN BRADY: Certainly the Central Coast is growing, so we certainly expect that it's an area that we can see enrolment growth over time. We are looking at it, as I briefly touched on this morning, as a combination of campuses. We've got the Ourimbah campus, which we co-locate with the University of Newcastle. We've got our Wyong campus, where we are currently building a new animal facility. We run some significant trades and more migrant programs there. We run a whole range of programs at the Wyong campus. Then you've got Gosford. So we will look at that across those three communities, which are relatively close together. We'll work out where we will best locate which disciplines. In planning for the Gosford campus, we would be taking into account the growth we see. In terms of the population, we would suggest that we are probably underservicing the population at the moment, based on the old campus we have in Gosford and its ability to support the delivery of skills in Gosford.

The Hon. RACHEL MERTON: In terms of the old campus and its condition, we have reports from teachers saying, "Hang on a moment, we need a better place than this." Are maintenance and repairs in place?

STEPHEN BRADY: I wouldn't disagree with those teachers. We are certainly very keen to—

The Hon. RACHEL MERTON: They said, "You come work from here."

STEPHEN BRADY: We'd certainly love to upgrade that facility. Gosford is not alone like that. We've got a very significant backlog in our 154 campuses. Professor Scott spoke about their heritage buildings. We similarly have a large portfolio of heritage buildings, many of which were old assets of other departments. The Department of Education has kindly given us some of their old facilities over time but not the maintenance budget to go with them—thank you, secretary. We've got old hospitals and we've got old ambulance stations. We have a portfolio of assets which is extensive, but it's very, very aged. We have a significant maintenance backlog. To answer your question around Gosford, given that we don't have clarity around timing of the investment in the new campus, we are continuing to spend money on our existing Gosford campus to make sure that it is safe and that it is accessible whilst a decision is being made. Let me just clarify, even when a decision is made on a new campus, it will take time for that new campus to be made ready for accommodation. We anticipate that, no matter what, we will be on the old campus for a number of years, so we need to continue to make sure that it's safe and suitable in the meantime.

The Hon. RACHEL MERTON: Unlike the funding arrangement or agreement entered into for the Bankstown TAFE, the Gosford TAFE would be a freestanding TAFE, funded by TAFE?

STEPHEN BRADY: That's correct. It's a TAFE business case about the delivery of a TAFE-only facility. Therefore, we have our own business case that we're putting it up for consideration by government.

The Hon. RACHEL MERTON: But can I just say, do you see the uncertainty? The community can think, "Hang on a moment. If we're going to replace a freestanding TAFE such as Gosford, and that is going to be funded through TAFE, when we look at Bankstown, we're moving out for the hospital, but the TAFE is going to be funded by Health." Or there has been an agreement or a joint statement, or something is happening. It doesn't seem to even up.

STEPHEN BRADY: I disagree, I'm sorry. We're developing a joint business case that will go forward for consideration of government for Bankstown. That's not terribly different to us putting forward a Gosford business case for consideration by government. I don't really see there's a huge difference between them.

The Hon. RACHEL MERTON: But in terms of the Bankstown joint business case with Health and the understanding that the $1.3 billion committed to Health and the new hospital will also fund Bankstown TAFE, there's no precedent for this.

STEPHEN BRADY: Not in the time that I have worked in TAFE NSW. Again, there have been whole-of-government property developments done before. There are government office buildings—for instance, 52 Martin Place where the ministerial offices are located is actually occupied by ministerial services, the Treasury and the department of Premier and Cabinet. That was a single business case considered by government. I would say there is precedent for this sort of arrangement and it really puts government in a position when you put the two together that it can make an overall decision.

I would find it problematic for me to have a TAFE business case and a Health business case that may not align, whether that's in terms of timing, funding, scope, the legal rights around the property. We're not thinking about building a hospital and a TAFE here with a big fence down the middle. We want to have a campus where people flow across it. You think about a hospital where it has a food court and hairdressers and all those things, we want our TAFE community to benefit from that as well.

The idea of having a joined up business case that considers the whole community, the way people flow across the campus—are we going to build health teaching specific facilities within the hospital? That's quite normal, and then we do similar sort of facilities in a TAFE campus. Why wouldn't we do it once and have it shared by both organisations so that we get economies of scale for government? They're the sorts of discussions we're going into. I've got a meeting with the South Western Sydney Local Health District in the next couple of weeks. We're going to talk about what the opportunities are for us to deliver health-related training on the Bankstown campus. If you think about enrolled nursing, it's one of our larger courses, and that's the sort of thing we want to talk about.

The CHAIR: We're out of time. We are going to take a 15-minute break and we will be back at 3.45 p.m.

(Short adjournment)

The CHAIR: We're back. We'll start again with questions from the Opposition.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: Mr Brady, earlier when I was asking about some of the overseas trips and travel, I was curious to learn a bit more about how many overseas campuses there are at TAFE, where they're located and how many staff are working there. Can you provide an overview of that for me?

STEPHEN BRADY: We don't have any overseas campuses. Our international delivery works in two ways. We bring students into Australia and teach them here. In some cases we do some online delivery in their home country and then bring them for a block of training here, so they actually study through TAFE NSW. They get accredited through TAFE NSW. Then we do some other delivery which is actually offshore, and this is where we'll have a partnership with an in-country education organisation. We'll have our teachers go over and teach their instructors. We'll give them our course materials and assessments, and then we'll go back and check that they're actually doing that well and that they're complying with the Australian regulatory requirements under ASQA. We deliver offshore but through partners.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: So it's either international students who are doing it or then you'll partner with other providers?

STEPHEN BRADY: Exactly.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: Do you have staff working overseas currently?

STEPHEN BRADY: We don't. I don't believe we have international staff who are located permanently overseas. We have an international team here in Australia which goes over regularly and works with partners.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: Is there a limit to how long the staff go overseas when they do that or how does that process work?

STEPHEN BRADY: They'll put up a proposal through me to the Minister for approval, but generally they're pretty quick trips. They're going over for either a partnership discussion around the terms of the arrangements. They might be going over to do the regulatory review work or training delivery to train the trainer. They're generally not gone for any more than a few days, so they're not extended trips.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: In terms of TAFE staff more broadly, do you have any that are working for TAFE NSW but either live interstate or overseas and work remotely?

STEPHEN BRADY: We do. With respect to overseas, as I said, we don't have staff who are based overseas, but we might have a staff member whose family is in India or Pakistan whose family is unwell, so they might go home to see their family and while they're there they'll do some remote work.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: Sort of a flexible working arrangement in certain circumstances.

STEPHEN BRADY: Precisely. There's no overseas permanently based staff. With respect to interstate, I think I talked about Kingscliff earlier, and similarly in places like Wagga, people live either side of the border in those border communities so there's a fair bit of that. There are some arrangements which sprang up through COVID. Our policy is not that people can permanently reside in other jurisdictions and work for us.[1] We have flexible work agreements with all of our staff, and we're currently reviewing those in light of the Premier's circular around flexible work to make sure that we're complying with that.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: What's the time frame of that review? I think when we had Mr Dizdar last week that was being worked on with the department more broadly trying to implement the Premier's memorandum I think by the start of the year if not sooner. I don't want to put words in your mouth, but that was my recollection of the evidence.

MURAT DIZDAR: Exactly.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: Is TAFE working to a similar time frame in terms of complying with that memorandum?

STEPHEN BRADY: To be perfectly honest, we've just been in consultation around turning our entire organisation on its ear, so that has been our primary focus. We'll be turning our mind after tomorrow, I'd say, when we have our final input from our unions to the timing around the Premier's memo. We have looked at what we need to do and the fact we have our agreements in place and then we need to work down through our management layers. I might ask Ms Tickle if she has a time frame in mind.

JULIE TICKLE: We have already started looking at our working flexibly arrangement procedure and it really does align with the Premier's memorandum, in any case. We don't have in place permanent working off campus at TAFE NSW. Many of our employees participate in flexible work arrangements, some of that might be working from home or varied starts. We do have 154 or 156—I always forget which one—campus locations as well, so people actually work across the State in lots of different campus locations. That's one of the ways that we're very flexible. We are certainly reviewing our current procedures to make sure they're in line with the Premier's circular.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: That probably goes to your earlier evidence, but I was asking about some of the positions that they can be located—they're not necessarily location specific. They could work at a TAFE campus, which could be anywhere.

JULIE TICKLE: That's right.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: I want to move to the Universities Accord now, which I think is Ms Read. I'll direct them to you and, if anyone else wants to jump in, go for it. I think last time we were here the final report had only just been released a few weeks earlier. I think it came out earlier that month and we were here last time. Is there any update you can provide us, in terms of the last six months, about what has happened from a New South Wales perspective in terms of the recommendations that came with that final report?

MURAT DIZDAR: Want me to kick off?

[1] In correspondence to the committee received 2 October 2024, Hon Steve Whan MP, Minister for Skills, TAFE and Tertiary Education requested a clarification to the evidence of Mr Stephen Brady, Managing Director, TAFE NSW.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: Yes, happy for either/or. I do have a couple of specifics, but I'm interested in the general position first.

MURAT DIZDAR: The report was released in February—you're right. It was 24 February. The Commonwealth budget for 2024-25 had some line items that went to the Universities Accord. The first one was around capping indexation of HECS from 1 June 2023. That was widely covered in the media. There was also the new means test—the Commonwealth Prac Payment—for students completing nursing, midwifery, teaching and social work. That's yet to come into play, Mrs Mitchell. It's from 25 July. We're working at officials level because we're keen, particularly on our side, with teaching, to see what that is going to look like. This goes to what has been labelled as prac poverty. You're on prac and you might be working part-time while you're studying and you can't complete that work.

There was also developing a managed growth funding system for Commonwealth supported places, needs-based funding to boost the number of students in under-represented backgrounds, and there was $350 million nationally to expand university enabling and preparatory courses. Also, it was announced in the budget—at least the Commonwealth budget—the establishment of the Australian tertiary education commission. Ms Read might talk to where those things are at because, while they were announced as budget line items, there's still a lot of work to go on many of those.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: Yes, I'm interested in the implementation as well.

CHLOE READ: Many of those pieces—we talked earlier about the national student ombudsman a little bit ahead of the accord—are still in consultation and the development of legislation at the Commonwealth level. The other piece that I think is going to progress hopefully to Ministers shortly is that there was a recommendation that came—again, I think it was from the first or the interim accord on early offers for universities.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: That was one I was going ask about.

CHLOE READ: I thought it might be. The Commonwealth is looking to work with States and Territories on what that might look like and how we might approach that work. You would recall that the accord gave a timeline of having something in place on that for enrolments from 2027. And then other pieces include the establishment of the study hubs. I think round one of the regional study hubs has been completed and they've awarded those funding arrangements. The two Country Universities Centres that we most recently established in New South Wales—I think Cowra and Mudgee—were successful in that round. They secured Commonwealth funding there. Round two, I think, is out at the moment. The metro or suburban study hub closed in late July, but they haven't announced yet what's coming out of that. They've also convened an implementation advisory committee to work on the tertiary education commission to understand the scope and the implementation of that.

And then, in terms of New South Wales, we've submitted feedback—I don't think they did a public consultation call on a couple of different papers, but there has been a paper on the needs-based funding and the managed growth approach for universities at the officials level, as Mr Dizdar said. We've given them some feedback. Finally, just to round out the New South Wales piece, we held off on updating our Higher Education Strategy with a view to looking at what came from the accord. We're moving ahead with consultation on that strategy. In fact, I think there's a round table in a couple of weeks time with the sector to talk through that. We have also been open for submissions and had a good deal of interest on the back of the discussion paper that we put out for that too.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: I just wanted to pick up a couple of things. The early offers—and I note that the recommendation, as you said, was to have consistency across the country by 2027. But there was a mention in the report about agreeing for education Ministers not to issue them before September in the year before, I think, for next year and the year after. I know a number of universities in New South Wales have had previous agreements. What would you anticipate for offers this year or what has that communication been like with the universities around how that will work?

CHLOE READ: That's in place. We went with September again, which was the date that New South Wales universities had agreed independently from the rest of the country in the year prior. Minister Clare wrote to all universities and said, "We're doing this nationally", and so we would expect that no universities were giving offers ahead of that.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: It's hard. Is it just operating on good faith that they won't or will that have an impact from 2027 if any universities do go early? How are you going to make sure?

CHLOE READ: The restriction on early offers is in place until 2027 while we do more work on what it looks like to do this well across the country to balance those considerations of equity in both directions, actually. In places, say, like Western Sydney University, a lot of the offer scheme is not ATAR dependent—lots of students who might otherwise not be able to rely on their ATAR securing offers for university through those mechanisms but on the other end of things the resources and the support needed to secure an early offer in some universities might be a bit of a barrier for some people. The work to be done across the next two years is to work out what is the right offer timing, what is the right way of managing those things, should there be a consistent process and do some research on the impacts of early offers. That's the work that Commonwealth and States and Territories are going to do together ahead of then—

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: Prior to the 2027 decision.

CHLOE READ: —having it in place for 2027. In the meantime, we don't do early offers before September.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: You mentioned the tertiary education commission and I know there was also a recommendation to establish a centre of excellence in higher education and research as well. That was one of the recommendations. Are there any discussions between the State and the Commonwealth about who will fund those, both the commission and also the research centre? Has that happened yet?

CHLOE READ: Not discussion, no—not that I'm aware of. We would expect that the Commonwealth would fund both of those because they fund universities, largely.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: Everyone loves asking for money from the other levels of government, so I was just curious about that.

CHLOE READ: Don't give them ideas.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: The last one I wanted to ask about was recommendation 38, which talks about a pathway for TAFEs to become self-accrediting in VET at the Australian Qualification Framework level 5 and above in areas of national priority. I don't pretend to completely understand what that one means. Mr Brady or Ms Read, can someone enlighten me? Does New South Wales already have that or what does that look like for our jurisdiction?

CHLOE READ: From memory, level 7 is bachelor degree, level 5 is advanced diploma and level 6 must be—sorry, it's diploma, then advanced diploma and then bachelor degree. The areas of national priority reference there, I think, relates to the intent that we might trial this as part of the centres of excellence. Mr Brady might want to talk a bit about that and then also about the pathway to self-accreditation for TAFEs.

STEPHEN BRADY: I think we've got to remember, whether you're talking about higher education or VET, we're currently applying through TEQSA, as I mentioned earlier, for a higher apprenticeship, which is a higher education degree. Minister Brendan O'Connor announced that there would be a trial of VET self-accreditation through ASQA, which is the regulatory body for vocational training. The intention is that there will be a trial with a few TAFEs. We are waiting to hear on the next steps with that. We are very keen to participate. We have had discussions with the regulator, but there are no details available as yet.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: Sorry for my ignorance, but when you say it's a higher education degree through the manufacturing centres, will it be at bachelor level or is there somewhere in between?

STEPHEN BRADY: I think it's a bachelor's, isn't it?

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: Sorry if I sound silly. I may well do. I'm just trying to understand where the differential is.

STEPHEN BRADY: A normal apprenticeship is a cert III or cert IV. What we are actually talking about is stepping up beyond that into the bachelor's realm. I might ask Dr McNeill to talk about that in particular but also a little bit about our work with the regulators around self-accreditation.

MARGOT McNEILL: Certainly. The higher apprenticeship program that was just mentioned is actually AQF level 6, which is an advanced diploma. We have a view to extending that up to AQF level 7, which is a typical bachelor's degree level. The way it has been designed is a really innovative mix of typical vocational education units, if you like, and higher education units. The students, for example, with our industry partners—they acknowledge that there are typical trade programs that learners can go through. Sometimes they need a merge of a couple of typical trades and some skills like leadership skills or digital skills that we've moved across from our existing higher ed programs. That's an innovative program because it combines those types of units that aren't usually pooled together in a vocational qualification. That's currently with TEQSA at the moment.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: Is that the first time you will be doing that through TAFE as well?

MARGOT McNEILL: Yes, it is. We're piloting that with TEQSA because we've used our higher education accreditation processes. We've had about 30 qualifications, either accredited or re-accredited in our higher education programs, over the past couple of years. That's very well documented as a respected process. They have all been there for seven years with no conditions, which is as good as you can possibly get in that context. The other thing that we have done is we are working on our self-accrediting authority for a range of four fields of education for our higher education component of TAFE NSW, and then we've mapped the two sets of standards. In the vocational education space at the moment there are draft standards which all RTOs, or registered training organisations, are required to meet. We're working closely with ASQA to document how we would act as a self-accrediting authority in the two different regulatory environments. That's the work that we're currently undergoing. We're submitting our self-accrediting authority with TEQSA for our higher education programs in December, if all goes well.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: We might ask you about it when we're back here next year, but it sounds very interesting. All the best; I hope it goes well. Do you envisage that there could be the potential to expand that even further in the future if it's successful with those three centres?

MARGOT McNEILL: Yes. To the point about them being priority skills areas, for example, in the centres of excellence we know that that model of combining units that aren't typically—if I take the Committee back to the structure of existing VET qualifications, they take a long time to be developed. Really, there's about a five-year process of designing what the qualifications are going to be like. In some cases, we need to be able to move much more quickly than that to do things like build students' digital fluency.

STEPHEN BRADY: There's also an intersection with the qualifications reform work that's happening at the Commonwealth level, which Dr McNeill is involved with. If you think about something like electrotechnology, it's heavily licensed and heavily regulated. It's unlikely that we would want to be self-accrediting in something like that because it's a national qualification and it's nationally limited by the real safety issues involved. But there are other types of qualifications in the VET space which really go more to capabilities rather than a single job outcome. The ability to have self-accrediting in that space gives us a lot more flexibility about how we bridge people across different types of job categories and give them capabilities and better recognition of prior learning as well. There are some really interesting developments happening at the Commonwealth level. If we combine those with a self-accrediting authority, it will give us a lot more flexibility and agility to be able to respond to changes in industry.

The Hon. RACHEL MERTON: Mr Brady, in terms of infrastructure funding—I know we mentioned this in relation to the Gosford TAFE campus—I wonder if we might be able to get a breakdown of the $190 million allocated for repairs at TAFE campuses. Which specific campuses will receive the funding and how much will that be?

STEPHEN BRADY: Just give me one moment. We've got the Asset Renewal Program. That's $90 million.

PATRICK WOODS: Yes, it is. I'm not sure where the $190 million comes from, I'm sorry.

STEPHEN BRADY: Why don't we talk about the Asset Renewal Program, which is $90 million? It's really looking at a whole range of different repairs, maintenance or replacements that need to occur across our facilities. For instance, it's looking at roof replacements across 10 campuses; replacement of noncompliant electrical distribution boards across 14 campuses; fire system replacements focusing on high-risk noncompliant areas; we're looking at HVAC, or heating, ventilation and cooling systems, that are at end of life; we're looking at remediation of potential safety issues, including retaining walls, trip hazards, footpaths and deteriorating building facades; but it also goes to the equipment we teach on, so things like lathes and other technical equipment, which we need to keep current.

We need to keep it current so we produce graduates who are job-ready in the modern environment but also to keep them safe. A couple of big issues there include replacing the aircraft cabin simulator at Kingscliff, which is estimated at $500,000; we're replacing some milling machines at Tamworth, which is worth $247,000; and we're replacing some hydraulic training equipment at Wollongong, which is estimated at $220,000.

The Hon. RACHEL MERTON: In terms of the $90 million Asset Renewal Program, how many campuses fall under that?

STEPHEN BRADY: It covers a statewide program; it depends on where the need is greatest. We work across our infrastructure teams and with our teaching teams to prioritise where the greatest need is, and then we will roll out programs of work to deliver that.

The Hon. RACHEL MERTON: Mr Brady, in terms of the projected timeline for completing infrastructure upgrades at TAFE, how will the progress be monitored and reported on to ensure the timely completion—just in terms of what the process might be on that and the oversight of upgrades to campuses?

STEPHEN BRADY: On the program that I just outlined, last year we put in place some contracting arrangements which were multi-year. One of the things we've struggled with at TAFE NSW is single-year funding, which has been a problem for many years. By the time we're aware of what money we've got, we then have to do our design work and go to market, so you've lost four or five months for delivery. Last year we put in place a multi-year program, which allowed us to bring forward packages of work each year. We've got those packages of work now; we're allocating those. The real incentive for us is that the Treasurer hates carry-forwards, so our incentive is to get all that delivered well within the financial year.

The Hon. RACHEL MERTON: The asset renewal program is the $90 million?

STEPHEN BRADY: That's right.

The Hon. RACHEL MERTON: For this financial year?

STEPHEN BRADY: That's correct.

The Hon. RACHEL MERTON: Mr Brady, in terms of digital infrastructure upgrade, where would that sit in terms of the budget?

STEPHEN BRADY: There's what we call DAF, which is digital access foundations. That's a key program for us where we're rolling out a number of things. We're rolling out, particularly, a network upgrade. I think we mentioned earlier today that some of our networks date back to 2009. We've put in place some foundational things around—and I'm not a technical person—SD-WAN, which will benefit across all of our campuses, but then specific network upgrades in, particularly, a lot of our regional campuses. We had a program, which we commenced last year, which I believe was for 24 campuses. We've got a further—I'm looking at my CIO—80 campuses for this year.[2] But then, of course, you need to have the equipment on the back to access those things as well, so it also goes to thousands of devices for teachers and students in order to be able to access that better digital connectivity.

It is a really important part of what we do because a lot of the students we support do not have access to great connectivity outside of a TAFE campus. They don't necessarily have home wi-fi. They don't necessarily have a computer at home. Being able to come onto our campus, access good wi-fi and access a laptop is critical to them to be able to complete their courses, and it's part of an ongoing program we have to improve that access. We've rolled out a very significant number of devices over the last two years. This year we'll further do that to bring the equipment that we have available to both teachers and staff up to date. Of course, most of this sort of equipment has a lifespan of three to four years, so once we actually catch up we then have to maintain that level of investment. It's also things like overhead projectors, and all those sort of things that are technology-based, that we need to make sure that we're investing in so that our teachers have the right tools to support our students.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: I want to ask about two semi-recent announcements—in July, so we'll say recent announcements—from the Government. One of them was about the animal care facilities at Kurri Kurri, I think, getting an upgrade. In another committee that I'm on we did an inquiry into vet shortages but also the importance of veterinary nurses and making sure you have facilities and enough places available. Does anyone have any details in terms of that particular upgrade and what it's expected to deliver?

STEPHEN BRADY: I believe that's at Wyong. I was there a couple of weeks ago and the building is well and truly under construction. I think it's nearing completion, in fact; it's not terribly far away. It will provide some standard classrooms but, most importantly, it will provide the sort of technical specialised spaces for vet nursing and vet nursing support. Mr Woods might have some more detail on that facility.

PATRICK WOODS: Not specifically, other than to say you asked the question as to whether it's going to provide the spaces necessary. Everything that we're hearing at the moment, based on the demand analysis and talking to the teachers and those that manage the schedule, would indicate that, yes, it is going to meet those demands. Having said that, should we get funding and should there be demand, we have the flexibility of being able to increase the capacity in a modular basis as we move forward in time.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: In terms of the offering of animal care courses more broadly across the State—and I'm happy if you need to take this on notice—how many campuses offer those courses currently?

STEPHEN BRADY: I think we'll have to take that on notice.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: That's all right. Could you maybe provide a list of where they're offered as well?

STEPHEN BRADY: Happy to. Also, out of some of this year's budget or over the forward estimates, we're enhancing our facility in the Northern Rivers, at Wollongbar, so there is money going in. We've also just completed, at Richmond, an upgrade of our vet space as well. It's been an area of focus for us.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: Could you also provide on notice how many students you currently have, or the capacity of how many? We're just interested. We've obviously made some recommendations in the inquiry around opportunities, and we'll wait for the Government response, but certainly the evidence that we heard was that there's a very high demand in the market for professionals and the role that, particularly, the veterinary nurses can play to assist vets as well.

STEPHEN BRADY: I'll take it on notice.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: I'm just interested in that space in general, but if you can provide it on notice that's fine. In terms of new courses generally, obviously we've spoken about what you'll be doing at the manufacturing centres, but are there any other areas where new courses are underway? I know there's the Hydrogen Centre of Excellence that the Minister spoke about, which I think is being constructed at the moment or about to—

STEPHEN BRADY: That's not a TAFE facility.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: That's not TAFE?

STEPHEN BRADY: No, it's a plumbing industry facility.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: Sorry. The announcement talked about plumbers and gasfitters et cetera, but it's being done by industry. So there's no engagement or—

STEPHEN BRADY: No.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: Are there any other areas around technology or renewable energy, outside of the three centres, that TAFE is looking at to add or develop new courses in, I suppose, emerging markets?

STEPHEN BRADY: Absolutely. The Institute of Applied Technology – Digital is working closely with the major tech companies and with the University of Technology Sydney and Macquarie University to produce new courses. We've had over 115,000 enrolments in the two institutes of applied technology since they were established. They have an ongoing program of delivering new micro-credentials and micro-skills. In the renewable energy space, obviously that's an area of focus and rapid change and we've got a whole program of micro-credentials that we're rolling out. Some of those relate to things that you'd expect, around electric vehicles and safety for emergency responders, but also for teaching existing mechanics in industry to upgrade their skills so they're able to deal with electric vehicles; and also pieces of knowledge for people in industry in the energy space about photovoltaics, about hydrogen et cetera. We have a whole package of those sorts of programs. We also have one which we've developed which actually is more for school kids, which talks about the types of careers that are available in a green energy environment. There's a range of different courses, but perhaps Ms Schorer might provide more detail.

JANET SCHORER: Yes, thank you. There are probably two parts to reform around courses and what might be new. It connects to some of the work that Dr McNeill has been involved in and things that we've been doing within TAFE about how you make the more foundational courses that we deliver contemporary for the sorts of industry, whether that's working into renewables or different kinds of infrastructure, other sorts of projects—even in nursing. Nursing is quite a different qualification in terms of the technology that you need to utilise. How do we incorporate those very current and future-thinking skills into the foundational programs that we have? As well, as Mr Brady said, we have the opportunity, through micro-skilling and micro-credentialling—which is more rapid to market, if you like—to provide students along their journey with us with that level of upskilling but also meet some of those immediate industry demands that we need to respond to. We need to have both in step, I think.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: Mr Brady, you mentioned the EV vehicles maintenance-repair courses et cetera. Are they currently available through TAFE, or what's the time frame?

STEPHEN BRADY: Absolutely, yes.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: Are they designed as a micro-skills course to be done on top of or as part of another course? How does that work in practice?

STEPHEN BRADY: There are different types. Janet might fill in some detail here, but we are delivering courses for emergency responders so that they understand how to safely engage with an electric vehicle. That's one type of course. We have other courses for mechanics in industry. When I was at Tamworth, I was talking to the auto teachers. They'll do courses at night for mechanics in the area. Some of that they'll do online and some of them they'll do in the workshops. We're currently rolling that out statewide. Electric vehicles are becoming a larger and larger part of the fleet. They need to be able to support them.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: Did you want to add anything, Ms Schorer?

JANET SCHORER: Yes, just a couple of specific examples. We've got about $5 million in a Federal grant to enable us to deliver the Wetherill Park electric vehicle training centre, as well as the Illawarra renewable energy training facility. That's work that's ongoing. I think it's safe to say that if you go to many of our automated workshops now, there is less grease—it's still there—and there are certainly more computers.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: It's better for washing, maybe—less Napisan.

JANET SCHORER: Yes, that's right—less Napisan. That means, in talking to some our teachers and head teachers specifically in that discipline, young apprentices are having to learn much more how to work with computers. That's the skill they need today. What we need is the ability to tap them into what industry needs. That doesn't mean we're going to have all the equipment in every campus, because we wouldn't be able to keep pace with industry. But that partnership to be able to access what an apprentice or any student is going to be using in their workplaces is what we're about.

The Hon. RACHEL MERTON: Mr Dizdar, can I touch on student support and financial assistance? How much funding has been allocated in the budget to provide financial assistance to TAFE students facing economic hardship?

MURAT DIZDAR: I might get Ms Read to comment on that.

CHLOE READ: I might start and then we'll see. Our funding relates to learners across a number of registered training organisations—not solely at TAFE. There are a couple of things that I would call out. The first would be the ongoing access to fee-free courses under fee-free apprenticeships and traineeships and also the fee-free TAFE program. There is also the Vocational Training Assistance Scheme, which provides support for apprentices who might be located a fair distance from where they need to travel to attend TAFE or training. That supports them with things like accommodation, petrol costs and those kinds of things.

The Hon. RACHEL MERTON: Ms Read, are there specific forms of financial assistance in the form of grants, subsidies or scholarships?

CHLOE READ: There are some scholarships. There are the Bert Evans Apprentice Scholarships—Mr Pearson is going to help me with the numbers and amounts. We also have a set of scholarships called the Elsa Dixon scholarships for Aboriginal students. I know that we've increased the number of those scholarships year on year for the past four years or so. Mr Pearson, do you have any information?

MATHEW PEARSON: I think it's 150 for the Bert Evans scholarships and I would just have to have a look for the Elsa Dixon scholarships.

The Hon. RACHEL MERTON: Is that 150 scholarships?

CHLOE READ: Yes.

MATHEW PEARSON: For the Elsa Dixon scholarships, as at 30 May 2024, we had approved 313 positions across New South Wales.

The Hon. RACHEL MERTON: In terms of the distribution of the relevant scholarships, how is that managed to ensure it's for students most in need? What is some of the process around that?

MATHEW PEARSON: The Bert Evans scholarship is an application program. In terms of the Elsa Dixon scholarship, because it's actually working with government departments, it's applied for through them and then they manage the process of selecting candidates.

The Hon. RACHEL MERTON: In terms of student support services, what portion of the budget is allocated to enhanced student support services for TAFE students such as mental health, career counselling and academic support?

CHLOE READ: I will pass that one to Mr Brady because he has a broad budget and some latitude on where he applies those things.

STEPHEN BRADY: There is a range of supports provided for students. We have a student support area where they are supported through identifying what they would like to learn and whether that is suitable for them, helping them through their enrolment process. We also have a range of counsellors and educational support officers, some of whom help around the academic side if they are struggling. We have got LLN teachers who help with literacy and numeracy as well. There is a surprising amount of maths, for instance, in the electrotechnology course and apprenticeship. It is about assisting those learners, identifying very early when they might have an academic challenge and providing that extra support to them.

In terms of other types of support, we have significant wraparound support for students with disability. One of the really important parts of that is disability teacher consultants. We have 84 of those around the State. They provide an assessment of educational needs for a student with disability and then look at the orientation, access and mobility needs and make sure they are met across different delivery modes and environments, including face-to-face, distance and online learning. They then work with the teachers to advise them on the needs of the students and ensure that the teaching teams are in a position to support those learners through teaching methods, assessments, examinations and curriculum delivery modifications. It also goes to the materials themselves and the way they are assessed. It includes things like the ability to change the pace of delivery and the pace of assessment.

There is a whole range of supports that go towards those disability teacher consultants. I think I would have to come back on notice in terms of budget breakdowns for the support services, but they are quite extensive from the point that a student is trying to work out which course they would like to engage with, right through, as I said earlier, to supports for their mental health and their physical disabilities as well—whatever they need to help try to get them through.

The Hon. RACHEL MERTON: In terms of the effectiveness of the support services to students, are there any measurements?

STEPHEN BRADY: One thing that we are doing is looking at our courses and developing what we are calling a course canvas. We are measuring the progress of students through the delivery of the course, particularly when they might be starting to drop out. We are using that as part of a continuous improvement process in order to make sure that we are providing the right levels of support in the right places. It is things like students might be starting the course with a really hard unit. If they have a bad experience, they don't continue, whereas, if we can build student confidence through some of the easier units to complete, then when they reach those harder units, they've got the confidence to push through. We're using that in more of a continuous improvement way.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: I want to come back to Mr Tidball. Before the lunchtime break we were talking about the temporary to permanent conversions for staff. I have a couple more questions I want to follow up on in terms of what criteria was used to determine which of those casual teachers were converted to a permanent position. I think you said it was 540 in the first cohort. I'm just curious about how you are identifying who is offered those permanent positions. Could you provide a bit more information about that? I am happy for either of you to answer.

JULIE TICKLE: The first target we set was 500 teachers. That included 400 existing part-time casual teachers becoming permanent and 100 new teachers. We exceeded that target and we have put 540 teachers on permanently. What we did with the part-time casual cohort was that they actually did a streamlined recruitment process to be selected into those roles. Many of those people have been working with us for a number of years, so we put them through a streamlined recruitment process in areas where we needed them. Only internal people applied and it was limited to those part-time casual teachers. That's how we did that first cohort. The second lot that I was talking about that we have now received initiations from are actually part of the Closing Loopholes legislation, which came into effect on 26 August. That Federal legislation resets the definition of what a casual employee actually is. We've got a number of people who have initiated the process and we're currently going through and reviewing their eligibility against permanent conversion. If they meet the eligibility criteria, they'll be converted. That legislation has six months to be implemented, so we'll have it implemented by term one next year.

STEPHEN BRADY: And the criteria is set out in the legislation for those conversions.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: Do you have any data—and I'm happy if you need to take it on notice—in terms of your overall numbers of teachers? I'm particularly interested in numbers that are permanent, permanent part time and then casual. If you've got it now, great. If not, you can provide it.

JULIE TICKLE: Yes, we do. I'll provide you full-time equivalent, or FTE, numbers. Our total staffing number has gone up 8.4 per cent for FY 24, which is a 907 increase in FTE. Total number of teachers—6,299 FTE, so a 5.1 per cent increase, or 307 teachers. In terms of the breakdown of teachers, for 2024, FTE permanent full-time teachers were 3,436; permanent part-time teachers, 202; temporary full-time teachers, 331; temporary part-time teachers, 53; and part-time casual teachers, 2,278.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: Again, this is just using my knowledge of people I know who have taught at TAFE over the years. Obviously there's a role for permanent positions, but are there some people who will come and they might have another job, but they come and they do—

JULIE TICKLE: Yes.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: You're always probably going to have a part-time or casual contingent just because of the nature of the offerings and the way that courses are running.

JULIE TICKLE: Absolutely. I was a casual teacher myself for 10 years, and that was by choice. We have many teachers who, for a number of reasons, wish to remain casual. In fact, the Federal legislation, the Closing Loopholes legislation—the teachers actually request to be converted. We've got a number of our part-time casual teachers who have not requested conversion because they don't wish to be permanent.

STEPHEN BRADY: They're more than likely still working in the industry, which is great for us because it means they're absolutely industry current and they're coming and passing on that knowledge to students.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: Yes, there are benefits both ways for that, I would imagine. In terms of professional development opportunities for your teachers, how does that work in terms of upskilling? I know we talked about EVs and renewable energy. How do you ensure that your teachers have got the most up-to-date professional development and skills that they need for their day-to-day work? What does that look like?

STEPHEN BRADY: Under our regulations, we are required to ensure that all of our teachers are current with industry practice. We have them record a diary of the work that they do to maintain that currency. That could be a combination of going and working in an industry, attending seminars in their chosen field—a whole of range of different things go towards it. There are professional development courses that we run for our teachers. We ran actually a whole festival of teaching and learning this year, where we had I think about 3,000 teachers attend online through a range of different programs. So there are things we run internally and things that they will do themselves in industry or with professional associations. They record those in a diary, and that then helps us to provide the evidence to our regulator that our teachers are maintaining their currency.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: You just mentioned online. Particularly for the teachers in more regional, rural and remote locations, to ensure that they can have access to that same sort of professional development, are there particular opportunities that you offer?

JULIE TICKLE: Yes, certainly. I love talking about this. We offer a lot of professional development opportunities. Our teachers are double hatted. As Mr Brady said, they need to be current in their industry area, but they also need to be current and competent in the practice of teaching and learning. We offer both of those opportunities for our teachers. The Festival of Learning and Teaching was something that we trialled with great success this year. In fact, we're going to have a further follow-up for that in term 4, because it was so well attended. That provided teachers with the opportunity to put their hand up for—there were lots and lots on offer, so it was a little bit like a "choose your own adventure", and they actually went to things that they wanted to do.

In terms of regional and remote, we do it a number of ways. We have a staff Moodle, or on our intranet we have a capability central portal, where everything that we have on offer is listed and teachers can apply through an EOI to do it or put their hand up to do it. We use a variety of modes. Some of it is self-paced learning; some of it is hybrid learning. We have people conducting the sessions online or face to face. A lot of our teachers actually support each other with professional development. That's actually one of the advantages of our new proposed faculty model, because by going to a statewide faculty, if I'm a hairdressing teacher in Gunnedah, I'm getting the same access to professional development as a hairdressing teacher in Ultimo, for example. We certainly have a lot of different things that we do.

We also put a big focus on wellbeing at TAFE NSW. Every September for the last four years, we've had a two-day hack-a-thon around R U OK? Day. All of our teachers and all of our support employees can participate in that. Quite a lot of our teachers actually run sessions—for example, our fitness teachers run fitness sessions, and some of our TAFE counsellors do sessions on wellbeing and mindfulness. There's just a whole range of things that we offer. We change them based on what's happening, too. Cybersecurity, for example, has been a focus. Psychosocial, of course, has been a focus with the new legislation. It just depends in terms of what the teachers want and what is happening in the sector. That's how we make the offerings.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: Presumably, as you just said, with the new faculty model, you would envisage even more linkages between staff right across the State when they can work more closely with cohorts.

JULIE TICKLE: Absolutely.

STEPHEN BRADY: I think one of the great advantages of the faculty model is our ability to identify best practice and have that peer taught across the State, alongside our ability to have a really strong direct engagement with industry so we can actually bring in industry experts to work with us statewide rather than having to try to do that region by region, which is almost impossible.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: I want to do something that's not on our list so I'm just going to go freewheeling here. I want to come back to the VET review. I don't know who's best placed to answer these. I appreciate the Minister said earlier that obviously the Government's still considering them, but I wanted to ask about careers advice in schools. That was one of the recommendations that came through about strengthening the roles of careers advisers. I think Careers NSW is still operating. Is there any movement or work underway in terms of that careers advice in school and how it feeds into TAFE and higher education?

CHLOE READ: I might tackle that one a little bit. Obviously the review has some specific recommendations that relate to the careers advisers positions that we have in public schools, and seeking to strengthen those positions. We'll need to work with the Government on the response, and with the Deputy Premier on staffing and the positioning of that within schools. In the meantime, there's a range of ongoing professional learning and support that we're putting around careers advice in schools. We talked earlier about the bringing together of the schools pathways and careers support: pieces like having the head teacher of careers that exists in the educational pathways program—a really good way for us to be able to both give careers advisers a pathway, a different step in their career to become a head teacher of careers working across a network of schools, but also a way for us to try to expand some of that provision. The Minister has referenced this morning that, at the minute, we have some things in some places and not in others. What we really want to do is aim for statewide provision where we've got good support, good advice and good careers provisions across all of those schools. I'm definitely excited to take things to Government—

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: I have no doubt you would.

CHLOE READ: —to seek a position on the recommendations. Certainly careers advice in schools is an incredibly valuable piece for parents as well as for the students in schools.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: Tying into that, there are also recommendations around the school-based apprenticeships, but also the VET in secondary schools. I know that NESA plays a role in that, too. I appreciate that they're not here, but is there any more work happening—and I think I asked about it last week, too—in terms of increasing the number of VET offerings at schools in those senior secondary years and the changes to the HSC ATAR requirements with the VET courses? How are you seeing that play out from your perspective?

CHLOE READ: There are a few things there. One would be the answer that I think Mr Martin from NESA gave on the review of stage six and where that fits in the curriculum rollout. I'm really interested—work already underway, I believe, between some of my teams and his on what the role of reviewing the VET frameworks that exist, largely for year 11 and 12, in schools is. Then I think the other piece is the ongoing kind of making sure we have teachers in training to become vocational education teachers within our schools. I stopped in to a training session a couple of weeks ago that they were running in Parramatta, where there were teachers doing visual arts. They said a whole bunch of kids who really want to do visual arts but who really don't come to the theory side of that well—there was one trained teacher in VET visual arts in the State and so, as a result of that training, there will be 13. We're trying to make sure that we continue to offer a really good range of vocational vision in schools and then, where we don't have that ability inside the school gates, turning to partnerships with TAFE to make sure that our EVET program also delivers those pieces.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: Obviously this is something we'll keep an eye on, because I do think there is, as you know, a lot of opportunity there, too. Hopefully it'll pan out well in terms of offering more opportunities and getting more students into those subjects.

MURAT DIZDAR: There is also the freeing up next year. For year 12 you can do as many VET subjects—

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: Yes, I think we talked about that last week.

MURAT DIZDAR: —and get the HSC.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: I think Mr Martin said we'd have some data on that maybe next time to see how it's tracking in terms of enrolments, because it's current year 11 students that that would apply to. I wanted to ask—again, it is in the report. I preface this by saying I know we haven't got the Government response yet. There is mention about strengthening provider capacity and particularly the role of Aboriginal community controlled organisations and RTOs—more support for interested ACCOs to become RTOs, to use a few acronyms. In your experience, Ms Read, are there any barriers at the moment? Where does that kind of recommendation come from in terms of the evidence base around needing a better pathway for those Aboriginal controlled organisations?

CHLOE READ: I think it comes from a few places. One would be it's really hard to become a registered training organisation. It's quite a complicated process. I'm not sure we think that is, in and of itself, a bad thing. We want registered training organisations to be strong and reliable organisations.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: High quality, yes.

CHLOE READ: But nonetheless I think it's also a little bit reflective of some of our discussions on closing the gap, both locally inside New South Wales with our partners but also at the national level—that there's a sense that part of really allowing Aboriginal people to understand the value of vocational education to improve completions, to improve pathways from vocational education will be to have Aboriginal people delivering that training for other Aboriginal people. It ties in really well with the National Skills Agreement approach, which has that same emphasis on strengthening the Aboriginal controlled and owned sector and working really closely with the peak organisations there. Mr Pearson looks like he wants to say more.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: He's very welcome to.

CHLOE READ: He's suddenly very energetic beside me. Before he does—

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: I feel bad for Mr El Khoury. We haven't had anything for him all day, but anyway we'll see how we go.

CHLOE READ: I would just say, the other thing we've done under our current Smart and Skilled program is the latest round of refreshing the panel of providers on that—increased the number of Aboriginal controlled and owned providers to 20. I think it was between eight and 12 before, over the past few years that I've been in this role. That's a really positive step for us and us doing some work across those providers to build a community of practice and/or to share experience and expertise. Mr Pearson, did you want to add something?

MATHEW PEARSON: I would just add, in terms of that ACCO-RTO piece, some part of it is actually just the ACCO sector piece as much as the RTO. This is a kind of issue not just around VET but more broadly, and so it's one of the Closing the Gap actions—is to support ACCOs in general. Part of what we're doing with that new cohort—we'll have 20 on the Smart and Skilled contract—is we've established a group to work with them collectively to understand how we can really tackle some of the specific issues that they face. That then feeds into the work that we're doing on the National Skills Agreement as well—engaging with the broader sector.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: And presumably with an end goal of trying to have higher numbers of Aboriginal people undertaking the course. In terms of TAFE figures for Aboriginal students, do you have any data around that?

STEPHEN BRADY: We've got approximately 38,000 Aboriginal students at TAFE.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: What's that as a percentage of your students?

STEPHEN BRADY: We've got approximately 400,000 students, so just under 10 per cent. To the point that we want Aboriginal people supporting students, making sure they feel culturally safe on campus, we've got an Aboriginal employment team, which is really trying to drive greater Aboriginal representation in our workforce. We've been doing a lot of recruitment in teaching support roles to make sure that we've got that in place. We've got some quite significant work happening around our engagement through the organisation with our governance level. We've got Aboriginal senior leadership groups and we've got our Closing the Gap steering committee we're working with. We're working with local communities across government to try and improve the outcomes for our learners. As you know, it's a very complex question but the more Aboriginal staff we get within TAFE NSW, the better understanding and better support, so that's been a really key focus of Ms Tickle's, to try and strengthen that program. I think our team is up for an award this month, so we're making steps but there's more to do.

The Hon. RACHEL MERTON: Mr Dizdar, in terms of transparency and accountability, what specific measures are in place to ensure transparency and accountability in the allocation and use of the budget funds for TAFE NSW?

MURAT DIZDAR: Mr Brady carries that accountability directly to the Minister and government, so he may want to comment on the budget. The Minister earlier spoke about the budget and how TAFE is in receipt of approximately 79 per cent of the entire Skills budget. There was an election commitment that that would be at least 70 per cent, so it's good that there is an increase on the TAFE budget. He gave the figures for the Skills budget.

The Hon. RACHEL MERTON: Mr Dizdar, my question was around transparency and accountability, as opposed to budget numbers.

MURAT DIZDAR: Like all agencies—Mr Brady can comment on TAFE—there's an end-of-year financial process. The accounts are audited by the Auditor-General. Mr Brady can talk to their processes in place at TAFE.

STEPHEN BRADY: We're the same as other statutory authorities, where we receive our budget through the budget papers. We're audited by the Auditor-General. We produce an annual report, in which we provide as much information as we can about our performance. We report through to NCVER around our performance as part of the national dataset. Regular publications by that authority show our completion rates, for instance, and I'm very happy to say our completion rates are above the average nationally—above the average for all TAFEs. There's a really quite dense dataset. What we are looking forward to, though, is the work that Ms Reid spoke about earlier about the national dataset and, coming through under the National Skills Agreement, how that's going to link through to the New South Wales skills plan. TAFE is a subset of that, so we can show how we're contributing through those layers to the achievement of the Government's priorities.

I think we've got a situation that the moment where some of the reporting is a bit fragmented, I'd probably say, but there's a move towards a more integrated system, which will show much clearer alignment. One thing is that achievement in VET tends to get simplified to completions. One point I would make is that a lot of our students achieve great outcomes without necessarily a completion in their course. That could be for a range of reasons. One is they only wanted a couple of pieces of knowledge out of that qualification; they didn't want the qualification. Another would be that they've achieved a level of confidence out of the course that has allowed them to go on to work. In some industry sectors, if you've started the course and you can go and do your job placement, you'll find you're employed before you get back to your TAFE campus, and so that's a great outcome in its own right. Some of the work we're doing now is to start to do more surveying with our students about what is their intention when they enter the course so we get a better measurement of what does success look like. But there's more work to do there.

The Hon. RACHEL MERTON: How much of the budget is allocated to stakeholder engagement activities to ensure the needs and feedback of students, teachers, industry partners and community groups are incorporated into TAFE NSW planning and delivery?

STEPHEN BRADY: Great question. As I was saying earlier, we're really shifting our operating model and the way we do our planning. One of the real drivers of that was to get a much stronger community engagement approach as well as stronger engagement with industry. Part of your answer is that it's embedded in the way we're changing the organisation. Part of standing up the new community area is to make sure we have a more fine-grained understanding of community requirements, so we're moving from very large regions—running from Gosford to the Queensland border was one region; from Orange to the South Australian border was another region—and encompassing lots of different economies. How would you get a handle on what communities actually need? We're moving towards more the 10 State planning boundaries, which will give us a much better understanding.

We've run what we're calling TAFE Connect, which was a series of community engagements. We did a statewide digital engagement. We have done 13 local community engagements across the State so far. That's going to be an ongoing program, meeting with community, understanding their requirements, understanding how we can better engage and support them. This area we're standing up as a new part of TAFE NSW will have an executive leadership member who will be on my executive, who will be there representing the interests of local communities and students to talk to their requirements. But it also feeds directly into our planning processes, so that we get that bottom-up community need informing what we're delivering where and how. In terms of those community engagements, we're not spending a gazillion dollars to do that. It's more the fact that we're building it into our business as usual. I think we spent something like $40,000 across all those 13 engagements.

The Hon. RACHEL MERTON: Mr Brady, you've touched on some of this in terms of TAFE Connect but in terms of specific mechanisms that will be used to gather and respond to stakeholder feedback—

STEPHEN BRADY: Firstly, there are the forums we are going to be running. We have dedicated leads in each of those regions who engage with the local community, whether that's local government, the local chamber of commerce or the school principals, who are always a key stakeholder in those communities as well, or large businesses in those areas, so making sure that information then comes back into our planning processes. We have a complaints mechanism, which is always an asset for any organisation to understand what's happening with our communities and with our students. We have different mechanisms for those two. My LinkedIn profile seems to be a great source of community feedback as well.

The Hon. RACHEL MERTON: Mr Brady, just as an example, when we're talking in the community—and just off the back of some of my questions this morning to the Minister about the construction sector—different builders and contractors would give us views and opinions and their experiences with apprentices and what they're seeing. You can imagine some of this is positive, some of this is constructive criticism. I'm wondering how those views are captured on the ground.

STEPHEN BRADY: We have industry forums that we work with regularly, that we meet with, get their feedback and incorporate that into the way we're delivering our classes. As I said earlier, we have our course canvases where we're looking at what's happening with student feedback as well as progressions. There are a range of different mechanisms.

CHLOE READ: I was going to add that the NCVER data collection that Mr Brady mentioned earlier also surveys employers, so there's employer satisfaction with vocational education in that survey. There's a place for both because you won't be able to tie the broad survey to specific regions or particular areas. Having both in place is a good mechanism.

STEPHEN BRADY: Of course our teachers are working closely with employers all the time and getting that feedback. Janet, have you got anything you would like to add?

JANET SCHORER: To reiterate, I think the housing industry is one example where there are big statewide multinational companies and then there are local developers and local businesses, and we need to connect with all that. In terms of a skills area that we have now in our Skills Excellence Network but that will become faculties, the heads of those faculties are very deeply involved with our industry innovation specialists in connecting where is the industry now and where do we need it to be with, as Mr Brady said, the intelligence that our teachers have from being on the ground, working with the businesses that our apprentices and other students are engaged with. How do they connect that together? Our teachers are a great source of that local business intelligence, and they're the ones who are managing those relationships day to day. Our ambition with the new operating model is to be able to harness much more of that insight that our teachers have and use that to inform how we engage and plan for a longer term future with our delivery.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: Picking up from the questions just now, I know that Rachel asked earlier about particular financial support for students. I think I raised this last time we met as well. But specifically for rural and regional students who might have to travel and have accommodation and transport costs if the course for their local apprenticeship isn't offered in their town, is there any specific financial support for students in that circumstance, or do they need to apply for one of the other scholarships that was mentioned earlier?

CHLOE READ: There's the Vocational Training Assistance Scheme that I mentioned before that assists with, particularly, apprentices and trainees who might be located far from where they might need to go to study.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: Do you have any more detail on that, on what's available?

MATHEW PEARSON: It provides financial assistance to apprentices or new entrant trainees when they're travelling more than a 120-kilometre round trip.

CHLOE READ: I think, from memory, that assistance can be things like travel and accommodation, as well as—

MATHEW PEARSON: Accommodation, yes. It's around $9 million a year that we've been allocating.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: But if you live in Gunnedah and you go to Tamworth to do your course, however many days a month or however it works, is there a limit to what each student can get? I'm happy if you need to provide it on notice; I'm just curious, in real terms, what an average student can get under that program.

MATHEW PEARSON: We might take it on notice, just around the specifics.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: Again, I sort of asked about this last time. In terms of the consultation you have with stakeholders and employers, when you have larger cohorts or the potential to run a course in a rural community—rather than having to travel to Tamworth, Dubbo, Wagga or wherever—how do you do it? Is it the number of students? Is it facilities? Is it teachers? Is it a combination of the three? Have there been any since we last met where you've been able to offer more remote or more rural locations for some of those courses, rather than those major regional cities?

STEPHEN BRADY: It's not necessarily the case that all those courses are concentrated in the large centres. For instance, in Leeton, we've got a very strong electrotech delivery. That's why we talk about a network of campuses.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: Is that because of industry or demand? Why Leeton? What's the history of that? I mean, it's great, but I'm just curious what makes certain campuses have that offering.

STEPHEN BRADY: I think it's the fact that we can't deliver everything everywhere. But it's not necessarily the case that we need to have a hub-and-spokes model; it's more about how we combine capability across campuses. Some of that might go to the fact that you've got a strong teacher in that location who's built up strong relationships with industry. You sort of build around that, and then they bring in other tradespeople to work with them and you build a level of depth within that teaching team. But Ms Schorer might have more.

JANET SCHORER: I'd certainly agree it's a combination. Some courses you definitely need the infrastructure in place in some form, but we do have our mobile training units that enable us to take a lot of the more bespoke equipment to places and for the teachers to utilise it there. It is also about enrolments. Predominantly, in my view, the reason for not having small classes is it's not a great student experience. But there are certainly still things that we do with small numbers and the availability of teachers. Many of our teachers still travel large distances to be able to reach to students. But it's also where the industry is. I think part of us thinking differently about how we plan for delivery is—some of the time we deliver in many places because of history. I think us having a better sense and intuition as an organisation about where industry might need us enables us to keep step with that a little better.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: That was going to be my follow-up. Do you work with industry and employers about future projections as well? If you've got emerging projects coming on in certain areas, they might be able to foreshadow, "At the moment we've only got this many apprentices but, actually, in five years we think we'll have triple or quadruple that." How do you use that to plan so that it's not a chicken and egg where you're waiting for numbers but you might not get the numbers without the delivery of the course? How do you manage that?

JANET SCHORER: Industry has that insight about what they need in the future and then there is the, as we were talking about earlier, conversation about pre-vocational pathways. How do we prepare students, whether they're in school or in other parts of the community, to be ready for that learning? Not every student walks in and is able to successfully complete a cert IV straight up. How do we prepare for that? That's also what we have to plan for. The model we're moving towards as an organisation gives us much more of that insight and the ability to use that insight to plan over longer periods with industry.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: And more flexibility, potentially.

JANET SCHORER: And more flexibility, exactly.

STEPHEN BRADY: I was going to say that, for that forward-looking planning approach we've been talking about, this is very much where it comes to bear—having that intelligence from local industry and business about what's coming up over the horizon. It takes time to be able to step up a capability. We need to be able to recruit someone from industry, train them to be a teacher, make sure we've got the facilities available and, if it requires specialist equipment, make sure that is in place. The more we can have that forward view of what industry needs, the better position we are in to be there when that's needed.

The other thing I'd say is, when you look at the interim report of the VET review, it talks a lot about local community. One thing we find is that trying to get a sufficient class size can be a challenge, and then getting the right teacher in the right place at the right time. One thing we're thinking very much about is how do we engage with community around a pattern of delivery? I've been to some of our campuses where we have taught business studies in that community because that's what the teacher can teach. They have taught everyone in town and there's no-one left to teach and there probably won't be anyone to teach for several years as a new generation comes through. We're starting to think about things like why wouldn't we teach it every two years? You can provide certainty to the community and you can make sure the teacher is there and you can deliver that. Thinking a little bit differently is not just about, "Let's put a course up and see how many enrol." Let's work with the community about what their needs are and then try and schedule things in a much more certain way so we give the community confidence that we are there for them.

The Hon. RACHEL MERTON: Ms Read, this might be your space. In terms of the fee-free places, I'm wondering how many fee-free TAFE places have been allocated in the 2024-25 budget and how this would compare to the previous year.

CHLOE READ: The fee-free program has two tranches. The first tranche was 2023 and we enrolled 174,451 students and then tranche 2 runs from 2024 to 2026 inclusive. You asked about the 2024-25 financial year, but they don't really match the financial years. I think Mr Pearson is going to give me the actual—no, he's not. In tranche 2 there are 147,000 places across those three calendar years. To 30 June, we had already enrolled 44½ thousand students or just a bit over, so about a third.

The Hon. RACHEL MERTON: The 2023 figure you gave me was, in terms of fee-free places, 174,451.

MATHEW PEARSON: Who enrolled.

The Hon. RACHEL MERTON: That being for a 12-month period, 2023-24?

CHLOE READ: Yes, it's just the calendar year, 2023. Some of those students will, obviously, still be in training.

The Hon. RACHEL MERTON: And then, in terms of 2024 to 2026?

CHLOE READ: The agreement says we need to deliver at least—

MATHEW PEARSON: It's 147,000.

CHLOE READ: Yes, 147,400 places.

The Hon. RACHEL MERTON: Over a three-year period?

MATHEW PEARSON: Yes, and the agreement actually asks that it is spread over the three years.

The Hon. RACHEL MERTON: We've gone from 174,000 over one year to 147,000 over three years?

CHLOE READ: Yes.

The Hon. RACHEL MERTON: So there has been over one-third reduction?

CHLOE READ: Yes. The program is a Commonwealth election commitment, obviously jointly delivered with the States as we run the skills systems. They had significantly more investment that they wanted to put into that first year and then wanted to spread the remainder across the other three years to then align, I think, with the rest of the time frame of the skills agreement itself. So that's why it's stated that way.

MATHEW PEARSON: And there is a tranche three which was announced in the Commonwealth budget, which is for construction places. That's around 20,000 nationally. But that agreement is still in negotiation. That starts from 2025, over two years.

The Hon. RACHEL MERTON: I appreciate, as you say, they are Federally funded, but just in terms of the availability and how they're managed, what measures are in place to ensure that these fee-free places are accessible to students across all regions of New South Wales, including rural and remote areas?

MATHEW PEARSON: In terms of the availability they're tied, effectively, to the allocations that our providers have for the subsidies, and those subsidies are then actually distributed across New South Wales, so we fund by different regions. Effectively, 50 per cent of our subsidies go outside of the Sydney metro area, so that does give us that spread. We also, obviously, have a distinct allocation that goes to TAFE NSW compared to the rest of the non-TAFE market.

The Hon. RACHEL MERTON: Are those fee-free places tied to a specific area of study?

CHLOE READ: There is a course list, which is similar to how other programs that we've run like this operate. There is significant enrolment across priority areas, so care and support, technology and digital, construction and agriculture all feature heavily in terms of the course profile.

The Hon. RACHEL MERTON: Can you provide a demographic breakdown of the students who have enrolled in fee-free TAFE places so far?

CHLOE READ: Perhaps we could. Mr Brady, do you have one for your enrolments?

STEPHEN BRADY: I think we'll have to take it on notice.

CHLOE READ: Yes, I think we might take that on notice.

The Hon. RACHEL MERTON: Given the anticipated high demand for fee-free places, what steps have been taken to ensure there is sufficient capacity to meet student demand? Have we had that experience?

MATHEW PEARSON: Do you mean in terms of having enough providers there to deliver those places?

The Hon. RACHEL MERTON: Yes.

MATHEW PEARSON: Probably we've got the opposite difficulty, which is there are really not enough places to go around for that student demand, particularly with the second tranche, which is obviously a much smaller number over a longer period.

CHLOE READ: And most of them, as we've said, are with TAFE. TAFE, obviously, have the capacity to deliver, I would assume, more than they are currently allocated.

STEPHEN BRADY: That's right. If you have any left over, we're willing to take them.

The Hon. RACHEL MERTON: In terms of what strategies are in place to manage a situation like this, is there a waitlist for high-demand fee-free courses?

CHLOE READ: I'm not sure. Do you guys run a waitlist?

JANET SCHORER: No. In general terms, we have a fairly technical process to determine the availability for fee-free places and once that allocation is exhausted they move to fee-paying courses. Obviously, the course is still available but we alert students that they are now a fee-paying student, and that might determine their choice. The other part of that is, obviously, trying to process students who don't wish to take up that place quickly so that we can offer it to another student who may have been fee paying. It means a fair bit of volatility in processing that, but we want to make those places available to as many students as we can.

CHLOE READ: I'll just flag that there are other fee-free places on offer that are not part of that Commonwealth scheme. We mentioned before that apprenticeships and traineeships in New South Wales are currently fee free, and if you enrol under one of our Smart and Skilled places, certain people will either get a fee benefit or it will be fee free. So Aboriginal people, students with a disability and veterans, I think—there's a list of people who are eligible already for fee-free support under Smart and Skilled.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: I just want to go back very quickly—I know you took it on notice, Mr Pearson—to the support that's available for students with accommodation and travel costs. Could you also, either now or on notice, provide information as to whether it's available for students of cross-border communities—if you live in one area but come across, or vice versa? I don't know how that works.

MATHEW PEARSON: I would be happy to take it on notice, but I would assume most of our cross borders are Albury-Wodonga-type situations around the border. I would think that most people would qualify, but I'm happy to take that on notice.

CHLOE READ: They wouldn't incur the distance requirement probably.

MATHEW PEARSON: That's right, exactly—the 120 kilometres. But I'm happy to take it on notice.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: That would be good because there may be some potentially where they do. Anyway, I'm interested if there is any information on that. Can I just go to the general enrolment trends and numbers across TAFE. I know we spoke about this last time as well but, so far this year, how are the enrolments tracking and is it on par with previous years? What are the numbers like?

STEPHEN BRADY: We've just had the discussion around the fact that the second tranche of fee-free TAFE was lower and spread over a longer period, so obviously that flows through into our general enrolment numbers as well, given that we were doing over 70 per cent of our program fee free. Our enrolments for 2023 were just over 400,000, which is pretty much where it was pre-COVID, but it's down a little bit from the peak in 2020 when we had all the COVID stimulus with the responsible service of alcohol and all that. They are very short courses, but they count as an enrolment, the same as a four-year course does. We had a peak of 468,000 enrolments. But, as I say, you're comparing apples with oranges. Certainly a lot of the courses we delivered through fee free were more certificate III or certificate IV courses, which were much more substantial pieces of delivery. We would say that we've had very strong involvement.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: I'm also particularly interested in regional areas as well. What are you seeing with student numbers there in terms of trends?

STEPHEN BRADY: I don't actually have that data with me.

JANET SCHORER: No, I don't. We can provide what we can on notice.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: If you can provide on notice a bit of a breakdown of the students and where they are based.

JANET SCHORER: Yes, of course.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: The issues around equity and accessibility—I know we spoke before about Aboriginal students, but we've done an inquiry recently, as the Chair mentioned, into access for young people with disability in terms of educational settings. What is offered or available to assist any students with disability? Do you have a breakdown of the numbers of students who fit that cohort?

STEPHEN BRADY: For TAFE?

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: Yes, for TAFE.

STEPHEN BRADY: Certainly. Disability is about 45,000 students, so about 12 per cent of our population. As I mentioned earlier, we've got a significant support network for our disabled students. We have the disability teacher consultants. We've got 84 of those statewide. They play a really crucial role in making sure we're complying with disability standards and actively promoting access to our courses. They work really closely with our teaching teams. All the consultations are confidential with the learner, and then they go and work with the teaching teams to make sure that we've got all of the support necessary. We offer a whole range of adjustments, whether that's note-takers, specific technologies for reading or hearing, and we support them with the teachers taking into account their disability in the way they run the classes as well.

The assistive technology—we also provide disability awareness training for our teaching staff. We negotiate and review reasonable adjustments within their individual education plans, which is what I was saying about the way that teaching is delivered. But there are also some changes for disability access courses: courses specifically tailored to provide a slower pace and more repetition of learning, where that's the suitable support for the learner—things like one-to-one tutorials. There is a whole range of supports, but that disability teacher support consultant helps to design the program around the individual learner.

STEPHEN BRADY: That's right. They are available either on campus or via phone. Appointments get made and they follow up. They work with the teaching teams to make sure that the plan that has been designed with the learner is then implemented in practice.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: And that plan would obviously include any of the adjustments that you were speaking about in terms of that?

STEPHEN BRADY: Absolutely.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: Do you have any capital money for disability upgrades or access requirements on your campuses? How do you manage that?

STEPHEN BRADY: We do that through our general maintenance programs. I mentioned earlier we've got an access advisory group which has a really key input into what sorts of changes on campuses we need. One of the things I spoke about with the asset renewal program was lift changes. Lifts, ramps, making sure we're checking the trip hazards—things that we can do to support those learners. But we are working in a campus environment where we've got a really long backlog of maintenance. So we're making the changes. We prioritise those within our maintenance programs, but we've got old infrastructure—

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: It's ongoing work.

STEPHEN BRADY: Yes.

The Hon. SARAH MITCHELL: I think that is our time.

The CHAIR: It is. You have done very well to fill it all, and our witnesses have done very well to answer it all. Thank you so much for your time. To the extent that there have been questions taken on notice, or there will be supplementary questions, the Committee secretariat will be in touch to discuss that. Does the Government have any questions?

The Hon. MARK BUTTIGIEG: No, we're all good.

The CHAIR: That brings us to the end of the day. Thank you very much.

(The witnesses withdrew.)

The Committee proceeded to deliberate.

Executive Summary

The University of Sydney (the University) has experienced a significant amount of protest activity. The protests were primarily brought in opposition to the Israeli war waged in Gaza. In addition to protests a range of other activities were engaged in, in support of the Palestinians' cause. The single largest event was an encampment on the front lawns of the University commencing on 23 April 2024 and ending peacefully on 24 June 2024. In the period immediately following the disbandment of the encampment, protests of various kinds continued on campus. Many allegations have been made regarding antisemitic behaviour and disruption created by the protest activity to the normal function of the University. There have been some complaints that there has been Islamophobic behaviour.

To address the issues on its campus, the University has undertaken a number of initiatives. It has commenced a thorough review of its policies and its complaints procedures, and it is increasing the capacity of campus security. Commissioning this External Review (Review) was another of the initiatives. These actions are directed at its stated aims of making the campus a welcoming and safe place for all.

The Review has been asked to look at the University's policies and processes going forward to ensure that the University is equipped not only to meet its obligations as they arise in the future, but to enhance the experience of all those on campus.

The University did not before 7 October 2023, and has not since, tolerated racism of any kind on its campus. Nor does it tolerate threatening or intimidatory speech or behaviour. Its policies make this clear. Whilst the University policies have always been based on those concepts, the actions taken by the University to maintain them have not been apparent to the public. There is a need for greater transparency so that the public are made aware, in an appropriate way, of the steps taken by the University in this area.

To address transparency a number of recommendations have been made. Two new reports, one dealing with complaints dealt with and the other with the range of penalties imposed for substantiated breaches of policy, have been suggested which would after having gone to the Senate be made public.

The fact that this encampment was the first protest of that particular kind experienced by the University added to the complexity, as does the changing legal framework in which the University operates.

The submissions made to the Review make clear that the University's policies and procedures are not well understood, hard to access and as a result often not consulted by those from outside the University and many from within. They are often dense documents written in language which is not clear as to their scope and intent.

The initiative already commenced by the University involving as it does a deep dive into all the University's policies and the procedures which flow from them is a very important one. It will, no doubt, take a significant commitment to see it through to completion. That commitment on the part of the University needs to be pursued vigorously. The simplification of policies will make them more user friendly and transparent. It will address many of the issues raised with the Review.

The University's complaints procedures have been the subject of wide criticism. This fact was recognised some time ago and the process of its overhaul with a view to creating a user friendly and transparent procedure is under way. This too is an important initiative. Recommendations have been made which are intended to assist this initiative. Making, in appropriate circumstances, student organisations that receive funding from the University responsible for compliance with the University's policies will make enforcement of those policies easier and help simplify the complaints procedures overall.

Some of the traditions of the University have been referred to as the basis for permitting particular types of activity such as sit-ins and other forms of protest in buildings and the addressing of lecture halls with political statements. These traditions grew up in a different time and when the legal framework with which the University must comply was far less complex. The maintenance of these traditions has led to students feeling unsafe. There does not appear to be a reason for their continuation particularly in light of social media communication methods.

By prohibiting all forms of protest in the University's buildings the University will make every building on campus a safe place; a refuge where those who feel unsafe as a result of protest activity can escape that activity.

At the core of the University is the maintenance of freedom of speech and academic freedom. The importance of, and the maintenance of, these freedoms cannot be doubted. Freedom of speech and academic freedom are not, however, without limitations. Primarily, those limitations are imposed on the freedoms by the law, and this has always been the case. As the law changes, so have the intrusions made by it into freedom of speech and academic freedom. Whilst such a development might be lamented by some, it cannot be denied.

However, it can be a very difficult matter to determine when a particular word or phrase is used in a legitimate way and when the same word or phrase is impermissible. Many complaints have been made that words and phrases which have been used on the campus are antisemitic. Others, including some Jewish people, who have heard the same words and phrases have determined that they have been used legitimately.

Finding a balance between the proper exercise of the right to freedom of speech and academic freedom and the use of speech which is not protected by those freedoms is a very difficult matter. Some in the Jewish community advance various definitions and guidelines whilst others from the same community decry the use of those definitions and guidelines as being an attempt to shut down free speech and academic freedom. Some have gone as far as to suggest that those who are relying on definitions and guidelines are weaponising antisemitism to prevent even legitimate criticism.

The context in which speech is used can alter its meaning. This is recognised when interpreting statutes, contracts and other documents. Context is then at least one important consideration when attempting to determine the meaning of a word or phrase. Context is the domain of the speaker. It is the speaker who can, if they choose to do so, make clear the meaning of the words and phrases that they are using. There is no longer room in this debate for those who would use a word or phrase in such a way that they have not made its meaning clear. This is so no matter what freedom they purport to rely on. Clarity is essential.

The section of the Report "Clarity through Context" discusses this issue. The consequence of this discussion is Recommendation 9, The New Civility Rule. That rule would make the speaker responsible for ensuring that the meaning of the words and phrases used by them was clear to the audience being addressed. This obligation would apply to any speaker addressing any form of meeting or lecture held using the University's facilities.

Other matters have been dealt with in the Report and where it was thought appropriate to do so recommendations have been made. In all 15 Recommendations have been made. Those Recommendations are set out in Appendix A to this Report.

Background

The attack by Hamas which included the murder, rape and the kidnapping of Israelis and foreign workers on 7 October 2023 and Israel's retaliatory assault on Gaza, which has resulted in the killing of tens of thousands of Palestinians, led to a series of protests across many universities around the world, including in the United States of America (USA). It has been no part of this Review to analyse the actions of Israel, the Palestinians or Hamas.

The protests in the USA took various forms, which involved encampments at some of the major universities including Harvard, Stanford, Columbia, MIT and others. Encampments were also established at Cambridge and the University of Nottingham in the United Kingdom. The response to these encampments differed. Most resulted in agreements being reached between each university and the protestors involving disclosure on a range of topics by the university. In a number of universities in the USA police were called in to break up the encampments and, in some instances, violent clashes and multiple arrests resulted.

At Columbia University three encampments were established. The first of these commenced on 18 April 2024 and the final encampment ended on 2 June 2024. The first two of those encampments were broken up by police, some in riot gear, and hundreds of arrests were made. The third ended after Columbia reached agreement with protestors which in part involved the disclosure of a list of the university's direct investment holdings.

In April of 2024 a group of University of Sydney students, one of whom openly identified as Jewish, determined that they would protest the war in Gaza and that the protest would take the form of an encampment.

On 23 April 2024 the encampment was established on the lawns in front of the quadrangle building and as a result was very visible to those entering the University through the front gates or attending Fisher Library or those at the Eastern Avenue end of the campus. Initially the encampment consisted of six tents[1] but over a period of a few weeks grew to approximately one hundred tents, not all of which were occupied. The numbers of participants in the encampment fluctuated. That number was significantly higher during the day than at night. Only a small number of individuals occupied tents during the duration of the encampment. Participants in the encampment included students, staff and at times individuals with no connection to the University. Many of the University's students and staff as well as others visited, without participating in, the encampment.

In Australia encampments were also established by students at most of the major universities, including the Australian National University, Monash University, the University of Adelaide, the University of Wollongong, the University of Melbourne and others.

The University has what is often described as a 'rich history of protest', however an encampment as a form of protest had not previously been experienced. Although there were some minor verbal altercations between different groups on a few occasions, the encampment did not erupt into physical violence. The police were regularly consulted and kept informed. The University determined from the outset of the encampment that it did not want any replication of the violence which had resulted from the forceful breaking up of encampments overseas. The University kept students and staff regularly updated on its approach with communications which are available on its website.[2]

In the days prior to the encampment being disbanded the University entered into an agreement with a student organisation known as the Sydney University Muslim Students Association (SUMSA). The terms of that agreement were notified to students and staff via a University wide email, and were published on its website.[3]
The encampment was disbanded and came to a peaceful end on 24 June 2024.

Since the establishment of the encampment and following it being disbanded the University has received a great deal of criticism. That criticism has come from both inside and outside the University and from a wide section of the community. Many aspects of the University's approach to, and handling of, the encampment as well as subsequent events have also been the subject of criticism and media reports. Some complain that the encampment went on too long and as a result caused students and staff, particularly those who are Jewish, distress, and feelings that they were not welcome on the campus and that they were unsafe. Many other issues have also been raised arising from the encampment and subsequent protest-related events on the campus. Others, including some who are Jewish, thought that the encampment was a legitimate form of protest which the University should have allowed to continue.

Entering into the agreement with SUMSA has been widely criticised particularly by sections of the Jewish community. Some had an understanding that the University's position was that it would not enter into an agreement with any of the protestors and complained that they were given no notice of the changed position. Some have suggested that the agreement was a capitulation without regard to the real problems that had been experienced on the campus whilst the encampment had been operating. On 24 June 2024 the Vice-Chancellor of the University sent an email to all students and staff outlining the agreement noting that there would be no restriction on student exchanges, academic partnerships or institutional relationships with any country or industry as part of the agreement. A copy of the Vice-Chancellor's announcement is at Appendix D.

The issues raised in the criticisms of the University are complex and wide ranging. Many are not capable of a readily identifiable solution and reaching a consensus amongst all stakeholders in respect of the criticisms was and remains highly unlikely. It was faced with this difficulty and the criticisms coming from all quarters that the University determined that it would commission an External Review.

The Review

On 25 July 2024 the University made the following announcement:

> The University of Sydney today announced the appointment of Bruce Hodgkinson SC to conduct an external review of its policies and processes – to ensure they are appropriate and fit for purpose as we safeguard the wellbeing of our community, academic freedom and freedom of speech, and the effective operations of the University into the future.

On 26 August 2024 the University published an invitation for submissions to the Review of policies and processes on its website. The University also sent the same invitation by email to students, staff and interested members of the community who were informed that they could make written submissions to the Review.

In issuing the invitation the University stated that:

> We are committed to ensuring that the university has:
> - a campus that is safe and welcoming for all students and staff;
> - appropriate process and policies in place targeted at preventing discrimination and harassment;
> - effective protocols and practices to deal with allegations and acts of racism, threats to safety, hate speech, intimidation, threatening speech, bullying or unlawful harassment; and
> - processes and policies that reflect best practice and are fit for purpose and the times.

In providing a safe and welcoming environment for all in our community, we also must be in a position to ensure our unwavering commitment to free speech and academic freedom as core principles of the University.

We invite students, staff and interested members of the community to make a submission to the external review. We would like to hear about your experience since 7 October 2023 in relation to the matters outlined above to which the University is committed including what is working well, areas for improvement, and any suggested steps the University might take to ensure its campus is a safe, respectful and inclusive place for all students and staff.

The invitation to make a submission set out the following advice and criteria:

- That a dedicated email address, usydexternalreview@counsel.net.au, had been established to which submissions could be sent, including on a confidential basis.
- That the University does not have access to the dedicated email address.
- That there was no intention to make the submissions publicly available, except where required by law.
- The submissions would not be disclosed to the University, except where in Mr Hodgkinson's discretion he deemed it appropriate or where required to do so by law.
- Submissions could be made anonymously.
- That regard would be had to all submissions lodged before the deadline of 23 September 2024.
- That submissions would be deleted 28 days from the completion of the Review, excluding any submissions provided to the University or otherwise retained in Mr Hodgkinson's discretion.
- That submission makers ought to minimise disclosure of personal information, and not to provide personal information of third parties without their consent.

- That the University intended to publish the report resulting from the Review.

The Review was required to be forward looking. For that purpose, it was not necessary or appropriate to scrutinise each of the decisions made in relation to the encampment, the agreement with SUMSA or in relation to the protest activity and issues that have arisen on the campus since.

The encampment and the activity surrounding it together with events which took place after it was disbanded, have been a focus of most of the submissions received by the Review. The submissions make clear the breadth and complexity of the problems that the University was facing and attempting to deal with. The information set out in the submissions has been used to inform the Review and to formulate Recommendations for the University's consideration. The Recommendations have been formulated having regard to the duties and obligations imposed on the University by law and the desire of the University to ensure that its campus is a safe place for all students and staff.

Review Process

A total of 51 written submissions from a wide range of individuals and organisations were received. These included students, staff and alumni of the University, parents of students at the University, as well as from representative organisations of students, staff, the Jewish community, and wider community groups.

Where anyone who made a submission has requested that their identity or the information disclosed in their submission, be treated as confidential to the Review that name and information has not been revealed to the University or otherwise made public. Each of the persons who requested that their identity or submission be kept confidential had a sound reason for making the request. No organisation who made a submission to the Review asked that their identity remain confidential.

The following individuals made a submission to the Review and did not seek that their identity remain confidential: Alexander Sherman, Andy Smidt, An Nguyen, Ben Grimes, Catherine Parr, Daej Arab, David Celemajer, Doron Samuell, Douglas Joshua, Emily MacLean, Jennifer Dowling, John Buchanan, Lucia Sorbera, Markela Panegyres, Matte Rochford, Michael Edwards, Rob Grunstein, Sarah Aamidor and Tatjana Seizova-Cajic.

Organisations who made a submission to the Review were: Australian Academic Alliance Against Antisemitism (5A), Australian Israel & Jewish Affairs Council (AIJAC), Disability At Work Network (DAWN), Executive Council of Australian Jewry (ECAJ), Jewish Council of Australia (JCA), National Centre for Cultural Competence (NCCC), National Tertiary Education Union (NTEU) and the New South Wales Jewish Board of Deputies (NSWJBD).

Some, but not many, requests for an extension of the deadline for the lodgment of submissions were made. Each one of these applications was granted. All of the submissions made to the Review have been considered and the information contained in them has been used to inform the considerations contained in this Report.

Everyone who lodged a submission was advised that they could request a meeting for the purpose of raising any matter which they thought might be of assistance to the Review. Meetings were held with everyone who requested one. 14 meetings were held. The discussions conducted in those meetings were undertaken on a confidential basis so that the participants were able to freely advance anything they thought to be of importance, including the identification of problems they perceived the University had in handling the issues arising on the campus from 7 October 2023. Those who attended the meetings were also asked if they had any suggestions as to how the University might handle the problems they had identified going forward.

Meetings were held with Jillian Segal AO the federally appointed Special Envoy to Combat Antisemitism, David Ossip and Michele Goldman as representatives of the NSWJBD, Zac Morris as a representative of the Australian Union of Jewish Students, Peter Wertheim and Simone Abel as representatives of ECAJ, Michael Abrahams-Sprod and Sarah Aamidor as representatives of 5A, Nick Riemer as a representative of the NTEU and Na'ama Carlin as a representative of JCA.

In addition to the meetings held with the persons who made submissions, others who it was thought might be able to assist the Review were invited to meetings. Those persons included Aftab Malik the federally appointed Special Envoy to Combat Islamophobia, representatives from Mandelbaum House, Michael Edwards, Doron Samuell, Ghena Krayem and others who requested that their identity be kept confidential which request has been respected.

Assistance to the Review

The University has provided the Review with every assistance required for a thorough consideration of the issues which have arisen on campus since 7 October 2023. That assistance has been provided on an open disclosure basis. The University has provided copies of its policies, statements, procedures and guidelines in addition to a large amount of other material covering all the topics relevant to the Review. The Review has been made aware of the ongoing policy development which the University has continued to pursue since the Review was commenced.

Meetings have been held with the Chancellor, Vice-Chancellor, Provost and senior staff members from various parts of the University's administration, including the Vice-Chancellor's Office, the VP (Operations), the Deputy Vice-Chancellor (Education Portfolio), Student Affairs, Workplace Relations, Protective Services and Health and Safety. Everyone who participated in those meetings did so on an open and frank basis. The University's Office of General Counsel has assisted the Review in many ways including by arranging meetings with various people within the University's administration and providing material and information addressing issues in response to questions that have arisen during the Review.

The Parliamentary Senate's Legal and Constitutional Affairs Legislation Committee conducted an inquiry into antisemitism at Australian universities in September of 2024. The University provided a submission and the Vice-Chancellor, Mark Scott, appeared before the Inquiry.

The University cooperated fully in the Senate Inquiry and provided the Review with its submission and a transcript of the Vice-Chancellor's appearance before the Legislative Committee. The University also provided all the submissions made to the Senate Inquiry which mentioned the University. These have been read and considered as part of the Review. They raise similar issues to those raised in the submissions made to the Review.

Issues beyond the scope of the Review

A number of staff members, including some very senior members of the University staff, who made submissions to the Review did so on the basis that their submission, and in particular their identity, remained confidential. The reason expressed for seeking confidentiality was in all cases a fear that there might be some form of adverse impact on their career if it became known within the University that the particular individual had made a submission. The nature of these adverse impacts is not known. The identity of persons who have raised this issue has not been released to the University.

Whilst it is beyond the scope of the Review to investigate fully the basis for these concerns or to take any action to consider them, the issue has been identified consistently with the terms of the invitation to make submissions. The University has enshrined the right of its staff to criticise it as an exercise of academic freedom.[4] The fact that some members of staff feel the exercise of this right might have an adverse impact on them is worrying.

In its submission to the Review, ECAJ raised that funding through grants, gifts and other means lacked transparency such that the actual source of the funding could not be ascertained. It was suggested that this concern was a reason that had motivated ECAJ to call for a Royal Commission into universities. Such an issue is beyond the scope of the Review.

[4] University of Sydney Enterprise Agreement 2023-2026 cl 366(b)(ii); See also the University of Sydney Charter of Freedom of Speech and Academic Freedom 2020, definition of 'academic freedom' includes "the freedom of staff and students to express their opinions in relation to the University in which they work or are enrolled."

Definition of Protest

Protests can and do take many forms. They are described in many different ways. Protests are referred to as demonstrations, rallies, sit-ins, boycotts and strikes amongst other descriptors. "Protest" as used in this Report is intended to refer to all actions taken as a protest, whatever that action may be and however that action is described.

University Initiatives

The University has already taken a number of significant steps to address the problems which confronted it arising out of the encampment and the protest activity which accompanied it. Those steps include the introduction of a new Campus Access Policy and the Viva Engage Terms of Use, the establishment of a Policy Working Group which is conducting a deep dive review of existing policies and other documents setting out the University's procedures, and improvements to CCTV coverage, amongst others. The University has also commenced a full review of its complaints procedures to ensure that the community has trust and confidence that their concerns will be heard and appropriately responded to.

Legal framework

The legislative environment in which the University operates is complex. There are many acts of the federal and state parliaments (Acts) with which the University must comply. Amongst those are the University of Sydney Act 1989 (NSW) (USYD Act), the Higher Education Support Act 2003 (Cth) (HES Act), the Tertiary Education Quality and Standards Agency Act 2011 (Cth) (TEQSA Act), the Work Health and Safety Act 2011 (NSW) (WHS Act), the Anti-Discrimination Act 1977 (NSW) (AD Act), the Racial Discrimination Act 1975 (Cth) (RD Act), the Sex Discrimination Act 1984 (Cth) (SD Act) and the Fair Work Act 2009 (Cth) (FW Act). A full list of the Acts applicable to the University is at Appendix C.

Many of the Acts applicable to the University require the University as a person concerned in a business or undertaking (PCBU) to proactively meet the obligations and discharge the various duties imposed by those Acts.[5] In certain circumstances the common law recognises that an employer has a proactive duty to deal with psychosocial injury.[6] The Work Health and Safety Regulations 2011 (Cth) (WHS Reg)[7] was amended in 2024 to include, for the first time, psychosocial hazards and risk.

The WHS Act requires the University as a PCBU to ensure so far as is reasonably practicable the health and safety of workers[8] and other persons[9] whilst they are on the campus. The WHS Act imposes upon officers[10] a separate duty from that imposed on the PCBU. That duty[11] requires the officer to exercise due diligence to ensure that the PCBU complies with its duties and obligations. The duties of workers[12] includes a duty to comply[13] with reasonable instruction given by the University for the purpose of the University complying with its health and safety duties. Workers are also required to cooperate[14] with reasonable work health and safety policies or procedures. Under the WHS Act if a duty holder (PCBU, officer and worker) breaches the duty imposed upon that duty holder they could be liable to criminal prosecution.

Duties and obligations regarding work environments are imposed by some Acts[15] on PCBUs. The work environment includes the buildings and outdoor areas which are on or make up the University campuses.

Given the proactive requirements in the various Acts, the University is required to have policies and processes to eliminate or minimise issues. Reactive policies and processes such as those dealing with misconduct are also necessary.

Issues raised in the Review

As the focus of this Review is forward looking, there is little to be gained by considering individually the merits of each incident or issue to which reference has been made. Rather, consideration has been given to all the incidents and issues raised by them. Similar issues have been dealt with by grouping them and considering them collectively.

Many of the submissions made to the Review dealt with problems experienced by Jewish students and staff members. However, it is also important to highlight that other Jewish students and staff members have informed the Review that they have not experienced problems on the campus as a result of the encampment or protest activity. Some submissions identified problems experienced by others, including persons with disabilities arising from the encampment and protests.

The issues raised involved allegations of antisemitic behaviour and behaviour perceived to be antisemitic, disruptive behaviour, deplatforming behaviour, Islamophobic behaviour and behaviour perceived to be Islamophobic. Submissions to the review also complained of the University's management of complaints, particularly a lack of transparency, poor communication and failure to impose penalties for those who commit misconduct.

Antisemitism

The majority of complaints made involving antisemitism referred to circumstances which arose whilst the encampment was present at the University.

Complaints were made about the use of particular phrases[16] which were antisemitic to some. Some of that speech was clearly antisemitic and contrary to the University's policies and statements which prohibit antisemitic and racist speech.[17] Some of the speech referred to involved words and phrases about which there was a difference of views.

[16] Note that 'phrases' in this Report includes (but is not limited to) slogans, chants, expressions, mottos and sayings.
[17] Student Charter 2020; Anti-Racism Statement https://www.sydney.edu.au/about-us/vision-and-values/diversity/cultural-diversity.html>; Bullying Harassment and Discrimination Prevention Policy 2015; Viva Engage Terms of Use 2024.

Behaviours such as the removal of posters depicting photographs of hostages taken by Hamas on 7 October 2023, the removal of Israeli flags, the display of posters said to contain antisemitic statements, as well as the support for Hamas were all examples of antisemitic behaviour identified to the Review. Other behaviour was also identified as antisemitic, including graffiti containing phrases, statements, and symbols such as swastikas.

There is no doubt that there have been examples of antisemitism on the campus, as was acknowledged by the Vice-Chancellor Mark Scott during his appearance before the Senate as part of the Commission of Inquiry into Antisemitism at Australian Universities Bill 2024. In extending his apology the VC said:

> "no one should feel at risk, unsafe or unwelcome at any place of learning, and no one should feel the need to hide their identity or stay away from classrooms or campuses."[18]

Many of the submissions identify that the words, phrases and behaviour complained about had caused Jewish students and staff members to feel that they were not safe on the campus. Some Jewish students thought it was unsafe to attend classes. As has already been discussed, antisemitic speech or behaviour is a breach of the laws preventing racism, harassment and intimidation. It is also a breach of the University policies directed at prohibiting the same types of conduct.

To address this behaviour for the future, there is a need to implement some structural change. The suggested changes are contained in the Recommendations found in Appendix A to this Report.

[18] Legal and Constitutional Affairs Legislation Committee Commission of Inquiry into Antisemitism at Australian Universities Bill 2024 (No. 2), 20 September 2024.

Islamophobia

Submissions were made to the Review which identified words, phrases and behaviour used on campus that were Islamophobic. Examples provided include conflating any person of the Islamic faith with terrorism and Hamas, comments about clothing worn by staff members and students and the tearing down of Palestinian flags.

Complaints were made that legitimate criticisms of the government of Israel and its actions have been cast as antisemitic. This, it is said, is contrary to the right to freedom of speech about political, as distinct from ethnic, religious and racial, matters. These complaints suggest that inappropriate allegations of antisemitism are being used as a mechanism to shut down the right to freedom of speech. Some suggest that this is the weaponising of the prohibition against antisemitic behaviour.

The majority of complaints regarding Islamophobia were made by staff members of the University. The complaints were often based on the perception that the University had taken no action in relation to circumstances involving Islamophobia that were clearly contrary to the University's policies. The complaints of Islamophobia included that staff members, and some students, have felt unsafe on campus as a consequence of being subject to Islamophobic words, phrases and behaviour. In addition, where complaints have been made about these words, phrases and behaviour, it is asserted that they have not been acted upon.

The complaints regarding antisemitic behaviour and the complaints regarding Islamophobic behaviour were at one in complaining that antisemitism and Islamophobia have been treated in communications sent by the University in the same category and often in the same sentence. All complaints of this kind suggested either that antisemitism should be treated as its own category of unacceptable behaviour, or where the complaints were in relation to Islamophobic issues, that Islamophobia should be treated as its own category of unacceptable behaviour.

Encampment

There was at the time of the commencement of the encampment a lack of clarity as to whether the University had the right to remove persons, including students, from the campus under the Inclosed Lands Protection Act 1901 (NSW) (ILP Act). It is now understood that the University is covered by the ILP Act.[19] This confirms the legal right of the University to remove people from its campus.[20] The Campus Access Policy contains reference to the ILP Act and the University's right to remove persons from the campus.[21] The position would be put beyond any level of dispute if the Government amended the definition of 'prescribed premises' to include 'universities' in the ILP Act.

The existence of the encampment and its longevity gave rise to many complaints that students and staff and others were subjected to inappropriate, threatening or racist speech and that some students and staff felt unsafe. That the encampment provided an opportunity for persons from outside the University, including members of Hizb ut-Tahrir, to have a presence on the campus and an influence on those involved in the encampment contributed to the feeling the campus was an unsafe place for some, particularly Jewish students and staff.

The University monitored to the extent possible the encampment and the activities being carried on within it. Protective and Risk Services (PRS) patrolled the areas around the encampment and were in regular communication with participants and police. Notwithstanding these efforts, the University had little real control over the encampment and the people participating in it, particularly as participation was a protest directed at the University itself. The University had little detailed knowledge of what activities were going on at any particular time and no way of gaining that knowledge. People were coming and going from the encampment as they pleased, so the University could not be aware of precisely who attended and when. Cooking, cleaning, attending to personal hygiene, putting up tents and other temporary structures as well as many other activities involve some level of risk to health and safety. Weather altered conditions potentially give rise to new risks. That people were present overnight involved a different consideration of risk. Many other factors may have added to risk or altered the risks. The University is not a camp site manager. The lack of clarity as to what was transpiring at any particular time in the encampment made its management difficult.

[21] Campus Access Policy 2024 cl 13(4).

Following the disbandment of the encampment the University reviewed the rule applying to access to the campus and published on 28 June 2024 a new Campus Access Policy. That policy identifies camping as an unacceptable activity on the campus. The Campus Access Policy is currently under review by the University as was promised at the time of its introduction. The Campus Access Policy going forward should maintain the prohibition on encampments as a form of protest on any University campus.

See Recommendation 1

Feeling unsafe on campus

The Review received many complaints that students felt unsafe on campus resulting from protests (which included the encampment) and the activity that accompanied them. A wide variety of circumstances was referred to which included antisemitic speech, racist threats, and the capacity to move around the campus without being confronted by the protest activity. There were also complaints that activities such as the flying of flags, the display of posters in areas not permitted by the University's policy and the display of banners created circumstances where people felt unsafe.

Even peaceful protest activity undertaken in the outdoor areas of the University campus brings with it the possibility of risk to the health and safety of persons engaged in the protest and others who are affected by a protest. Where a protest takes place over a short period of time the likelihood of exposure to those risks is minimised. The Campus Access Policy has addressed some of these matters. Provision of security personnel, advising others on the campus of the area in which the protest is taking place and ensuring that the protest remained peaceful were all steps which were taken by the University to make the campus a safe place for all.

Many submissions referenced incidents about which they had heard from media reports as the reason for the feeling that the campus was not a safe place. It is not to be doubted that where a person becomes aware of circumstances through media, they could as a result of those reports, feel unsafe. That could be the case even if the individual did not have any direct experience of the behaviour reported on. It is important that incidents or events, such as those reported on the campus, are reported accurately.

One incident reported on by the media which many submissions referred to in support of the proposition that Jewish people on the campus were unsafe was the visit to the University by Tel Aviv University (TAU) academics. The visit by the academics, Professor Milette Shamir and Sharon Ziv Kafri, was interrupted when pro-Palestinian demonstrators entered a function room in which the TAU academics were present. It was clearly inappropriate behaviour that the visit of these two distinguished persons should have been interrupted, particularly as they had been invited to the University and were involved in running an information booth promoting international student exchanges.

Unfortunately, this incident was the subject of inaccurate media reporting, which wrongly asserted that the University of Sydney locked pro-Palestinian activists in a room with senior Israeli university staff for an hour and a half. The Israeli university staff referred to in the media were the two visiting academics from TAU. The submissions made to the Review which reference this incident all refer to the asserted fact that the visiting academics from TAU were locked in a room with pro-Palestinian activists and the fact that those academics were locked in a room was a reason why Jewish people felt unsafe on campus.

In an interview which appeared in the Australian Jewish News on 28 March 2024, Professor Shamir described the incident as "unpleasant" because of the proximity of the demonstrators, having noted that she had encountered multiple demonstrations of "this type in different parts of the world".[22] Importantly, she said "I will say that at no point were we not allowed to leave or unable to leave".[23] The Professor went on to say "the choice to stay there was ours…we did not feel that we were physically threatened"[24] although both professors "felt very uncomfortable because it was loud..."[25]. It is clear that the media reporting relied upon by many is simply wrong to suggest that the TAU academics were locked in a room by the University. This article is at Appendix E.

This incident has been set out at some length to identify that a lack of safety legitimately felt by some Jewish students and staff at the University has been caused or contributed to by the inaccurate reporting of this incident.

Protests in buildings

The holding of protests within a building on the University campus is also said to be part of the rich tradition of protest at the University. In years gone past storming of the Chancellor's office, sit-ins, taking over lecture halls and the occupation of buildings have all been engaged in. Protests which take place inside University buildings are more likely than protests staged outside of buildings to disrupt the ordinary course of the University's business and interrupt students engaged in learning. Protests which are held in buildings, as a consequence of their risk profile, do not fit within the modern legislative framework and as a result permitting them places the University at risk of being in breach of the various legal duties and obligations.

The WHS Reg requires that a PCBU provide the capacity for persons to enter and exit a workplace without risk to health and safety, both under normal and emergency circumstances.[26] That obligation will be met if the entry and exit to a building is not impeded by a protest.

Protest activity that is carried on within a building involves risk to those involved in the protest and those affected by it. The potential for persons to be harassed or bullied is greater when a protest is held inside a building. The confined nature of the space has the potential to magnify the adverse impact that a protest might have on a person in the vicinity of the protest. A person may not be able to remove themselves from the vicinity of protest activity taking place inside a building. Loud chanting or message delivery, particularly if megaphones are used by the protestors is likely to cause risk and possible harm to persons in the building.

The Campus Access Policy prohibits protests in buildings.[27] The policy also states that protests must not unreasonably impede the access or movement of people or vehicles.[28] This policy is presently under review. Some of the submissions made to the Review have criticised this policy as being an attack on the right to freedom of speech. None of those submissions have mentioned the duties and obligations imposed by the WHS Act.

The Campus Access Policy post review should continue the prohibition against all forms of protests in buildings. It should also clearly prohibit the impeding of access to and exit from buildings, which is supported by WHS Reg 40(1).

The continuation of a policy prohibiting protests within buildings would have a number of other benefits. Firstly, it would result in every building on the campus being a safe place in which anybody could seek refuge, particularly in circumstances where activity taking place outside of buildings was making them feel unsafe. Secondly, the disruption to the ordinary course of the University's business and students' capacity to learn by protest activity would be decreased. This would address a number of the complaints that people felt unsafe on campus as a result of the encampment and the protest activity accompanying it.

Disruption to lectures

Lectures generally commence at the University at five minutes past the hour. The five-minute period is used by students to prepare for the lecture. This period has also been used as a time during which a student or group of students can, with the permission of the lecturer, address the gathered students who are attending the lecture. That opportunity is said to be one of the traditions of the University.

No doubt before the advent of social media platforms the opportunity to address a collected group of students face to face was an important one. However, communication of events, social or political, can now be made to the wider student population using social media platforms including the University's online forums.

Many complaints to the Review have been made about the use of this five-minute period to deliver messages considered to be inappropriate interruptions and which have no relevance to the course of study being undertaken. Many students find this disturbing, including students with disabilities, who have complained that in addition to it being upsetting, that it makes it difficult to prepare for the lecture. Since 7 October 2023 some have described announcements being made regarding the war in Gaza and the messages being delivered as antisemitic. Some have described being harassed and yelled at.

One example of the type of interruption raised in the Review involved students from the encampment who came into the classroom before the lecture commenced. Those students were not members of the student group attending the lecture. The students from the encampment took photographs of all the students in the class without asking their permission, which they said would be posted on social media. The students were told by those taking the photographs that if they did not want their photograph taken, they could hold a piece of paper in front of their face. Additionally, there are allegations that the message being delivered was antisemitic. Whatever the content of the message, taking over a classroom and making demands is likely to be intimidation, bullying and at the very least an unwanted interruption for those students preparing for the upcoming lecture.

It appears to be the case that at least on some occasions the opportunity to address students awaiting the commencement of a lecture has been taken without first obtaining the permission of the lecturer. While a lecturer can ask a student to leave it can be difficult to remove them if they do not want to comply with the request. If a lecturer has difficulty convincing the student to leave this only causes greater disruption to those waiting for the commencement of the lecture.

A student who is presently awaiting their lecture to commence really has no option but to sit through the announcement, even if doing so makes them feel uncomfortable or worse. The circumstances where students feel they are being yelled at, harassed, made to feel unwelcome or unsafe should not be permitted. This consequence is eliminated if students are prohibited from addressing those gathered in the lecture theatre prior to a lecture commencing.

There should be no opportunity provided for students to make any announcement before a lecture commences. Making any announcement to those gathered to attend the lecture by a student or students before a lecture commences should be an identified category of misconduct.

See Recommendation 3

If social media does not provide a sufficient means for students to communicate and there is a compelling reason to provide students with an opportunity to address those gathered in a lecture, then that opportunity could be provided to students at the end of the lecture. Providing the opportunity to address those at the end of the lecture permits those who wish to leave to do so. Any message delivered following the end of the lecture should first require the lecturer's permission. It must also be made clear, if this opportunity is provided, that the prohibition against protests in buildings applies and if the student(s) delivering the message are using this opportunity to protest that they would be in breach of that prohibition and dealt with for misconduct.

Posters

The Review has been told of many circumstances where posters have been put up around the University in places not permitted by the University's Advertising on Campus Policy which regulates areas in which posters can be displayed. That policy is currently under review by the Policy Working Group. There are many photographs and descriptions of posters which are in areas not permitted by the Advertising on Campus Policy, and which contained material that some found antisemitic, intimidating or threatening. The presence and proliferation of these posters caused some to feel unsafe on campus.

The University's PRS staff were removing posters from unauthorised areas of the campus on a daily and sometimes twice daily basis. This did not prevent the posters in large numbers being continuously replaced in unauthorised areas of the University campus.

By restricting the areas in which posters can be put up, the Advertising on Campus Policy provides students and staff an opportunity to either see or avoid the posters so that they are not confronted by them in a way which they cannot avoid.

A number of formal complaints were made by students and staff about the presence and content of the posters on the campus through the University's complaints procedure. There were a large number of issues raised to the Review about the complaints system itself, which are dealt with later in the Report.

The Advertising on Campus Policy places the responsibility for compliance on individuals. In most cases the complainant was not present when the poster was put up. In those circumstances the identity of the individual(s) who put up the posters will not be known to the complainant and very often will not be able to be established. Where the identity of the individual is not established there is nothing under the present system regulating complaints that can be done, and the complainant is advised that no further action can be taken. This will often leave complainants feeling aggrieved. In those circumstances to some it appears that the University is unwilling, unable to, or uninterested in acting on the issue raised in their complaint. This has created a belief that the University is permitting posters to be put up in contravention to the Advertising on Campus Policy.

Where some action is taken because of a complaint, the complainant is far more likely to be satisfied with the process than if no action is taken at all.

The majority of posters on campus are produced by student organisations (Organisations) These student organisations and groups are registered with the University[29] so that they are eligible to receive funding to support their activities from the University through the Student Services and Amenities Fee (SSAF) Fund and in some cases from other sources. Where posters are put up on the campus which identify an Organisation or Organisations as the author, or where the posters are advertising an event that is being run by an Organisation or more than one Organisation, then the Organisation(s) should be held responsible for ensuring that their posters are put up in compliance with the Advertising on Campus Policy. Compliance with that policy and all other University policies should be a condition of registration for funding.

Where an Organisation's posters are put up on the campus in a way or place that breaches the Advertising on Campus policy it is the Organisation who should be liable to sanction. The range of appropriate sanctions which could be imposed on an Organisation will need to be carefully considered. The range of sanctions imposed should neither be too harsh nor so insignificant that it will not discourage Organisations from breaching University policy. The type of sanction might depend on the policy that has been breached by the Organisation. Where an Organisation has breached the Advertising on Campus Policy for the first time, or infrequently, and the breach is identified early, it may be sufficient to require the Organisation to remove the offending posters immediately.

A sanction where an Organisation is in breach of a policy may involve withholding or reducing the Organisation's funding. It may be appropriate, depending on the circumstances of the breach and the record of the Organisation to make the sanction one which suspends funding, on a temporary basis or permanently. Where an Organisation is in breach of the University's polices on a repetitive basis consideration might have to be given to precluding its office and position holders (or some of them) from being eligible to hold an office, elected or otherwise in any Organisation which receives funding from the University.

Holding an Organisation responsible where it breaches the Advertising on Campus Policy would address the allegation that the making of a complaint on this issue results in no action being taken. It will also minimise the likelihood that posters are put up "all over" the University. It will make dealing with a complaint of that kind simpler to process and therefore likely to be dealt with in a timely way. As the sanction would be imposed on an Organisation, there would be no reason the complainant could not be informed of it. By doing so the University would demonstrate that it will not permit a breach of its policies and that it is not unwilling to, unable to, or uninterested in acting on a complaint.

Complaints Procedure

The Review has received many submissions identifying problems with the University's complaints procedure. They are that the complaints procedures are complex, slow, receive generic communications and lack transparency.

Those involved in administering and dealing with complaints are highly trained, diligent and professional in the way they treat all aspects of the complaints made to the University. All complaints are treated seriously. Those dealing with complaints face many issues, some of which are:

- The subject matter of complaints is very diverse as a complaint may arise in any part of the University's operations.
- Complainants may wish to remain anonymous.
- The information provided may not identify the individual(s) who are responsible for or involved in the behaviour complained about.
- The information provided by the complainant may be insufficient.
- Persons named in complaints may seek legal advice and sometimes legal representation.
- Privacy considerations may be and often are involved.
- Whatever the result of the complaint someone may refer it to the Ombudsman for review of the substance or the process.
- An appeal to the Administrative Division of the Supreme Court of NSW may be possible.

The problems which have been raised have not been caused or contributed to by the personnel handling complaints. It is the system which they administer for the handling of complaints which gives rise to these problems and is currently under review.

Where a complaint is made, the investigation resulting from it is initially directed to establishing if there is evidence to identify, with a sufficient degree of certainty, the individual(s) who engaged in the misconduct complained about. If that evidence is available, then the individual(s) is advised, and the investigation continues to determine if the misconduct on the part of the individual is established. This involves providing the individual(s) whose identity has been established with a proper opportunity to explain and raise any matter which they think is relevant. This opportunity is necessitated by the rules of natural justice to which all individuals alleged to have engaged in misconduct are entitled to by law.

Some submissions suggest that the complaints system is not worth pursuing as nothing will result. Many have complained that the process takes too long. Individuals who feel that the University has taken inadequate or no action and have seen the activity complained about continue, such as posters appearing in unauthorised areas of the campus, have described themselves as feeling unsafe.

The complaints procedures are presently the subject of a comprehensive review initiated by the University's Office of General Counsel.

Complexity

The University's complaints procedures are complex. They involve multiple entry points, policies, processes, systems and complaints handlers. This is added to by a complex and onerous regulatory framework with multiple laws and regulations which have to be considered and can impact complaints.

Which of the procedures is engaged and who within the University is responsible for the processing of the complaint will vary depending on a variety of factors. These factors include who the complaint is made by and about whom the complaint is made. Complaints made by students about students go to the Student Affairs Unit,[30] complaints made by staff members about students first go to Workplace Relations and are then referred to the Student Affairs Unit if necessary,[31] complaints made by students about staff members first go to the Student Affairs Unit and may then be referred to either the relevant faculty, Provost, administrative unit or Workplace Relations,[32] and complaints about sexual matters including harassment go to the Safer Communities Office.[33] A complaint which raises an academic consideration will be reviewed by a different person or persons than a complaint made about an academic regarding behaviour not associated with academia.[34]

Complaints have been made to the Review that accessing complaint forms and the procedures which explain how to commence the different complaints is not easily done. Forms have been produced for different types of complaints however finding the correct form for a particular type of complaint can be challenging. The University website is not easy to navigate for this purpose. Going through the process of finding the correct form, the correct area of the University to lodge a particular complaint and understanding what is required to make a particular type of complaint from a website which is not user friendly can be confusing and frustrating.

Where a complaints procedure is difficult to access or navigate it may result in under reporting. Under reporting is an issue as trends and problems are not clearly identified at an early time. The identification of trends and problems is necessary to be proactive.

The present review should be continued to achieve a complete overhaul and simplification of every aspect of the complaints procedures. That review should be detailed and is likely to identify more issues than have been raised with the Review. The following suggestions regarding the overhauling of the complaints procedures are drawn from the submissions made to the Review and are included for the assistance of the University's ongoing review.

A single central office (the Complaints Office) should be established. This will create a single place in the University where all complaints are directed to, no matter who is making them, who is being complained about or what the subject matter of the complaint is can be lodged and processed.

[34] University of Sydney (Student Academic Appeals) Rule 2021; Student Complaints Procedures 2015 cl 1(3)(a).

Once established the Complaints Office should be in a position to triage complaints making sure that they are dealt with or relevant aspects of them are considered by the persons with the necessary experience and skills to deal with the particular subject matter of the complaint. The Complaints Office should be responsible for ensuring that complainants are kept informed of the progress of their complaint including the reason for any delay. This approach together with disclosure of any reasons for delay will address the criticism that the process is not transparent.

It is likely that a complete overhaul of the complaints procedures will result in the need for an investment in appropriate technology. Technology is also likely to speed up the handling of complaints. It is beyond the scope of this Review to consider or investigate the types of technology that might best suit the University, and no attempt has been made to do so.

There are complaints received by the University which do not go through the existing complaints procedures because they are sent to senior personnel within the University including the Vice-Chancellor. In addition to creating a burden on the staff assisting those senior persons, there remains the potential that complaints end up being missed or dealt with inconsistently because they have not become part of the complaints procedures. Those complaints received by senior personnel should be referred to or logged with the Complaints Office. This will assist in creating transparency in the process.

Alternative Dispute Resolution

The University's policies that deal with the resolution of complaints, include some alternative dispute resolutions mechanisms. Unfortunately, those mechanisms have not been widely used. As part of the review of the complaints procedures consideration should be given to strengthening the University's alternative dispute resolution mechanisms. Mediation, which is a voluntary process, is an option offered in many dispute and complaint processes. Mediation provides an alternative to the completion of formal processes and can provide a quick alternative to a formal determination of the complaint. It provides the parties to the complaint, who opt to participate in it, an opportunity to air the subject matter of the complaint confidentially and explore a pathway to resolution of the issue the subject of the complaint. Whether mediation is an appropriate option will depend on the subject matter and seriousness of the complaint.

Where mediation is appropriate, it provides the parties to the complaint with an opportunity to reach an agreement which does not involve the imposition of a penalty. Often complaints, particularly those about behaviour, can be resolved through discussion between the parties by such things as an apology, the recognition of an alternate position or the gaining of insight into the other person's motivation for the behaviour, amongst others. The parties to a dispute can often achieve a personally satisfactory result to a dispute through mediation which would otherwise not be available through the complaints procedure.

Reporting on Complaints

There is a perception that the University does not take actions on complaints. This perception has found its way into many areas including the media. There is little or no information available in the public arena to identify how many complaints are received by the University, the subject matter of those complaints, how many of those complaints are dealt with to completion and how many are substantiated. The consequence of this lack of public information is that the public perception, particularly as it is reflected in the media, is a very negative one. Publicly, the number of complaints received is thought to be a significantly higher number than the University's records show to be the fact. The subject matter of the complaints is thought to be more damning than is reflected by the records of those complaints. Issues such as the time taken to process complaints is speculated on. There is a perception that the University is unwilling, unable to, or uninterested in acting on complaints.

This problem of perception could readily be addressed by having a report sent to the Senate on a regular bi-monthly basis (or another suitable interval) and thereafter released to the public. Paying proper regard to privacy considerations the report would identify the nature of the complaints received by grouping similar complaints together so that there is no need to identify the specific circumstances of individual complaints. The report would also need to include how many of the complaints received since the last report had been dealt with and the expected timeframe for the completion of the balance of those complaints. Publishing a report of this kind would immediately provide an accurate basis for those in the community, including the media, to assess the University's progress in the handling of complaints and be more accurately aware of the nature of the subject matter raise in complaints.

There may be other matters which could appropriately be included in such a report. These matters will no doubt become obvious during the review of the complaints procedures. The report would dispel the perception that there is any level of inaction or that the University is not, or not interested in handling complaints made to it.

Where it is public knowledge that complaints are being dealt with and that they are being dealt with in a timely fashion, the system disclosing that information is unlikely to have a significant under reporting problem.

Reporting on Substantiated Complaints

Where complaints are substantiated the person or Organisation found to have breached the University's policies or rules will receive some form of penalty or a suspended penalty. At the present time, however, driven by considerations given to privacy, others are generally not made aware of the penalties the University is imposing for breaches of its policies. Where penalties imposed are not known by the general student and staff population of the University, those penalties do not act as a deterrent to others. That penalties should act as a deterrent to others is a recognised element of our legal system.

To achieve a deterrent effect, the nature of a penalty imposed for a breach of the University's policies must be known publicly. Given that complaints are made about individuals there are relevant and compelling privacy considerations to which attention must be paid.

It is not suggested that the University should publish individual penalties or that the identity of those upon whom the penalty has been imposed be made public. A report could be sent to the Senate, possibly on an annual basis, which identified in a group fashion the nature of complaints that had been substantiated and the range of penalties imposed in respect of each of those groups. The report would have to be made public.

Publishing de-identified statistics on employee misconduct in the form of an annual report is a practice that is becoming more prevalent among corporations. For instance, the KPMG 'Our Impact Plan 2024' discloses the number of conduct reports raised, the number closed out, the type of misconduct (breach of the code of conduct, discrimination or sexual harassment) and the number that were substantiated.[35] The Deloitte 'Making an Impact FY24 Annual Report' discloses the number of concerns raised, the number investigated and closed out, the number substantiated and the number of those dealt with either by counselling, reprimand or firm exit. Examples of this kind of reporting should be considered by the University.[36]

Freedom of Speech and Academic Freedom

Both students and staff have the right to freedom of speech at the University.[37] The essential elements of freedom of speech and academic freedom "mark it as a defining characteristic of universities and like institutions."[38] The scope of freedom of speech and academic freedom in the sector is not settled as there is no common consensus as to the boundaries of each.[39] The maintenance of freedom of speech and academic freedom is fundamental to the University's operations. For the purposes of the Review academic freedom and intellectual freedom are considered to have the same meaning. The terms have been used herein interchangeably. In taking this approach the discussion of the meaning of academic freedom contained in the French Report, page 18 is acknowledged. Freedom of speech is not and has never been without limitations. In exercising the right to freedom of speech it must be done consistently with the law at the time of its exercise. The law prohibits "various forms of excessive conduct including that which is offensive, insulting or obscene, harassing or intimidating."[40] Freedom of speech does not permit the use of hate speech or vilification.

Freedom of speech and academic freedom includes the right to peaceful protest. However, boundaries of this freedom are not well understood and often ignored. The French report provides:

> "It does not carry with it a right to go onto private land in order to express a particular view.
> It does not carry a right to protest against the speech of others by shouting them down or otherwise acting to prevent them from speaking. There are, and always have been, limits.
> It does not permit negative speech directed toward particular classes of persons defined by their attributes, ancestry or religious beliefs, can contravene laws giving effect to humans rights norms."[41]

In March 2021 the Federal government amended the HES Act to require that all higher education providers including the University have a policy that "upholds freedom of speech and academic freedom."[42] This amendment reflected the recommendations contained in the Report of the Independent Review of Freedom of Speech in Australian Higher Education Providers (the French Report). The University's Charter of Freedom of Speech and Academic Freedom (the Charter), which was amended following the publishing of the French Report and before the HES Act was amended, meets this legislative requirement.

[42] HES Act s 19-155. See also objects cl 2-1(a)(iv).

The Charter acknowledges that although the right to freedom of speech and academic freedom is fundamental, it is not without restriction.[43] Both statute and common law place restrictions on both freedom of speech and academic freedom.[44] The Charter acknowledges the right of persons at the University to protest and disagree subject to restrictions imposed by law.[45] In addition to the Charter the University's commitment to freedom of speech and academic freedom is reiterated in many of its polices and statements.[46]

The University of Sydney Enterprise Agreement 2023-2026 (the Agreement 2026) also embodies the University's commitment to the protection and promotion of intellectual freedom[47]. The exercise of intellectual freedom recognises that staff members of the University are at liberty to express unpopular or controversial views, without impact on their employment, provided that in doing so they do not engage in harassment, vilification or intimidation.[48] The exercise of intellectual freedom under the Agreement 2026 must be "in accordance with the highest ethical, professional and legal standards."[49] This is also an acknowledgement in the Agreement 2026 that intellectual freedom must be exercised in accordance with the restrictions imposed by the law.

The limits imposed by the law on freedom of speech have altered with the introduction of new laws and amendment of existing laws. As laws develop to reflect changing societal standards, they have imposed on many aspects of life including the right to freedom of speech. Laws such as the WHS Act, The AD Act and the SD Act and others in the employment field have created duties and obligations which must be met by PCBUs. The meeting of those duties and obligations may, and in some circumstances will, impose limits on the right to freedom of speech.

There does not appear to have been any significant consideration given in either case law or academic writing to the impact the WHS Act might have on freedom of speech or academic freedom. However, as speech can result in risk to health and safety the WHS Act does operate as a law which limits freedom of speech and academic freedom.

Clarity through Context

"One should aim not at being possible to understand, but at being impossible to misunderstand"

Quintillian, 95AD

Freedom of speech and academic freedom have been considered earlier in the report. They are fundamental to all universities. They are part of the foundation of the University and what the University stands for.[50] They are, as earlier discussed, not without their limits; they, and their use, are subject to the law.

The Review has received submissions identifying particular words and phrases, which some argue are legitimate expressions of a political view, whilst others argue those same words and phrases are antisemitic or racist. Determining which of these competing views is correct has proven to be difficult for the University and many others who have attempted it. Those who allege that the words and phrases are antisemitic do so as part of a wider argument that antisemitism is on the rise in the community generally and at the University. One expression of this point of view is:

[50] The Honourable Gareth Evans AC QC FASSA FAIIA, 'Maintaining Universities' Raison D'etre: Meeting the Challenge, Inaugural Chancellor's Oration' to the University Chancellors' Council (UCC) 11th National Conference on University Governance, The Challenge of Change for Australian Universities, 4 October 2018.

> "Antisemitism is a light sleeper which has awoken with a vengeance on the University of Sydney Camperdown campus, often justified under the cover of anti-Zionism and oxygenated under the cover of 'free speech.'"[51]

Whilst this is an eloquent description of the problem of antisemitism experienced on the University campus, it does not reflect the view of all Jewish people or those who support them.

In another submission to the Review the author wrote:

> "I have deep roots in the Australian Jewish community. It is from this position that I write to express my disappointment and frustration at the weaponisation of antisemitism accusations to silence forms of protest and critique that are legitimately directed at the State of Israel and the political ideology of Zionism"[52]

Some Jewish authors pointed out that there are no Jewish communal leaders or organisations who speak for all Jewish people in Australia on the issues the subject of the Review, "no community is a monolith". Clearly the Jewish community is one in which there is a divergence of strongly held views each of which has proper foundation and must be respected. Like many in the Jewish community, others expressed strongly held but divergent views on what it is that constitutes antisemitism and in particular which words and phrases, if used, were antisemitic.

All submissions to the Review appear to support the concept of freedom of speech and the encouragement of open, vigorous and serious debates[53] about any topic including political ones. However, there is deep disagreement over what words and phrases are permitted in such debates and where the boundary between legitimate freedom of speech and impermissible speech lies.

[52] The author sought to remain anonymous.
[53] Debate is not used in any technical sense and should be read to include all forms discussion heated or otherwise.

Shortly after 7 October 2023 the University recognised this problem and set about trying to establish what speech did and what did not constitute antisemitism. To assist, it sought expert advice both from inside and outside the University, which was not illuminating. It looked widely at the experience of other universities around the world and other places of higher learning. Academic papers on the topic of antisemitism and racism generally were considered. The various definitions of antisemitism were reviewed. This process led to the same position facing the Review: there is no universally accepted definition of antisemitism and there is no definitive guidance on precisely where the line between acceptable and unacceptable speech exists.

Resulting from its consideration of these issues, the University published its Anti-Racism Statement which states that the University will not accept any form of "discrimination based on colour, descent, caste, national or ethnic origin, language, sex, sexual orientation, gender, gender identity or expression, sex characteristics, marital or relationship status, age, disability, religion, migration status, refugee or asylum status, socio-economic status, or other status."[54] The supplementary resources to the Anti Racism Statement identify and refer to the most widely accepted definitions of antisemitism and recommend them as guidelines.

The difficulty is in determining how serious debate can be held about difficult topics in which controversial opinions are raised. At present, given the circumstances confronting the University and the world, that difficulty is most prominent in relation to antisemitism, Islamophobia and racism. However, the same difficulty, what is and is not acceptable speech when used in a debate which is held having regard to freedom of speech, will arise in the future in relation to topics other than the war in Gaza. The University's policies and procedures must be developed having regard to that likelihood.

In addressing this issue, concentration has been initially focused on antisemitism. As will be made clear, the result from this consideration is of general application to debates at the University.

[54] Anti-Racism Statement, https://www.sydney.edu.au/about-us/vision-and-values/diversity/cultural-diversity.html>.

Where a word or phrase is obviously antisemitic, then clearly it cannot be used. Doing so would breach the University's policies and statements[55] which would amount to misconduct on the part of a student or staff member who used the word of phrase. It may also amount to a breach of the law. Repeated use of a word or phrase over a period of time may expose those offended or upset by it to psychosocial harm. That could be the case if the same word or phrase is used over time in different settings such as a chant, in an address to a class gathered for a lecture, in a meeting and if used to shout down a person with a different view so that they are not able to be heard.

It is not the words or phrases that are clearly antisemitic which cause the problem. It is words and phrases which can be used as a legitimate expression of view or in a way which is antisemitic. Often it will be claimed by the person using the word or phrase that they have done so in a legitimate context whilst those who have heard what was said are certain that an antisemitic word or phrase has been used. If a person is later trying to determine whether the speaker or the listener is correct, they will need to look to the context in which the word or phrase was used. The context is often difficult to establish, leaving open whether the word or phrase was legitimately used, or it was an antisemitic expression. Trying to establish context after the event can be a challenging, time consuming and often a fruitless exercise.

The legitimate utilisation of word or phrases which could also be considered antisemitic or racist is well explored by Rabbi Jill Jacobs in her paper titled

> 'Criticism of Israel and Antisemitism: How to Tell Where One Ends and the Other Begins.'[56]

In that paper Rabbi Jacobs explores the circumstances involving protests against the war in Gaza in the USA since 7 October 2023, including those on American university campuses. In the paper the Rabbi points out:

[55] Bullying, Harassment and Discrimination Prevention Policy 2015; Anti Racism Statement; Viva Engage Terms of Use 2024 cl 6(5)(b); Student Charter 2020 cls 8(1)(a) and 8(1)(c).
[56] Rabbi Jill Jacobs, 'Criticism of Israel and Antisemitism: How to Tell Where One Ends and the Other Begins', 22 May 2024.

> "As protests against the war have erupted, so has significant confusion – sometimes deliberate and sometimes not – about the boundaries between criticism of Israel and antisemitism" [57]

The Rabbi identifies the division of opinion within the Jewish community:

> "In order to fight antisemitism, it is important to be clear about what it is and what it is not. Too many on the right have levied false charges of antisemitism against virtually any criticism of Israel. This has allowed for crackdowns on legitimate free speech and has allowed some on the left to conclude that no criticism of Israel is antisemitic. But some criticism does, in fact, cross the line into antisemitism." [58]

Rabbi Jacobs has explored "instances in which criticism of Israel does not necessarily cross the line into antisemitism"[59] and those in which it does. One of the examples explored by the Rabbi is the use in protests and other places of the phrase "from the river to the sea, Palestine will be free." The Rabbi opines that some proponents of that phrase:

> "Argue that a free Palestine will also include Jewish citizens in a single democratic state. This belief is not antisemitic, as long as one is sincere about protecting Jews within such a state.
> However, most Jews hear this slogan as a call to expel Jews from Israel. The fact that this slogan appears in Hamas's 2017 charter makes it difficult for Jews to understand the words otherwise. The terms also echoes Syrian leader Hafez el-Assad's 1966 declaration, "We shall only accept war…We have resolved to drench this land with our blood, to oust you, aggressors, and throw you into you the sea for good."

Therefore, it is advisable for anyone who does not want to be viewed as antisemitic to avoid this phrase or use it only when there is an opportunity to clarify their meaning.

As is the case in other situations of potential prejudice, the impact is often more important than the intent. And there are many other ways to declare one's commitment to the freedom of Palestinians without suggesting that Israeli Jews should leave."[60]

As Rabbi Jacobs makes clear in her paper and in the extract set out above, it is the context in which a particular phrase or word is used that will make the statement a legitimate criticism or one which crosses the line into antisemitism. The context is the domain of the user of the phrase. It is important therefore that the context be made clear by the user of the phrase, so that they are not mistaken for being antisemitic when their intention was to convey legitimate criticism.

Although, by referring to the paper by Rabbi Jacobs, an example of a particular phrase that could be antisemitic or used in a legitimate way depending upon context has been explored, the same observations apply to statements that could be used legitimately or otherwise in other areas such as the use of phrases which could be, depending on context, sexist, racist, bullying or Islamophobic.

Academics are familiar with the need to identify and explain context. Academic writing requires clarity of argument. Clarity is not achieved if the reader is left to determine for themselves the meaning to the words and phrases used to advance the argument. To achieve clarity the academic must inform the reader of the context in which particular words and phrases have been used.

Persons who seek to use language presumably do so in circumstances that do not breach laws prohibiting racism, sexism, bullying, hate speech, intimidation or harassment and, for that purpose, would usually make the listener aware of the context in which the speech is being used so no adverse conclusion as to its use could be drawn and there can be no suggestion that a law has been broken.

That the user of speech which has the potential to offend if used in a particular context has the obligation to establish the context in which the speech is being used finds support in the approach taken by the Full Federal Court of Australia in its decision in University of Sydney v National Tertiary Education Industry Union [2024] FCAFC 57.

In that matter the University had dismissed Dr Anderson for misconduct arising out of certain statements made by him and posts he made on social media which were said to be impermissible. Dr Anderson maintained that the statements he made, and his social media posts, were permitted by the clauses in the University of Sydney Enterprise Agreement (2018 -2021) (2018 Agreement)[61] dealing with Intellectual Freedom.

Justices Perram and Lee both found that it was Dr Anderson who was required to prove that his "various comments had complied with the highest ethical, professional and legal standards referred to in clause 317."[62] Put in legal terms, Dr Anderson bore the onus. It was for Dr Anderson to explain how his "conduct could be characterised as being consistent with the highest ethical, professional and legal standards referred to in cl 317."[63]

Any person using a word or phrase that could possibly be interpreted in such a way that it is unlawful or otherwise impermissible should be made responsible for identifying to the audience at the time the word or phrase is used, the context in which it is used. Requiring a speaker to identify the context as suggested here reflects the approach taken by the Full Federal Court in the Dr Anderson proceedings. By identifying context which establishes the legitimacy of their use the words and phrases could not be understood to have an impermissible meaning. They will not be construed as sexist, bullying, harassment or racist. The speaker will have ensured clarity.

Civility

In the exercise of freedom of speech, the University through policy, statements and guidelines requires students and staff members to engage in discourse of all kinds with civility. Engaging with civility underpins the way in which the University seeks its academic staff and students to speak and behave in all situations.

The Student Charter seeks to "protect academic freedom and safeguard the presentation of ideas through the presentation of ideas through robust, informed and respectful debate that is free from discrimination and harassment[64] (emphasis added). Students are expected to:

- Treat others with respect regardless of gender, religion, race, sexuality or disability;[65]
- Avoid engaging in bullying, harassment or discriminatory behaviour, including on social media;[66] and
- Support academic freedom and freedom of speech for themselves and for others.[67](emphasis added)"

The Charter of Freedom of Speech and Academic Freedom states as follows:

- The University of Sydney greatly values courage, civility and respect and promotes a climate where people disagree well.[68]
- The duty to foster the wellbeing of staff and students includes the duty to ensure that no member of staff and no student is subject to threatening or intimidating behaviour by another person or persons on account of anything they have said or proposed to say in exercising their freedom of speech. [69] (emphasis added)

The University of Sydney Statement on Respectful Engagement on Campus, 16 March 2024[70] (Statement) includes the following: "a campus is place of civility and mutual respect, where everyone feels welcome, safe and included."[71] The Statement refers to "respectful protest and cultural safety", as well to "robust, non-violent, informed civil debate." [72] It notes that courage and civility are greatly valued at our University as is the promotion of culture where people disagree well.

The University published in 2024 an education module titled 'Engaging with Civility.' That module refers to the Student Charter and draws attention to clause 8(1)(a) which is set out above. The module contains the following statements:

- "The University is committed ensuring an inclusive, anti-racist institutional culture and has recently issued the Anti-Racism Statement."[73]

- "We all have a responsibility to be inclusive, respectful and considerate in our words and actions to ensure everyone at the University feels connected and is treated with respect, regardless of gender, religion, race, sexuality or disability."[74] (emphasis added)

Consistently with this approach, the requirement for a speaker to identify the context in which the words and phrases being used are to be understood should be seen as a means of ensuring that persons engage with civility.

See Recommendation 9

As discussed below, the New Civility Rule should be enforced in all lectures, seminars, tutorials and meetings which take place within any of the University's buildings.

Staff members and students have a right to use the University's buildings and facilities (facilities) subject to the law and any lawful requirement imposed by the University for doing so. The University's requirements for using its facilities can be found in various policies, procedures and statements.

[74] Ibid.

Lectures, seminars and tutorials are all conducted by members of the University staff who will, resulting from the changes suggested above, be responsible to ensure that the context in which they deliver their material and each aspect of it is clear to their audience.

The University should require that staff and students holding or participating in any form of lecture, seminar, tutorial or meeting in any of its facilities comply with the New Civility Rule. This is intended to be in addition to, and not in substitution of, the University rules which are already in place for the conducting of lectures, seminars, tutorials and meetings.

A failure to comply with the New Civility Rule should be dealt with as a misconduct matter.

There are at the University many meetings conducted in the University buildings by Organisations. One meeting, held by the Student Representative Council on 7 August 2024, has been the subject of a number of different complaints to the Review, most of which have informed consideration already outlined in the report.

An important aspect of the complaints made about the meeting is that a motion which was proposed by a group of Jewish students was shouted down by those assembled. No proper opportunity was given to those moving this motion to address it or for them or others to speak to it. They were not treated with respect or listened to as required by the Student Charter. One of the Jewish students at the meeting, Celina Di Veroli, recorded her experience of the meeting in an article published in The Australian Jewish News on 9 August 2024.[75] In describing the meeting Ms Di Veroli said "What should have a forum for open dialogue instead became a crucible of hostility,…."

[75] Celina Di Veroli, Australian Jewish News, 'Silenced Voices: Rejecting Mob Mentality', 9 August 2024 <https://www.australianjewishnews.com/silenced-voices-rejecting-mob-mentality/>.

Where a person or persons are not allowed an appropriate opportunity to engage by expressing their view even if a majority of those present hold a different view, no matter how strongly, the right to freedom of speech and the University's present rules regarding civility and the obligation to "disagree well" are not met.

It falls to the persons or Organisations conducting the meeting to ensure that the meeting is conducted consistently with the University's policy and the obligation to listen. Where instead of respectful debate a meeting descends into a sea of angry voices or speakers are shut down by other means, only those responsible for the calling of the meeting are able to bring it back to civility.

The University's policies should reflect that it is the convenor of a meeting being held in the University's facilities who must ensure that the meeting is conducted consistent with the University's engaging with civility principles. It should be made clear that this obligation includes the requirement to comply with the New Civility Rule.

Where a student Organisation holds a meeting using University facilities, the Organisation should be accountable if they do not conduct those meetings in compliance with the civility principles. Sanctions should be imposed on the Organisation if it fails to comply with the University's civility principles whist running meetings.

To ensure that Organisations and their office and position holders are aware of and able to ensure that all meetings are held in compliance with the University's civility principles, the University should make it compulsory that every office holder undertake the Engaging with Civility module, noting that it will need to be amended to reflect the adoption of the New Civility Rule. Existing office and position holders within University funded student associations should be given some appropriate time by which they would be able to establish that they had done the Engaging with Civility module.

It should be a requirement in all University funded Organisations that any new office or position holder is only permitted to occupy the office within the Organisation if they have completed the Engaging with Civility module. Where a student Organisation permits any of its office and position holders to act in or discharge the responsibilities of that office or position, the responsibility for breaching the requirement in respect of the completion of the Engaging with Civility module should rest with both the individual and the Organisation. In the case of an individual, a breach of the policy would be misconduct. The Organisation should be made accountable by the imposition of a sanction which could include withdrawal of their funding in whole or in part if they fail to comply with the requirement that all their office and position holders have completed the Engaging with Civility module.

Policies

The University has a complex system of policies, guidelines, rules, procedures, provisions, faculty resolutions and other resolutions. There are 102 policies. Many of these policies overlap. Some deal with small areas of activity that could otherwise be comfortably accommodated somewhere else. Many appear to deal with a limited circumstance which has a small area of impact. There are also a small number of policies that have not been reviewed for many years and have little or no relevance to the University's present-day circumstances and operations.

Identifying which policy or policies is applicable to a particular issue is often a difficult task. Where policies overlap it is not easy to identify how they are intended to work together. The policies are often expressed in general terms which lack sufficient clarity to be certain. They are often lengthy and use words and phrases that have multiple meanings. Policies which use language of this kind make it difficult to identify the University's position on a matter and more difficult to comply with the policy.

Where an organisation has a very large number of policies, it is often the case that the polices are not well understood and, in some cases, not referred to at all. Having various other documents to which regard must be had to understand the University's actual position on a matter compounds this problem. Putting to one side staff members whose function is directly affected by a policy or polices, the submissions made to the Review make it clear that the University's policies are not well understood and rarely consulted. People from outside of the University have difficulty locating them and even more difficulty gaining clarity from them. The existing system of polices and other University position documents does not create transparency.

Recognising this, the University is currently undertaking a robust policy transformation project to ensure its policies are fit for purpose and simplified.

In March 2024, the University implemented a Policy Working Group. To date, the Policy Working Group has introduced two new policies, the Viva Engage Terms of Use 2024, which outlines appropriate use of the Viva Engage online platform used by staff, and the Campus Access Policy 2024, which governs use of, and conduct, on its land. Following the events on campus since 7 October 2023 including the encampment, further policies have been identified as a priority for review. The Policy Working Group is currently reviewing its Flag Guidelines, the Acceptable Use of ICT Resources Policy, University Staff and Students Broadcast Email Policy, Public Comment Policy and Advertising on Campus Policy. The University should continue with this initiative to review all of its policies with the aim of simplification, clarity of language and to ensure that its policies are fit for purpose.

Surveillance

Many complaints arising from activity in the outdoor areas of the campus have been unable to reach a positive conclusion due to a lack of evidence as to who was engaging in the activity complained about. The University's CCTV system has limitations in its coverage of the outdoor areas of the campus. The University is at the present time upgrading its CCTV capacity both in respect of the technology and coverage it will provide. The completion of this project will enhance the capacity to identify those responsible for inappropriate behaviour about which a complaint has been made. The increase in the capacity of the CCTV monitoring system will create a safer environment by enabling quicker and more decisive responses to circumstances as they arise and complaints as they are made.

Security Protocols

The University has had a number of visits by persons who require particular security measures to be implemented when visiting the campus. Politicians and dignitaries, domestic and foreign, as well as others, are increasingly requiring or require security assessments of the places they visit and a particular level of security in place when they do. The University has some capacity to provide security for visitors to the campus which is geared to the provision of such services at a level appropriate for usual activity. Even with well-planned visits the events surrounding them can require an increased security or peace keeping presence on short notice. Often in the case of visiting politicians and dignitaries, this additional level of security will be provided by the state or federal police. Where coordination between the University security service and external security services is required, it is essential that protocols are in place to ensure that the expectations of each party to the protocol are well understood.

The circumstances that have arisen on campus since 7 October 2023 have resulted in the University's PRS dealing with NSW police on many occasions. Whilst these interactions have been handled very professionally by the PRS, they have been ad hoc meetings and discussions which were dealing with a particular issue which had arisen.

There have been circumstances where, as a result of a particular level of protest activity on campus, the provision of security services has not been appropriate. The protest activity directed at the visit to the campus by the Honourable Malcolm Turnbull AC resulted in the interruption by protestors of his visit leading to its early conclusion. I have earlier referred to the visit to the University by academics from the Tel Aviv University. There have been occasions when University security became aware of a need for, and the presence of, police on the campus only after the arrival of those police.

The establishment of protocols through agreements with police which can be acted on in any appropriate circumstance is an important step in proactively maintaining safety on the campus. Agreements of this kind not only operate to ensure the safety of visitors but also provide reassurance for others on the campus that their safety will be maintained.

Footbridges

There are two footbridges which pedestrians use to enter and leave the University's Camperdown campus. The footbridge over City Road is owned by the University, whilst the footbridge over Parramatta Road is owned by Roads and Maritime Services. Individuals and Organisations do, as part of a protest, hang banners over the railing on the footbridge so that the messaging on the banner can be seen from passing cars. Both footbridges would be a means of access and egress for which the University bears a health and safety duty.[76]

The hanging of banners from the footbridges involves risk, and the possibility that the banner might fall onto the roadway below creates a risk to passing traffic. There is a risk arising from working at height whilst the banner is being positioned or removed. Weather conditions such as rain and wind may add further risk. To comply with WHS Act duties and obligations all the risk arising from the hanging of banner must be assessed and eliminated or, if it is not reasonably practicable to do so, minimised. The opportunity to assess the risk is not available to the University before a banner is put up where that is done as part of a protest. However, the risk of the banner becoming detached remains and is a matter for which that University has a work health and safety duty under the WHS Act.

To meet health and safety standards the University should prohibit the hanging of banners in any circumstance from the footbridges. This would eliminate the risk.

The hanging of a banner from either footbridge in breach of this prohibition should be recognised as misconduct. Organisations should be held responsible for compliance with this prohibition in the same way, and with the same consequences for breach, as has been set out in the section of this report dealing with the placing of posters on campus.

Conclusion

As is clear from the commissioning of this Review, the University is looking for ways to deal with problems and issues on campus. Where those issues reflect a serious world problem the task of keeping the campus a place where students and staff feel safe is complex. There are no easy answers.

Despite having policies and procedures which are intended to address these issues the University has still been criticised for not doing enough and for not doing anything. Taking additional steps will help build public trust in the University. Despite the difficulty in doing so, striking a balance between the use of impermissible speech and the proper application of freedom of speech and academic freedom is now imperative.
The University deserves credit for the initiatives it is undertaking. However, it will need to take additional steps so that students, staff, alumni and all other stakeholders are confident that their association with the University is something of which they are proud.

Appendix A

List of Recommendations:

1. The prohibition on encampments as a form of protest on any University campus should be maintained as part of the current review of the Campus Access Policy.

2. The prohibition against any form of protest within a building on the University campus, and the impeding of access to and exit from any building by protest, be maintained following the review of the Campus Access Policy.

3. The University prohibit any student from addressing those present in a lecture, seminar or tutorial prior to the commencement of the lecture, seminar or tutorial on any subject matter. A breach of the prohibition may be considered misconduct.

4. The University should hold Organisations responsible if posters identifying them or an event which they are involved in are put up on campus in breach of the Advertising on Campus Policy.

   That the University develop a range of sanctions including the withholding of funding to an Organisation which can be imposed on an Organisation found to be in breach of University policy.

   Where an Organisation is repeatedly acting in breach of University policy, consideration should be given to precluding its office and position holders (or some of them) from being eligible to hold an office in that or any other Organisation receiving University funding.

5. The University should continue to support its review of its complaints procedures with a view to a complete overhaul and simplifying every aspect of it.

   The review of its complaints procedures should consider establishing a single central office to receive and process all complaints.

6. The University should strengthen existing mechanisms for alternative dispute resolution processes, such as mediation, as part of its review of the complaints procedures. Complainants should be advised, where appropriate, that alternative dispute resolution is an option available to them.

7. The University should publish a regular report to the Senate containing the number of complaints received, the nature of the complaints, the number of complaints resolved since the last report and the timeframe for the resolution of outstanding complaints. The information contained in the report should be presented in such a way that it does not identify the individuals mentioned in the complaints.

8. The University should publish a public report that identifies the range of penalties imposed in matters where a breach of University policy has been substantiated.

9. The University should amend its policies and procedures to make clear that each person utilising a word or phrase is responsible at the time the word or phrase is used to identify to the audience the context in which it is used. (New Civility Rule)

10. A failure to conduct a lecture, seminar, tutorial or a meeting which takes place within any of the University's facilities in accordance with the New Civility Rule should be recognised as misconduct and treated accordingly.

11. The University's policies be amended to make clear that Organisations are responsible for conducting all meetings held by them using University facilities in compliance with the Civility Principles.

    Where an Organisation breaches this requirement, it will be liable to sanction for breach of the University's policy.

12. The University policies should be amended to require Organisations, when conducting a meeting using University facilities, to comply with the University's Civility Principles.

    In order to hold an office or position within an Organisation the persons holding that office or in that position must have completed the Engaging with Civility module.

Where an Organisation permits a person to hold an office or act in a position, and that person has not completed the Engaging with Civility module, both the Organisation and individual should be held accountable.

Where a person holds an office or occupies a position without completing the Engaging with Civility module, the person's breach of the policy would amount to misconduct.

An Organisation should be held responsible for a breach of the policy where it permits a person who has not completed the Engaging with Civility module to hold an office or occupy a position and subject to sanction which could include the withdrawal of their funding in whole or in part.

13. The policy review presently being undertaken and the Policy Working Group should be supported with a view to achieving a review of all of the University's policies and the simplification of them.

14. The University should approach both the NSW Police and the Federal Police with a view to entering into with them formal protocols which set out how they can assist the University if the need arises.

15. That attaching banners to the footbridges be prohibited.

The University's announcement regarding the peaceful end to the encampment:

Update: Monday 24 June 2024

Peaceful end of protest encampment

Today Vice-Chancellor and President, Professor Mark Scott, wrote to students and staff confirming the peaceful end of the protest encampment on campus.

Dear colleagues and students,

I wanted to let you know that the protest encampment on the University's front lawns has packed up and we're looking forward to holding Semester 2 Welcome there in a few weeks.

After weeks of discussions and deep listening to members of our diverse community, we are pleased that the encampment has ended peacefully without violence. We know it has been a very difficult time for many members of our community.

Summary

As part of the agreement to end the encampment, we have upheld the core principles of freedom of speech and academic freedom. Specifically, we will not restrict student exchanges, academic partnerships or institutional relationships with any country or industry as part of this agreement.

As we said on 5 June, we are:

- doubling our expenditure over the next three years to support academics and PhD students under the Scholars-at-Risk Program
- convening a working group to provide feedback on our investment policies with a lens to ensure they reflect our commitment to human rights, including consideration of the position of defence- and security-related industries in our Investment Policy and our Integrated ESG Framework
- as is standard practice for many universities globally, disclosing our defence- and security-related research activities including research contracts and research grants, subject to contractual, legal and privacy obligations

I share our community's distress at the events in the Middle East and the ways in which that conflict is reverberating here in Australia. Our focus from the beginning has been to de-escalate tensions on campus, and our top priority is always the safety of our students, staff and the broader community. We have zero tolerance for any form of racism, threats to safety, hate speech, intimidation, threatening speech, bullying or unlawful harassment, including antisemitic or anti-Muslim language or behaviour.

Since the conflict broke out, the University has been clear that we condemn violence, terrorism and any breach of human rights; and we continue to hold collective hope for an immediate cessation of hostilities.

I'm pleased we've been able to reach a peaceful resolution to the encampment, and I look forward to students enjoying Welcome Fest on the front lawns in a few weeks' time.

Kind regards,
Mark

The Australian Jewish News article with regarding the TAU Academics visit to the University:

Israeli academic recounts ordeal

After an ordeal lasting around 90 minutes, with no apparent intervention from University of Sydney security personnel, the Israeli guests were escorted off the premises.

By Peter Kohn and Shane Desiatnik March 28, 2024, 11:55 am

When pro-Palestinian demonstrators at the University of Sydney invaded a function room where Tel Aviv University (TAU) academics were running an information stall, Professor Milette Shamir, one of the Israeli visitors, was just metres from the rampage.

Shamir, TAU's vice-president for international academic relations and Sharon Ziv-Kafri of TAU's Lowy International School found themselves in the same room as the demonstrators who had burst in and were shouting anti-Israel slogans.

There are reports that with another anti-Israel demonstration on campus, the function room's doors were locked, but a University of Sydney spokesperson was adamant that nobody inside the function room had been forcibly detained.

After an ordeal lasting around 90 minutes, with no apparent intervention from University of Sydney security personnel, the Israeli guests were escorted off the premises.

The Israelis had been invited by University of Sydney to run the information booth as part of a March 19 international fair promoting student exchanges.

Shamir told The AJN she had encountered multiple demonstrations of this type in different parts of the world.

"It wasn't a huge shock or surprise, as I'm familiar with what's going on now on campuses. This one was particularly unpleasant because it was very close to where we were. There was no buffer between us and demonstrators.

"We were for a long time in the same room with the pro-Palestinian protesters. I will say that at no point were we not allowed to leave or unable to leave.

"The choice to stay there was ours – simply because we didn't think it was right, having travelled so far, to put an end to what we set out to do.

“We did not feel that we were physically threatened. We felt very uncomfortable because it was loud and there were accusations [relating to] Tel Aviv University,” she said, recounting slogans shouted by the demonstrators accusing TAU of complicity “with genocide and apartheid – all the slogans that we’re familiar with”.

TAU president Ariel Porat sent a stern letter to University of Sydney vice-chancellor and president Mark Scott on Wednesday, describing the invasion of the information expo as “a violent instance of verbal assault against two women, preventing them from fulfilling the purpose for which they were invited”.

“I request a detailed explanation from you regarding what appears to be an extreme neglect by your university in preventing or at least taking responsibility for this shameful incident,” wrote Porat.

Shamir told The AJN that TAU is waiting to hear from Scott about the university’s account of what happened, and that meanwhile, University of Sydney’s international office has been providing support for the Israeli visitors.

“They were concerned about our safety and wanted to help us,” she said.

The TAU visitors, including Professor Karen Avraham, TAU’s faculty dean of medicine and life sciences, are in Australia to expand partnerships with Australian universities.

Australian Friends of Tel Aviv University president David Solomon said University of Sydney must take steps to ensure such incidents are not repeated. “We’re concerned that the university didn’t take stronger action to protect our people and also other stallholders.”

Good morning

I submitted this late last night, and I just wanted to add in a couple of things I couldn't put into the form.

I submitted the incorrect version and then emailed you the correct one but forgot to add the reference number. I am also attaching a redacted version. The climate at the university is such that anyone who still works there is scared for their own career. I therefore have a redacted version that removes the names of all the witnesses. If you could please ensure not to send the names of the witnesses to the university please that would be really appreciated.

Many thanks

Andy

Hi John

I have spoken with my group and the best time for everyone seems to be Friday at 3pm. Would this suit you to join a zoom meeting?

In terms of other documents, I will forward some emails to you now – and the whole of the policy library at USYD seems to have gone down so I was somewhat limited in what I could get but I am attaching some of documents here

I am also attaching some of the group emails/letters to Mark Scott

I have sent you a large number of documents which I hope are helpful and not too confusing.

Many thanks

Andy

Description: Email sent @ 3.23pm on Wednesday 11 September 2024 to PCBU rep: Kim GRADY

Hi Kim,

Could we aim for a visit by SafeWork to Sydney University on either of the following dates please?

1. Monday 23 September 24
2. Tuesday 24 September 24
3. Wednesday 25 September 24

Time frame 11.00am please.

The complaint and a small number of colleagues representing the group want to be present at the workplace inspection.

I will obtain further details about representation of the affected workgroup by either Health and Safety Representatives or WHS Committee this week.

The workplace inspection will involve enquiries with PCBU representatives, workgroup representatives, complainant and areas of the campus.

Please contact me if you have any questions or concerns.

Hi John

The finding of the senate inquiry was just released. It has some really good points in it including recognition that a senate inquiry will be too slow. There are recommendations for the universities to put steps in place to combat antisemitism immediately. I have not yet read it closely enough but will do in the next day or so and send you my highlights but I am sharing it here in case you want to see it sooner.

Many thanks

Andy

Good afternoon Tamallee,

I have discussed your request with my team Manager Jared O'CONNOR.

The Section 155 notices 7-492083 and 7-492084 will be cancelled and reissued.

Paragraphs b (1) (2) in your submission will be separated into a new S155 notice and refined in context to assist Sydney University to comply.

The compliance period for this S155 notice will be 8 weeks.

Further S155 notices will be issued with a compliance period of 4 weeks in relation to the essentially less onerous requests for information and documents.

You are welcome to contact me to discuss further, if necessary,

Hi Kim,

As discussed at our recent "teams' meeting in relation to S155 notice 7-493627 – Clarification around emails requested.

Could you kindly review the following suggested wording in the reference headings please?

Your suggestions will be considered and formalised into an additional S155 notice.

1. Concerns raised about psychosocial risk to health and safety from alleged anti – sematic activities occurring at Sydney University.

2. Concerns raised relating to psychosocial risk health and safety from encampments, political protests, demonstrations, and individuals demonstrating on site and entering faculty lectures and work areas promoting alleged anti – sematic messages, posters and conduct directed at Jewish workers and students.

3. Concerns raised relating to psychosocial risk health and safety from posters, graffiti, broachers on notice boards and handouts with alleged anti – sematic content and messages.

4. Concerns relating to safe access and egress to SU campus by Jewish workers and students having to walk past encampments, political protests, demonstrations and individuals demonstrating on site alleged anti – sematic messages when attending and leaving work or classes.

Email received @ 3.01pm on Wednesday 4 December 2024 from PCBU rep: Tam

Dear Inspector Whatman

Thank you for your email.

Unfortunately, due to a number of pre-existing commitments as well as the University's upcoming annual shut down period (which commences on 20 December), the University has limited availability for a site visit during the remaining working days in December. However, as an alternative, we can provide our availability for a SafeWork site visit for the new year.

We also consider that it may be of more utility to arrange for a further site visit to occur once the University has complied with the current section 155 notices (No 7- 493581, No 7 - 493627 and No 7- 493639) which are due for compliance in the next three weeks. Scheduling a meeting in the new year will provide SafeWork with the opportunity to review and consider the information and material which will be provided prior to this time. It would also be of assistance if we could discuss with you the purpose and logistics of the meeting ahead of it occurring.

Please let us know if the proposed timing of a meeting in the new year is suitable for you.

Hi Andy,

I am unable to attend the planned follow up meeting at the university next Tuesday 10 December 24.

Attempts to decide arrangements to return the following weeks in December have not been agreed with the university due to its Christmas shutdown.

I have emailed the university to decide arrangements to return in late January or early February 2025.

I hope you can join us at this follow up visit.

Hi John,

Yes that is predictable from the uni – the uni really does grind to a halt from mid Dec to mid Jan. I am back from leave on 7th Jan and happy to attend the meeting if it is during weeks I am in Sydney. I am not available from 29th – 31st Jan but otherwise should be around.

I have some other things to send to you so I will try to do that early next week. Many thanks for all your support and wishing you a peaceful end of year and new year period.

Cheers

Andy

Hi John

Yes I do – I am actually in Sydney for the whole of Feb so please do suggest some date options and I will liaise with the others in my group and see what we can do. If you want to see the campus when it is likely to be buzzing, I would suggest welcome week (19th – 21st Feb) – there will be stalls and megaphones and no doubt student groups protesting about Palestine – but the uni might prefer you not come then……

Cheers

Andy

Hi Andy,

Thankyou for the suggestion.

I will contact the uni and make arrangements to return to the campus during that nominated week.

You are welcome to call me if you have any issues or concerns you wish to discuss.

Hi Kim,

We would like to return to the university on Thursday 20th February 2025.

My colleague ASI Peter Barron is in Sydney during this week the 20th being a preferred date.

Please let me know if this is suitable.

The purpose of the visit is to follow up on what actions the university has taken since our visit on 25 September 2024.

Description:

Email received @ 11.44am on Thursday 30 January 2025 from PCBU rep: Kim GRADY

Dear Inspector Whatman

Thank you for your email.

Unfortunately key individuals from the University who are closely involved in this matter, including myself, are unavailable the week of 20 February 2025. So that they can attend, would it be possible to schedule the visit during either the week commencing 10 February or the week commencing 27 February 2025? We appreciate that you are trying to schedule to accommodate the attendance of ASI Peter Barron so please let me know if there is a time during either of those weeks that may be suitable.

So that we can make any necessary logistical arrangements and identify the appropriate attendees on the University's behalf, it would also be helpful to have an agenda with an indication of the focus areas for discussion, including any updates that you are seeking to obtain so that we can have this information available for you. Please also let me know if there are any areas of campus that you would like to visit so a tour can be arranged if need be.

We understand that yourself and Inspector Barron will be attending on behalf of SafeWork NSW, please let me know if you anticipate that there will be anyone else in attendance so we can ensure there is an appropriate meeting space available.
Thank you

Hi Kim

I will lock in the 27th @ 11.00am and send an invite.

I will be accompanied by Team Manager Ian BLUME and State Inspector Ian FIRTH.

The purpose of the visit is to enquire into actions which may have been taken by the university to manage psychosocial hazards in relation anti – semitic concerns post the initial visit to the university by SafeWork on 25 September 2024.

The visit will involve inspecting areas of the campus visited on 25 September 2024 and meeting with university representatives to make enquiries into what actions may have been taken by the university to manage psychosocial hazards in relation anti – semitic concerns.

The complainant will be informed of this visit and is likely to request to be in attendance.

You are welcome to contact me if you wish to discuss further.

Recommendations:

Refer to IDMP with recommendation to investigate the matter of antisemitism occurring at the University of Sydney Camperdown from 7 October 2023 until September 2024.

Background:

On 7 October 2023 Hamas and several other Palestinian militant groups launched a coordinated armed incursion from the Gaza Strip into the Gaza Envelope of southern Israel. Israel initiated retaliatory military action. The conflict went on for several months significantly affecting Palestine. The conflict resulted in international protests, including in Australia.

Shortly after the October 2023 incursion and subsequent Israeli military operations, increasing antisemitic political activism at the Sydney University was noticeable. In April 2024 activists instigated the establishment of a pro – Palestinian student encampment on the campus quad lawn lasting for approximately 8 weeks.

The antisemitic activism on campus consisted of student activists' groups represented by student groups such as the Students Representative Council (SRC), Left Action and Students Against War (SAW), other groups and individuals openly promoting antisemitism on campus.

The antisemitic conduct consisted of but was not limited to the following examples experience by workers and students at the University.

1. Notice boards located on campus with posters organising a “student intifada” by the SRC and NUS.

2. Posters on notice boards with wording, “Between us and them are mountains of paradise, hatred, blood, wailing and long-lasting revenge”, “stop bombing Lebanon cut ties with genocide”.

3. Student activists holding campus rallies calling for a “student intifada” and “destruction of Zionism and state of Israel”.

4. Student activists holding campus rallies handing out paper flyers stating in Arabic “between us and them are mountains of paradise, hatred, blood, wailing and long-lasting revenge”, organising student meetings to “discuss our response to Israels atrocities” (source SAW group flyer).

5. Flyers handed out by SRC activists on campus promoting in summary, “USYD divest from apartheid Israel, USYD divest from weapons companies, build the Palestine Solidarity Campaign, demanding free speech – scrap the campus access policy, make your count for Palestine, decolonise from Gadigal to Gaza”. SRC stating it had, “started the USYD Gaza solidarity encampment in order to force the university to divest from apartheid Israel” and “founded the Israel apartheid week at USYD”.

6. A graffiti tunnel with graffiti such as, “Free Palestine” Israeli flags with a red circle and line across the middle with words, “zio punks”, “gaza will be free”. Nazi Germany Swastika stickers painted on walls of the tunnel, graffiti stating “Israel has no right to exist”.

7. Student activists entering lecture halls intent of disrupting lessons chanting anti – semitic slogans preventing other students from learning.

8. Student activists harassing and intimidating workers and students who hold different views or decline to involve themselves in campus protest or debates.

9. Student activists preventing free movement of workers and students around campus confronting people they believed had opposing views and ideologies to their own. Jewish workers and students became frightened and intimidated arriving and leaving the campusand walking past the encampment.

10. Jewish lecturers witnessing campus activists in large groups demonstrating carrying Palestinian flags and black flags with Arabic writing outside windows of lecture rooms, facilities, passageways, entries and campus areas shouting and chanting disrupting classes and the daily activities of Jewish workers and students.

11. Student activists at the Palestinian encampment displaying a banner showing a Star of David crossed out with a red 'Jews not allowed' and chanting hate speech considered by Jewish workers and students to be discriminatory, racist and vilification of Jewish people – source incident report 13 May 2024.

12. Incident reports identifying incidents on 24th, 26th and 29th April 2024 along Eastern Ave and at the encampment on the quad lawn. Palestinian activists using a megaphone chanting “there is only one solution, intifada revolution” interpreted by Jewish workers and students as a reference to Nazi Germany Fuhrer Adolf HITLERS “final solution” also chanting “globalise the intifada”, “Zionists are not welcome here” and “USYD cut ties”.

13. During Welcome Week 14 to 16 February 2024, the Australian Union of Jewish Students (AUJS) stand was approached by three female individuals who aggressively ripped the Israeli flag off the stall desk, which had four Jewish student volunteers attending, causing items to fall off the table. They put the flag in the nearby rubbish bin, took a photo of it and then left. Source Sydney university incident report 15 February 2024.

What was the injury, if any? (Include RTW Status)

Psychosocial hazards to Jewish workers and students resulting in Jewish workers leaving their employment, taking leave, sick leave and being maligned through by about 11 months of antisemitism on campus.

What action was taken after the incident/ event / identified matter?

By the PCBU?

- On 27 June 2024 (commencing 28 June 2024) Vice-Chancellor and President, as delegate of the Senate of the University of Sydney, adopts the Campus Access Policy 2024 with the following statement of intent.

- Policy is binding - Except to the extent that a contrary intention is expressed, this policy binds the University, staff, students, affiliates, and visitors.

- Statement of intent - aims to maintain a vibrant environment on university lands, which is welcoming to the University community and the public; and respects academic freedom and freedom of speech, states the University’s requirements for protecting the safety of users, the integrity of buildings, fixtures and grounds and continuity of university operations.

- Specifies activities that require prior University approval are unacceptable at any time and provides for the safe and orderly conduct of demonstrations.

- This policy applies to any user of university lands. This includes staff, affiliates, students, and visitors.

- SafeWork conducted a visit on 25 September 2024 at this visit Jewish workers and students stated in summary there had been a noticeable decline in antisemitic conduct on campus.

- About this time the university reviewed its policy and procedures in relation to this matter and commissioned the Hodgkinson report into antisemitism at the university.

- The university took actions to review the universities policies and procedures in relation to the campus access rule, code of conduct and psychosocial hazards.

- The university took actions to remove the Palestinian encampment on campus.

By SafeWork relating to incident / event / identified matter (only include Notice/s issued relevant to the risk/breach subject to this submission)

- SafeWork conducted an initial visit to the university on 25 September 2024 meeting with the university representatives, complainant and Jewish workers and students.

- The visit involved SafeWork meeting with the university representatives, complainant, Jewish workers and students to make enquiries into the universities policies and procedures relating to psychosocial hazards. The visit also involved SafeWork accompanied by the university representatives, complainant, Jewish workers and students walking throughout inspecting the campus areas.

- SafeWork conducted enquiries in with the university in relation to this matter and issued S 155 notices to obtain information and documents.

- No evidence of reasonable belief was established as the university took actions to review its policy and procedures relating to psychosocial hazards. There were no grounds for issuing improvement notices. By the time SafeWork NSW became involved, the university was able to demonstrate compliance with the Act.

What was the risk?

- For about 11 months the university failed to take reasonable actions to manage, reduce and eliminate active anti – semitic conduct on campus.

- The university's failures placed at risk the psychosocial health and safety of Jewish workers and students.

- Jewish workers and students experienced Antisemitism daily whilst on campus creating a workplace of fear, anxiousness and a fear of retribution towards Jewish workers and students because they were Jewish people.

What was/wasn't in place to control the risk?

- The university always had the authority to eliminate antisemitism on campus with the Campus Access rule 2009, it failed to enforce its own policy.

- In May 2009 the Sydney University Senate approved the University of Sydney Campus Access rule 2009.

- This Rule is made by the Senate of the University of Sydney pursuant to section 37(1) of the University of Sydney Act 1989 for the purposes of the University of Sydney By-law 1999.

- This Rule commences on the day after it is made in accordance with Chapter 2 of the University of Sydney By-law 1999.

- The purpose of this Rule is to confer upon the University certain powers in relation to persons coming onto a campus or other property occupied by the University.

- Unlawful Entry on University Lands - Any person who, without lawful excuse (proof of which lies on the person), enters university lands without the consent of the University, or who remains on those lands after being requested by a university representative to leave those lands will have their licence to access those lands terminated by way of a Termination of License Notice.

- Offensive Conduct While on University Lands - Any person, who remains upon the University lands after being requested by a University representative to leave those lands and while remaining upon those lands conducts himself or herself in such a manner as would be regarded by reasonable persons as being, in all the circumstances, offensive will have their licence to access those lands terminated by way of a Termination of License Notice.

- Offender May be Apprehended - Any person found committing any offence upon the University lands, and who refuses, when required to do so, to give his or her name and place of abode, may be apprehended by a University representative upon or in relation to which the offence was committed, and delivered to the custody of the nearest constable to be taken before a Magistrate or an authorised officer within the meaning of the Criminal Procedure Act 1986 to be dealt with according to law.

- The university updated the Campus Access policy 2024 which does not include antisemitic conduct.

- The university maintains policies and procedures in relation to managing psychosocial hazards which it did not enforce.

- Antisemitic campus rallies, demonstrations, meetings, graffiti, flyers, social media and Palestinian encampment continued unabated until increasingly adverse media scrutiny emerged in about June 2024 and SafeWork commenced inquiries into a request for service on 3 September 2024.

- The university repeatably failed to act in response to incident reports about antisemitism on campus.

- The university did not adequately respond to complaints and concerns from Jewish workers and students about antisemitism.

- The university maintains a campus security service which failed to take reasonable and proportionate actions to manage, reduce and eliminate Antisemitism on campus being experienced by Jewish workers and students daily.

- NSW Police Force raised concerns about the Palestinian encampment requesting to take action to remove the encampment, the university took no action to remove the Palestinian encampment for about 2 months.

- Examples of Antisemitism at the university were being widely reported in the media which failed to compel the university to act.

- After about 11 months the university finally took actions to manage and reduce Antisemitism on campus because of the involvement of SafeWork, political developments, adverse media focus and advocacy from Jewish complainants and groups.

The university failed to moderate anti – semitic conduct on its intrant, email system and remove anti – semitic posts from its sites. What was reasonably practicable for the PCBU/person to have done to eliminate or minimise the risk?

- The university had the authority, policies and procedures in place to eliminate Antisemitism but no action was taken by the university for about 11 months.

- The university manages an extensive range of CCTV across the campus which provides it the capability to acquire CCTV from across the entire campus 24 hours a day 7 days a week. The university could have used the CCTV to identify hazardous behaviour.

- The university manages a security team which gives it the capability to implement and manage a wide range of security and enforcement functions across the campus 24 hours a day 7 days a week. The university security team could have removed flyers and posters and enforce university policies and procedures.

- The university could have taken reasonable actions to so far as is reasonably practicable to balance its work, health and safety responsibilities with the rights of free speech on campus and social media .

- The Commission of Inquiry into Antisemitism at Australian Universities provided its report in October

- Th Commission made a list of (3) recommendations.

- Recommendation 1 2.258 stated, “The committee recommends that in collaboration with the Tertiary Education Quality and Standards Agency (TEQSA) and the Special Envoy to Combat Antisemitism all Australian universities urgently review their complaints process and give effect to any and all changes necessary to ensure these processes are known to and understood by students and staff and deliver real and meaningful outcomes for complainants”.

- Between 7 October 2023 and September 2024, the university received multiple complaints about Antisemitism and failed to take reasonable actions.

- The university should have investigated complaints about the antisemitic behaviours and instigated actions to reduce the psychosocial hazards.

Factor 2. Investigation Priority Area

Priority Area 5 - Repeated contraventions of work health and safety legislation by a duty holder.

Priority Area 9 - Strategic regulator and/or directorate priority areas*

Choose an item.

*For Priority Area 9 - Please select a strategic priority area that this incident/matter aligns with. More than 1 may apply.

Regulatory Priority - Psychological Safety

Factor 3. Guiding Principles

 The seriousness of any potential breach of law – Sydney university took inadequate actions between 7 October 2023 and about September 2024 to eliminate antisemitism at the university.

 Availability of reliable evidence to proceed to investigation – Reliable evidence is in place.

 The severity and scale of potential risk and/or the actual harm outcome – Evidence suggests a high-risk psychosocial hazardous workplace environment existed for about 11 months because of the inactions of the university to eliminate Antisemitism.

 The duty holder’s compliance history- Adequate for the size and risk profile of the PCBU undertakings.

 Foreseeability of the risk – The should so far as is reasonably practicable acted on overwhelming evidence of antisemitism flourishing throughout the university. It placed the importance of free speech above the psychosocial health and safety of its workers and students. The public interest (i.e. whether an investigation would be the expectation of the public at large) – There is extensive and broad public interest in this matter which has been the focus of extensive national and international news coverage. Public interest in antirentism is intense and polarised.

 Emerging and escalating issues – This matter is an emerging and escalating issue identified by the Commonwealth and NSW Government both taking actions to eliminate antisemitism in Australian and NSW. It has been identified as an emerging and escalating issue by the NSW Senate and Parliament in parliamentary actions and enquiries. The university has also identified this matter as an escalating issue, the university senate taken actions to commission an external review into the university.

 The potential to identify the root cause/s, promote better understanding and deter unsafe work practices, including development of guidance material and building case law – There is no doubt an investigation by SafeWork will identify contraventions of law, determine whether actions needed to be taken to prevent reoccurrence, identify lessons to be learnt, assist in identifying and developing prevention programs and legislation and determine what response is appropriate and proportionate to an alleged breach of the law.

MEDIA RELEASE 27 FEBRUARY 2025

STATEMENT ON RACISM

Racism has absolutely no place in Australia's universities, and our sector condemns it in all forms.

Universities Australia's (UA) 39 members all have a role to play in ensuring our campuses are safe, respectful and welcoming places to study, work and visit.

This is not a responsibility our members shy away from.

Sadly, university campuses are not immune to racism in all forms, including antisemitism, Islamophobia and the experience of First Nations people.

Our sector has, is and will continue to work with the Government to respond to these issues as they play out on campuses.

UA's members have agreed to work with the Tertiary Education Quality and Standards Agency (TEQSA) and the Higher Education Standards Panel (HESP) to ensure we have a harmonised approach to dealing with these issues, consistent with our collective efforts to address all forms of discrimination.

In response to the rise of antisemitism in Australia, UA's 39 members have agreed to the recommendation of the Parliamentary Joint Committee on Human Rights to adopt a clear definition of antisemitism that aligns closely with the International Holocaust Remembrance Alliance definition.

UA's members have also unanimously endorsed the following working definition of antisemitism:

"Antisemitism is discrimination, prejudice, harassment, exclusion, vilification, intimidation or violence that impedes Jews' ability to participate as equals in educational, political, religious, cultural, economic or social life. It can manifest in a range of ways including negative, dehumanising, or stereotypical narratives about Jews. Further, it includes hate speech, epithets, caricatures, stereotypes, tropes, Holocaust denial, and antisemitic symbols. Targeting Jews based on their Jewish identities alone is discriminatory and antisemitic.

"Criticism of the policies and practices of the Israeli government or state is not in and of itself antisemitic. However, criticism of Israel can be antisemitic when it is grounded in harmful tropes, stereotypes or assumptions and when it calls for the elimination of the State of Israel or all Jews or when it holds Jewish individuals or communities responsible for Israel's actions. It can be antisemitic to make assumptions about what Jewish individuals think based only on the fact that they are Jewish.

"All peoples, including Jews, have the right to self-determination. For most, but not all Jewish Australians, Zionism is a core part of their Jewish identity. Substituting the word "Zionist" for ''Jew" does not eliminate the possibility of speech being antisemitic."

A uniform definition of antisemitism will help universities in their efforts to combat this scourge.

UA will provide this definition to TEQSA and request that it works with the HESP to best determine the positioning of the definition within the Higher Education Standards Framework, and to ensure it acknowledges universities' responsibility to honouring academic freedom of speech and expression.

There is no place for racism of any form in our universities, or anywhere else.

UA will continue to work closely with our members, the Special Envoy to Combat Antisemitism, the Special Envoy to Combat Islamophobia, parliamentarians and community groups as we continue to respond to these issues.

Our sector also remains committed to tackling the challenges faced by Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander students and staff. We continue to work to include these issues in our policies and standards.

Further context to the working definition of antisemitism UA's members have endorsed:

This definition has been developed for incorporation into relevant complaints schemes and disciplinary processes as soon as practicable and will also be used to educate about antisemitism.

Universities are required under statutory obligations, relevant clauses in Enterprise Agreements, University policies and procedures, Staff and Students Codes of Conduct, and their values, to combat antisemitism and other forms of racism.

All UA member universities support explicit action to combat antisemitism as part of their commitment to combatting racism and exclusion in all its forms.

Our commitment to anti-racism

Supplementary resources

The Anti-Racism Statement supplements ongoing efforts by the University to promote a deeper understanding of racism and its harmful impacts. The Statement has been developed in collaboration with many students and staff, including the National Centre for Cultural Competence and representatives from the Mosaic Staff Network, the Sydney Law School, Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander staff, Diversity and Inclusion, the Student Representative Council, the Sydney University Chinese Students' Association, the Australasian Union of Jewish Students, the Sydney University Muslim Association among many others. The Statement was unanimously endorsed by the Academic Board, a decision affirmed by the University Senate on 28 July.

The Statement speaks to the University's aspiration to stand against racist ideas and practices within the University, but also our obligation to uphold the principle of freedom of speech and academic freedom. As an academic institution, we have a responsibility to be open to diverse views and opinions and to foster a greater understanding of these issues in the community. In addition to the Statement, some supplementary guides, developed by the Working Party drafting the Statement, offer a selection of relevant material and debates around specific forms of racism. These serve as pathways to understanding contemporary manifestations of racism and discrimination for those interested in further detail.

The Australian context:

There are Federal laws to protect people from discrimination and from breaches of their human rights. The Racial Discrimination Act 1975 promotes equality before the law for all people regardless of race, colour, or national or ethnic origin. It is unlawful to discriminate against people on the basis of race, colour, descent or national or ethnic origin. The International Covenant on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination 1965 is the progenitor of Australia's Racial Discrimination Act. The Australian Human Rights Commission offers additional resources on understanding racism in Australia. The University of Sydney is a proud supporter of the Commission's campaign Racism. It Stops With Me.

Although racism is commonly framed by antagonism to people from different cultures, and ethnicities, in colonial contexts such as Australia, Canada, South Africa, New Zealand and the USA, racism has also been fundamental to the experience of First Nations peoples. The legacy of colonisation, dispossession and racist ideas and attitudes that underpinned these processes for Australia's First Nations peoples is still evident in high rates of chronic disease, imprisonment and many other indices of social disadvantage. Addressing contemporary racism in Australia has to involve an understanding of the factors that have shaped and continue to shape the lives of Indigenous Australians.

Racism is also evident in attitudes, practices and policies with respect to people from many other ethnicities and cultures. Racism can be amplified, masked, configured or displaced by intersections with other forms of discrimination such as those based on age, disability, religion, gender and sexuality and other grounds as outlined in the university's anti-racism statement. The Anti-Discrimination Act 1977 (NSW) protects people against these forms of discrimination in certain circumstances. It explicitly prohibits any public act that could incite hatred, serious contempt or severe ridicule towards people of a particular race or on the basis of their religious beliefs, affiliations or activities. The Australian Human Rights Commission offers further information on intersectionality in its 2022 National Ant-Racism Framework Scoping Report, as does the United Nations Network on Racial Discrimination and Protection of Minorities, Guidance Note on Intersectionality, Racial Discrimination and Protection of Minorities. More commonly, racism involves antagonism to people from 'foreign' cultures and ethnicities and some of the most prevalent forms of racism have been characterised as antisemitism, Islamophobia and xenophobia. These are contentious areas in contemporary culture. Below are some guides to some of these current definitions and debates. The University presents these for information and education purposes but does not endorse them.

Antisemitism:

The University Senate has endorsed the inclusion of the Universities Australia agreed working definition on combatting antisemitism in this document alongside the University's anti-racism statement and confirmed it will be used by decision-makers to assess complaints of, and allegations of antisemitism.

Definitions under Other Resources (the section following Context) are included for information and education purposes.

Universities Australia agreed working definition on combatting antisemitism

Antisemitism is discrimination, prejudice, harassment, exclusion, vilification, intimidation or violence that impedes Jews' ability to participate as equals in educational, political, religious, cultural, economic or social life. It can manifest in a range of ways including negative, dehumanising, or stereotypical narratives about Jews. Further, it includes hate speech, epithets, caricatures, stereotypes, tropes, Holocaust denial, and antisemitic symbols. Targeting Jews based on their Jewish identities alone is discriminatory and antisemitic.

Criticism of the policies and practices of the Israeli government or state is not in and of itself antisemitic. However, criticism of Israel can be antisemitic when it is grounded in harmful tropes, stereotypes or assumptions and when it calls for the elimination of the State of Israel or all Jews or when it holds Jewish individuals or communities responsible for Israel's actions. It can be antisemitic to make assumptions about what Jewish individuals think based only on the fact that they are Jewish.

All peoples, including Jews, have the right to self-determination. For most, but not all Jewish Australians, Zionism is a core part of their Jewish identity. Substituting the word "Zionist'' for ''Jew'' does not eliminate the possibility of speech being antisemitic.

Context

This working definition draws from a range of definitions. It draws particularly on the working definition developed by the International Holocaust Remembrance Alliance (IHRA) and recommendations of Antisemitism Taskforces at Columbia University, Stanford University, Harvard University, and New York University.

This definition has been developed for incorporation into relevant complaints schemes and disciplinary processes as soon as practicable and will also be used to educate about antisemitism.

Universities are required under statutory obligations, relevant clauses in Enterprise Agreements, University policies and procedures, Staff and Students Codes of Conduct, and their values, to combat antisemitism and other forms of racism.

All UA member universities support explicit action to combat antisemitism as part of their commitment to combatting racism and exclusion in all its forms.

Other resources

There are several definitions and debates which serve as valuable guides to understanding antisemitism. As with Islamophobia and xenophobia below, antisemitism is a form of racism that amalgamates all members of a community into one group and treats common social, cultural and religious differences as if they are innate.

One of the most widely used definitions of antisemitism is the non-legally binding working definition produced by the International Holocaust Remembrance Alliance (IHRA). The general definition is accompanied by illustrative examples of antisemitism.

The European Commission also offers useful commentary on antisemitism, drawing on the principles of the IHRA definition.

There is, however, debate about the IHRA definition, and the accompanying examples, despite the fact that it has been adopted by many universities in the United Kingdom, the European Commission, the Australian Government and a number of other Australian universities. There are a number of critics, including Jewish scholars and others working in Israeli institutions, who have argued that the IHRA definition and accompanying examples are unduly restrictive of academic freedom, particularly the right to criticise the state of Israel.

Although the IHRA rejects these criticisms as unfounded, arguing that there are adequate protections in the IHRA definition for academic freedom in their definition, in this context of principled debate two qualifying statements, proposed by the UK Home Affairs Select Committee have been adopted by a number of universities in the UK and Australia including the University of Cambridge, the University of Manchester and Monash University. These institutions consider these as useful supplements in relation to the IHRA definition to further safeguard academic freedom. We note however, that the qualifying statements as proposed by the Home Affairs Select Committee were not adopted by the UK Government when it formally adopted the IHRA definition on 16 December 2016. These qualifications are:

- It is not antisemitic to criticise the government of Israel, without additional evidence to suggest antisemitic intent.
- It is not antisemitic to hold the government of Israel to the same standards as other liberal democracies, or to take a particular interest in the Israeli government's policies or actions, without additional evidence to suggest antisemitic intent.

Another useful resource for understanding antisemitism, developed by a number of critics of the IHRA definition and one focused more on protecting the freedom to criticise the state of Israel and the Israeli government, is the Jerusalem Declaration on Antisemitism.

Islamophobia:

In its report 'Sharing the Stories of Australian Muslims', the Australian Human Rights Commission provides a helpful guidance on Islamophobia in an Australian context. Islamophobia has been defined as a form of racism that 'amalgamates all Muslims into one group and treats characteristics associated with Muslims (violence, misogyny, political allegiance/disloyalty, incompatibility with Western values) as if they are innate'. The working definition of Islamophobia by the All-Party Parliamentary Group (APPG) on British Muslims states it 'is rooted in racism and is a type of racism that targets expression of Muslimness or perceived Muslimness'. This APPG working definition, has received widespread support and adoption from the Muslim community in the United Kingdom and overseas since its proposal. In providing that 'Islamophobia' is rooted in racism, the definition does not suggest that Muslims are a race. Instead, it suggests that Muslim communities often encounter anti-Muslim discrimination, vilification and hatred in ways that are akin to the experience of racism.

Anti-Asian:

Anti-Asian racism, is a particular form of xenophobia that has been prevalent in Australia, given the significant numbers of citizens, residents and students from Asian backgrounds in Australia. It refers to historical and ongoing discrimination, negative stereotyping, and injustice experienced by peoples of Asian origin, based on others' assumptions about their ethnicity and nationality. The Asian population is a diverse group that comprises individuals from multiple national origins and languages. Despite this diversity, Asian communities have reported a shared experience of discrimination. Peoples of Asian origin are subjected to specific overt and subtle racist tropes and stereotypes at individual and systemic levels, which lead to their ongoing social, economic, political, and cultural marginalisation, disadvantage, and unequal treatment.

https://onlinelibrary.wiley.com/doi/10.1002/ajs4.176 https://www.mdpi.com/2076-0760/11/5/227

Xenophobia:

There are many other forms of xenophobia, some of which we have seen in Australia in recent decades, especially with respect to people from African and Middle Eastern backgrounds, although it can operate with respect to anyone or any group seen to be foreign. As we know, many of those considered foreigners may be from families that have been in Australia for a number of generations. Xenophobia is characterised by a fear, prejudice, or hatred of people based on the perception that they are outsiders or foreigners within the community which include behaviours that seek to harass, vilify and discriminate. Another common manifestation of xenophobia is criticism of immigrants and immigration policies. Opposition to immigration can have legitimate or non-racist justifications, such as a desire to safeguard national borders during a pandemic or because of concerns that the resource base of a country or region is unable to sustain an increase in population. Anti-immigrant attitudes, however, may be grounded in racist attitudes, which identify immigrants from particular countries, regions or ethnicities as undesirable.

EXECUTIVE SUMMARY

Introduction and Background

The 7 October massacre is the most traumatic event for the Jewish world since the Holocaust. The atrocities of this pogrom lifted a veil on age-old antisemitism, breaking inhibitions and allowing it to resurface in stark and unsettling ways (Smith, 2024). A particularly concerning aspect of this resurgence is the role of universities in the free world, which have become epicentres of antisemitic activism, often granting it moral legitimacy and academic authority.

A core value of universities is academic freedom, including free scholarly and respectful debate. Since 7 October, this core value has been undermined with strident protests, university encampments and cancel culture. Tribalism has continued to be entrenched, with a polarising effect, so that Jewish students and staff, who believe Israel has the right to exist, have felt excluded.

It is important to stress that the anti-Jewish attacks on university campuses overseas and in Australia did not suddenly emerge in a vacuum. They were part of a growing trend which began with the UN World Conference Against Racism, Racial Discrimination, Xenophobia and Related Intolerance held in South Africa in 2001. Subsequently, the Boycott, Divestment and Sanctions (BDS) movement emerged, especially on university campuses. These developments were heightened by the accusations of apartheid and settler-colonialism against Israel, with the theoretical constructs of intersectionality and critical race theory adding to the growth of campus antisemitism.

Survey Aims

To assess the extent and nature of antisemitism on Australian campuses, the Australian Academic Alliance Against Antisemitism (5A) conducted a comprehensive survey which aimed to:

i. assess the extent of antisemitism in Australian universities, as experienced by Jewish students and staff; and
ii. assess the extent to which universities in Australia are taking active measures to ensure that their campuses are free from antisemitism.

Methodology

The 5A study employed a mixed-methods approach for collecting and analysing both qualitative and quantitative survey data. The survey employed a non-probability sample, designed for completion by Jewish students and staff at Australian universities. It was administered online, allowing for anonymous participation with data being collected from 16 April to 31 July 2024. A total of 548 responses met the criteria for inclusion. The distribution of participants across roles consisted of 66% (n = 395) students, 25% (n = 149) staff, 6% (n = 34) administration or management, and 3% (n = 18) other.

Responses were obtained from 30 universities. The largest number of respondents came from Monash University, the University of Sydney, the University of New South Wales, and the University of Melbourne—a total of 313, accurately reflecting the distribution of Jewish students across Australian universities. Data cleaning and data weighting were applied to ensure the validity and reliability of the results.

Qualitative Analysis Results

In response to the first question, which asked "If you encountered antisemitism, please describe the most impactful experience of antisemitism that you have encountered on campus since 7 October 2023", 416 respondents shared experiences. The thematic analysis revealed four categories and their themes:

The campus environment category: posters, symbols, slogans, distribution of flyers; constraints on freedom of movement on campus; hostile behaviour of activists at rallies, encampments, and student union meetings; use of megaphones; being ignored, cancelled, excluded, needing to hide one's identity; verbal attacks; and, in a few cases, physical threats and attacks.

The student experience category: discriminatory behaviour and hostile comments by lecturers, tutors, and fellow students; identifying and singling out Jewish and Israeli students in class; political statements about the conflict in class; disruption of classes by protestors; disruption of learning; and Jewish students feeling they need to hide their identity or drop classes because of the behaviour of staff.

The academics and staff experience category: hostility to Israel; overt antisemitism in classes, interactions with colleagues, and online faculty forums; discriminatory actions including failure to renew contracts; students' attempts to intimidate staff; targeting staff in their offices; doxxing and cancellation; and National Tertiary Education Union and student union resolutions and actions.

The universities' systems failure category: unwillingness to listen to concerns; failure to act on complaints; dismissal of complaints as invalid or over-sensitive; and failure to provide a safe learning and work environment.

Finally, the combined qualitative and quantitative data suggest that most participants equate anti-Zionism with antisemitism.

Quantitative Results Analysis

The physical and virtual environment

Respondents indicated their experiences of witnessing antisemitic expressions on campus since 7 October, with 93% witnessed graffiti, posters or fliers delegitimising the right of Israel to exist; 92% experienced verbally or through social media delegitimising the right of Israel to exist; and, 85% experienced verbally or through social media derogatory comments about Israelis (Israeli people).

These responses were consistent across students and staff, but more pronounced with students, with only the deligitimisation (posters & social media) being statistically significant.

Personal experiences

Personal experiences were considered in relation to hearing and being subjected to antisemitic comments, insults, and harassment, as well as feeling isolated or cancelled, and experiencing physical assault.

Three quarters (74%) of Jewish students heard antisemitic comments, with 67% of the overall sample (students and staff) exposed to this type of harassment; 43% of the sample reported feeling ignored or excluded; and 39% experienced insults or harassment on social media.

These findings reveal that antisemitic behaviour has become normalised across university campuses. Staff were more likely than students to report feeling excluded, while students reported higher rates of most other antisemitic experiences.

Relationship changes

The findings suggest that 7 October triggered a "social earthquake," disrupting relationships both between and within the Jewish campus community.

Almost half of the participants (49%) reported decreased interaction with non-Jewish people; and 77% reported increased interaction with Jewish people, suggesting that Jewish people have been seeking refuge within their own community.

A smaller proportion moved in the opposite direction, with 5% reported decreased mixing with Jewish people; and 11% reported increased mixing with non-Jewish individuals. Qualitative data indicates that political anti-Zionist views may have contributed to a rift within the Jewish community, dividing the majority who identify as Zionists from the minority who do not.

Personal behaviours

Notable behavioural changes were reported post 7 October 2023, with 48% decrease in class attendance; 50% decrease in speaking Hebrew in public; and 56% increase in engagement with social media. Reduced class attendance due to lack of sense of safety may have long-term consequences for academic achievement and career progression.

Bifurcation of behavioural changes was found, with 39% reporting a decrease in wearing Jewish symbols versus 40% reporting an increase; 49% reported a decrease in publicly expressing political beliefs or their connection to Israel, versus 32% reporting an increase.

Sense of safety

The sense of safety on campus was low, with only a third (34%) of Jewish students and staff reported feeling safe. Both the physical and virtual campus environments were perceived as equally unsafe. The rate of sense of unsafety for Jewish people is 3.47 higher than the rate of sense of unsafety found in the 2021 National Student Safety Survey (NSSS), in relation to sexual harassment (Heywood et al., 2022).

Perceptions of universities' policies and procedures

Sixty percent of participants rated their universities' actions against antisemitism between 0 and 3 on a scale from 0 to 10. By contrast, in the NSSS Survey, only 9.9% of students gave similarly low ratings for university action to address sexual harassment (Heywood et al., 2022).

Comparisons of rankings across universities revealed statistically significant differences, suggesting high variability between universities and lack of uniformity.

More than half of respondents (51%) reported having no confidence in the complaints system. This compares to only 23.5% of students in the NSSS survey who expressed a lack of confidence in complaint systems (Heywood et al., 2022). Only 27% of participants felt confident that they could lodge a complaint without risking discrimination. These findings point to a systemic failure of university management.

Cluster Analysis of Key Survey Items

A cluster analysis was applied to identify and differentiate sub-groups within the surveyed population. The participants' responses to campus antisemitism falls into four response types, revealing varying degrees of vulnerability among Jewish people.

Key Findings

- Antisemitism is systemic across university systems
- and has become normalised
- Virtual campuses increasingly merge with physical environments, with the boundaries between them becoming highly blurred, with both being equally hostile.
- Campus environments and imagery are among the most influential factors contributing to harassment and alienation of Jewish people.
- Most participants equate antisemitism with anti-Zionism.
- Jewish people's freedom of speech has been silenced.
- Jewish staff and students lack confidence in the universities' disciplinary systems.
- High variability was found within and between campuses in relation to actions against antisemitism.

Conclusion and Recommendations

Based on the survey's findings, 5A makes the following recommendations:

- Universities must demonstrate the same level of commitment to preventing antisemitism as they have shown in addressing sexual harassment.
- Adopt a definition of antisemitism, as understood by most Jewish people, treating this as non-negotiable.
- Establish a confidential and centralised antisemitism complaint system with trained staff.
- Create educational mandated modules on antisemitism for all stakeholders.
- Ensure the safety of Jewish people not only on physical campuses by preventing campus defacement, but also within virtual spaces.
- Set clear policies and enforcement in terms of protests, use of megaphones and class disruptions.
- Restore and protect freedom of speech for Jewish students and staff, through initiatives such as university-led public debates.
- Undertake further research to systematically evaluate university actions and identify effective practices.

In summary, we recommend that universities act now to stop campus tribalism and restore the foundational values of academic conduct—respectful dialogue, ethical engagement, and shared responsibility toward all members of the university community.

1 INTRODUCTION

The Establishment of the Australian Academic Alliance Against Antisemitism (5A)

The 7 October 2023 massacre stands as the most traumatic event in modern Jewish history since the Holocaust. For Jewish people worldwide, the atrocities of this pogrom lifted a veil on age-old antisemitism, breaking inhibitions and allowing it to resurface in stark and unsettling ways (Smith, 2024). This particularly manifested itself across university campuses in the Western world, which emerged as a key platform fostering this upsurge in antisemitism.

In response to this brutal Hamas attack on 7 October 2023 and the fact that, within a day, Hamas's massacre was being celebrated in academic circles as 'resistance' with almost no support for Jewish students and staff, the Australian Academic Alliance Against Antisemitism (5A) was born. A non-profit organisation, 5A has grown very quickly and today consists of academics and professional staff from across 32 Australian universities. It acts as the main body representing the voice of both Jewish and non-Jewish staff who are concerned with the emergence of antisemitism on their campus in the Australian tertiary sector.

The 5A's functional structure, from individual universities to state and federal representatives, has enabled the executive to be informed quickly of incidents and to take appropriate action. The organisation's reach includes activities in education, academic advice and peer support, responding to anti-Israeli and BDS activity, to the media and misinformation, supporting legal and medical professional educator groups, advocating for Jewish academics and education professionals with sector regulators and University executives as well as tertiary sector membership bodies, and supporting individual students across all levels in responding to their own adverse experiences of antisemitism and bias in the classroom, publishing and professional development.

The Campus Environment Post 7 October

One of the core traditional values of academic institutions is the cultivation of free scholarly debate across ideological divides. This foundational principle is essential for advancing the frontiers of knowledge and fostering high-quality research for the benefit of society. From this value stem a set of academic behavioural norms, including respectful dialogue that upholds the rights and dignity of others, mutual accountability within the academic community, and a shared responsibility to engage ethically with all members of the university.

In the months following 7 October 2023, these core values have eroded across Australian campuses. A culture of tribalism has taken hold, where staff and students from opposing ideological camps have ceased communicating; cancel culture is now widespread; and on some campuses, members of the dominant group have established encampments, forcefully excluding anyone suspected of affiliation with the targeted group ("Zios") and occupied university buildings. At a conference held at Queensland University of Technology, a Zionist-identifying academic was publicly shamed and labelled an "infiltrator"—all under the banner of free speech.

Although the encampments were eventually dismantled, tribalism on Australian campuses continues to deepen, with little meaningful intervention from university leadership. This survey portrays the grim, polarising manifestations of antisemitism on Australian campuses as experienced by Jewish students and staff.

The Foregrounding of Campus Antisemitism Before 7 Oct

It is important to stress that the anti-Jewish attacks on university campuses, which manifested themselves both overseas and in Australia after October 7, did not suddenly emerge in a vacuum. They were part of a growing trend which began with the UN World Conference Against Racism, Racial Discrimination, Xenophobia and Related Intolerance held in South Africa in 2001. Subsequently, the Boycott, Divestment and Sanctions (BDS) movement emerged, especially on university campuses. These developments were heightened by the accusations of apartheid and settler-colonialism against Israel, with the theoretical constructs of intersectionality and critical race theory adding to the growth of campus antisemitism. In addition to right-wing antisemitism, protests by left-wing activists from groups such as Students for Justice in Palestine have increased both overseas and locally (Rutland and Allington, 2023). These negative feelings towards Jews were exacerbated during the period of the COVID Pandemic.

Since 2021, there has been an increase in the anti-Israel narrative on Australian campuses, with anti-Israel resolutions being passed and anti-Israel articles being published in campus newspapers, together with the resultant uptick of antisemitic incidences. The narrative persistently morphs into an antisemitic narrative. This leaves Jewish university students feeling vulnerable and under attack, as clearly demonstrated by the survey initiated by the Zionist Federation of Australia [ZFA] with the support of Australasian Union of Jewish Students [AUJS] and the Scanlon Foundation. The survey, conducted by the Social Research Centre over a three-week period from April to June 2023 among Jewish students put forward the aim to "understand Jewish students' experiences of antisemitism in Australian universities" (Social Research Centre, 2023, p. 3).

The findings revealed that 64% of Jewish university students experienced some form of antisemitism. Of these, 47% described intimidation by people or events; 37% relating to tropes of Jewish money, power or influence; 37% comparing Israel to Nazi Germany; 30% Holocaust denial or minimisation; and 25% being singled out or excluded over Israel. Another key finding is that 19% of students have stayed away from campus to avoid antisemitism. Finally, the survey found that Jewish students have a lack of confidence in the complaints process at various universities with only 14% making a complaint after an incident (Social Research Centre, 2023, p. 1). These findings are very relevant to the present study as they pre-empt the increase in antisemitism reported by the current study.

This background foregrounds the eruption of the anti-Jewish actions and attacks throughout the Western world following the 7 October pogrom. A particularly concerning aspect of this eruption of antisemitism is the role of universities in Western countries, which have become epicentres for antisemitic activism, granting it moral legitimacy and academic authority. This bears a troubling resemblance to the pre-World War II era, when Western academia became awash with the pseudo-theory of eugenics that provided the scientific rationale and moral justification for the persecution and extermination of Jewish people (Smith, 2020; Johnson, 2018).

It has been noted that while pre-Holocaust antisemitism on campuses focused on Judaism as a race, following the establishment of Israel, campus antisemitism has shifted toward denying Jews the right to self-determination in their ancestral homeland – Israel and vilifying Jewish students and staff who support that right (Taylor, 2021; Cohen, 2017).

To assess the extent and nature of antisemitism on Australian campuses, the Australian Academic Alliance Against Antisemitism (5A) conducted a comprehensive survey, collecting data from April to July 2024.

The objectives of the survey were to:

i. assess the extent of antisemitism in Australian universities, as experienced by Jewish students and staff, and
ii. the extent to which universities in Australia are taking active measures to ensure that their campuses are free from antisemitism.

2 LITERATURE REVIEW

The rapidly deteriorating safety of Jewish people on campuses and the sharp rise in antisemitism have garnered significant research attention, resulting in numerous publications. Santos and Yogev (2023) carried out the first known international survey of Jewish students and staff following 7 October 2023. Their sample included 202 Jewish university members from the U.S. (136), Canada (35), and Europe (31). The participants, with an average age of 35.1, completed an online survey between December 15, 2023, and January 7, 2024.

The findings revealed significant Increases after 7 October 2023 in hate speech against Jewish individuals and Israel; graffiti and distribution of pamphlets featuring Nazi or other known antisemitic symbols; doxing on social media; dehumanisation of Jewish individuals and Israelis; demonisation of Israel; public anti-Israel protests on campuses; prevalent anti-Israel activity on social media; and anti-Israel rhetoric in listserv emails, classroom statements by lecturers and students, and remarks by university employees outside the classroom. There were very few physical assaults, but "between 20 and 25% of respondents reported being victims of verbal harassment due to their nationality or religion" (Santos & Yogev, 2023, p. 10).

The findings also revealed notable decreases in engaging on social media (-1.23; $p < .001$); publicly expressing political beliefs (-1.16; $p < .001$), religious beliefs (-.91; $p < .001$), or connections to Israel (-.79; $p < .001$); and wearing a kippah (-.81; $p = .018$) or other Jewish symbols (-.67; $p = .002$) on campus.

Regarding trust in university systems, the findings indicated a consistent lack of confidence in senior leadership (e.g., university presidents) and in the willingness by Diversity, Equity, and Inclusion (DEI) units to address Jewish students' safety concerns (Santos & Yogev, 2023).

In the United States, the House Committee on Education and the Workforce conducted an intensive investigation into campus antisemitism, reviewing 400,000 pages of documents as evidence in their final report. The findings revealed significant failures by university leadership nationwide, some of which attracted global attention during highly publicised hearings featuring the presidents of Harvard University, the University of Pennsylvania, and the Massachusetts Institute of Technology. The report condemned the lack of accountability of university leadership for students committing vandalism on university property and faculty members preventing the enforcement of disciplinary actions against students who violate policies.

At Colombia University, similar to the University of Melbourne in Australia, students who took over university buildings avoided punishment (see https://www.abc.net.au/news/2024-05-22/pro-palestinian-melbourne-university-encampment/103881534). The House Committee Report highlights universities' unreasonable capitulation to encampment leaders' demands and the overall hostile environment for Jewish students. University leaders withheld support from Jewish students. In their public appearances, they projected commitment to combating antisemitism, while their private communications revealed the opposite. One key finding states: "Universities utterly failed to impose meaningful discipline for antisemitic behaviour that violated school rules and the law" (U.S. House of Representatives, 2024, p. 3).

Another comprehensive study of antisemitism across U.S. campuses was conducted by the Brandeis Maurice and Marilyn Cohen Center for Modern Jewish Studies (Wright et al., 2024). The aim of the study was to assess the impact of 7 October 2023 and the Israel-Hamas war on Jewish students and the response of colleges and universities. The report drew upon interviews at 23 U.S. campuses with Jewish students and staff, along with survey data from Jewish undergraduates.

Findings revealed that nearly two-thirds of participants rated antisemitism as the most pressing campus issue since 7 October 2023. The report also noted that this hostility was in the air, often implicit rather than explicitly anti-Jewish, with few physical threats reported. Nevertheless, it led to exclusion and targeting based on Jewish identity. Many Jewish students concealed their identity and avoided discussing Israel. Social relationships were highly impacted, creating divisions between Jewish and non-Jewish students. Jewish students reported ostracism and excluded from student groups. Most students interviewed had negative views of their university's statements and actions in response to the various antisemitic activities on campus (Wright et al., 2024).

These findings echoed in various internal investigations at specific universities, such as the Stanford report and the UCLA. In May 2024, a subcommittee at Stanford University published its report entitled: 'It's in the Air': Antisemitism and anti-Israeli bias at Stanford, and how to address it'. Data was collected through 50 listening sessions with over 300 undergraduates, graduate students, faculty, staff, alumni, and parents. Interviews were also held with senior and mid-level administrative officials at Stanford. The report concluded that > antisemitism exists today on the Stanford campus in ways that are widespread and pernicious. Some of this bias is expressed in overt and occasionally shocking ways, but often it is wrapped in layers of subtlety and implication, one or two steps away from blatant hate speech (Jewish Advisory Committee at Stanford University, Subcommittee on Antisemitism and Anti-Israeli Bias [Jewish Advisory Committee at Stanford University], 2024, p. 4).

The findings included Jewish students having to leave their dorms, facing ostracism and intimidation, and hiding their Jewish identity. Staff members reported that, for the first time in their lives, they felt physically unsafe. Tutors abused their academic positions and used class time for spouting antisemitic propaganda. Respondents highlighted the university's failure to condemn blatant antisemitism, a fear of retaliation among students if they do complain, and lack of trust in management. The report expressed deep concern about the normalisation of antisemitic and anti-Israeli rhetoric and the university's apparent indifference (Jewish Advisory Committee at Stanford University, 2024, p. 7).

Similarly, a shocking report by the Jewish Faculty Resilience Group at UCLA, released in December 2024, described how pro-terror protesters vandalised buildings on campus. These descriptions echoed events seen on the campus of the University of Melbourne (see https://www.freepalestinevic.org/media-watch/baillieu-library-graffitied-with-palestinian-militants-name/ ) and the University of Queensland (see https://www.couriermail.com.au/queensland-education/tertiary/uq-staff-members-office-allegedly-targeted-in-urine-attack-as-tensions-escalate-between-students/news-story/04415a784173da992e80df4c9117ceaa ).

The graffiti and chanting included hate speech such as: "beat that f##king Jew!", "glory to the martyrs", and "down with Israel". (Jewish Faculty Resilience Group, 2024, pp. 3-4). Israelis and Jews were targeted and there was a call to expel Israeli students from the university.

Like other reports, the university turned a blind eye to antisemitic attacks on Jews, and "all attempts to seek support from the administration either went unanswered or were dismissed as politically motivated, trivial, or unimportant" (Jewish Faculty Resilience Group, 2024, p. 4).

The Anti-Defamation League (ADL) provides a daily email report, Campus Crisis Alert, listing and detailing antisemitic incidents on American campuses. It also publishes a Campus

Antisemitism Report Card as a tool for students, parents, alumni, college faculty, guidance counsellors, admissions consultants and other stakeholders. As of 21 February 2025, 85 institutions were graded on a five-point scale: A – Ahead of the pack, B – Better than most, C – Corrections needed, D – Deficient approach, and F – Failing. A large majority (65 out of 85, or 76%) of the institutions were graded C or below. At that date an F grade was awarded to nine institutions: Harvard University, Massachusetts Institute of Technology, Northwestern University, Tufts University, University of California Los Angeles, University of Chicago, University of Massachusetts Amherst, University of Michigan, and the University of North Carolina Chapel Hill. The Report released in March 2025 showed improvement at a number of universities, eight getting A grades, up from two, and 41 obtaining B, up from 18. (Anti-Defamation League, n.d.)

In Australia, comprehensive post-7 October 2023 surveys include "Australian Jews in the Shadow of War: Main Survey Findings" (Bankier-Karp & Graham, 2024) and the Community Security Group (CSG) Victoria's "University Report: A CSG Analysis of Incidents on Campus" (CSG Victoria, 2024).

Bankier-Karp and Graham (2024) surveyed 7,611 Australian Jewish adults between November 10–17, 2023, revealing unprecedented concerns about antisemitism. Among the Jewish students who participated in the survey, 68% experienced hostility toward Israel from other students, and 46% from lecturers. Some respondents reported feeling the need to hide their Jewish identity.

The report emphasised "that most Jewish people in Australia feel a very strong emotional attachment to Israel" (Bankier-Karp & Graham, 2024, p. 8), with 91% of Australian Jewry feel at least somewhat emotionally attached to Israel. Additionally, "87% said they felt 'a special alarm' given that Israel had been put in danger. 37% said they were so alarmed 'it is almost as if my own life was in danger'" (Bankier-Karp & Graham, 2024, p. 8).

The CSG Victoria report documented 85 antisemitic incidents from February 2024 to May 2025 across six universities, a sharp increase from 11 in 2023 and one in 2022. Incident reports were obtained, in descending order of frequency, from Monash Clayton, the University of Melbourne, RMIT, Deakin University Burwood, Swinburne University, Monash Caulfield, and La Trobe Bundoora (CSG Victoria, 2024).

The majority of the incidents involved verbal abuse. Other incidents, in decreasing order of frequency, included the display of symbols/paraphernalia, stickering, threats of assault, graffiti, and photography/videography. Particularly noteworthy is the hostile rhetoric on campus toward Zionism, including discrimination, vilification, and threats of violence against 'Zionists.' The report states that "Jewish students routinely feel unsafe, psychologically attacked, or at best, unwelcome, on university campuses around Victoria" (CSG Victoria, 2024, p. 4).

Consistent with all previous reports, this report indicates that Jewish students have no trust in their universities' administrations or campus security to ensure their safety. Consequently, they refrain from filing complaints or reporting incidents to their universities. Jewish students "expressed dismay at inaction by university administrations and campus security, particularly when it comes to allowing hateful rhetoric at demonstrations" (CSG Victoria, 2024, p. 6).

Several official Australian Government inquiries gathered evidence of the situation in universities. Based on submissions, interviews and public hearings the inquiries repeatedly expressed alarm at the level of antisemitism in Australian universities.

The first Inquiry, commissioned by the Australian Government Department of Education in July 2024, was conducted by the Human Rights Commission. Its Interim Report, released late 2024, lacked detail. However, the initial consultations with Jewish students "reported escalating experiences of antisemitism on campus since October 2023" (Australian Human Rights Commission, 2024, p.33). It referenced a statement by The Zionist Council of New South Wales that "certain staff and students are too frightened to come to campus. We heard about teachers being harassed as they walk to halls to teach, we heard about students being silenced in class because of their Jewish identity" (p. 38).

The Australian Senate responded in July 2024 given the urgency of the issue. In July 2024 the Australian Senate's Legal and Constitutional Affairs Legislation Committee, on the initiative of Liberal Shadow Minister Senator Sarah Henderson, conducted an Inquiry into the need for a Commission of Inquiry into antisemitism at Australian universities. The committee received and published 669 submissions and held two public hearings in Canberra in September 2024 (Legal and Constitutional Affairs Legislation Committee, 2024).

One of the submissions was lodged by the Special Envoy to Combat Antisemitism, Jillian Segal AO, whose staff interviewed more than 65 Jewish students and academics in August-September 2024 to provide data for the submission. The Envoy reported that "Jewish students are traumatised and feel isolated and unsafe" (Segal, 2024, p. 1), noting that "approximately half of those interviewed were visibly teary during their interview" (p. 7). It found that of those interviewed, 80% of students had experienced an antisemitic incident in a lecture or tutorial, and nearly 70% of university staff, including academics, experienced an incident in their workplace. Most students and staff were "intimidated and unwilling to complain to universities because they lack trust … or they fear retribution in some form" (p. 9). Not a single person interviewed felt satisfied with the reporting process

> Antisemitic behaviour is not only present on many campuses but is an embedded part of the culture. Universities have not taken appropriate action to denounce and suppress it: it has become systemic … This normalised antisemitism is incredibly dangerous to our society as it is an attitude and behaviour that eats away at the fabric of the mission of the tertiary sector (Segal, 2024, p. 1).

The Committee's majority, comprising Labor Senators and other parties, did not support the need for a commission. However, it did support further Parliamentary investigation, referring the issue of antisemitism to the Parliamentary Joint Committee on Human Rights which was asked to examine "the prevalence, nature and experiences of antisemitic activity at universities" (Parliamentary Joint Committee on Human Rights, 2025, p. vii) and the effectiveness of the response within universities "to ensure the safety and wellbeing of students, staff and academics" (p. vii). After four hearings and 49 submissions, in addition to review of the evidence gathered by the earlier Senate Committee, this second Committee reported in February 2025 that "the current situation of Jewish students and staff feeling unsafe is unacceptable" (p. ix).

> There is a cultural shift which is needed, and for that to occur university responses to antisemitism must be informed by an understanding of the experiences of Jewish students and staff, and those Jewish students and staff must feel that their concerns are heard and valued (p. ix).

The Committee's Report highlighted "the importance of listening to the lived experiences of Jewish students and staff" (p. ix). It recommended that the Government consider amending the Tertiary Education Quality and Standards Agency Act 2011 to provide the Agency with enhanced powers "to enforce compliance with the higher education threshold standards relating to student wellbeing and safety" (p. xii). If it became evident that the university responses were insufficient, then the next step should be consideration of the establishment of a Judicial Inquiry.

Coalition members of the Committee, who as before supported the immediate establishment of a Judicial Inquiry, criticised the evidence that had been presented by university leaders, echoing comments in the American Congress: "Despite the best efforts of members to get to the truth and secure answers to our questions, our hearings were a masterclass in obfuscation from university leaders" (pp. 80-81). In the view of the Coalition members, there was overwhelming evidence of "an alarming and abhorrent rise in antisemitism amongst students and staff … On the balance of evidence presented to the committee inquiry … Australian universities have become incubators of antisemitic thought" (p. 80). Coalition members were particularly alarmed by the examples of university academics who "espoused antisemitic tropes" (p. 80) and the failure of universities to deal with such conduct, which exacerbated the rise in antisemitism.

Emerging from the rapid upsurge of antisemitism, particularly after 7 October 2023, the Australian Academic Alliance Against Antisemitism conducted a survey to gain deeper insights into the experiences of antisemitism among students and staff as they navigate their academic and professional responsibilities on campus, alongside colleagues, friends, and university management. The survey methodology is discussed in the following section.

3.1. Research Design

The study employed a mixed-methods approach using the Convergent Parallel design. In this method, qualitative and quantitative data were collected simultaneously, but each was analysed separately. The findings from both approaches were then merged to provide a comprehensive understanding (Creswell, 2018). Both data types were gathered through an online survey.

3.2. Population and Sampling

The survey was designed for completion by Jewish students and staff at Australian universities. It survey employed a nonprobability sample, the only financially feasible method for surveying the target population due to the low incidence of the Jewish population in Australia and at Australian universities, and the nonexistence of a list of Jewish students and academics from which a probability sample could be drawn. Records held by universities and Jewish organisations could not be accessed for research sampling due to privacy laws.

3.3. Data Collection

The survey was administered online via Qualtrics, allowing for anonymous participation. Convenience sampling method was applied through snowballing recruitment technique. The survey was promoted by 5A to its academic and administrative members, and by the Australian Union of Jewish Students, the Zionist Federation of Australia, the Jewish Community Council of Victoria, and the New South Wales Jewish Board of Deputies. Promotion was by email, social media posts, organisational newsletters, and word of mouth.

The survey was available for completion online and was open from 16 April to 31 July 2024. The majority of responses, 78%, were obtained in April and May, with only 3% in June. A final promotion in early July advised that the survey was to close shortly, resulting in 19% of the responses being submitted in that month.

3.4. Data Analysis

The data were analysed using SPSS software. The data analysis includes data cleaning for obtaining the achieved sample, data weighting, and employing both quantitative and qualitative methods for analysis.

3.4.1. Data Cleaning and Achieved Sample

Four measures were taken to mitigate risk of fraudulent survey completion by individuals' hostile to the survey objectives.

First, following the demographic questions, the first substantive survey question was open-ended, to assist in identification of fraudulent responses by the tenor of written comments.

> Discussing the difficulty and expense of probability samples of the Jewish population, the Canadian researcher Professor Robert Brym commented: 'Drawing a probability sample of a so-called rare population, such as Canadian Jews, who comprise only about 1 percent of Canada's population, is extremely expensive. For instance, if one wanted to create a random sample of five hundred Canadian Jews for a landline/cell phone survey, and 5 percent of calls resulted in a person agreeing to be interviewed, it would be necessary to make one million calls to find five hundred Jewish respondents. (One hundred calls would be required to find five respondents, two thousand calls to find one Jewish respondent, and one million calls to find five hundred Jewish respondents.) At, say, $1 per call, that's a million dollars'. 'Jews and Israel 2024 survey: ten further insights', Canadian Jewish Studies, Vol 39, Fall 2024, Jews and Israel 2024 Survey: Ten Further Insights | Canadian Jewish Studies / Études juives canadiennes.

However, fewer than ten such responses were detected, so this did not provide a significant check.

Second, time taken to complete the survey was analysed. Although the survey was accessed nearly 1,000 times, many accessors were apparently curious about the questionnaire with no intention of completing it. Some access may have been by bots, as evidenced by 276 sessions which lasted less than two minutes with few or no questions answered. Additionally, 33 accesses lasted between two and three minutes. As the time to complete the survey was close to ten minutes, we excluded all surveys accessed for less than three minutes.

Third, respondents who did not reach the key question near the end of the survey (Q12_1) about sense of safety on campus were excluded. Nearly all respondents excluded by this criterion had accessed the survey for less than three minutes.

Fourth, the IP addresses of the devices used to complete the survey were checked to identify repeat entries. It was found the same IP address was used more than twice on 33 occasions. Most of these entries provided no or incomplete data. In the few cases where some data was provided, the respondent was excluded from the analysis.

In summary, the dataset was filtered to provide completeness and quality by including only respondents who spent at least three minutes completing the survey and who answered the key question (Q12_1) on sense of safety. Surveys accessed more than twice from the same IP address were also excluded.

A total of 548 responses met our criteria for inclusion. The distribution of participants across roles consisted of 66% (n=395) students; 25% (n=149) staff; 6% (n=34) administration or management; and 3% (n=18) other, totalling 596. The difference between the sample size and the total role counts is derived from 48 participants reporting more than one role. Table 3.1 present the distribution of participants by role.

Table 3.1. Distribution of participants by their university roles

| Roles | Number of responses | Total per group |
|---|---|---|
| Student | | |
| Diploma student | 20 | |
| Bachelor's degree student | 294 | |
| Master's degree student | 47 | |
| Higher degree by research student | 34 | |
| Sub-total students | | 395 |
| Staff | | |
| Academic - ongoing or contract | 79 | |
| Academic - sessional | 38 | |
| Research fellow | 15 | |
| Adjunct | 7 | |
| Research assistant/ instructor | 10 | |
| Sub-total academic | | 149 |
| Management and administration | | |
| Management | 8 | |
| Administration and services | 26 | |
| Sub-total management | | 34 |
| Other | 18 | 18 |

Note: Survey question: “Select the roles that describe your association with your university?”

Responses were obtained from 30 universities. The largest number of respondents came from Monash University, the University of Sydney, the University of New South Wales, and the University of Melbourne, a total of 313. These four universities accounted for 57% of the sample, which accurately reflects the distribution of Jewish students according to the Australian Union of Jewish Students membership, where 57% are enrolled at these four Go8 universities. Appendix A presents the distribution of participants by university.

3.4.2. Data Weighting

To align the survey data with the target Jewish population, reducing the risk of demographic over- or under-representation, data were weighted to benchmarks for survey respondents derived from the 2021 Census of Population and Housing. Benchmarks for age (18–24, 25–34, 35–44, 45–54, 55–64, 65+), gender (male, female), and state of residence (identified in the survey by university affiliation) were obtained from Australian Bureau of Statistics Census TableBuilder (Australian Bureau of Statistics, 2021). Population totals for the benchmark characteristics are presented in Appendix B. Weights were calculated for each respondent using generalised regression calibration (Deville et al., 1993). This applies an algorithm that assigns a weight to each person such that the weights simultaneously sum to the population values for each benchmark characteristic. The implementation of the algorithm was that by Lumley (2024)

3.4.3. Analysis

Quantitative analysis included descriptive statistics to derive frequencies, percentages, and summarise experiences; cross-tabulation to examine associations between demographic variables and reported experiences—such as differences in responses to specific questions between students and staff; and inferential statistics, including mean comparisons and cluster analysis. The qualitative data was analysed thematically through coding to produce themes and categories, which form natural units of meanings (Cohen et al., 2011).

3.5. Questionnaire Design

The survey was short, intended to be completed in less than fifteen minutes: it comprised five demographic, eight fixed-choice (seven with multiple parts), and three open-ended questions. Respondents were able to skip questions if they chose to do so.

The open-ended questions asked about “the most impactful experience of antisemitism encountered on campus since October 7” and the “actions university management should take to combat antisemitism on campus”. The final question provided respondents with the opportunity to share any other “thoughts and feelings concerning antisemitism at Australian universities not covered in the survey”.

The fixed-choice questions focused on campus experiences and their personal impact.

The extent to which respondents had encountered Nazi imagery, messages delegitimizing Israel's right to exist, glorifying Hamas and the October 7 massacre, and justification of the killing or harming of Jews.

i. Experience of being ignored or excluded, receiving insults or harassment both online and in person, and physical assaults.
ii. Extent of concern about antisemitism from people on the political left and political right.
iii. The impact of campus experiences on relationships with both Jewish and non-Jewish friends, colleagues, and others.
iv. Behavioural change in various contexts, including attending classes, engaging in social media, expressing political beliefs, and identifying as Jewish.
v. Sense of safety on both the physical and virtual (including social media) campus.

The survey also sought feedback on the response of the university administration, including whether participants believed their university was taking sufficient action against antisemitism and ensuring a safe and inclusive environment for Jews.

Specific questions asked whether a definition of inappropriate political content in lectures and course materials was provided, the adequacy of complaints procedures, and confidence in lodging complaints without fear of discrimination and retribution.

Pilot testing was conducted in March 2024, where approximately 12 participants were asked to complete the survey and provide written feedback. The feedback was used to refine the questions prior to dissemination.

3.5.1. Definitions

The survey did not define antisemitism, leaving respondents to interpret the term themselves in response to open-ended questions. This enabled respondents to describe their campus experiences in their own words, avoiding the limitation of a single, potentially contested definition. The open approach allowed for a wide range of experiences to be captured, resulting in a notable feature of the survey, the detailed written comments.

The term campus was defined as: "University campuses are both physical spaces (e.g. lecture rooms) and virtual spaces (e.g. social media). For the purposes of this survey, any space in which you interact in relation to your university affiliation is defined as Campus".

3.6. Validity and Reliability

Multiple measures were employed to ensure the validity and reliability of the survey. Content validity was achieved through expert judgement of the survey questions (Polit & Beck, 2006). Clear and concise wording were obtained through broad expert consultation and reviewing multiple publishes questionnaires on antisemitism. Additionally, the survey was pilot-tested prior to dissemination (Presser et al., 2004).

We do not claim the survey is a representative sample of Jewish students and staff across the university sector, given that the survey was based on a sample of volunteer or self-selected respondents. It is reasonable to assume the most distressed and affected staff and students would make the effort to report their experiences and therefore the survey might overstate the magnitude of antisemitism. But offsetting this is the reasonable assumption that some students and staff may not have participated because they were busy or distracted, had not heard of the survey, or were pessimistic, given their negative experiences, that the survey would achieve a useful practical purpose. It is acknowledged that experiences varied at different campuses, as evidenced in communal sources, media reports, and in the data we collected.

Despite these caveats, our confidence in the reliability and validity of our findings is supported by the similar pattern in student and staff responses and the consistency of findings in reports which dealt with antisemitism in Australian universities, as discussed in the Literature Review above.

Finally, the convergence between participants' open-ended responses and the quantitative findings provides evidence of convergent validity, strengthening the credibility of the results. The detailed descriptions provided by the 548 respondents in response to the open questions, is in itself, a substantial record of the often-hostile university environment in the period April-July 2024.

3.7. Ethical Considerations

Ethical approval was obtained from Victoria University Human Research Ethics Committee. All the participants were above 18 years of age, and participation was voluntary and anonymous. Informed consent was obtained at the beginning of the survey.

The next chapter first presents the findings from the qualitative analysis, followed by the findings from the quantitative analysis.

4.1 Impactful Experience of Antisemitism Statements

In response to the first question, which asked "if you encountered antisemitism, please describe the most impactful experience of antisemitism that you have encountered on campus since 7 October 2023", 416 respondents shared experiences. Written comments totalled 21,000 words, when typically, in a survey with this number of respondents 5000-6000 words would have been expected. 70 respondents (13%) indicated that they encountered little or no antisemitism on campus, and 64 (12%) skipped the question – a combined 25%. A very few respondents, less than 10, who identified in their responses as Jewish anti-Zionists or non-Zionist, indicated that they were concerned with verbal attacks from Jews, not pro-Palestinians.

The thematic analysis revealed four categories and 14 themes.

4.1.1 The Campus Environment category includes:

Posters, symbols, slogans, distribution of flyers; constraints on free movement on the campus; hostile behaviour of activists at rallies, encampments, and student union meetings; use of megaphones; being ignored, cancelled, excluded, needing to hide their identity; verbal attacks; in a few cases physical threats and attacks.

- Exemplary excerpts from the Campus Environment category include:
- Constant barrage of anti-Israel posters - everywhere - on doors, windows, posts and even chalk on the footpaths
- The vile chants shouted at the recent protest were quite unnerving
- Chalk saying 'Zionists not welcome'
- For the first time in my life, I was afraid to be Jewish, afraid to reveal my identity.
- I have specifically chosen a distance education course in order for me to avoid attending the campus

4.1.2 The Student Experience category includes:

Discriminatory behaviour and hostile statements by lecturers, tutors, and fellow students; identifying, singling out Jewish and Israeli students in class; political statements about the conflict in class; the disruption of classes by protestors, disruption of learning; Jewish students feeling that they need to hide their identity, to drop classes because of the behaviour of staff.

Exemplary excerpts in the Student Experience category include:

- People actively ignore me when we used to all be really friendly.
- I have regularly been called 'Jew boy' or 'Jew' and singled out by passers-by
- I was spat on for wearing my Star of David necklace
- Students singing Nazi songs in my presence, knowing I am Jewish
- I've been singled out and made to feel alienated and afraid and having to hide or defend my Jewishness by my tutor and unit coordinator
- My tutor walked into class wearing a keffiyeh and, unprompted by any student, began to explain his reasons for wearing a 'symbol of resistance against a genocidal regime'

4.1.3 The Academics and Staff Experience category includes:

Hostility to Israel, overt antisemitism in teaching environment, in interaction with colleagues, online faculty forums; discriminatory actions, including failure to renew contracts; attempts by students to intimidate staff; targeting staff in their offices, doxxing, cancelling; National Tertiary Education Union and student union resolutions and actions.

Exemplary excerpts in the Academics and Staff Experience category include:

- I was assaulted by a student
- Numerous colleagues could no longer look at me, and stopped speaking to me
- Academics in the school organised a hate fest discussion on the conflict
- The cancelling of the visiting Israeli academic

4.1.4 The Universities' Systems Failure category includes:

Unwillingness to listen to concerns, failure to act on complaints; dismissing complaints as not valid or over-sensitive; failure to provide safe learning and work environment.

Exemplary excerpts in the Universities' Systems Failure category include:

- I had students in my class perform a Nazi salute to me on three occasions. I reported this, they did not take my complaint seriously... Since complaining my contract has not been renewed.
- Staff and students denying the state of Israel has a right to exist. The management is unwilling to address any of this on campus
- University administrations denied my complaint against protesters using the chant 'intifada' on the basis that the word is context related and that the university was not responsible for my feelings.

Table 4.1 presents the categories, their themes and frequencies of excerpts. Figure 4.1. presents a visual representation of these findings. Appendix C presents exemplary excerpts organised by categories and themes.

Table 4.1. Personal experiences of antisemitism by categories, themes frequencies and percentages

| Categories | Themes | No. of Statements | % |
|---|---|---|---|
| The campus environment | Physical and virtual campus environments: hostile, excluding and unsafe for Jews | 139 | 32.9 |
| | Constraint movement on campus; interruptions to campus core businesses | 17 | 4.0 |
| | Needing to hide Jewish identity; avoiding campus | 21 | 5.0 |
| | Hostility toward Jews across unions | 13 | 3.1 |
| The student experience | Ignored, cancelled, expelled | 15 | 3.6 |
| | Verbal and physical attacks on Jewish students by other students | 59 | 14.0 |
| | Singling out Jewish students | 5 | 1.2 |
| | Propaganda/antisemitism/discrimination by lecturers | 30 | 7.1 |
| | Antisemitism and hostility within learning settings; disruptions to learning | 33 | 7.8 |
| The academic and staff experience | Jewish academics and staff personally attacked, targeted; feeling unsafe | 31 | 7.3 |
| | Antisemitism among academics and staff | 30 | 7.1 |
| | BDS cancelling Jewish/Israeli academics | 6 | 1.4 |
| Universities' systems failure | Discrimination against Jews by professional staff and management | 6 | 1.4 |
| | Systems' failure to deal with complaints and protect Jewish students and staff; | 17 | 4.0 |

The Campus Environment appears as the most impactful experience of antisemitism encountered by the participants, close to half of all excerpts (45%).

The theme Hostile and Excluding Physical and Virtual Campus Environments, makes up 33% of excerpts. Within its category, this theme is the largest, representing 73% of the excerpts in The Campus Environment category.

The findings also show that the Students' Experience category is the second largest, comprising 33.6% of excerpts. Within this category, the theme Attacks on Jewish Students by Other Students is the most frequently reported impactful antisemitic experience (14%). Collectively, the five themes in this category portray a grim picture of Jewish students being ostracised, dehumanised, and effectively driven off campus and excluded from campus social life.

As our quantitative data also shows, this highly hostile environment leads many Jewish students and staff to significantly reduce their social interactions with non-Jewish peers and avoid the physical campus whenever possible.

The category The Academic and Staff Experience (8.5%) includes excerpts provided by staff. The smaller percentage of excerpts reflects the lower representation of staff in the sample. These excerpts portray a similarly grim antisemitic campus experience to that of students, with many staff reporting they work from home to avoid being on campus.

The category Universities' System Failure data suggests that these systems either discriminate against Jewish people at worst, or at best do nothing to protect them. These qualitative findings are confirmed by our quantitative findings. However, it is important to note that while the majority of responses suggest system failure, the data shows that the universities are not uniform in their responses. This finding will be elaborated further when discussing the quantitative data.

4.2 Critical Implications of the Thematic Frequency Distribution

The thematic analysis allows the drawing of critical implications. First, the finding that the hostile campus environment is the most impactful experience of antisemitism suggests that restoring a sense of safety and inclusivity on campus could be achieved if universities simply enforced their existing rules and codes of conduct. Preventing the defacing of public spaces and the posting of imagery in unauthorised areas would make a significant difference. By enforcing policies that prohibit unauthorised posters, stickers, and flyers, as well as megaphone use during class hours and other physical disruptions to campus life, universities could bring about a considerable improvement in the campus experience for Jewish students and staff.

Equally important is that the majority of participants describe anti-Zionist and anti-Israel posters and imagery as forms of antisemitic harassment. Quantitative data reaffirms the qualitative data, suggesting that the majority of participants equate anti-Zionism with antisemitism.

The exemplary excerpts in Appendix C provide a powerful testimony of the experience of being a Jewish person on Australian campuses post 7 October 2023. These findings are further supported by the quantitative analysis that follows.

5 QUANTITATIVE ANALYSIS RESULTS

Fixed-choice questions were developed to provide insight into the frequency and characteristics of antisemitism on campus. These included questions related to witnessing antisemitic expressions, personally experiencing antisemitism, changes in relationships and behaviour, sense of safety, level of concern from the political left and right, the university's response to antisemitism, and its overall performance. In addition to the findings for the full sample, data is reported for students and staff, to explore divergence and commonality in experiences.

5.1 The Physical and Virtual Environment

Respondents reported on their experiences of witnessing antisemitic manifestations on campus since 7 October. They were asked to "indicate whether you have personally witnessed any of the following antisemitic expressions on your campus since 7 October 2023", on a scale ranging from 'never' and 'rarely' to 'occasionally', 'frequently' and 'all of the time'.

The comparison between the percentage of responses "never witnessed" to the combined percentage of responses "rarely" through to "all the time" (responses 2-5), reveals that the highest percentage of reported witnessing of antisemitic expressions—over 90%—related to opposition to the continued existence of the State of Israel, evidenced in graffiti, posters, flyers, or verbal and social media comments. Derogatory comments about Israelis were witnessed by 85% of respondents, and justification of killing or harming Jews by 76%. Glorification of Hamas or the 7 October 2023 massacre was witnessed by 72%, while Nazi imagery was reported being witnessed by 54% of respondents.

These findings are consistent across both students and staff, although they are more pronounced among students, as elaborated below. Table 5.1 and Figure 5.1 show the distribution of response percentages. Figure 5.2 compares the percentage of responses indicating "never witnessed" with those indicating "having witnessed" (the combined responses 2–5, ranging from "rarely" to "all the time").

Table 5.1. Percentage distribution of reported experiences of antisemitic expressions on campus, by expression type and frequency of witnessing

| Question | 1 Never | 2 Rarely | 3 Occasionally | 4 Frequently | 5 All the time |
|---|---|---|---|---|---|
| 1. Graffiti, posters or fliers with Nazi imagery | 45% | 18% | 21% | 10% | 5% |
| 2. Graffiti, posters or fliers delegitimising the right of Israel to exist | 8% | 7% | 15% | 26% | 45% |
| 3. Graffiti, posters or fliers glorifying Hamas or the 7 October 2023 massacre | 29% | 14% | 24% | 18% | 16% |
| 4. Verbally or through social media: delegitimising the right of Israel to exist | 8% | 6% | 15% | 21% | 50% |
| 5. Verbally or through social media: Making derogatory comments about ISRAELIS (Israeli people) | 16% | 13% | 16% | 21% | 35% |
| 6. Verbally or through social media: Calling for, or justifying the killing or harming of Jews | 25% | 16% | 20% | 21% | 19% |

5.1.1 Comparing students and staff

The responses of students were compared to staff in relation to witnessing imagery and verbal expressions of antisemitism. The analysis revealed that students consistently reported higher rates of witnessing antisemitic incidents compared to staff across all categories. However, statistically significant differences between students and staff were found in only two areas: "Graffiti, posters or fliers delegitimising the right of Israel to exist" ($X^2 = 18.19$, $p < 0.001$); and "Verbally or through social media: Delegitimising the right of Israel to exist" ($X^2 = 6.61$, $p < 0.05$).

The higher percentages of students reporting witnessing antisemitic expressions are expected, given students' higher levels of social engagement on campus. Figure 5.3 presents the comparison of percentages reported by students and staff.

Figure 5.3. Comparison between students and staff, by percentages of respondents having personally witnessed antisemitic expressions (responses 2-5, "rarely" through to "all the time")

In summary, the findings indicate that the highest percentages of antisemitic experiences reported by participants consist of "Graffiti, posters or fliers: delegitimising the right of Israel to exist" (93%) and "Verbally or through social media: delegitimising the right of Israel to exist" (92%). The second most frequently reported experience was "Verbally or through social media: making derogatory comments about Israelis (Israeli people)" (85%). This finding suggests that, from the perspective of the majority of participants in the survey, delegitimising Israel's right to exist constitutes antisemitism.

5.2 Personal Experiences

Personal experiences were considered in relation to hearing and being subjected to antisemitic comments, insults, and harassment, as well as feeling isolated or cancelled, and experiencing physical assault. Specifically, participants were asked:

"At your campus, since 7 October 2023, have you personally experienced the following behaviours towards you because you are Jewish or Israeli?"

The findings reveal that two-thirds of participants (67%) reported hearing antisemitic comments in their presence. This was the most commonly reported personal experience, followed by "feeling ignored or excluded" (43%). A further 39% reported experiencing insults or harassment on social media, while 29% reported verbal insults or harassment. Physical assaults were rare, with only 3% of participants reporting such incidents. Table 5.2 and Figure 4.4 present the percentage distribution of responses.

Table 5.2. Reports of personal antisemitic experiences, by question prompt and response type

| Personal experience | Yes | No | Not Sure |
|---|---|---|---|
| Listening to antisemitic comments in your presence | 66.6% | 30.5% | 3.0% |
| Feeling ignored or excluded | 43.2% | 43.0% | 13.8% |
| Received insult or harassment on social media | 38.9% | 56.7% | 4.4% |
| Received verbal insult or harassment | 28.8% | 64.9% | 6.3% |
| Being cancelled from groups | 18.7% | 65.6% | 15.8% |

A comparison between student and staff responses reveals that students reported significantly higher rates of "listening to antisemitic comments in their presence" (74% of students compared to 48% of staff). This was followed by "receiving insults or harassment on social media" (40% of students, 36% of staff), "receiving verbal insults or harassment" (36% of students, 23% of staff), and "being cancelled from groups" (21% of students, 17% of staff).

In contrast, staff reported slightly higher rates of "feeling ignored or excluded" (44% of staff, 40% of students). Reports of physical assault were similarly low across both groups. Figure 5.5 presents a comparison between students and staff in percentages of reporting personal experiences of antisemitic behaviours towards them.

In summary, the findings indicate that physical assaults are rare. However, three-quarters (74%) of Jewish students have experienced antisemitic behaviour in the form of hearing antisemitic comments in their presence, with a total of 67% of the overall sample exposed to this type of harassment. Additionally, 43% of the sample reported feeling ignored or excluded, and 39% experienced insults or harassment on social media.

These findings indicate the pervasiveness of antisemitic behaviours directed towards Jewish people on campus, suggesting that antisemitic discourse has become normalised on campuses. Staff appear slightly more likely to feel ignored or excluded compared to students, whereas students report experiencing most other types of antisemitic behavioural harassment at higher rates.

5.3 Relationship Changes

To gain insight into the impact of the 7 October aftermath on personal relationships, two sets of questions were administered. The first asked about changes in personal relationships within the campus, the second asked about changes in relationships within the broader community. Specifically, the first question asked: "Since 7 October 2023, would you say that your relationship with your non-Jewish university friends, colleagues, and others on campus has become ...". Respondents ranked changes in closeness on a five-point Likert scale.

The second question asked participants to use a slider to indicate increase or decrease in mixing with non-Jewish people, and with Jewish people, since 7 October. The scale used was from -5 to +5'. Response: 0 = no change, -5 = substantial decrease, + 5 = substantial increase.

5.3.1 On-campus Relation changes

The findings indicate that for about half of the sample, relationships remained about the same. However, for nearly the other half, 7 October had a profound impact on Jewish people's relationships with non-Jews on campus. Within this group of respondents, a relationship rift was formed:

- 43% of students reported becoming distant or disconnected from non-Jewish friends.
- 35% of staff reported becoming distant or disconnected from their colleagues.
- 42% of respondents reported becoming distant or disconnected from other university acquaintances.

This finding highlights the sense of isolation experienced by a large minority of Jewish students and staff on campus.

At the same time, a small percentage of Jewish people moved in the opposite direction in response to the same events:

- 8.5% of students reported becoming closer or much closer to non-Jewish friends.
- 6.15% of staff reported becoming closer or much closer to non-Jewish colleagues.
- 4.07% of respondents reported becoming closer or much closer to other university acquaintances.

Taken together, the findings indicate that, post-7 October, approximately half of students (43% becoming distant + 8.5% becoming closer = 52%) and a significant minority of staff (35% + 6.15% = 41%) no longer maintained their usual relationships on campus.

Table 5.3 presents the percentage distribution of responses. Figure 5.6 presents the percentage distribution by aggregated responses for becoming closer, staying the same, and becoming distant.

Table 5.3. Percentages of reported changes in relationships with non-Jewish friends (for students), colleagues (for staff) and other university acquaintances

| | Friends (response by students) | Colleagues (response by staff) | Other university acquaintances |
|---|---|---|---|
| Much closer | 4.6% | 1% | 0.4% |
| Closer | 3.9% | 5.2% | 3.3% |
| Stayed about the same | 48.3% | 58.7% | 54.6% |
| Distant | 30.1% | 22.5% | 29.2% |
| Disconnected | 13.2% | 12.7% | 12.5% |

Figure 5.6. Percentages of reported changes in relationships with non-Jewish friends (for students), colleagues (for staff) and other university acquaintances, by aggregates responses for becoming closer, staying the same and becoming distant

5.3.2 Relationship Changes Beyond Campus

An examination of changes in mixing with Jewish and non-Jewish people revealed similar trends. The findings show that 77% of participants reported increased mixing with Jewish people, and 49% reported decreased mixing with non-Jewish people.

Conversely, a small minority of Jewish participants reported the opposite trend: 5% reported decreased mixing with Jewish people, and 11% reported increased mixing with non-Jewish people.

Notably, the aftermath of 7 October was so impactful that only a small minority reported no change in mixing with Jewish people. Even within the narrow range of -1 to +1, 8% reported a small increase of +1. A large minority (40%) reported no change in mixing with non-Jewish people. However, even within this range, 17% reported a small decrease of -1.

The comparison between students and staff reveals almost identical trends.

Figure 5.7. Comparing changes in mixing with Jewish people to changes in mixing with non-Jewish people, by aggregated scale measures of increase (+2 - +5), no change (-1 - +1), and decrease (-2 - -5).

Table 5.4 and Figures 5.8A and 5.8B present the percentage distribution across the scale measuring increased or decreased relationship closeness. These visualisations illustrate the extent to which participants' relationships have shifted—either becoming closer or more distant—following 7 October.

Table 5.4. Extend of changes in relationships with Jewish and non-Jewish people, by extent of change (on a scale from -5 to +5)

| | Scale | Mixing with Jewish people | Mixing with Non Jewish people |
|---|---|---|---|
| Substantial decrease | -5 | 2.2% | 11% |
| | -4 | 0.9% | 7.8% |
| | -3 | 1% | 14.1% |
| | -2 | 1.3% | 16% |
| | -1 | 0.3% | 16.6% |
| No Change | 0 | 9.3% | 19.6% |
| | 1 | 8% | 4.2% |

A. Behavioural change in relation to mixing with Jewish people: Distribution of responses across the scale -5 to +55.8.B. Behavioural change in relation to mixing with non-Jewish people: Distribution of responses across the scale-5 to +5

5.8.B. Behavioural change in relation to mixing with non-Jewish people: Distribution of responses across the scale-5 to +5

In summary, the findings suggest that 7 October created a "social earthquake" and led to the tearing of the social fabric between and within the Jewish campus community.

Within campus, 43% of students reported becoming distant or disconnected from non-Jewish friends, and 35% of staff reported becoming distant or disconnected from their colleagues. Beyond the campus community, Jewish students and staff report similar decreases in mixing with non-Jewish people (49%). Concurrently, 77% of participants reported increased mixing with Jewish people.

A small percentage of Jewish people moved in the opposite direction, with 8.5% of students and 6.15% of staff reported becoming closer or much closer to non-Jewish friends and colleagues on campus, and 5% reported decreased mixing with Jewish people in the broader community. Concurrently, 11% reported increased mixing with non-Jewish people. Qualitative data suggests that political anti-Zionist views may have contributed to a rift within the Jewish community, dividing Zionist and anti-Zionist Jews.

These social reconfigurations provide strong evidence for the unsettling antisemitic environment where a large majority of Jewish people are seemingly seeking refuge among their own.

5.4. Personal Behaviours

A set of questions examined behavioural changes following 7 October, expressed as increases, decreases, or no change.

The findings reveal stark changes across all behaviours examined. Participants could no longer maintain their previous patterns of behaviour, to the extent that even class attendance—which is compulsory for students and therefore expected to show minimal change—revealed a 48% decrease. The fact that nearly half the students in the survey felt the need to reduce attendance suggests that campuses are no longer safe for Jewish students. This may have long-term consequences, potentially threatening their academic performance.

A similarly sharp behavioural decrease (50%) was reported in Hebrew-speaking individuals avoiding speaking Hebrew in public, suggesting a perceived safety risk in displaying affiliation with Israel, the only Hebrew-speaking country.

In contrast to the sharp decreases in class attendance and publicly speaking Hebrew, the findings reveal a significant increase (56%) in engagement with social media. This may be attributed to the destabilising effects of 7 October, with participants feeling the need to stay constantly informed and to inform others.

When asked whether they chose to hide or assert their Jewish identity by wearing Jewish symbols such as a kippah (skullcap) or Magen David (Star of David, normally worn on a necklace), a total of 79% of the sample changed their behaviour in one way or the other. A large minority, 39% reported decrease, while 40%, a similar proportion, reported an increase in wearing Jewish symbols.

Similarly, in relation to publicly expressing political beliefs or one's connection to Israel, 49% reported a decrease, and 32% an increase. The comparison between students and staff reveals similar results across the two groups, suggesting similar patterns of behavioural changes.

Table 5.5 and Figure 5.9 present the percentages of participants reporting behavioural changes.

Table 5.5. Behavioural changes on a scale of -5 to +5, by behaviour types

| Scale | Engaging in social media | Attending classes, if you are a student | Publicly expressing political beliefs | Publicly expressing your connection to Israel | Speaking Hebrew where others can hear | Wearing a Kippah, Magen David, or other Jewish symbols |
| -5 | 8.1% | 13.4% | 16.5% | 21.2% | 26.1% | 22.2% |
| -4 | 3.7% | 6.3% | 8.4% | 9.2% | 8.1% | 3.2% |
| -3 | 8.6% | 15.1% | 11.3% | 10.6% | 5.6% | 6.3% |
| -2 | 8.9% | 12.8% | 13% | 7.7% | 10.5% | 6.8% |
| -1 | 3.7% | 9.6% | 6.3% | 7.8% | 11.6% | 5.9% |
| 0 | 5.5% | 27.7% | 5.8% | 4.6% | 14.6% | 9.7% |
| 1 | 5.7% | 2.6% | 6.8% | 7% | 6.7% | 5.5% |
| 2 | 11.6% | 3.8 | 9.4 | 8.6 | 5 | 8.6 |
| 3 | 15.7% | 2.6 | 7.5 | 8.8 | 4 | 6 |
| 4 | 8.2% | 3.3 | 6.4 | 3.4 | 1.8 | 4.5 |
| 5 | 20.4% | 2.7 | 8.6 | 11.1 | 6.1 | 21.2 |
| Decrease (-5 to -2) | 29% | 48% | 49% | 49% | 50% | 39% |
| No change (-1 to +1) | 15% | 40% | 19% | 19% | 33% | 21% |
| Increase (+2 to +5) | 56% | 12% | 32% | 32% | 17% | 40% |

In summary, the analysis of behavioural changes mirrors the trends observed in changes to personal relationships. It appears that participants were shaken to the extent that they could no longer maintain their normal behaviours, revealing what may be described as a "social earthquake" in the aftermath of 7 October.

Two sharp behavioural decreases were reported: a 48% reduction in class attendance and a 50% reduction in speaking Hebrew in public. One sharp increase was noted: a 56% rise in engagement with social media.

Other behaviours displayed bifurcated changes, including a 39% decrease and 40% increase in wearing Jewish symbols, and a 49% decrease versus a 32% increase in publicly expressing political beliefs or one's connection to Israel.

The reduced class attendance suggests that Jewish students do not feel safe or welcome on campus, which may have enduring effects on their academic performance and career pathways. The decline in public Hebrew speaking indicates that Israeli individuals (the only native Hebrew speakers globally) may feel at risk if their affiliation with Israel becomes known. Similarly, the marked increase in social media engagement (56%) may reflect an attempt to cope with the dramatic and destabilising post 7 October impacts—by staying informed, seeking support, engaging with like-minded individuals, or advocating and explaining their perspective to others.

Finally, the bifurcated behavioural responses suggest that Jewish individuals adopted two contrasting strategies in response to the rapidly changing campus environment—akin to "fight or flight": either increasing their visibility and advocacy or withdrawing and concealing their identity.

When asked about concerns regarding antisemitism from the political left and the political right, respondents expressed significantly greater concern about the political left. Specifically, 67% of respondents were “very concerned”, with a further 17% “somewhat concerned”, totalling 84%. This sentiment was consistent across both students and staff.

In contrast, concern about the political right was markedly lower, with a combined 37% reporting they were “somewhat concerned” or “very concerned”.

Table 5.6 and Figure 5.10 present percentage distributions of concerns from the political left versus the political right.

|---|---|---|
| Not at all concerned | 8.1% | 20.4% |
| A little concerned | 7.9% | 42.4% |
| Somewhat concerned | 17.3% | 23.1% |

In summary, the majority of participants (84%) perceive the political left as the major source of antisemitism on campus compared to only 37% concerned and very concerned about the political right.

5.6 Sense of Safety

Respondents were asked "how safe do you feel on the campus?", with a five-point response option ranging from "feeling very unsafe" to "feeling very safe".

A minority of 34% of respondents reported feeling "safe" and "very safe" on the physical campus and 32% in the virtual campus.

Among staff, 17% indicated they felt "very safe" on the physical campus, compared to 8% of students.

Combining "feeling very safe" and "feeling safe" on the physical campus obtains only 38% of students and 36% of staff reporting a sense of safety. Similar results were obtained for the virtual campus, 36% of students and 30% of staff reporting sense of safety.

Table 5.7 presents the percentage distribution of responses. Figure 5.11 presents a comparison between students and staff.

Table 5.7. Percentage distribution of sense of safety levels, by physical and virtual campuses

| | Feeling very unsafe | Feeling unsafe | Feeling somewhat unsafe | Feeling unsafe | Feeling somewhat unsafe |
|---|---|---|---|---|---|
| Safety on the physical campus | 12.9% | 21.5% | 31.6% | 24.7% | 9.4% |
| Total unsafe physical campus | | | 66.00% | | |
| Safety in the virtual campus | 17.9% | 21.1% | 29.3% | 21.1% | 10.6% |

A benchmark to interpret the significance of this sense of safety finding is the 2021 National Student Safety Survey (NSSS) (Heywood et al., 2022). The objective of the survey, which was completed by 43,819 students, was to inform 'ongoing efforts of Australian universities in building equitable, safe and inclusive learning experiences for their students', with specific reference to sexual harassment and sexual assault.

To provide a context for its findings, the NSSS asked students to indicate their "perception of university culture". It obtained 84% agreement by domestic students and 81% by international students with the statement "I feel safe when at [my university]", which compared with the 34% of respondents reported feeling "safe" and "very safe" on the physical campus and 32% in the virtual campus in the 5A survey. The comparison reveals that the rate of those who reported a lack of safety for Jewish people on Australian campuses since October 2023 is 3.47 times higher than the rate of reported a lack of safety due to sexual harassment measured in 2021.

In summary, the findings suggest that only a third (34%) of Jewish students and staff feel safe on campus. The rate of sense of lack of safety for Jewish people is 3.47 higher than the rate of sense of lack of safety due to sexual harassment. Both the physical and virtual campus environments are perceived as equally unsafe.

5.7 Perceptions of Universities' Policies and Procedures

To gain insights into universities' actions against antisemitism, a series of questions were presented. Participants were asked to rank their universities' actions and indicate: the provision of relevant information; their understanding and assessment of the complaint system; whether they had lodged a complaint; and their level of trust in the system.

5.7.1 Ranking Universities' Actions

The participants were asked: "Do you think that your university's management is taking sufficient actions against antisemitism and ensuring that campuses are safe and inclusive for Jews?" Participants were asked to rank their universities' actions on a scale ranging from 0= Not taking any actions against antisemitism to 10= Taking sufficient actions against antisemitism.

The findings revealed that 60% of participants rated their universities' actions between 0 and 3, indicating insufficient action taking by their universities. At the other end of the scale, only 17% ranked their universities between 7 and 10, indicating sufficient action taking.

This result was benchmarked against the NSSS survey, where students responded to the statement: "[My university] is trying hard to protect the safety of all students." A combined 74.5% indicated "strong agreement" or "agreement", and another 9.9% indicated "strongly disagree" or "disagree" with this statement (Heywood et al., 2022, p. 74). The comparison suggests that students were 4.4 times more likely to report that university management takes sufficient action to protect against sexual harassment than to protect the safety of Jewish people on campus.

Table 5.8. Ranking of universities' actions against antisemitism on a scale of 0 to 10

| Scale | Percentage (%) | Sub-totals (%) |
|---|---|---|
| 0= Not taking any actions against antisemitism | 12.9 | |
| 1 | 19.6 | |
| 2 | 15.3 | |
| 3 | 12 | 0-3 = 60 |
| 4 | 8.9 | |
| 5 | 9.3 | |
| 6 | 4.8 | |
| 7 | 5.5 | |
| 8 | 3.5 | |
| 9 | 3.2 | |
| 10 = Taking sufficient actions against antisemitism | 5 | 7-10 = 17 |

5.7.2 Comparing Universities

A non-parametric Kruskal-Wallis test was conducted to compare the distribution of ratings across 12 universities, each with at least 10 responses and no missing data. The test statistic is 37.75, with a significantly low p-value of 0.000086 (Kruskal-Wallis X2 = 37.75, p = 0.000086). This low p-value indicates substantial variations in response patterns between institutions.

The distribution of rankings (0-10) across universities was plotted in a boxplot (Figure 5.13). The plot allows us to compare the distribution of responses across different universities. Only universities with sample sizes ≥10 were included in the comparison, with the width of each box proportional to the number of survey responses. We can see variations in both the median responses and the spread of responses among different institutions. Some universities show more variability (taller boxes) while others have more concentrated responses (shorter boxes).

Note: The boxplot shows the median (horizontal line in each box); the interquartile range (the height of the box itself); the whiskers extending to the most extreme non-outlier points; and the individual points beyond the whiskers representing outliers. The width of each box is proportional to its sample size.

The University of Sydney, RMIT, University of Technology Sydney, and Curtin University have a low median of 2. A median ranking of 5 was obtained in La Trobe and Swinburne University of Technology.

The interquartile range indicates the spread of the distribution of responses. The smaller the range, the more participants agree on their university's ranking. Tight distribution of ranking (low interquartile range) can be viewed at the University of Sydney (2), RMIT (2) and Curtin (2). All three universities show both a low median ranking of 2 and a tight distribution.

Caution should be used when interpreting results from universities with smaller sample sizes, as their ratings are more influenced by individual responses and may not represent the broader Jewish staff and students as accurately.

A Mann-Whitney U test was conducted to compare pairs of universities with large sample sizes: Monash University (n=106), the University of Sydney (n=105), University of New South Wales (n=62) and the University of Melbourne (n=51).

The results reveal that the mean ranking of the University of Sydney was statistically significantly lower than Monash (Z=3.78, p=0.0008), and the University of New South Wales (Z=-4.18, p= 0.00015). The medians for both the University of Sydney and the University of Melbourne were identical, at 2—the lowest among the universities with large sample sizes. Figure 5.14 presents a boxplot visualisation of the distribution of rankings across the four universities with large sample sizes.

Note: The boxplot shows the median (horizontal line in each box); the interquartile range (the height of the box itself); the whiskers extending to the most extreme non-outlier points; and the individual points beyond the whiskers representing outliers

Overall, the findings suggest that while in general, universities in Australia rank low on their actions against antisemitism, they are not homogenous in their responses, as perceived by the participants.

The responses to the open-ended questions provide insights into the nature of some practices that were appreciated by the participants. For example:

- "Our VC has been good."
- "To be honest I think [university name removed] … has done a really good job with things like keeping anti-Israel/antisemitic sentiment on campus to a minimum."
- "I think it has been good at how [university name removed] has dismantled the encampment."
- "The university is doing a good job by banning posters and gatherings."
- "I have confidence in management at [university's name removed]—they have quickly responded to antisemitic posters and ensured a safe space for Jewish students on campus."
- "They were great in dismantling the encampment once the protestors started breaking every rule they were given and inviting dangerous people in.

5.7.3 Fostering Understanding

Participants were asked: “Has the university provided you with a definition of inappropriate political content in lectures and course materials?”

Only 11% reported that a definition had been provided, 16% were unsure, and 73% responded ‘no’. The ‘no’ response was similar for both staff (71%) and students (69%). Table 5.8.2.1 below presents the percentage distribution.

5.7.4 Understanding the Complaint System

Students were asked whether they understood “complaint procedures if you encounter antisemitic content in lectures or course materials”.

48% of students reported no knowledge of the complaint procedures, while 34% indicated understanding.

Staff were asked whether they understood the complaint procedures if they encountered “antisemitic comment or behaviour by colleagues, students, or other staff members”. In a near reverse of student responses, 28% of staff reported no knowledge, while 56% indicated understanding (see Table 5.9).

5.7.5 Confidence in the Complaint System

The participants were asked:

- “Do you consider that complaints procedures are adequate at your university?”
- “Have you ever lodged a complaint?” and
- “Are you confident that you can lodge a complaint without risking discrimination against you or other negative impacts?”

Concerning the adequacy of the complaint system, 45% responded that the system is not adequate, and only 16% considered it adequate.

In relation to lodging a complaint, a majority of 67% reported they had never lodged a complaint, and 32% had lodged a complaint.

Regarding confidence in the system, 51% reported no confidence and 27% reported confidence. This finding was benchmarked against the NSSS survey (Heywood et al., 2022), where students were asked about their confidence in reporting incidents of sexual harassment and assault. Only 23.5% reported a lack of confidence (“Not at all/Slightly”), which is less than half the proportion (51%) of Jewish participants reporting a lack of confidence in lodging a complaint without risking discrimination or other negative impacts.

Chi-square analysis was conducted to compare student and staff responses. Significant differences were found in response to the question: “Do you consider that complaint procedures are adequate at your university?” A significantly higher number of staff rated the procedures as inadequate ($X^2 = 6.15$, $p = 0.0463$).

Another significant difference was found in response to: “Have you ever lodged a complaint?” A significantly higher number of students reported that they had never lodged a complaint ($X^2 = 11.75$, $p = 0.0028$). Table 5.9 and Figure 4.15 present the percentages of response distribution.

Table 5.9. Perceptions of universities' policies and procedures, by "yes", "no" and "not sure"

| Question item | No | Yes | Not Sure |
|---|---|---|---|
| Has the university provided you with a definition of inappropriate political content in lectures and in course materials? | 73% | 11% | 16% |
| Do you understand the complaint procedures at your university, if you encounter antisemitic content in lectures and course materials? Answer if you are a student. | 47.5% | 33.6% | 18.9% |
| Do you understand the complaint procedures at your university, if you encounter antisemitic comment or behaviour by colleagues, students or other staff members? Answer if you are a staff member. | 28% | 55.7% | 16.3% |
| Do you consider that complaints procedures are adequate at your university? | 45.1% | 16.4% | 38.4% |
| Have you ever lodged a complaint? | 67.4% | 31.5% | 1.1% |
| Are you confident that you can lodge a complaint without risking discrimination against you or other negative impacts? | 50.5% | 26.7% | 22.8% |

In summary, 60% of participants ranked their universities' management actions against antisemitism between 0 and 3, indicating that they are not taking sufficient action on antisemitism. This contrasts with the NSSS survey, where only 9.9% of students ranked their universities' actions to keep campuses safe from sexual harassment as unsatisfactory (Heywood et al., 2022).

Seventy-three per cent of students reported that universities fail to provide a definition of inappropriate political content in lectures and course materials; 47% of students and 28% of staff reported that they do not understand the complaint system; 45% of participants do not regard the complaint system as adequate; and 67% have never lodged a complaint.

A majority of 51% of participants reported having no confidence in the complaint system. This compares to only 23.5% who reported a lack of confidence in the complaint processes for incidents of sexual harassment and sexual assault (Heywood et al., 2022).

A comparison between students and staff revealed statistically significant differences, with a higher number of staff rating the complaint procedures as inadequate, and more staff having lodged complaints compared to students. These findings are expected, given that staff are employed by universities over many years, making them more familiar with administrative procedures and more likely to lodge complaints over the course of their careers.

Overall, the findings reveal a stark contrast between the level of antisemitism experienced by Jewish people on campus—67% reported hearing antisemitic comments and 93% reported witnessing antisemitic expressions delegitimising the right of Israel to exist—and their level of trust in their universities' systems to protect them, with only 27% reporting confidence that they could lodge a complaint without risking discrimination. Taken together, the findings indicate a system failure in preventing antisemitism.

5.8. Cluster Analysis of Key Survey Items

A cluster analysis was applied to gain deeper insight into the heterogeneity of campus antisemitism experiences post 7 October. Cluster analysis groups participants are based on their distinct mean response profiles. Segmenting the sample into clusters enables us to identify and differentiate sub-groups within the surveyed population, and develop an understanding of the unique subjective experiences, attitudes, and coping mechanisms of participants in each sub-sample.

We applied k-means clustering to the survey dataset using responses from 14 prompts derived from four questions, ultimately selecting a 4-cluster solution, with the distribution fairly balanced across the sample. Figure 5.16 presents the mean responses for each cluster, followed by an interpretation.

Note: Q7— At your campus, since 7 October 2023, have you personally experienced the following behaviours towards you, because you are Jewish or Israeli? (Responses: 1-yes; 2-no; 3-not sure) Q7_1— Feeling ignored or excluded; Q7_2— Being cancelled from groups; Q7_3— Received insult or harassment on social media; Q7_4— Received verbal insult or harassment; Q7_5— Listening to anti-Semitic comments in your presence.

Q10— Since 7 October 2023, would you say that your relationship with your NON-JEWISH university friends, colleagues and others on campus has become... (responses: 1-disconnected; 2 distant; 3-stayed about the same; 4- closer; 5- much closer) Q10_1— Friends [Answer if you are a student; Q10_2— Colleagues [Answer if you are a staff member].

Q11— Please use the slider to indicate any behavioural change you might have experienced since 7 October 2023, on a scale from -5 to +5. Q11_2— Attending classes, if you are a student; Q11_3— Publicly expressing your political beliefs; Q11_4— Publicly expressing your connection to Israel; Q11_7— Mixing with Jewish people; Q11_8— Mixing with non-Jewish people.

Q12—How safe do you feel on campus since 7 October 2023? Please indicate your sense of safety on a scale from 1 to 5. Q12_1— Safety on the physical campus; Q12_2— Safety in the virtual campus (Media and online).

5.8.1 Cluster Profiles by Question Series

Cluster 0 (162 participants, 29.6%): Low-impact, resilient group

- Extent of antisemitism impact: Low
- Extent and nature of social reconfiguration: Low decrease in mixing with non-Jews; moderate decrease in mixing with Jews
- 47 Survey of Antisemitism on Australian Campuses
- Behavioural changes (fight / flight / continue as usual): Flight — low to moderate decrease
- Sense of safety: Somewhat unsafe

Cluster 1 (123 participants, 22.4%): Identity-affirming, forthcoming responders

- Extent of antisemitism impact: Medium to high
- Extent and nature of social reconfiguration: Low to moderate decrease in mixing with non-Jews; high increase in mixing with Jews
- Behavioural changes: Fight — moderate increase
- Sense of safety: Somewhat unsafe

Cluster 2 (110 participants, 20.1%): Highly impacted and sensitised group

- Extent of antisemitism impact: Moderate to high
- Extent and nature of social reconfiguration: Moderate to high decrease in mixing with non-Jews; high increase in mixing with Jews
- Behavioural changes: Flight — moderate to high decrease
- Sense of safety: Unsafe

Cluster 3 (153 participants, 27.9%): Antisemitism perceived as a non-issue

- Extent of antisemitism impact: Non-issue
- Extent and nature of social reconfiguration: Moderate increase in mixing with non-Jews; slight to no increase in mixing with Jews
- Behavioural changes: Continue as usual
- Sense of safety: Safe

Table 5.10 summarises the mean values and key findings for each cluster.

| | Sence of safety in the virtual campus (Media and online) | Somewhat unsafe (2.92) | Unsafe (2.23) | Unsafe (2.02) | Feeling safe (3.87) |

In summary, the cluster analysis enabled the identification of four distinct groups based on their responses to the surge in antisemitism following 7 October. This analysis is particularly valuable for identifying at-risk groups and informing the development of targeted strategies tailored to each cluster profile.

In our survey, one-fifth (20%) of participants belonged to Cluster 2 (Highly impacted and sensitised), representing those at highest risk. These participants experienced direct exposure to antisemitism, felt unsafe on campus, and exhibited strong avoidance behaviours — avoiding campus, distancing from non-Jewish peers, and presumably seeking refuge within the Jewish community. Supporting this group requires targeted interventions to help strengthen their resilience.

Another fifth (22.4%) of participants formed Cluster 1 (Affirmative, forthcoming responses to antisemitism), characterised by assertive responses. Their reaction to confronting antisemitism involved strengthening their Jewish identity and increasing its public expression. Although similarly impacted as Cluster 2, their "fight" response may relate to greater resilience and a comparatively higher sense of safety.

Nearly a third (29.6%) of participants comprising Cluster 0 (Relatively resilient group) demonstrated high levels of resilience, with low impact from antisemitism. Behavioural and relationships changes expressed low to moderate flight responses.

A further 27.9% of the participants comprising Cluster 3 (Antisemitism is a non-issue) appears as a mixed group. One subgroup appeared largely unaffected by antisemitism, potentially due to limited campus presence, though they did show some behavioural shifts such as increased interaction with Jewish people. The other subgroup appeared to align with anti-Israel protestors, expressing a sense of safety on campus and increased mixing with non-Jewish people.

Further research is needed to design tailored interventions that address the distinct needs of Jewish participants across these cluster types.

The combined qualitative and quantitative findings are discussed in what follows.

6 DISCUSSION

This section summarises the qualitative findings, followed by an overview of the quantitative results and their comparison to the pre-7 October campus university students' survey (Social Research Centre, 2023). By integrating these data sources, we derive meaningful insights and implications for fostering inclusive and safe campuses for Jewish students and staff. Together, these data sources present a comprehensive picture—both in words and numbers—of the deeply troubling antisemitic climate on campus.

6.1 Qualitative Findings

The qualitative data portray a campus environment that is hostile and abusive to Jewish people, with overt and normalised antisemitic discourse. Participants described incidents such as a swastika engraved in the staff cafeteria; graffiti stating "Zionists are Nazis"; Nazi salutes at a student council meeting; the distribution of brochures bearing Hitler's face alongside the Magen David; posters promoting talks such as "Global Intifada" and "come and hear who is Hamas"; and chanting on campus declaring "Zionists aren't welcome here."

Jewish students and staff encounter exclusion and social ostracism by peers and colleagues. One respondent reported being asked to leave a share house with other university students because of "political differences." Another described how some academics ceased all communication and professional interaction with them.

Jewish students are subjected to physical and verbal harassment. A participant reported being called a "Zionist pig," while another reported being asked, "how many babies have you killed today?" simply for walking on campus wearing a Kippah. A further example involved a student being doxed and trolled on Instagram, with explicit threats that their HDR studies were at risk due to "being on the list".

In the classroom students are targeted and singled out, needing to hide their identity. One participant described a tutor "asking me my "ethnicity" on two separate occasions upon noticing that I stayed silent in the Israel discussions … Being too afraid to say 'Jewish' so saying Eastern Europe instead". Another student reported being "singled out and made to feel alienated and afraid, and having to hide or defend my Jewishness by my tutor and unit coordinator"

Students are exposed to antisemitic rhetoric from their lecturers. One tutor "described Jewish people as 'the oppressed that became the oppressors' during a class that was about celebrity culture". "A faculty member publicly expressed on social media that Zionists were not safe around her, in any space whatsoever".

Jewish academics experience hostile and abusive statements from colleagues. One participant reported that a colleague said, "Jews caused all the problems in the world. If the Arabs wiped them out, they would be doing the world a favour." Another reported a peer saying they did "not like Israelis but Jews were fine".

Jewish academics are targeted and discriminated against solely based on their Israeli nationality or Zionism. One participant reported about "cancellation of Israeli lecturer in my faculty". Another reported "urination in an ex-pat Israeli staff members' working area and writing 'RESIGN'".

Dismissal of complaints and the instilling of doubt in Jewish individuals' perception of reality, as a form of gaslighting.

One participant reported that their boss told them it was "imaginary that there is any threat to Jewish staff and students on campus and we are simply feeding each other's anxiety". Another reported that the university administration denied their complaint against protesters using the chant “intifada” on the basis that the word was context related and that the “university was not responsible for their feelings”. A further participant noted that they were offered counselling after every complaint of racism made to the university, and that this response diminished the seriousness of the antisemitism, meant perpetrators were not held responsible, and “puts the blame on me as though I am the one who needs to change because of my experience”.

Universities consistently fail to take meaningful action to protect Jewish people from antisemitism. Participants reported overt discrimination by professional staff and described institutional inaction when they sought help. One participant noted that the university responded to complaints from Jewish staff by saying they were taking concerns on board but never took any action. Another reported that when they attempted to have action taken against students in a course with explicit rules against discriminatory behaviour and statements, including online, “the university weasel-worded and equivocated me and ultimately did nothing”.

Universities are not uniform in their responses to antisemitism. While 60% of respondents indicated that their universities are not talking sufficient actions on antisemitism, both quantitative and qualitative data suggest that universities are not uniform and that some respond more appropriately than others. For example, one respondent noted, “I’m lucky to go to a university that is fundamentally different from most in that it is quite apolitical.” Another participant expressed a mixed view: “My assessment of my university's approach is very mixed. On one hand, they appeared to enforce a stricter poster policy, which helps with de-escalation; on the other hand…” Others expressed appreciation of poster removal: “I have confidence in management at my university — they have quickly responded to antisemitic posters and ensured a safe space for Jewish students on campus.” Another stated, “The university is doing a good job by banning posters and gatherings.”

These positive examples, though very few and anecdotal, suggest that some institutions apply effective practices. However, the findings of this survey are insufficient to characterise these exemplary practices in detail.

The quantitative data support these findings and shed light on their prevalence and impacts.

6.2 Quantitative Findings

Both students and staff are profoundly impacted by antisemitism, with the majority equating anti-Zionism with antisemitism.

The findings indicate that most survey participants have personally experienced antisemitism on campus. A high proportion of responses related to antisemitic imagery: “graffiti, posters or fliers: delegitimising the right of Israel to exist” (93%); and “verbally or through social media: delegitimising the right of Israel to exist” (92%).

The survey intentionally did not define antisemitism. But, with few exceptions, survey participants identified anti-Israel imagery and hate speech as a form of antisemitism. This indicates that the majority of Jewish students and staff in the sample equate anti-Zionism with antisemitism.

While both Jewish students and staff report experiencing antisemitism, students appear to be more vulnerable. The largest difference was found in “listening to antisemitic comments in your presence”, where students reported a 26% higher rate than staff (74% vs 48%). These findings are expected, given students’ higher engagement in campus life, both the virtual and physical campuses.

The profound impacts of the antisemitism surge is illustrated in participants’ accounts of fear for the first time in their lives, being afraid to leave a building “because of the violence of the student protests, …. afraid to reveal my identity” , or being “spat on for wearing my Star of David necklace”.

Antisemitism has deeply shaken Jewish people’s core sense of identity and belonging.

The findings suggest that after 7 October, there were stark changes in personal relationships and behaviours, creating a sense of an existential ""earthquake."" Critical aspects of social identity appear to have been affected. One respondent commented: “Socially, in my faculty I feel that I no longer know who my friends are”.

The tearing of the social fabric is most evident in shifts in personal relationships, with Jewish people mixing less with non-Jewish people (49%) and increasingly drawn into Jewish social circles (77%), seemingly seeking refuge. Similarly, on campus, 43% of students reported becoming distant from non-Jewish friends and 35% of staff reported becoming distant from colleagues.

At the same time, an opposite trend emerged among a minority of participants, with 8.5% of students and 6.2% of staff reporting that they became closer or much closer to non-Jewish individuals on campus. This suggests that political anti-Zionist views may have caused a rift within the Jewish community between Zionist and anti-Zionist Jews. Qualitative excerpts support this assertion, where a small minority of participants identified as anti-Zionists (e.g., “a proud Jewish person who does not subscribe to Zionist beliefs”), explicitly outlining the ideological rift: “Stop stifling protest, help young Jews to learn the truth. Anti-Zionism is not antisemitism”; “I have received comments on social media calling me a kapo, traitor, not Jewish, saying that I'm not part of the community, etc., all from Jewish Zionists.”

Free Speech, but Not for Supporters of Israel

The findings suggest that publicly supporting Israel carries the greatest social cost for Jewish individuals. The overall 49% decrease in expressions of political beliefs and connections to Israel indicates that, in effect, for the majority of Jewish people who support Israel, free speech on campus has been suppressed.

Fight or Flight Responses

The findings reveal two distinct responses to the hostile campus environment resembling fight- or-flight behaviour, with a reported 39% decrease versus 40% increase in wearing Jewish symbols, and a 49% decrease versus a 32% increase in publicly expressing political beliefs or one's connection to Israel. These bifurcated behavioural responses suggest an underlying emotional stress pushing people towards survivalist responses in opposite directions. Among the flight responses, hiding identity and avoidance are prevalent.

Hostile Excluding Campus Environment

By triangulating the three data sources—anecdotal reports from participants on what makes them feel safe, qualitative responses related to the physical environment, and quantitative data on exposure to imagery—it becomes evident that the campus environment, with its antisemitic imagery, is itself a form of harassment, a source of intimidation, and a driver of alienation.

The category "The campus environment" in the qualitative data had the highest frequency of responses, accounting for nearly half (45%) of all excerpts in the survey. Within this category, the most frequently cited theme was "Hostile and exclusionary physical environments," which comprised 32.9% of the total 45% of excerpts.

The quantitative findings reinforce this conclusion by highlighting the significant role of the physical environment in shaping perceptions of safety. When asked whether they had personally witnessed antisemitic expressions on campus since 7 October, 92% of participants reported seeing at least "rarely" graffiti, posters, or flyers that delegitimised Israel's right to exist.

This finding is critically important because it suggests that restoring a substantial sense of safety and inclusivity on campus can be achieved through minimal efforts by universities. It only requires the consistent enforcement of existing rules and codes of conduct prohibiting campus defacement.

Avoiding the Threat, Hiding Identity.

The atmosphere of alienation and isolation on campus has led a large minority of Jewish students to avoid attending classes, and Jewish people on campus to make behavioural changes in order to hide their Jewish identity and its intrinsic association with Zionism.

The combined qualitative and quantitative data indicate behavioural patterns of campus avoidance among students and staff. Class avoidance was reported by 48% of students ("I deliberately stay off campus as much as possible in the hope of avoiding direct encounters with antisemitism"; "I have specifically chosen a distance education course in order for me to avoid attending the campus"). Participants also reported avoiding specific hostile areas on campus ("I was constantly checking these groups' social media in an attempt to always avoid going anywhere near them, even taking much longer indirect routes to avoid even passing them").

Hiding Jewish identity was also extensively reported and took various forms, such as non-disclosure of identity ("I am a first-year student and have not yet told anyone at the uni that I am Jewish"); avoiding academic work that may reveal identity ("I am afraid to tell anyone I'm Jewish and I'm afraid to produce Jewish artwork"); and removal of Jewish symbols, as previously discussed ("Plenty of friendly non-Jews have gone up to me telling me to hide my Star of David for my own safety").

Progressive Paradox: When Left Liberal Ideals Foster Exclusion

Jewish respondents perceived the primary source of concern about campus antisemitism came from the political Left (84%). There was much less concern about the political Right (37%). Antisemitism on campuses, particularly in the form of anti-Zionism, appears to be embedded in liberal progressive ideologies, where hostility toward the Jewish minority is justified, and Jews are framed as "oppressors" (Hirsh, 2017).

Differentiated Groups of Participants

The data reveal that participants in our sample differ in the extent to which antisemitism impacts them emotionally, affects their daily lives, and influences their sense of safety on campus. These differences, in turn, are reflected in the extent and nature of social reconfiguration and behavioural change. Two groups stand out in particular: Cluster 2 – "Highly Impacted and Sensitised Group", and Cluster 3 – "Antisemitism Perceived as a Non-Issue".

Cluster 2 is of particular concern due to the high impact of antisemitism. This group comprises individuals who are likely struggling to perform academically, with potential long-term implications for their career trajectories and social adjustment. Focused research is needed to evaluate the broader impacts of antisemitism on this group and to identify effective means of community support.

Cluster 3 appears as an outlier across the four key dimensions: impact of antisemitism, social reconfiguration, behavioural change, and sense of safety. Findings for this group tend to show trends that are generally opposite to those observed in the rest of the sample.

However, this cluster is not homogeneous and could potentially have been subdivided into two distinct groups. One subgroup includes Jewish individuals who do not perceive campus protests as personally targeting them. Since 7 October, this group has become closer to the non-Jewish community and more distant from the Jewish community. As noted above, the dividing line between this subgroup and the broader Jewish community is most likely their identification as anti-Zionists.

The other subgroup comprises participants who maintain a sense of closeness with the broader Jewish community, which has even slightly strengthened. However, they adopt a more neutral stance on the conflict and, overall, do not feel personally threatened by the post-7 October campus antisemitism.

The decision not to divide these into separate clusters was informed by the finding that a four- cluster solution offered the most meaningful differentiation while preserving a relatively balanced distribution. Further research is required to better understand the specific characteristics of the subgroups within this cluster, their roles in the current discourse on campus antisemitism, and the implications of their outlier status within the Jewish community."

"Betrayed by Leadership: Lack of Confidence in University Administration

Most students and staff expressed little trust in their universities' administration, with 60% rating their institution's actions against antisemitism between 0 and 3 on a scale from 0 to 10. Universities failed to provide adequate guidance on inappropriate content (72%), and only 17% of participants agreed that "the complaints procedures are adequate at your university."

Among the few students and staff who reported filing complaints, frustration with institutional inaction was a common theme. In most cases, complaints were dismissed or met with advice for the complainant to remain at home. Such responses invalidated the complainants' lived experiences and signalled that the issue lay not with the aggressors—who faced no consequences—but with the complainants, who were seen as "too sensitive." Unsurprisingly, formal complaints by Jewish students and staff were rare.

The gap between the frequency of reported antisemitic comments (67%) and the relatively low rate of formal complaints (32%) indicates a systemic failure in university grievance and complaints procedures. Indeed, 51% of participants reported a lack of confidence that they could lodge a complaint without risking discrimination or other negative repercussions. This concern was affirmed by qualitative data. One participant reported: "Please note that I have made a complaint about antisemitism to the university and have been discriminated against for making the complaint."

Inadequate disciplinary measures, lack of transparency, and fear of retaliation appear to have created a culture of distrust and reluctance to report incidents.

This poor institutional performance stands in stark contrast to the response to sexual harassment and assault following the 2021 release of the National Student Safety Survey (Heywood et al., 2022).

For example, Professor Mark Scott, Vice-Chancellor and Principal of the University of Sydney, committed his institution to "renewed and targeted action to create a safer and more supportive environment." (University of Sydney, 2022). He noted that since 2018 the university had required all new students to complete a Consent Matters module, and consent workshops were held twice a year for all student leaders and first-year students in residential accommodation. In addition, a mandatory module was introduced for all executive office holders in student clubs and societies to address the drivers of sexual assault and harassment.

Despite progress, Professor Scott commented about ongoing incidents:

> Frankly, one case is one too many. To every person who has experienced sexual harassment or sexual assault, we are deeply sorry. Every student has the right to feel safe and supported and to be treated with respect and dignity, whether on campus, online or offshore. Anything less is unacceptable. (University of Sydney, 2022).

Across Australia, universities implemented a suite of measures, including new policies, educational modules, and support systems. For instance, the University of Melbourne released a standalone Sexual Misconduct Prevention and Response Policy in 2021, and Deakin University updated its Student Code of Conduct to explicitly address sexual harm. Educational programmes on respectful relationships and consent were made mandatory, and support systems were restructured to include centralised contact points.

These measures demonstrate that universities have adopted a zero-tolerance policy towards sexual harassment and have actively implemented comprehensive systems to ensure all students feel safe on campus. In contrast, no such institutional response has been extended to Jewish students and staff experiencing antisemitism. Despite two-thirds of the Jewish campus population reporting that they feel somewhat unsafe to very unsafe, universities have, to date, not demonstrated a genuine commitment to uprooting antisemitism from their campuses.

6.3 Comparison of The Jewish University Experience Survey (Social Research Centre, 2023) Survey Findings to Antisemitism in Australian Universities Post 7 October (5A, 2024) Survey Findings

As discussed above the two surveys of antisemitism on Australian campuses were conducted almost a year apart, one— The Jewish University Experience Survey (Social Research Centre, 2023)— prior to 7 October and the other—Antisemitism in Australian Universities Post 7 October (5A, 2024)—after. By comparing key variables across the two surveys, it is possible to gain a quantitative glimpse into the sharp rise of antisemitism on campuses over the course of just one year, and thus assess the magnitude of the impact of the 7 October aftermath.

6.1 presents a comparison of key variables between the two surveys."

Table 6.1. Comparison of survey findings: The Jewish University Experience Survey (Social Research Centre, 2023) vs. Antisemitism in Australian Universities Post 7 October (5A, 2024), by key variables

| Item | The Jewish University Experience Survey (Social Research Centre, 2023) | Antisemitism in Australian Universities Post 7 October (5A, 2024) | % Change | Rate of Growth |
|---|---|---|---|---|
| Avoid attending campus due to antisemitism | Avoid attending campus due to the antisemitic behaviour of others – 19% | Decrease in attending classes – 57% | +38% | 3.0x |
| Social exclusion due to antisemitism | Being involuntarily singled out or excluded due to matters relating to Israel – 25% | Feeling ignored or excluded – 43% | +18% | 1.7x |
| Intimidation based on antisemitism | People or events that made you feel intimidated because of your Jewish identity – 47% | Verbally or through social media: Calling for, or justifying the killing or harming of Jews – 76% | +29% | 1.6x |
| Comparing Israel to Nazis | Comparing Israel to Nazi Germany – 37% | Witnessed graffiti, posters, or fliers with Nazi imagery – 54% | +17% | 1.5x |
| Lack of confidence in complaint mechanisms | Lack of confidence about making a complaint – 38% | Not confident to lodge complaint without risk of discrimination – 51% | +13% | 1.3x |

Examination of the table reveals a 1.5- to threefold rise across all four indicators of antisemitism, alongside a 1.3-fold decline in Jewish people's confidence in their universities' complaint systems. The strongest evidence that campuses have become increasingly unsafe for Jewish students is the threefold reduction in class attendance following 7 October.

These findings provide quantitative evidence of the post–7 October eruption of full-blown antisemitism—a sentiment that has been lurking on campuses since the turn of the century (Rutland & Allington, 2023). While the quantitative comparison offers insight into the rise in antisemitism rates, the full extent of its nature and scope could only be revealed through the integration of both quantitative and qualitative data collected in this survey. These findings give rise to a series of recommendations for cultural reform on campuses.

SUMMARY OF KEY FINDINGS & RECOMMENDATIONS

7.1 Antisemitism is Systemic Across University Systems.

Antisemitism was revealed across systems, in policy enforcement, disciplinary procedures, administration, teaching and research practices and coursework materials.

Recommendation: The persistent gap between rhetoric and action—where universities profess zero tolerance for antisemitism but take little to no concrete action to prevent it—needs to be addressed. Institutions must demonstrate the same level of commitment to tackling antisemitism as they have shown in addressing sexual harassment. While the two social maladies differ markedly in nature and characteristics, lessons can be drawn from the impact of serious institutional commitment.

7.2 Addressing Antisemitism in Both Physical and Online Spaces

Virtual campuses increasingly merge with physical environments, with the boundaries between them becoming blurred. Participants report that both the physical and virtual campuses are equally hostile.

Recommendation: Universities need to develop policies that ensure the safety of Jewish people not only on physical campuses but also within virtual spaces. As the boundaries between these spaces continue to blur, institutions must proactively address antisemitism across both domains, including broader outreach efforts such as prohibiting hate speech by staff and students—even beyond the confines of the university community.

7.3 The Impact of Campus Imagery

Campus environments and imagery are among the most influential factor affecting Jewish students' and staff members' sense of safety and inclusion.

Recommendation: There needs to be strict prohibition of campus defacement. Universities must enforce and strengthen existing policies that prohibit and penalise the defacement of public spaces. Campuses should be cleared of unauthorised posters, flyers, megaphone use during class hours, and other physical disruptions. Their removal is expected to significantly contribute to restoring a sense of safety.

7.4 Jewish people's freedom of speech has been silenced

Recommendation: Universities need to implement explicit educational measures to restore and protect this right. Effective initiatives may include university-led public debates, compulsory educational modules for all students and staff, and a requirement that coursework materials relating to the Middle East present all sides of the conflict fairly and equally.

7.5 Antisemitism has become normalised

Regardless of the campus or the specific segment of the Jewish university population surveyed, findings consistently show that antisemitic culture has become pervasive and normalised across Australian universities.

Recommendation: Universities need to take immediate, strong, and decisive action to challenge and reverse this normalisation of antisemitic discourse. This can only be achieved through a dual strategy of education, combined with rigorous enforcement and disciplinary processes. Hate-driven discourse inevitably leads to hateful actions. If left unaddressed, escalation is inevitable.

7.6 The majority of participants equate antisemitism with anti-Zionism

Recommendation: Universities need to fully adopt the definition of antisemitism as understood by the majority of Jewish people, treating it as non-negotiable—just as other minority groups are granted the right to define their own identities. Accordingly, a suite of policies and disciplinary procedures must be developed and implemented to prevent this form of antisemitic harassment.

7.7 Jewish staff and students Lack Confidence in the Universities' Disciplinary Systems

More than half of the participants reported lacking confidence in their ability to lodge a complaint without risking discrimination or other repercussions.

Recommendation: Universities need to establish centralised complaint systems dedicated to addressing antisemitism on campus in all its forms, including those related to the Middle East conflict and anti-Zionism. These systems should be staffed by specially trained officers with understanding of contemporary manifestations of antisemitism, Jewish history—including the Jewish people's three-millennia-long connection to the land of Israel—and the impact of anti-Israel bias on Jewish individuals. The centralised disciplinary system should be mandated to address all forms of antisemitic expression on campus, including inappropriate teaching materials, biased practices in nomination processes, and other forms of offensive antisemitic conduct.

7.8 Responses are not uniform across universities.

The high variability among Australian universities in the ranking of their actions on antisemitism suggest that some may be more effective in addressing certain issues of antisemitism than others.

Recommendation: Further research is needed to systematically evaluate university actions and identify effective practices.

8 CONCLUSION

The findings of this survey align with those of campus antisemitism studies conducted in other Western countries, including the UK, USA, Canada, and Europe (e.g., Lierens, 2024; Santos and Yogev, 2023; U.S. House of Representatives, 2024). In today's globalized world, it took a few weeks for the COVID-19 virus to spread to each corner of the planet. Similarly, it seems to have taken only one day for the brutal massacre of Jews and non-Jews in Israel on October 7, to trigger a rapid surge of antisemitism on university campuses worldwide.

Rabbi Lord Jonathan Sacks (2020) famously described antisemitism as a virus that mutates. He compared it to a social disease, noting that just as biological viruses adapt to their environments, antisemitism evolves in response to societal changes. In the Middle Ages, antisemitism was anchored in religious hostility; in the 20th century, it was anchored in racial ideologies; and in the 21st century, it is anchored in anti-Zionism—the denial of Jewish self-determination.

As institutions that shape intellectual discourse and lead academic thought, universities bear a profound responsibility to confront this modern mutation of antisemitism. It is imperative that they take decisive action to eradicate antisemitic hostility from their campuses and uphold their commitment to fostering safe, inclusive, and respectful learning environments.

Universities must act now to stop campus tribalism and restore the foundational values of academic conduct—respectful dialogue, ethical engagement, and shared responsibility toward all members of the university community.

APPENDIX C

EXEMPLAR EXCERPTS FROM QUALITATIVE DATA

Category: The Campus Environment

Theme: Physical and virtual campus environments: hostile, excluding and unsafe for Jews.

Exemplary excerpts:

- The vile chants shouted at the recent protest were quite unnerving. While I was sitting in class it was impossible to focus while people outside were chanting intifada, calling for the death of Jews and Israelis. It is incredibly scary to walk around campus knowing that these people are around you.
- On the … university encampment the members were using microphones and yelling "f off Zionists" and "bye bye Zionists".
- Constant barrage of anti-Israel posters - everywhere - on doors, windows, posts and even chalk on the footpaths
- Chalk saying "Zionists not welcome"
- Certain students and student bodies labelling Zionists as racists, genocide lovers; Israeli guest lecturers cancelled owing to pressure from these students; posters around campus showing a Nazi-like caricature of a Jew representing Israel saying "if I don't steal it someone else will;" people protesting with signs saying that Israel is a terrorist state
- Handed brochures with Hitler's face with Magen David. Posters with talks of Global Intifada and "come and Hear who is Hamas"
- Posters including the words of the "case for the intifada" and "who are Hamas". Protests which made me feel unsafe on campus. Needing a security escort to come into campus.
- Recently I heard chanting on campus "Zionist's aren't welcome here". Prior to this it was lies on posters - how Israel was created as a mean to control the Middle East, how it is evil etc… accusations of genocide every day on the posters, ripping of kidnapped posters, and all staff announcements on the intranet from various staff members.
- Posters of the hostages taken by Hamas defaced and torn down, stickers with the Israeli flag crossed out in prominent public spaces and amenities (toilets, on drinking fountains, poles), innumerable posters depicting the map of Israel in Palestinian flag colours (to suggest Israel be destroyed and replaced by a total Palestinian state), posters saying "Zionists not welcome here", speeches and megaphones shouting "From the River to the Sea" and "Globalise the Intifada" and absolutely no acknowledgement that this would be threatening to Jewish students and staff, students / protestors publicly interrupting lectures and disrupting the teaching, protestors aggressively pushing petitions in your face when you're trying to get into a building…
- The encampment where people refuse to talk and walk around with their faces covered with keffiyehs - Megaphones being used to scream into people's ears close up
- Swastika engraved in staff cafeteria
- Graffiti on university property "Zionists are Nazis"

Theme: Constraint movement on campus; interruptions to campus core businesses

Exemplary excerpts:

- Locked out of Melbourne Connect because of anti-Israel protestors
- Hijacking of the Arts Degrees Graduation ceremony
- I was not able to use the Arts West building to study or work in, like I normally would
- Encampments on campus blocking entrances to buildings
- My lecture theatre was outside the .... encampment and I had to walk through to get to the theatre. On my way out of the theatre I saw a group of protestors linking arms preventing Jewish students from entering, most notably those who told the protestors to do so were Arab men who didn't even attend the university
- I walked to a meeting I needed to attend in the ... building and there was a protest right out the front of the building. The building was in lockdown, I had to ask the police that were in attendance where to get in. They directed me incorrectly and I had to walk right up to the protest only to be turned away. I had to go to a side door, I had to prove I was staff and that I had a meeting in the building, all the while having to listen to the protesters. I was shaken up and my anxiety was through the roof by the time I got into the building
- The Israeli women who were invited to the campus for their exchange program being locked in a room with aggressive protestors and then being asked to leave. Now all Jewish or other students who may have been interested in the exchange can no longer do it
- The encampments that blocked everything during my graduation and a man wearing a terrorist scarf sitting right next to me at my graduation

Theme: Needing to hide Jewish identity; avoiding campus

Exemplary excerpts:

- I am a first-year student and have not yet told anyone at the uni that I am Jewish
- I have specifically chosen a distant education course in order for me to avoid attending the campus
- ...the presence of the encampment as well as the antisemitic chants have drastically affected me, while on campus I was constantly checking these groups' social medias in an attempt to always avoid going anywhere near them, even taking much longer indirect routes to avoid even passing them. Furthermore, their presence had a significant impact on my mental health, the last few weeks feeling as though I couldn't attend my university, making sure that I don't look "too Jewish" to avoid being the victim of racial vilification, feeling unsafe to represent my Jewish culture
- I was in my office, unable to leave, because of the violence of the student protests. For the first time in my life, I was afraid to be Jewish, afraid to reveal my identity
- I deliberately stay off campus as much as possible in the hope of avoiding direct encounters with antisemitism

- At the Paddington campus there have been protests to free Palestine and there are hundreds of posters all over campus. Constantly chanting “from the river to the sea Palestine be free”. I know that means the elimination of Jewish people and I am afraid. There is nothing that is pro-Israel. I chose UNSW as it is known in the community as JEW NSW. I am afraid to tell anyone I’m Jewish and I’m afraid to produce Jewish artwork

- I was spat on for wearing my Star of David necklace. This has happened twice. Also, plenty of friendly non-Jews have gone up to me telling me to hide my Star of David for my own safety

Theme: Hostility toward Jews across unions

Exemplary excerpts:

- NTEU circulating letters condemning Israel without mentioning Hamas or the October 7 attacks or hostages and holding a “wear your kaffiyeh to work day” with no thought to how Jewish students and staff may feel.
- Jewish students see purple Student Union gazebos in the middle of the encampment and feel alienated by their own student representative body
- My union has engaged in some hate speech, lots of signs around campus calling for an “intifada”. Most notably I went to speak to the protesters and asked if they thought the hostages should be released, and they replied with “those Jews deserved it”.
- … the ANU Student Association - a body that is elected to apolitically represent students has been the greatest perpetrator of antisemitism. Displaying and giving out Palestinian flags, encouraging students to go to antisemitic marches and putting in student newspapers and welcome booklets pages upon pages of horrifyingly antisemitic contents
- I attended a student council meeting and during the council there were various Nazi salutes
- The official Sydney Uni student union group “Autonomous Collective Against Racism” …exists to ensure that no "Zionist" students can run for student council (SRC). In practice, this involves scanning social media accounts of prospective new candidates and barring any Jewish students unless they outwardly condemn Israel
- Blocked from Facebook pages by the student Union

Category: The Student Experience

Theme: Ignored, cancelled, expelled

Exemplary excerpts:

- Being asked to leave my share house with other university students because of “political differences” and different “values”
- People … actively ignoring me where we used to all be really friendly. One kid invited everyone in my course (it’s a small course) to a house party except myself. Many people who used to be my friends from uni have unfollowed me on social media and shared harmful propaganda because they do not know any better.

- I have experienced people gossiping about me when they thought I wasn't in the vicinity, saying things like "Jew hatred can't be that bad... especially at Melbourne Uni," in relation to me specifically, alongside people in my degree going around spreading word about how I'm a Zionist as if I'm the scum of the earth. Some people have even unfollowed me on Instagram, give me dirty looks, eye rolls, mock my personality (I've heard that when they thought I wasn't in the room once again), and just a general energy where people are disinterested in talking or communicating with me since October 7th
- Previous "friends" no longer speak to me. There was an incident on campus where my Jewish friend got shoved for speaking up
- I was uninvited from gathering due to my "political standing" which I had never shared with them and also noticed all their Jewish friends had been uninvited
- Some academics stopped speaking or dealing with me completely

Theme: Attacks on Jewish students by other students

Exemplary excerpts:

- I was spat at by one of the pro-Palestinian students as I was walking to the library
- A girl I walked past who knew I was Jewish saying "f the Jews" under her breath
- I have been called a "Zionist pig". Been followed. Made to feel that I need to hide my identity
- I have regularly been called "Jew boy" or "Jew" and singled out by passersby while with no Jewish friends
- heard students talking about anyone who supports Israel as not being human
- Getting asked "how many babies have you killed today" due to simply walking around on campus with a Kippah - plus many other slurs and accusations such as being labelled "a right-wing fascist" that should be kicked off campus, again after doing nothing but wearing a Kippah
- Other students singing Nazi songs in my presence, knowing I am Jewish
- I was included on the list of Zionists who were doxed. As a result, I was trolled by someone on Instagram who made reference to the fact my HDR studies would be at risk and my academic future would be under attack due to my being on the "list"
- My uni friend ... told me that she doesn't want to go to a restaurant in Melbourne because the chef there is from Israel. I felt very confused as I thought she knew I was Jewish and confused on how somebody could think that an Israeli chef in Melbourne can hurt or impact the war in anyway
- I was approached by 4 "pro-Palestinian" students who called me names such as a "pig", a "genocide supporter" and a "Nazi". They tried to intimidate and harass me whilst I was waiting to attend a class. I asked them if they would like to have a civil discussion about the conflict and they were reluctant to

- One incident was upon finding out I was Jewish, another student began to complain about how many Jews there are at USyd. When he found out he beat me in a maths quiz, he yelled out “Revenge!” This same person said he did his HSC by imagining the markers were Zionists and he was charging into battle against them; when asked what a Zionist is, he replied “Jews”

- I've been verbally assaulted when I wore a "bring them home" necklace, someone came up to me and shouted "Fuck you Zionazi" in my ear

Exemplary excerpts:

- The same tutor asking me my “ethnicity” on two separate occasions upon noticing that I stayed silent in the Israel discussions and asking where my family name is from. Being too afraid to say “Jewish” so saying Eastern Europe instead.

- Hearing students wanting to work out who is Jewish and talking about how they might do so, such as asking about where their name comes from while I was sitting in the room, I guess they didn’t know I was Jewish but from a room of 20 people no one thought to tell them that it’s wrong to go searching for Jews like it’s a witch hunt. The way they said Jewish with such venom was quite terrifying for me given that my surname is a Jewish name and if they think of me during their witch hunt it won’t take long to figure it out
- When pro Palestine activists entered my lectures and forced everyone to participate in a vote to split the classroom into who was pro-Israel and who was anti-Israel. They took a photo of the results

- I've been singled out and made to feel alienated and afraid and having to hide or defend my Jewishness by my tutor and unit coordinator, that made me feel distressed and scared and alienated, separate and bad for the team, as they were negatively affected and encouraged to treat / view me differently as I am Jewish from the faculty

Theme: Propaganda/antisemitism/discrimination by lecturers

Exemplary excerpts:

- A tutor described Jewish people as “the oppressed that became the oppressors” during a class that was about celebrity culture
- A professor saying that all casualties in Gaza should be considered non-combatant because Israel put the Gazans in a bad enough situation that Hamas should be considered protected civilians

- I was in a subject where we had a lecture on the Israeli-Palestine conflict where the lecture opened by saying that she will be antisemitic in the lecture, which caused me to have a panic attack after the lecture and eventually drop the subject because I felt unsafe in the subject

- I determine courses according to lectures/ tutors' biographies and if they are affiliated with antisemitic groups, I choose another course as I am scared of being discriminated against

- My tutor for Art History walked into class wearing a keffiyeh and, unprompted by any student, began to explain his reasons for wearing a “symbol of resistance against a genocidal regime". The non-topical nature of his speech, and the uncalled-for political posturing were deeply unneeded and offensive to my own family in Israel, who are by no means genocidal or oppressive

- I have encountered teachers saying during lectures "free Palestine from the river to the sea" making me so uncomfortable during class, fellow students who knew I was Jewish saying "stop talking Jew" when I never even stated my support for Israel to them
- I do not feel comfortable or safe ... My lecturers, subject coordinators and tutors all impose their personal opinion of the Israel-Gaza conflict on the class and don't encourage debate or a balanced discussion. My tutors emailed my classes encouraging us to attend the schools strike for Palestine as it was an "effective public relations campaign" and raises awareness for the injustice of Palestinian people. My educators signed the petition which called for "UTS to cut all ties with Israel" - meaning they want to cut ties with me? Anti-Zionism IS Anti-Semitism. Why are there posters everywhere reading "from the river to the sea ...". Why are my subject coordinators publishing information which is really hurtful to Jewish people?"
- In a citizenship and communications class, one student used Free Palestine protests as an example of how protesting works saying "no matter how much we protest, nothing seems to happen". The teacher then responded saying "soon the government will appeal to reason and stop supporting Israel and go on to support Palestine". It made me feel like the pro-Israel position was simply viewed as wrongful and invalid. As the rest of the class nodded in agreement, I realised I couldn't stand up for what I believed was right. Everyone seemed to share pro-Palestinian/anti-Israeli values
- My tutors wearing a Palestinian flag on their shirts everyday

Theme: Antisemitism and hostility within learning settings; disruptions to learning

Exemplary excerpts:

- My lecturer announced that attendance to our class would not be taken due to the encampment and encouraged everyone to follow what was happening in Gaza. I later saw him at the protest, actively participating and confronted him about influencing his own political agenda in the classroom. I described feeling unsafe on campus as a Jew, he told me to go on zoom. I am now anxious to go to this class
- Being a student at a university in which a faculty member publicly expressed on social media that Zionists were not safe around her, in any space whatsoever
- At the very beginning of one of my classes, the club/group "Students for Palestine" issued fliers to everyone, urging for us to strike ... repeatedly said that "genocide" is being committed - felt incredibly isolated and shocked that this was allowed in a classroom setting. I was extremely uncomfortable for the remainder of the lesson
- In a maths lecture in the first or second week of university a pro-Palestinian speaker co-opted the forum and made a statement that included somewhat inflammatory and certainly not objective statements about the war in Gaza.

- When people disturbed my lecture (that I paid for) twice about how there's a genocide but that's not true at all, it made me feel unsafe
- People coming into my classroom to promote the anti-Israel encampment
- Disruption of lectures and even graduation ceremonies. The one-sided material given and talked about at some lectures. UNBEARABLE
- Only just a few weeks ago I was sitting in the library next to a group of uni students when I heard, and I quote "If Hitler had done his job properly, the Israel and Palestine war wouldn't be happening"
- Students in class discussing the effects of boycotting Israel as though this is a consensual matter. The question was not whether this is morally ok, but rather, how effective is it
- Sitting in quiet libraries and people walking around putting pro-Palestinian posters on tables

Category: The Academics and Staff Experience

Theme: Jewish academics and staff personally attacked, targeted; feeling unsafe

Exemplary excerpts:

- I was assaulted by a Deakin student who I have reported internally and provided the student's name, photos and contact details of several eyewitnesses
- Demonising comments from colleagues. Defamation of my image on poster. Derogatory drawings posted in public spaces
- I was openly falsely accused of - and threatened with disciplinary action for - allegedly providing favourable treatment to a rabbi over other faith leaders in relation to a university event on the basis that I am Jewish
- A Jewish colleague has had an office door trashed; another has been asked to teach from home
- Numerous colleagues could no longer look at me, and stopped speaking to me after Oct 7th, or were unusually cold, unfriendly, or suspicious. I feel strongly that decisions about whether or not to work together were made on the basis of my identity or perceived political opinion because of my identity
- On October 9th, had a student who identifies as Lebanese Palestinian enter the lab in which I teach 25 students. He came in, unfurled his Keffiyeh in front of me, then rolled it up and put it on. He knows that I am Jewish as we have had many discussions about it prior
- I was asked to provide a list of Jews who opposed the Overland petition by someone with a watermelon emoji in their name
- Urination in an ex-pat Israeli staff members' working area (their name is not public knowledge), and writing "RESIGN".
- Being doxxed on Twitter by a Senior Professor in my faculty
- My colleague, who is not Jewish, but who spent time in Israel and married an Israeli, was accused of taking bribes by our Lead Tutor, who is not Jewish, because he argued in favour of a student's higher mark. An ex-tutor from the unit, who was friendly with the Lead tutor, suggested it is because of my colleague's connection to Israel. Upon further inquiry, the ex-tutor/friend detailed our Lead Tutor's history of antisemitism including a specific disdain for me, although I never disclosed that I am Jewish in my limited interactions with the Lead Tutor. The subject of my heritage is not relevant to our unit in any way. I was also not hired back to tutor on that unit, nor was my colleague with the Israeli wife.

- Extreme anti-Israel sentiment that quickly morphed into personal vitriol when I disagreed. Accused of authoring genocide. Doxxed on X
- A student in my class of about 15 who was asked to use creative arts in designing a lesson, suggested, (knowing I was Jewish) that they act out being Hitler. This was a clear attempt to intimidate

Theme: Antisemitism among academics and staff

Exemplary excerpts:

- When a colleague described … the Holocaust as being a term reserved to describe the trauma of "white" people
- Peer saying - does not like Israelis but Jews are fine
- My experience has been at [university name omitted] with the rewriting of a piece I wrote for them. They "edited" it so dramatically- and refused to change it, even though I had been asked to write as a subject specialist- that the piece was incorrect and misleading. It was so awful, and their response so intransigent that I had to withdraw it from publication.
- … a colleague said to me, "Jews caused all the problems in the world. If the Arabs wiped them out, they would be doing the world a favour." When I asked if it was a joke the colleague said it was not
- The official USYD staff communication channel, Viva Engage (formerly Yammer) is a cesspool of misinformation and hate, with daily calls to sign boycott petitions and condemn Israel and constantly stating things like there is no evidence for rape on October 7 …including links to really concerning fringe websites. These posts appear in the email inbox of all staff at the university and apparently are not moderated. Day after day of these email notifications and the visual onslaught of posters and speeches (by staff, not just students) makes the campus a very hostile place for anyone who is Jewish
- Fellow academics promoting barely disguised Jew-hatred
- Academics in the Law School organised a hate fest discussion on the conflict
- Former [details omitted] of UNSW continuously posting online under his title "Emeritus Professor of UNSW" outrageous anti-Israel posts. Constantly maligning online Jewish alumni. Complete refusal of UNSW to take any disciplinary action
- …having colleagues inform me that as I am white. I cannot experience racism

Theme: BDS, cancelling Jewish/Israeli academics

Exemplary excerpts:

- Cancellation of Israeli lecturer in my faculty
- Cancellation by Engineering of the Technion Professor's visit

- … the cancelling of the visiting Israeli academic
- … a postgraduate conference disinviting a speaker due to the organisation they represent tackling antisemitism. A formal complaint was made, the investigation concluded it was an ""outside function"" merely renting space at the university, so the university would not take the investigation forward. This is despite the chair of the conference not even mentioning their role within the conference committee, but instead introducing themselves as a researcher at the university in their email disinviting the speaker. The university has a policy on antisemitism, but seems unwilling to apply it when considering outside bookings.

Category: The Universities' Systems Failure

Theme: Discrimination against Jews by professional staff and management

Exemplary excerpts:

- Another encounter was with an International Student Advisor …. I told her that I want to have my recreational leave and then a sick leave back home. She asked me “where is home? Portugal?” … I told her “no, Israel”. The second I said that her face changed, and she just told me she can’t help me and it’s best I’ll contact another advisor. Practically expelled me from her room. And after she closed it, I was sticking around pretty shocked she screamed something like “OMG! Blablabla” (couldn’t hear the rest of it).
- The institution denying me special considered for Jewish holidays. … and the Muslim students were granted special consideration for Ramadan and I wasn't for Pesach.
- A very senior executive has been overly scrutinising my social media posts and publicly criticised them trying to shame me in front of senior colleagues with mocking comments about my position at [university name omitted]. in turn I have seen that she had liked an anti-Semitic post on social media which gives me a strong clue to her motivation. This person is also trying to restrict my academic freedom in other ways

- I had students in my class at UNSW perform a Nazi salute to me on three occasions. I reported this to UNSW College ….. They did not take my complaint seriously. I reported it to the NSW Police, who took the case very seriously UNSW College Admin only took the complaint seriously once the police were involved. This occurred last term. For more than the past 12 months, my contract hours have been renewed every term, with the same hours and the same classes, however since complaining about antisemitism, UNSW College did not renew my contract. The only possible explanation in my opinion is that this is because I raised the issue of antisemitism with the police.

Theme: Systems’ failure to deal with complaints and protect Jewish students and staff

Exemplary excerpts:

- I’m on cloud campus - but during online lectures, there have been ‘casual’ comments made against Israelis and slowly against Jews. This was made by the same handful of students - I reported this to my professor but they told me to just ignore them and complete the Unit. The fact that I was told to move on and no one told these students off for their antisemitic and racist comments made me feel like I do not matter, insignificant

- I had placement last year at a known antisemitic school, guess, and once they found out I was Jewish, the admin and management attitudes changed and I felt unsafe, always looking over my shoulder - when I reported this to my placement officer, I was once again told to finish up my placement and move on. No actions have ever been taken, I was just told to move on and ignore their hatred through my entire degrees and placements. Their apathy hit me deep, time and time again

- Multiple students in my course … made posts following the attacks—… in which the attack was described as justified (in other words, it was terror apologism, not just anti-Zionism). When I went to the university and attempted to have action taken against these students, as my course has explicit rules about discriminatory behaviour and statements (including online), the university weasel-worded and equivocated me and ultimately did nothing about it, essentially telling me that the posts were made out of 'ignorance' and because I couldn't prove the posts were made with malicious intent, literally defending terrorism didn't count. This was before Israel had even responded militarily and these course members knew that I was Israeli and could have had friends and family die in the attack.
- During an Anti-Israel protest in the Hawken engineering building a person smashed a window and escaped. UQ has not followed with an investigation or a concrete attempt to identify the attacker… During one of the days of the first half of May, in extensive video interview, participants of the anti-Israel camp stated they 'would be terrorists'. …UQ has claimed that it has is taking disciplinary action, yet there is no evidence of any disciplinary action that was taken

- Staff and Students denying the state of Israel has a right to exist. The managements unwillingness to address any of this on campus up to needing a committee to figure out if antisemitic posters were really antisemitic
- The university responds to complaints from Jewish staff by saying they are taking concerns on board but never take any action. I feel that if the same were experienced by any other minority it would be the targeted minority group that was called on to define what counts as harassment for them, however, this has not been extended to Jewish people. My boss has told me it is imaginary that there is any threat to Jewish staff and students on campus and we are simply 'feeding each other's anxiety'
- I was leaving campus on the Wentworth footbridge, and saw a poster titled 'The Case for a Global Intifada' with a bulldozer through the Gaza fence on it, advertising an event on campus the next day. I immediately felt intense rage and fear; I drank some water to try stop myself from vomiting. My smart watch showed my heart rate spike. I kept crossing the bridge, I didn't rip down the posters, I just took a photo. At the end I saw two men putting up more, smiling and joking about something, so I took a photo of them and walked off as quick as I could without making it seem like I was running. After all the discussions that day about campus security allegedly removing posters, and free speech, and the Vice Chancellor emailing over and over about both sides and calm political discussions, it really hammered home that no one really gives a shit about us, and our concerns are not valid

- University administrations denied my complaint against protesters using the chant 'intifada' on the basis that the word is context related and that the university was not responsible for my feelings. Being offered counselling after every complaint of racism made to the university - this reduces my pain and the effect of the antisemitism, means perpetrators are not held responsible, and puts the blame on me as though I am the one who needs to change because of my experience.

EXECUTIVE SUMMARY

Introduction and Background

The 7 October massacre is the most traumatic event for the Jewish world since the Holocaust. The atrocities of this pogrom lifted a veil on age-old antisemitism, breaking inhibitions and allowing it to resurface in stark and unsettling ways (Smith, 2024). A particularly concerning aspect of this resurgence is the role of universities in the free world, which have become epicentres of antisemitic activism, often granting it moral legitimacy and academic authority.

A core value of universities is academic freedom, including free scholarly and respectful debate. Since 7 October, this core value has been undermined with strident protests, university encampments and cancel culture. Tribalism has continued to be entrenched, with a polarising effect, so that Jewish students and staff, who believe Israel has the right to exist, have felt excluded.

It is important to stress that the anti-Jewish attacks on university campuses overseas and in Australia did not suddenly emerge in a vacuum. They were part of a growing trend which began with the UN World Conference Against Racism, Racial Discrimination, Xenophobia and Related Intolerance held in South Africa in 2001. Subsequently, the Boycott, Divestment and Sanctions (BDS) movement emerged, especially on university campuses. These developments were heightened by the accusations of apartheid and settler-colonialism against Israel, with the theoretical constructs of intersectionality and critical race theory adding to the growth of campus antisemitism.

Survey Aims

To assess the extent and nature of antisemitism on Australian campuses, the Australian Academic Alliance Against Antisemitism (5A) conducted a comprehensive survey which aimed to:

i. assess the extent of antisemitism in Australian universities, as experienced by Jewish students and staff; and
ii. assess the extent to which universities in Australia are taking active measures to ensure that their campuses are free from antisemitism.

Methodology

The 5A study employed a mixed-methods approach for collecting and analysing both qualitative and quantitative survey data. The survey employed a non-probability sample, designed for completion by Jewish students and staff at Australian universities. It was administered online, allowing for anonymous participation with data being collected from 16 April to 31 July 2024. A total of 548 responses met the criteria for inclusion. The distribution of participants across roles consisted of 66% (n = 395) students, 25% (n = 149) staff, 6% (n = 34) administration or management, and 3% (n = 18) other.

Responses were obtained from 30 universities. The largest number of respondents came from Monash University, the University of Sydney, the University of New South Wales, and the University of Melbourne—a total of 313, accurately reflecting the distribution of Jewish students across Australian universities. Data cleaning and data weighting were applied to ensure the validity and reliability of the results.

Qualitative Analysis Results

In response to the first question, which asked "If you encountered antisemitism, please describe the most impactful experience of antisemitism that you have encountered on campus since 7 October 2023", 416 respondents shared experiences. The thematic analysis revealed four categories and their themes:

The campus environment category: posters, symbols, slogans, distribution of flyers; constraints on freedom of movement on campus; hostile behaviour of activists at rallies, encampments, and student union meetings; use of megaphones; being ignored, cancelled, excluded, needing to hide one's identity; verbal attacks; and, in a few cases, physical threats and attacks.

The student experience category: discriminatory behaviour and hostile comments by lecturers, tutors, and fellow students; identifying and singling out Jewish and Israeli students in class; political statements about the conflict in class; disruption of classes by protestors; disruption of learning; and Jewish students feeling they need to hide their identity or drop classes because of the behaviour of staff.

The academics and staff experience category: hostility to Israel; overt antisemitism in classes, interactions with colleagues, and online faculty forums; discriminatory actions including failure to renew contracts; students' attempts to intimidate staff; targeting staff in their offices; doxxing and cancellation; and National Tertiary Education Union and student union resolutions and actions.

The universities' systems failure category: unwillingness to listen to concerns; failure to act on complaints; dismissal of complaints as invalid or over-sensitive; and failure to provide a safe learning and work environment.

Finally, the combined qualitative and quantitative data suggest that most participants equate anti-Zionism with antisemitism.

Quantitative Results Analysis

The physical and virtual environment

Respondents indicated their experiences of witnessing antisemitic expressions on campus since 7 October, with 93% witnessed graffiti, posters or fliers delegitimising the right of Israel to exist; 92% experienced verbally or through social media delegitimising the right of Israel to exist; and, 85% experienced verbally or through social media derogatory comments about Israelis (Israeli people).

These responses were consistent across students and staff, but more pronounced with students, with only the deligitimisation (posters & social media) being statistically significant.

Personal experiences

Personal experiences were considered in relation to hearing and being subjected to antisemitic comments, insults, and harassment, as well as feeling isolated or cancelled, and experiencing physical assault.

Three quarters (74%) of Jewish students heard antisemitic comments, with 67% of the overall sample (students and staff) exposed to this type of harassment; 43% of the sample reported feeling ignored or excluded; and 39% experienced insults or harassment on social media.

These findings reveal that antisemitic behaviour has become normalised across university campuses. Staff were more likely than students to report feeling excluded, while students reported higher rates of most other antisemitic experiences.

The findings suggest that 7 October triggered a "social earthquake," disrupting relationships both between and within the Jewish campus community.

Almost half of the participants (49%) reported decreased interaction with non-Jewish people; and 77% reported increased interaction with Jewish people, suggesting that Jewish people have been seeking refuge within their own community.

A smaller proportion moved in the opposite direction, with 5% reported decreased mixing with Jewish people; and 11% reported increased mixing with non-Jewish individuals. Qualitative data indicates that political anti-Zionist views may have contributed to a rift within the Jewish community, dividing the majority who identify as Zionists from the minority who do not.

Notable behavioural changes were reported post 7 October 2023, with 48% decrease in class attendance; 50% decrease in speaking Hebrew in public; and 56% increase in engagement with social media. Reduced class attendance due to lack of sense of safety may have long-term consequences for academic achievement and career progression.

Bifurcation of behavioural changes was found, with 39% reporting a decrease in wearing Jewish symbols versus 40% reporting an increase; 49% reported a decrease in publicly expressing political beliefs or their connection to Israel, versus 32% reporting an increase.

The sense of safety on campus was low, with only a third (34%) of Jewish students and staff reported feeling safe. Both the physical and virtual campus environments were perceived as equally unsafe. The rate of sense of unsafety for Jewish people is 3.47 higher than the rate of sense of unsafety found in the 2021 National Student Safety Survey (NSSS), in relation to sexual harassment (Heywood et al., 2022).

Perceptions of universities' policies and procedures

Sixty percent of participants rated their universities' actions against antisemitism between 0 and 3 on a scale from 0 to 10. By contrast, in the NSSS Survey, only 9.9% of students gave similarly low ratings for university action to address sexual harassment (Heywood et al., 2022).

Comparisons of rankings across universities revealed statistically significant differences, suggesting high variability between universities and lack of uniformity.

More than half of respondents (51%) reported having no confidence in the complaints system. This compares to only 23.5% of students in the NSSS survey who expressed a lack of confidence in complaint systems (Heywood et al., 2022). Only 27% of participants felt confident that they could lodge a complaint without risking discrimination. These findings point to a systemic failure of university management.

Cluster Analysis of Key Survey Items

A cluster analysis was applied to identify and differentiate sub-groups within the surveyed population. The participants' responses to campus antisemitism falls into four response types, revealing varying degrees of vulnerability among Jewish people.

Key Findings

- Antisemitism is systemic across university systems
- and has become normalised
- Virtual campuses increasingly merge with physical environments, with the boundaries between them becoming highly blurred, with both being equally hostile.
- Campus environments and imagery are among the most influential factors contributing to harassment and alienation of Jewish people.
- Most participants equate antisemitism with anti-Zionism.
- Jewish people's freedom of speech has been silenced.
- Jewish staff and students lack confidence in the universities' disciplinary systems.
- High variability was found within and between campuses in relation to actions against antisemitism.

Conclusion and Recommendations

Based on the survey's findings, 5A makes the following recommendations:

- Universities must demonstrate the same level of commitment to preventing antisemitism as they have shown in addressing sexual harassment.
- Adopt a definition of antisemitism, as understood by most Jewish people, treating this as non-negotiable.
- Establish a confidential and centralised antisemitism complaint system with trained staff.
- Create educational mandated modules on antisemitism for all stakeholders.
- Ensure the safety of Jewish people not only on physical campuses by preventing campus defacement, but also within virtual spaces.
- Set clear policies and enforcement in terms of protests, use of megaphones and class disruptions.
- Restore and protect freedom of speech for Jewish students and staff, through initiatives such as university-led public debates.
- Undertake further research to systematically evaluate university actions and identify effective practices.

In summary, we recommend that universities act now to stop campus tribalism and restore the foundational values of academic conduct—respectful dialogue, ethical engagement, and shared responsibility toward all members of the university community.

1 INTRODUCTION

The Establishment of the Australian Academic Alliance Against Antisemitism (5A)

The 7 October 2023 massacre stands as the most traumatic event in modern Jewish history since the Holocaust. For Jewish people worldwide, the atrocities of this pogrom lifted a veil on age-old antisemitism, breaking inhibitions and allowing it to resurface in stark and unsettling ways (Smith, 2024). This particularly manifested itself across university campuses in the Western world, which emerged as a key platform fostering this upsurge in antisemitism.

In response to this brutal Hamas attack on 7 October 2023 and the fact that, within a day, Hamas's massacre was being celebrated in academic circles as 'resistance' with almost no support for Jewish students and staff, the Australian Academic Alliance Against Antisemitism (5A) was born. A non-profit organisation, 5A has grown very quickly and today consists of academics and professional staff from across 32 Australian universities. It acts as the main body representing the voice of both Jewish and non-Jewish staff who are concerned with the emergence of antisemitism on their campus in the Australian tertiary sector.

The 5A's functional structure, from individual universities to state and federal representatives, has enabled the executive to be informed quickly of incidents and to take appropriate action. The organisation's reach includes activities in education, academic advice and peer support, responding to anti-Israeli and BDS activity, to the media and misinformation, supporting legal and medical professional educator groups, advocating for Jewish academics and education professionals with sector regulators and University executives as well as tertiary sector membership bodies, and supporting individual students across all levels in responding to their own adverse experiences of antisemitism and bias in the classroom, publishing and professional development.

The Campus Environment Post 7 October

One of the core traditional values of academic institutions is the cultivation of free scholarly debate across ideological divides. This foundational principle is essential for advancing the frontiers of knowledge and fostering high-quality research for the benefit of society. From this value stem a set of academic behavioural norms, including respectful dialogue that upholds the rights and dignity of others, mutual accountability within the academic community, and a shared responsibility to engage ethically with all members of the university.

In the months following 7 October 2023, these core values have eroded across Australian campuses. A culture of tribalism has taken hold, where staff and students from opposing ideological camps have ceased communicating; cancel culture is now widespread; and on some campuses, members of the dominant group have established encampments, forcefully excluding anyone suspected of affiliation with the targeted group ("Zios") and occupied university buildings. At a conference held at Queensland University of Technology, a Zionist-identifying academic was publicly shamed and labelled an "infiltrator"—all under the banner of free speech.

Although the encampments were eventually dismantled, tribalism on Australian campuses continues to deepen, with little meaningful intervention from university leadership. This survey portrays the grim, polarising manifestations of antisemitism on Australian campuses as experienced by Jewish students and staff.

The Foregrounding of Campus Antisemitism Before 7 Oct

It is important to stress that the anti-Jewish attacks on university campuses, which manifested themselves both overseas and in Australia after October 7, did not suddenly emerge in a vacuum. They were part of a growing trend which began with the UN World Conference Against Racism, Racial Discrimination, Xenophobia and Related Intolerance held in South Africa in 2001. Subsequently, the Boycott, Divestment and Sanctions (BDS) movement emerged, especially on university campuses. These developments were heightened by the accusations of apartheid and settler-colonialism against Israel, with the theoretical constructs of intersectionality and critical race theory adding to the growth of campus antisemitism. In addition to right-wing antisemitism, protests by left-wing activists from groups such as Students for Justice in Palestine have increased both overseas and locally (Rutland and Allington, 2023). These negative feelings towards Jews were exacerbated during the period of the COVID Pandemic.

Since 2021, there has been an increase in the anti-Israel narrative on Australian campuses, with anti-Israel resolutions being passed and anti-Israel articles being published in campus newspapers, together with the resultant uptick of antisemitic incidences. The narrative persistently morphs into an antisemitic narrative. This leaves Jewish university students feeling vulnerable and under attack, as clearly demonstrated by the survey initiated by the Zionist Federation of Australia [ZFA] with the support of Australasian Union of Jewish Students [AUJS] and the Scanlon Foundation. The survey, conducted by the Social Research Centre over a three-week period from April to June 2023 among Jewish students put forward the aim to "understand Jewish students' experiences of antisemitism in Australian universities" (Social Research Centre, 2023, p. 3).

The findings revealed that 64% of Jewish university students experienced some form of antisemitism. Of these, 47% described intimidation by people or events; 37% relating to tropes of Jewish money, power or influence; 37% comparing Israel to Nazi Germany; 30% Holocaust denial or minimisation; and 25% being singled out or excluded over Israel. Another key finding is that 19% of students have stayed away from campus to avoid antisemitism. Finally, the survey found that Jewish students have a lack of confidence in the complaints process at various universities with only 14% making a complaint after an incident (Social Research Centre, 2023, p. 1). These findings are very relevant to the present study as they pre-empt the increase in antisemitism reported by the current study.

This background foregrounds the eruption of the anti-Jewish actions and attacks throughout the Western world following the 7 October pogrom. A particularly concerning aspect of this eruption of antisemitism is the role of universities in Western countries, which have become epicentres for antisemitic activism, granting it moral legitimacy and academic authority. This bears a troubling resemblance to the pre-World War II era, when Western academia became awash with the pseudo-theory of eugenics that provided the scientific rationale and moral justification for the persecution and extermination of Jewish people (Smith, 2020; Johnson, 2018).

It has been noted that while pre-Holocaust antisemitism on campuses focused on Judaism as a race, following the establishment of Israel, campus antisemitism has shifted toward denying Jews the right to self-determination in their ancestral homeland – Israel and vilifying Jewish students and staff who support that right (Taylor, 2021; Cohen, 2017).

To assess the extent and nature of antisemitism on Australian campuses, the Australian Academic Alliance Against Antisemitism (5A) conducted a comprehensive survey, collecting data from April to July 2024.

The objectives of the survey were to:

i. assess the extent of antisemitism in Australian universities, as experienced by Jewish students and staff, and
ii. the extent to which universities in Australia are taking active measures to ensure that their campuses are free from antisemitism.

2 LITERATURE REVIEW

The rapidly deteriorating safety of Jewish people on campuses and the sharp rise in antisemitism have garnered significant research attention, resulting in numerous publications. Santos and Yogev (2023) carried out the first known international survey of Jewish students and staff following 7 October 2023. Their sample included 202 Jewish university members from the U.S. (136), Canada (35), and Europe (31). The participants, with an average age of 35.1, completed an online survey between December 15, 2023, and January 7, 2024.

The findings revealed significant Increases after 7 October 2023 in hate speech against Jewish individuals and Israel; graffiti and distribution of pamphlets featuring Nazi or other known antisemitic symbols; doxing on social media; dehumanisation of Jewish individuals and Israelis; demonisation of Israel; public anti-Israel protests on campuses; prevalent anti-Israel activity on social media; and anti-Israel rhetoric in listserv emails, classroom statements by lecturers and students, and remarks by university employees outside the classroom. There were very few physical assaults, but "between 20 and 25% of respondents reported being victims of verbal harassment due to their nationality or religion" (Santos & Yogev, 2023, p. 10).

The findings also revealed notable decreases in engaging on social media (-1.23; $p < .001$); publicly expressing political beliefs (-1.16; $p < .001$), religious beliefs (-.91; $p < .001$), or connections to Israel (-.79; $p < .001$); and wearing a kippah (-.81; $p = .018$) or other Jewish symbols (-.67; $p = .002$) on campus.

Regarding trust in university systems, the findings indicated a consistent lack of confidence in senior leadership (e.g., university presidents) and in the willingness by Diversity, Equity, and Inclusion (DEI) units to address Jewish students' safety concerns (Santos & Yogev, 2023).

In the United States, the House Committee on Education and the Workforce conducted an intensive investigation into campus antisemitism, reviewing 400,000 pages of documents as evidence in their final report. The findings revealed significant failures by university leadership nationwide, some of which attracted global attention during highly publicised hearings featuring the presidents of Harvard University, the University of Pennsylvania, and the Massachusetts Institute of Technology. The report condemned the lack of accountability of university leadership for students committing vandalism on university property and faculty members preventing the enforcement of disciplinary actions against students who violate policies.

At Colombia University, similar to the University of Melbourne in Australia, students who took over university buildings avoided punishment (see https://www.abc.net.au/news/2024-05-22/pro-palestinian-melbourne-university-encampment/103881534). The House Committee Report highlights universities' unreasonable capitulation to encampment leaders' demands and the overall hostile environment for Jewish students. University leaders withheld support from Jewish students. In their public appearances, they projected commitment to combating antisemitism, while their private communications revealed the opposite. One key finding states: "Universities utterly failed to impose meaningful discipline for antisemitic behaviour that violated school rules and the law" (U.S. House of Representatives, 2024, p. 3).

Another comprehensive study of antisemitism across U.S. campuses was conducted by the Brandeis Maurice and Marilyn Cohen Center for Modern Jewish Studies (Wright et al., 2024). The aim of the study was to assess the impact of 7 October 2023 and the Israel-Hamas war on Jewish students and the response of colleges and universities. The report drew upon interviews at 23 U.S. campuses with Jewish students and staff, along with survey data from Jewish undergraduates.

Findings revealed that nearly two-thirds of participants rated antisemitism as the most pressing campus issue since 7 October 2023. The report also noted that this hostility was in the air, often implicit rather than explicitly anti-Jewish, with few physical threats reported. Nevertheless, it led to exclusion and targeting based on Jewish identity. Many Jewish students concealed their identity and avoided discussing Israel. Social relationships were highly impacted, creating divisions between Jewish and non-Jewish students. Jewish students reported ostracism and excluded from student groups. Most students interviewed had negative views of their university's statements and actions in response to the various antisemitic activities on campus (Wright et al., 2024).

These findings echoed in various internal investigations at specific universities, such as the Stanford report and the UCLA. In May 2024, a subcommittee at Stanford University published its report entitled: 'It's in the Air': Antisemitism and anti-Israeli bias at Stanford, and how to address it'. Data was collected through 50 listening sessions with over 300 undergraduates, graduate students, faculty, staff, alumni, and parents. Interviews were also held with senior and mid-level administrative officials at Stanford. The report concluded that > antisemitism exists today on the Stanford campus in ways that are widespread and pernicious. Some of this bias is expressed in overt and occasionally shocking ways, but often it is wrapped in layers of subtlety and implication, one or two steps away from blatant hate speech (Jewish Advisory Committee at Stanford University, Subcommittee on Antisemitism and Anti-Israeli Bias [Jewish Advisory Committee at Stanford University], 2024, p. 4).

The findings included Jewish students having to leave their dorms, facing ostracism and intimidation, and hiding their Jewish identity. Staff members reported that, for the first time in their lives, they felt physically unsafe. Tutors abused their academic positions and used class time for spouting antisemitic propaganda. Respondents highlighted the university's failure to condemn blatant antisemitism, a fear of retaliation among students if they do complain, and lack of trust in management. The report expressed deep concern about the normalisation of antisemitic and anti-Israeli rhetoric and the university's apparent indifference (Jewish Advisory Committee at Stanford University, 2024, p. 7).

Similarly, a shocking report by the Jewish Faculty Resilience Group at UCLA, released in December 2024, described how pro-terror protesters vandalised buildings on campus. These descriptions echoed events seen on the campus of the University of Melbourne (see https://www.freepalestinevic.org/media-watch/baillieu-library-graffitied-with-palestinian-militants-name/ ) and the University of Queensland (see https://www.couriermail.com.au/queensland-education/tertiary/uq-staff-members-office-allegedly-targeted-in-urine-attack-as-tensions-escalate-between-students/news-story/04415a784173da992e80df4c9117ceaa ).

The graffiti and chanting included hate speech such as: "beat that f##king Jew!", "glory to the martyrs", and "down with Israel". (Jewish Faculty Resilience Group, 2024, pp. 3-4). Israelis and Jews were targeted and there was a call to expel Israeli students from the university.

Like other reports, the university turned a blind eye to antisemitic attacks on Jews, and "all attempts to seek support from the administration either went unanswered or were dismissed as politically motivated, trivial, or unimportant" (Jewish Faculty Resilience Group, 2024, p. 4).

The Anti-Defamation League (ADL) provides a daily email report, Campus Crisis Alert, listing and detailing antisemitic incidents on American campuses. It also publishes a Campus

Antisemitism Report Card as a tool for students, parents, alumni, college faculty, guidance counsellors, admissions consultants and other stakeholders. As of 21 February 2025, 85 institutions were graded on a five-point scale: A – Ahead of the pack, B – Better than most, C – Corrections needed, D – Deficient approach, and F – Failing. A large majority (65 out of 85, or 76%) of the institutions were graded C or below. At that date an F grade was awarded to nine institutions: Harvard University, Massachusetts Institute of Technology, Northwestern University, Tufts University, University of California Los Angeles, University of Chicago, University of Massachusetts Amherst, University of Michigan, and the University of North Carolina Chapel Hill. The Report released in March 2025 showed improvement at a number of universities, eight getting A grades, up from two, and 41 obtaining B, up from 18. (Anti-Defamation League, n.d.)

In Australia, comprehensive post-7 October 2023 surveys include "Australian Jews in the Shadow of War: Main Survey Findings" (Bankier-Karp & Graham, 2024) and the Community Security Group (CSG) Victoria's "University Report: A CSG Analysis of Incidents on Campus" (CSG Victoria, 2024).

Bankier-Karp and Graham (2024) surveyed 7,611 Australian Jewish adults between November 10–17, 2023, revealing unprecedented concerns about antisemitism. Among the Jewish students who participated in the survey, 68% experienced hostility toward Israel from other students, and 46% from lecturers. Some respondents reported feeling the need to hide their Jewish identity.

The report emphasised "that most Jewish people in Australia feel a very strong emotional attachment to Israel" (Bankier-Karp & Graham, 2024, p. 8), with 91% of Australian Jewry feel at least somewhat emotionally attached to Israel. Additionally, "87% said they felt 'a special alarm' given that Israel had been put in danger. 37% said they were so alarmed 'it is almost as if my own life was in danger'" (Bankier-Karp & Graham, 2024, p. 8).

The CSG Victoria report documented 85 antisemitic incidents from February 2024 to May 2025 across six universities, a sharp increase from 11 in 2023 and one in 2022. Incident reports were obtained, in descending order of frequency, from Monash Clayton, the University of Melbourne, RMIT, Deakin University Burwood, Swinburne University, Monash Caulfield, and La Trobe Bundoora (CSG Victoria, 2024).

The majority of the incidents involved verbal abuse. Other incidents, in decreasing order of frequency, included the display of symbols/paraphernalia, stickering, threats of assault, graffiti, and photography/videography. Particularly noteworthy is the hostile rhetoric on campus toward Zionism, including discrimination, vilification, and threats of violence against 'Zionists.' The report states that "Jewish students routinely feel unsafe, psychologically attacked, or at best, unwelcome, on university campuses around Victoria" (CSG Victoria, 2024, p. 4).

Consistent with all previous reports, this report indicates that Jewish students have no trust in their universities' administrations or campus security to ensure their safety. Consequently, they refrain from filing complaints or reporting incidents to their universities. Jewish students "expressed dismay at inaction by university administrations and campus security, particularly when it comes to allowing hateful rhetoric at demonstrations" (CSG Victoria, 2024, p. 6).

Several official Australian Government inquiries gathered evidence of the situation in universities. Based on submissions, interviews and public hearings the inquiries repeatedly expressed alarm at the level of antisemitism in Australian universities.

July 2024, was conducted by the Human Rights Commission. Its Interim Report, released late 2024, lacked detail. However, the initial consultations with Jewish students "reported escalating experiences of antisemitism on campus since October 2023" (Australian Human Rights Commission, 2024, p.33). It referenced a statement by The Zionist Council of New South Wales that "certain staff and students are too frightened to come to campus. We heard about teachers being harassed as they walk to halls to teach, we heard about students being silenced in class because of their Jewish identity" (p. 38).

The Australian Senate responded in July 2024 given the urgency of the issue. In July 2024 the Australian Senate's Legal and Constitutional Affairs Legislation Committee, on the initiative of Liberal Shadow Minister Senator Sarah Henderson, conducted an Inquiry into the need for a Commission of Inquiry into antisemitism at Australian universities. The committee received and published 669 submissions and held two public hearings in Canberra in September 2024 (Legal and Constitutional Affairs Legislation Committee, 2024).

One of the submissions was lodged by the Special Envoy to Combat Antisemitism, Jillian Segal AO, whose staff interviewed more than 65 Jewish students and academics in August-September 2024 to provide data for the submission. The Envoy reported that "Jewish students are traumatised and feel isolated and unsafe" (Segal, 2024, p. 1), noting that "approximately half of those interviewed were visibly teary during their interview" (p. 7). It found that of those interviewed, 80% of students had experienced an antisemitic incident in a lecture or tutorial, and nearly 70% of university staff, including academics, experienced an incident in their workplace. Most students and staff were "intimidated and unwilling to complain to universities because they lack trust … or they fear retribution in some form" (p. 9). Not a single person interviewed felt satisfied with the reporting process

> Antisemitic behaviour is not only present on many campuses but is an embedded part of the culture. Universities have not taken appropriate action to denounce and suppress it: it has become systemic … This normalised antisemitism is incredibly dangerous to our society as it is an attitude and behaviour that eats away at the fabric of the mission of the tertiary sector (Segal, 2024, p. 1).

The Committee's majority, comprising Labor Senators and other parties, did not support the need for a commission. However, it did support further Parliamentary investigation, referring the issue of antisemitism to the Parliamentary Joint Committee on Human Rights which was asked to examine "the prevalence, nature and experiences of antisemitic activity at universities" (Parliamentary Joint Committee on Human Rights, 2025, p. vii) and the effectiveness of the response within universities "to ensure the safety and wellbeing of students, staff and academics" (p. vii). After four hearings and 49 submissions, in addition to review of the evidence gathered by the earlier Senate Committee, this second Committee reported in February 2025 that "the current situation of Jewish students and staff feeling unsafe is unacceptable" (p. ix).

> There is a cultural shift which is needed, and for that to occur university responses to antisemitism must be informed by an understanding of the experiences of Jewish students and staff, and those Jewish students and staff must feel that their concerns are heard and valued (p. ix).

The Committee's Report highlighted "the importance of listening to the lived experiences of Jewish students and staff" (p. ix). It recommended that the Government consider amending the Tertiary Education Quality and Standards Agency Act 2011 to provide the Agency with enhanced powers "to enforce compliance with the higher education threshold standards relating to student wellbeing and safety" (p. xii). If it became evident that the university responses were insufficient, then the next step should be consideration of the establishment of a Judicial Inquiry.

Coalition members of the Committee, who as before supported the immediate establishment of a Judicial Inquiry, criticised the evidence that had been presented by university leaders, echoing comments in the American Congress: "Despite the best efforts of members to get to the truth and secure answers to our questions, our hearings were a masterclass in obfuscation from university leaders" (pp. 80-81). In the view of the Coalition members, there was overwhelming evidence of "an alarming and abhorrent rise in antisemitism amongst students and staff … On the balance of evidence presented to the committee inquiry … Australian universities have become incubators of antisemitic thought" (p. 80). Coalition members were particularly alarmed by the examples of university academics who "espoused antisemitic tropes" (p. 80) and the failure of universities to deal with such conduct, which exacerbated the rise in antisemitism.

Emerging from the rapid upsurge of antisemitism, particularly after 7 October 2023, the Australian Academic Alliance Against Antisemitism conducted a survey to gain deeper insights into the experiences of antisemitism among students and staff as they navigate their academic and professional responsibilities on campus, alongside colleagues, friends, and university management. The survey methodology is discussed in the following section.

3.1. Research Design

The study employed a mixed-methods approach using the Convergent Parallel design. In this method, qualitative and quantitative data were collected simultaneously, but each was analysed separately. The findings from both approaches were then merged to provide a comprehensive understanding (Creswell, 2018). Both data types were gathered through an online survey.

3.2. Population and Sampling

The survey was designed for completion by Jewish students and staff at Australian universities. It survey employed a nonprobability sample, the only financially feasible method for surveying the target population due to the low incidence of the Jewish population in Australia and at Australian universities, and the nonexistence of a list of Jewish students and academics from which a probability sample could be drawn. Records held by universities and Jewish organisations could not be accessed for research sampling due to privacy laws.

3.3. Data Collection

The survey was administered online via Qualtrics, allowing for anonymous participation. Convenience sampling method was applied through snowballing recruitment technique. The survey was promoted by 5A to its academic and administrative members, and by the Australian Union of Jewish Students, the Zionist Federation of Australia, the Jewish Community Council of Victoria, and the New South Wales Jewish Board of Deputies. Promotion was by email, social media posts, organisational newsletters, and word of mouth.

The survey was available for completion online and was open from 16 April to 31 July 2024. The majority of responses, 78%, were obtained in April and May, with only 3% in June. A final promotion in early July advised that the survey was to close shortly, resulting in 19% of the responses being submitted in that month.

3.4. Data Analysis

The data were analysed using SPSS software. The data analysis includes data cleaning for obtaining the achieved sample, data weighting, and employing both quantitative and qualitative methods for analysis.

3.4.1. Data Cleaning and Achieved Sample

Four measures were taken to mitigate risk of fraudulent survey completion by individuals' hostile to the survey objectives.

First, following the demographic questions, the first substantive survey question was open-ended, to assist in identification of fraudulent responses by the tenor of written comments.

> Discussing the difficulty and expense of probability samples of the Jewish population, the Canadian researcher Professor Robert Brym commented: 'Drawing a probability sample of a so-called rare population, such as Canadian Jews, who comprise only about 1 percent of Canada's population, is extremely expensive. For instance, if one wanted to create a random sample of five hundred Canadian Jews for a landline/cell phone survey, and 5 percent of calls resulted in a person agreeing to be interviewed, it would be necessary to make one million calls to find five hundred Jewish respondents. (One hundred calls would be required to find five respondents, two thousand calls to find one Jewish respondent, and one million calls to find five hundred Jewish respondents.) At, say, $1 per call, that's a million dollars'. 'Jews and Israel 2024 survey: ten further insights', Canadian Jewish Studies, Vol 39, Fall 2024, Jews and Israel 2024 Survey: Ten Further Insights | Canadian Jewish Studies / Études juives canadiennes.

However, fewer than ten such responses were detected, so this did not provide a significant check.

Second, time taken to complete the survey was analysed. Although the survey was accessed nearly 1,000 times, many accessors were apparently curious about the questionnaire with no intention of completing it. Some access may have been by bots, as evidenced by 276 sessions which lasted less than two minutes with few or no questions answered. Additionally, 33 accesses lasted between two and three minutes. As the time to complete the survey was close to ten minutes, we excluded all surveys accessed for less than three minutes.

Third, respondents who did not reach the key question near the end of the survey (Q12_1) about sense of safety on campus were excluded. Nearly all respondents excluded by this criterion had accessed the survey for less than three minutes.

Fourth, the IP addresses of the devices used to complete the survey were checked to identify repeat entries. It was found the same IP address was used more than twice on 33 occasions. Most of these entries provided no or incomplete data. In the few cases where some data was provided, the respondent was excluded from the analysis.

In summary, the dataset was filtered to provide completeness and quality by including only respondents who spent at least three minutes completing the survey and who answered the key question (Q12_1) on sense of safety. Surveys accessed more than twice from the same IP address were also excluded.

A total of 548 responses met our criteria for inclusion. The distribution of participants across roles consisted of 66% (n=395) students; 25% (n=149) staff; 6% (n=34) administration or management; and 3% (n=18) other, totalling 596. The difference between the sample size and the total role counts is derived from 48 participants reporting more than one role. Table 3.1 present the distribution of participants by role.

Table 3.1. Distribution of participants by their university roles

| Roles | Number of responses | Total per group |
|---|---|---|
| Student | | |
| Diploma student | 20 | |
| Bachelor's degree student | 294 | |
| Master's degree student | 47 | |
| Higher degree by research student | 34 | |
| Sub-total students | | 395 |
| Staff | | |
| Academic - ongoing or contract | 79 | |
| Academic - sessional | 38 | |
| Research fellow | 15 | |
| Adjunct | 7 | |
| Research assistant/ instructor | 10 | |
| Sub-total academic | | 149 |
| Management and administration | | |
| Management | 8 | |
| Administration and services | 26 | |
| Sub-total management | | 34 |
| Other | 18 | 18 |

Note: Survey question: “Select the roles that describe your association with your university?”

Responses were obtained from 30 universities. The largest number of respondents came from Monash University, the University of Sydney, the University of New South Wales, and the University of Melbourne, a total of 313. These four universities accounted for 57% of the sample, which accurately reflects the distribution of Jewish students according to the Australian Union of Jewish Students membership, where 57% are enrolled at these four Go8 universities. Appendix A presents the distribution of participants by university.

3.4.2. Data Weighting

To align the survey data with the target Jewish population, reducing the risk of demographic over- or under-representation, data were weighted to benchmarks for survey respondents derived from the 2021 Census of Population and Housing. Benchmarks for age (18–24, 25–34, 35–44, 45–54, 55–64, 65+), gender (male, female), and state of residence (identified in the survey by university affiliation) were obtained from Australian Bureau of Statistics Census TableBuilder (Australian Bureau of Statistics, 2021). Population totals for the benchmark characteristics are presented in Appendix B. Weights were calculated for each respondent using generalised regression calibration (Deville et al., 1993). This applies an algorithm that assigns a weight to each person such that the weights simultaneously sum to the population values for each benchmark characteristic. The implementation of the algorithm was that by Lumley (2024)

3.4.3. Analysis

Quantitative analysis included descriptive statistics to derive frequencies, percentages, and summarise experiences; cross-tabulation to examine associations between demographic variables and reported experiences—such as differences in responses to specific questions between students and staff; and inferential statistics, including mean comparisons and cluster analysis. The qualitative data was analysed thematically through coding to produce themes and categories, which form natural units of meanings (Cohen et al., 2011).

3.5. Questionnaire Design

The survey was short, intended to be completed in less than fifteen minutes: it comprised five demographic, eight fixed-choice (seven with multiple parts), and three open-ended questions. Respondents were able to skip questions if they chose to do so.

The open-ended questions asked about “the most impactful experience of antisemitism encountered on campus since October 7” and the “actions university management should take to combat antisemitism on campus”. The final question provided respondents with the opportunity to share any other “thoughts and feelings concerning antisemitism at Australian universities not covered in the survey”.

The fixed-choice questions focused on campus experiences and their personal impact.

The extent to which respondents had encountered Nazi imagery, messages delegitimizing Israel's right to exist, glorifying Hamas and the October 7 massacre, and justification of the killing or harming of Jews.

i. Experience of being ignored or excluded, receiving insults or harassment both online and in person, and physical assaults.
ii. Extent of concern about antisemitism from people on the political left and political right.
iii. The impact of campus experiences on relationships with both Jewish and non-Jewish friends, colleagues, and others.
iv. Behavioural change in various contexts, including attending classes, engaging in social media, expressing political beliefs, and identifying as Jewish.
v. Sense of safety on both the physical and virtual (including social media) campus.

The survey also sought feedback on the response of the university administration, including whether participants believed their university was taking sufficient action against antisemitism and ensuring a safe and inclusive environment for Jews.

Specific questions asked whether a definition of inappropriate political content in lectures and course materials was provided, the adequacy of complaints procedures, and confidence in lodging complaints without fear of discrimination and retribution.

Pilot testing was conducted in March 2024, where approximately 12 participants were asked to complete the survey and provide written feedback. The feedback was used to refine the questions prior to dissemination.

3.5.1. Definitions

The survey did not define antisemitism, leaving respondents to interpret the term themselves in response to open-ended questions. This enabled respondents to describe their campus experiences in their own words, avoiding the limitation of a single, potentially contested definition. The open approach allowed for a wide range of experiences to be captured, resulting in a notable feature of the survey, the detailed written comments.

The term campus was defined as: "University campuses are both physical spaces (e.g. lecture rooms) and virtual spaces (e.g. social media). For the purposes of this survey, any space in which you interact in relation to your university affiliation is defined as Campus".

3.6. Validity and Reliability

Multiple measures were employed to ensure the validity and reliability of the survey. Content validity was achieved through expert judgement of the survey questions (Polit & Beck, 2006). Clear and concise wording were obtained through broad expert consultation and reviewing multiple publishes questionnaires on antisemitism. Additionally, the survey was pilot-tested prior to dissemination (Presser et al., 2004).

We do not claim the survey is a representative sample of Jewish students and staff across the university sector, given that the survey was based on a sample of volunteer or self-selected respondents. It is reasonable to assume the most distressed and affected staff and students would make the effort to report their experiences and therefore the survey might overstate the magnitude of antisemitism. But offsetting this is the reasonable assumption that some students and staff may not have participated because they were busy or distracted, had not heard of the survey, or were pessimistic, given their negative experiences, that the survey would achieve a useful practical purpose. It is acknowledged that experiences varied at different campuses, as evidenced in communal sources, media reports, and in the data we collected.

Despite these caveats, our confidence in the reliability and validity of our findings is supported by the similar pattern in student and staff responses and the consistency of findings in reports which dealt with antisemitism in Australian universities, as discussed in the Literature Review above.

Finally, the convergence between participants' open-ended responses and the quantitative findings provides evidence of convergent validity, strengthening the credibility of the results. The detailed descriptions provided by the 548 respondents in response to the open questions, is in itself, a substantial record of the often-hostile university environment in the period April-July 2024.

3.7. Ethical Considerations

Ethical approval was obtained from Victoria University Human Research Ethics Committee. All the participants were above 18 years of age, and participation was voluntary and anonymous. Informed consent was obtained at the beginning of the survey.

The next chapter first presents the findings from the qualitative analysis, followed by the findings from the quantitative analysis.

4.1 Impactful Experience of Antisemitism Statements

In response to the first question, which asked "if you encountered antisemitism, please describe the most impactful experience of antisemitism that you have encountered on campus since 7 October 2023", 416 respondents shared experiences. Written comments totalled 21,000 words, when typically, in a survey with this number of respondents 5000-6000 words would have been expected. 70 respondents (13%) indicated that they encountered little or no antisemitism on campus, and 64 (12%) skipped the question – a combined 25%. A very few respondents, less than 10, who identified in their responses as Jewish anti-Zionists or non-Zionist, indicated that they were concerned with verbal attacks from Jews, not pro-Palestinians.

4.1.1 The Campus Environment category includes:

Posters, symbols, slogans, distribution of flyers; constraints on free movement on the campus; hostile behaviour of activists at rallies, encampments, and student union meetings; use of megaphones; being ignored, cancelled, excluded, needing to hide their identity; verbal attacks; in a few cases physical threats and attacks.

- Exemplary excerpts from the Campus Environment category include:
- Constant barrage of anti-Israel posters - everywhere - on doors, windows, posts and even chalk on the footpaths
- The vile chants shouted at the recent protest were quite unnerving
- Chalk saying 'Zionists not welcome'
- For the first time in my life, I was afraid to be Jewish, afraid to reveal my identity.
- I have specifically chosen a distance education course in order for me to avoid attending the campus

4.1.2 The Student Experience category includes:

Discriminatory behaviour and hostile statements by lecturers, tutors, and fellow students; identifying, singling out Jewish and Israeli students in class; political statements about the conflict in class; the disruption of classes by protestors, disruption of learning; Jewish students feeling that they need to hide their identity, to drop classes because of the behaviour of staff.

Exemplary excerpts in the Student Experience category include:

- People actively ignore me when we used to all be really friendly.
- I have regularly been called 'Jew boy' or 'Jew' and singled out by passers-by
- I was spat on for wearing my Star of David necklace
- Students singing Nazi songs in my presence, knowing I am Jewish
- I've been singled out and made to feel alienated and afraid and having to hide or defend my Jewishness by my tutor and unit coordinator
- My tutor walked into class wearing a keffiyeh and, unprompted by any student, began to explain his reasons for wearing a 'symbol of resistance against a genocidal regime'

4.1.3 The Academics and Staff Experience category includes:

Hostility to Israel, overt antisemitism in teaching environment, in interaction with colleagues, online faculty forums; discriminatory actions, including failure to renew contracts; attempts by students to intimidate staff; targeting staff in their offices, doxxing, cancelling; National Tertiary Education Union and student union resolutions and actions.

Exemplary excerpts in the Academics and Staff Experience category include:

- I was assaulted by a student
- Numerous colleagues could no longer look at me, and stopped speaking to me
- Academics in the school organised a hate fest discussion on the conflict
- The cancelling of the visiting Israeli academic

4.1.4 The Universities' Systems Failure category includes:

Unwillingness to listen to concerns, failure to act on complaints; dismissing complaints as not valid or over-sensitive; failure to provide safe learning and work environment.

Exemplary excerpts in the Universities' Systems Failure category include:

- I had students in my class perform a Nazi salute to me on three occasions. I reported this, they did not take my complaint seriously... Since complaining my contract has not been renewed.
- Staff and students denying the state of Israel has a right to exist. The management is unwilling to address any of this on campus
- University administrations denied my complaint against protesters using the chant 'intifada' on the basis that the word is context related and that the university was not responsible for my feelings.

Table 4.1 presents the categories, their themes and frequencies of excerpts. Figure 4.1. presents a visual representation of these findings. Appendix C presents exemplary excerpts organised by categories and themes.

Table 4.1. Personal experiences of antisemitism by categories, themes frequencies and percentages

| Categories | Themes | No. of Statements | % |
|---|---|---|---|
| The campus environment | Physical and virtual campus environments: hostile, excluding and unsafe for Jews | 139 | 32.9 |
| | Constraint movement on campus; interruptions to campus core businesses | 17 | 4.0 |
| | Needing to hide Jewish identity; avoiding campus | 21 | 5.0 |

The Campus Environment appears as the most impactful experience of antisemitism encountered by the participants, close to half of all excerpts (45%).

The theme Hostile and Excluding Physical and Virtual Campus Environments, makes up 33% of excerpts. Within its category, this theme is the largest, representing 73% of the excerpts in The Campus Environment category.

The findings also show that the Students' Experience category is the second largest, comprising 33.6% of excerpts. Within this category, the theme Attacks on Jewish Students by Other Students is the most frequently reported impactful antisemitic experience (14%). Collectively, the five themes in this category portray a grim picture of Jewish students being ostracised, dehumanised, and effectively driven off campus and excluded from campus social life.

As our quantitative data also shows, this highly hostile environment leads many Jewish students and staff to significantly reduce their social interactions with non-Jewish peers and avoid the physical campus whenever possible.

The category The Academic and Staff Experience (8.5%) includes excerpts provided by staff. The smaller percentage of excerpts reflects the lower representation of staff in the sample. These excerpts portray a similarly grim antisemitic campus experience to that of students, with many staff reporting they work from home to avoid being on campus.

The category Universities' System Failure data suggests that these systems either discriminate against Jewish people at worst, or at best do nothing to protect them. These qualitative findings are confirmed by our quantitative findings. However, it is important to note that while the majority of responses suggest system failure, the data shows that the universities are not uniform in their responses. This finding will be elaborated further when discussing the quantitative data.

4.2 Critical Implications of the Thematic Frequency Distribution

The thematic analysis allows the drawing of critical implications. First, the finding that the hostile campus environment is the most impactful experience of antisemitism suggests that restoring a sense of safety and inclusivity on campus could be achieved if universities simply enforced their existing rules and codes of conduct. Preventing the defacing of public spaces and the posting of imagery in unauthorised areas would make a significant difference. By enforcing policies that prohibit unauthorised posters, stickers, and flyers, as well as megaphone use during class hours and other physical disruptions to campus life, universities could bring about a considerable improvement in the campus experience for Jewish students and staff.

Equally important is that the majority of participants describe anti-Zionist and anti-Israel posters and imagery as forms of antisemitic harassment. Quantitative data reaffirms the qualitative data, suggesting that the majority of participants equate anti-Zionism with antisemitism.

The exemplary excerpts in Appendix C provide a powerful testimony of the experience of being a Jewish person on Australian campuses post 7 October 2023. These findings are further supported by the quantitative analysis that follows.

5 QUANTITATIVE ANALYSIS RESULTS

Fixed-choice questions were developed to provide insight into the frequency and characteristics of antisemitism on campus. These included questions related to witnessing antisemitic expressions, personally experiencing antisemitism, changes in relationships and behaviour, sense of safety, level of concern from the political left and right, the university's response to antisemitism, and its overall performance. In addition to the findings for the full sample, data is reported for students and staff, to explore divergence and commonality in experiences.

5.1 The Physical and Virtual Environment

Respondents reported on their experiences of witnessing antisemitic manifestations on campus since 7 October. They were asked to "indicate whether you have personally witnessed any of the following antisemitic expressions on your campus since 7 October 2023", on a scale ranging from 'never' and 'rarely' to 'occasionally', 'frequently' and 'all of the time'.

The comparison between the percentage of responses "never witnessed" to the combined percentage of responses "rarely" through to "all the time" (responses 2-5), reveals that the highest percentage of reported witnessing of antisemitic expressions—over 90%—related to opposition to the continued existence of the State of Israel, evidenced in graffiti, posters, flyers, or verbal and social media comments. Derogatory comments about Israelis were witnessed by 85% of respondents, and justification of killing or harming Jews by 76%. Glorification of Hamas or the 7 October 2023 massacre was witnessed by 72%, while Nazi imagery was reported being witnessed by 54% of respondents.

These findings are consistent across both students and staff, although they are more pronounced among students, as elaborated below. Table 5.1 and Figure 5.1 show the distribution of response percentages. Figure 5.2 compares the percentage of responses indicating "never witnessed" with those indicating "having witnessed" (the combined responses 2–5, ranging from "rarely" to "all the time").

Table 5.1. Percentage distribution of reported experiences of antisemitic expressions on campus, by expression type and frequency of witnessing

| Question | 1 Never | 2 Rarely | 3 Occasionally | 4 Frequently | 5 All the time |
|---|---|---|---|---|---|
| 1. Graffiti, posters or fliers with Nazi imagery | 45% | 18% | 21% | 10% | 5% |
| 2. Graffiti, posters or fliers delegitimising the right of Israel to exist | 8% | 7% | 15% | 26% | 45% |
| 3. Graffiti, posters or fliers glorifying Hamas or the 7 October 2023 massacre | 29% | 14% | 24% | 18% | 16% |
| 4. Verbally or through social media: delegitimising the right of Israel to exist | 8% | 6% | 15% | 21% | 50% |
| 5. Verbally or through social media: Making derogatory comments about ISRAELIS (Israeli people) | 16% | 13% | 16% | 21% | 35% |
| 6. Verbally or through social media: Calling for, or justifying the killing or harming of Jews | 25% | 16% | 20% | 21% | 19% |

5.1.1 Comparing students and staff

The responses of students were compared to staff in relation to witnessing imagery and verbal expressions of antisemitism. The analysis revealed that students consistently reported higher rates of witnessing antisemitic incidents compared to staff across all categories. However, statistically significant differences between students and staff were found in only two areas: "Graffiti, posters or fliers delegitimising the right of Israel to exist" ($X^2 = 18.19$, $p < 0.001$); and "Verbally or through social media: Delegitimising the right of Israel to exist" ($X^2 = 6.61$, $p < 0.05$).

The higher percentages of students reporting witnessing antisemitic expressions are expected, given students' higher levels of social engagement on campus. Figure 5.3 presents the comparison of percentages reported by students and staff.

Figure 5.3. Comparison between students and staff, by percentages of respondents having personally witnessed antisemitic expressions (responses 2-5, "rarely" through to "all the time")

In summary, the findings indicate that the highest percentages of antisemitic experiences reported by participants consist of "Graffiti, posters or fliers: delegitimising the right of Israel to exist" (93%) and "Verbally or through social media: delegitimising the right of Israel to exist" (92%). The second most frequently reported experience was "Verbally or through social media: making derogatory comments about Israelis (Israeli people)" (85%). This finding suggests that, from the perspective of the majority of participants in the survey, delegitimising Israel's right to exist constitutes antisemitism.

5.2 Personal Experiences

Personal experiences were considered in relation to hearing and being subjected to antisemitic comments, insults, and harassment, as well as feeling isolated or cancelled, and experiencing physical assault. Specifically, participants were asked:

"At your campus, since 7 October 2023, have you personally experienced the following behaviours towards you because you are Jewish or Israeli?"

The findings reveal that two-thirds of participants (67%) reported hearing antisemitic comments in their presence. This was the most commonly reported personal experience, followed by "feeling ignored or excluded" (43%). A further 39% reported experiencing insults or harassment on social media, while 29% reported verbal insults or harassment. Physical assaults were rare, with only 3% of participants reporting such incidents. Table 5.2 and Figure 4.4 present the percentage distribution of responses.

| Personal experience | Yes | No | Not Sure |
|---|---|---|---|
| Listening to antisemitic comments in your presence | 66.6% | 30.5% | 3.0% |
| Feeling ignored or excluded | 43.2% | 43.0% | 13.8% |
| Received insult or harassment on social media | 38.9% | 56.7% | 4.4% |
| Received verbal insult or harassment | 28.8% | 64.9% | 6.3% |
| Being cancelled from groups | 18.7% | 65.6% | 15.8% |
| Physical assault on you | 3.4% | 94.2% | 2.4% |

A comparison between student and staff responses reveals that students reported significantly higher rates of "listening to antisemitic comments in their presence" (74% of students compared to 48% of staff). This was followed by "receiving insults or harassment on social media" (40% of students, 36% of staff), "receiving verbal insults or harassment" (36% of students, 23% of staff), and "being cancelled from groups" (21% of students, 17% of staff).

In contrast, staff reported slightly higher rates of "feeling ignored or excluded" (44% of staff, 40% of students). Reports of physical assault were similarly low across both groups. Figure 5.5 presents a comparison between students and staff in percentages of reporting personal experiences of antisemitic behaviours towards them.

In summary, the findings indicate that physical assaults are rare. However, three-quarters (74%) of Jewish students have experienced antisemitic behaviour in the form of hearing antisemitic comments in their presence, with a total of 67% of the overall sample exposed to this type of harassment. Additionally, 43% of the sample reported feeling ignored or excluded, and 39% experienced insults or harassment on social media.

These findings indicate the pervasiveness of antisemitic behaviours directed towards Jewish people on campus, suggesting that antisemitic discourse has become normalised on campuses. Staff appear slightly more likely to feel ignored or excluded compared to students, whereas students report experiencing most other types of antisemitic behavioural harassment at higher rates.

5.3 Relationship Changes

To gain insight into the impact of the 7 October aftermath on personal relationships, two sets of questions were administered. The first asked about changes in personal relationships within the campus, the second asked about changes in relationships within the broader community. Specifically, the first question asked: "Since 7 October 2023, would you say that your relationship with your non-Jewish university friends, colleagues, and others on campus has become ...". Respondents ranked changes in closeness on a five-point Likert scale.

The second question asked participants to use a slider to indicate increase or decrease in mixing with non-Jewish people, and with Jewish people, since 7 October. The scale used was from -5 to +5'. Response: 0 = no change, -5 = substantial decrease, + 5 = substantial increase.

5.3.1 On-campus Relation changes

The findings indicate that for about half of the sample, relationships remained about the same. However, for nearly the other half, 7 October had a profound impact on Jewish people's relationships with non-Jews on campus. Within this group of respondents, a relationship rift was formed:

- 43% of students reported becoming distant or disconnected from non-Jewish friends.
- 35% of staff reported becoming distant or disconnected from their colleagues.
- 42% of respondents reported becoming distant or disconnected from other university acquaintances.

This finding highlights the sense of isolation experienced by a large minority of Jewish students and staff on campus.

At the same time, a small percentage of Jewish people moved in the opposite direction in response to the same events:

- 8.5% of students reported becoming closer or much closer to non-Jewish friends.
- 6.15% of staff reported becoming closer or much closer to non-Jewish colleagues.
- 4.07% of respondents reported becoming closer or much closer to other university acquaintances.

Taken together, the findings indicate that, post-7 October, approximately half of students (43% becoming distant + 8.5% becoming closer = 52%) and a significant minority of staff (35% + 6.15% = 41%) no longer maintained their usual relationships on campus.

Table 5.3 presents the percentage distribution of responses. Figure 5.6 presents the percentage distribution by aggregated responses for becoming closer, staying the same, and becoming distant.

Table 5.3. Percentages of reported changes in relationships with non-Jewish friends (for students), colleagues (for staff) and other university acquaintances

| Closer | 3.9% | 5.2% | 3.3% |
| Stayed about the same | 48.3% | 58.7% | 54.6% |

| Disconnected | 13.2% | 12.7% | 12.5% |

Figure 5.6. Percentages of reported changes in relationships with non-Jewish friends (for students), colleagues (for staff) and other university acquaintances, by aggregates responses for becoming closer, staying the same and becoming distant

5.3.2 Relationship Changes Beyond Campus

An examination of changes in mixing with Jewish and non-Jewish people revealed similar trends. The findings show that 77% of participants reported increased mixing with Jewish people, and 49% reported decreased mixing with non-Jewish people.

Conversely, a small minority of Jewish participants reported the opposite trend: 5% reported decreased mixing with Jewish people, and 11% reported increased mixing with non-Jewish people.

Notably, the aftermath of 7 October was so impactful that only a small minority reported no change in mixing with Jewish people. Even within the narrow range of -1 to +1, 8% reported a small increase of +1. A large minority (40%) reported no change in mixing with non-Jewish people. However, even within this range, 17% reported a small decrease of -1.

The comparison between students and staff reveals almost identical trends.

Figure 5.7 presents the combined dual trends of relationship changes: mixing with Jewish and non-Jewish people.

Figure 5.7. Comparing changes in mixing with Jewish people to changes in mixing with non-Jewish people, by aggregated scale measures of increase (+2 - +5), no change (-1 - +1), and decrease (-2 - -5).

Table 5.4 and Figures 5.8A and 5.8B present the percentage distribution across the scale measuring increased or decreased relationship closeness. These visualisations illustrate the extent to which participants' relationships have shifted—either becoming closer or more distant—following 7 October.

Table 5.4. Extend of changes in relationships with Jewish and non-Jewish people, by extent of change (on a scale from -5 to +5)

5.8.B. Behavioural change in relation to mixing with non-Jewish people: Distribution of responses across the scale-5 to +5

In summary, the findings suggest that 7 October created a "social earthquake" and led to the tearing of the social fabric between and within the Jewish campus community.

Within campus, 43% of students reported becoming distant or disconnected from non-Jewish friends, and 35% of staff reported becoming distant or disconnected from their colleagues. Beyond the campus community, Jewish students and staff report similar decreases in mixing with non-Jewish people (49%). Concurrently, 77% of participants reported increased mixing with Jewish people.

A small percentage of Jewish people moved in the opposite direction, with 8.5% of students and 6.15% of staff reported becoming closer or much closer to non-Jewish friends and colleagues on campus, and 5% reported decreased mixing with Jewish people in the broader community. Concurrently, 11% reported increased mixing with non-Jewish people. Qualitative data suggests that political anti-Zionist views may have contributed to a rift within the Jewish community, dividing Zionist and anti-Zionist Jews.

These social reconfigurations provide strong evidence for the unsettling antisemitic environment where a large majority of Jewish people are seemingly seeking refuge among their own.

5.4. Personal Behaviours

A set of questions examined behavioural changes following 7 October, expressed as increases, decreases, or no change.

The findings reveal stark changes across all behaviours examined. Participants could no longer maintain their previous patterns of behaviour, to the extent that even class attendance—which is compulsory for students and therefore expected to show minimal change—revealed a 48% decrease. The fact that nearly half the students in the survey felt the need to reduce attendance suggests that campuses are no longer safe for Jewish students. This may have long-term consequences, potentially threatening their academic performance.

A similarly sharp behavioural decrease (50%) was reported in Hebrew-speaking individuals avoiding speaking Hebrew in public, suggesting a perceived safety risk in displaying affiliation with Israel, the only Hebrew-speaking country.

In contrast to the sharp decreases in class attendance and publicly speaking Hebrew, the findings reveal a significant increase (56%) in engagement with social media. This may be attributed to the destabilising effects of 7 October, with participants feeling the need to stay constantly informed and to inform others.

When asked whether they chose to hide or assert their Jewish identity by wearing Jewish symbols such as a kippah (skullcap) or Magen David (Star of David, normally worn on a necklace), a total of 79% of the sample changed their behaviour in one way or the other. A large minority, 39% reported decrease, while 40%, a similar proportion, reported an increase in wearing Jewish symbols.

Similarly, in relation to publicly expressing political beliefs or one's connection to Israel, 49% reported a decrease, and 32% an increase. The comparison between students and staff reveals similar results across the two groups, suggesting similar patterns of behavioural changes.

Table 5.5 and Figure 5.9 present the percentages of participants reporting behavioural changes.

Table 5.5. Behavioural changes on a scale of -5 to +5, by behaviour types

| Scale | Engaging in social media | Attending classes, if you are a student | Publicly expressing political beliefs | Publicly expressing your connection to Israel | Speaking Hebrew where others can hear | Wearing a Kippah, Magen David, or other Jewish symbols |

| Increase (+2 to +5) | 56% | 12% | 32% | 32% | 17% | 40% |

In summary, the analysis of behavioural changes mirrors the trends observed in changes to personal relationships. It appears that participants were shaken to the extent that they could no longer maintain their normal behaviours, revealing what may be described as a "social earthquake" in the aftermath of 7 October.

Two sharp behavioural decreases were reported: a 48% reduction in class attendance and a 50% reduction in speaking Hebrew in public. One sharp increase was noted: a 56% rise in engagement with social media.

Other behaviours displayed bifurcated changes, including a 39% decrease and 40% increase in wearing Jewish symbols, and a 49% decrease versus a 32% increase in publicly expressing political beliefs or one's connection to Israel.

The reduced class attendance suggests that Jewish students do not feel safe or welcome on campus, which may have enduring effects on their academic performance and career pathways. The decline in public Hebrew speaking indicates that Israeli individuals (the only native Hebrew speakers globally) may feel at risk if their affiliation with Israel becomes known. Similarly, the marked increase in social media engagement (56%) may reflect an attempt to cope with the dramatic and destabilising post 7 October impacts—by staying informed, seeking support, engaging with like-minded individuals, or advocating and explaining their perspective to others.

Finally, the bifurcated behavioural responses suggest that Jewish individuals adopted two contrasting strategies in response to the rapidly changing campus environment—akin to "fight or flight": either increasing their visibility and advocacy or withdrawing and concealing their identity.

When asked about concerns regarding antisemitism from the political left and the political right, respondents expressed significantly greater concern about the political left. Specifically, 67% of respondents were “very concerned”, with a further 17% “somewhat concerned”, totalling 84%. This sentiment was consistent across both students and staff.

In contrast, concern about the political right was markedly lower, with a combined 37% reporting they were “somewhat concerned” or “very concerned”.

Table 5.6 and Figure 5.10 present percentage distributions of concerns from the political left versus the political right.

|---|---|---|
| Not at all concerned | 8.1% | 20.4% |
| A little concerned | 7.9% | 42.4% |
| Somewhat concerned | 17.3% | 23.1% |
| Very concerned | 66.6% | 14.2% |

In summary, the majority of participants (84%) perceive the political left as the major source of antisemitism on campus compared to only 37% concerned and very concerned about the political right.

5.6 Sense of Safety

Respondents were asked "how safe do you feel on the campus?", with a five-point response option ranging from "feeling very unsafe" to "feeling very safe".

A minority of 34% of respondents reported feeling "safe" and "very safe" on the physical campus and 32% in the virtual campus.

Among staff, 17% indicated they felt "very safe" on the physical campus, compared to 8% of students.

Combining "feeling very safe" and "feeling safe" on the physical campus obtains only 38% of students and 36% of staff reporting a sense of safety. Similar results were obtained for the virtual campus, 36% of students and 30% of staff reporting sense of safety.

Table 5.7 presents the percentage distribution of responses. Figure 5.11 presents a comparison between students and staff.

Table 5.7. Percentage distribution of sense of safety levels, by physical and virtual campuses

| | Feeling very unsafe | Feeling unsafe | Feeling somewhat unsafe | Feeling unsafe | Feeling somewhat unsafe |
|---|---|---|---|---|---|
| Safety on the physical campus | 12.9% | 21.5% | 31.6% | 24.7% | 9.4% |
| Total unsafe physical campus | | | 66.00% | | |
| Safety in the virtual campus | 17.9% | 21.1% | 29.3% | 21.1% | 10.6% |

A benchmark to interpret the significance of this sense of safety finding is the 2021 National Student Safety Survey (NSSS) (Heywood et al., 2022). The objective of the survey, which was completed by 43,819 students, was to inform 'ongoing efforts of Australian universities in building equitable, safe and inclusive learning experiences for their students', with specific reference to sexual harassment and sexual assault.

To provide a context for its findings, the NSSS asked students to indicate their "perception of university culture". It obtained 84% agreement by domestic students and 81% by international students with the statement "I feel safe when at [my university]", which compared with the 34% of respondents reported feeling "safe" and "very safe" on the physical campus and 32% in the virtual campus in the 5A survey. The comparison reveals that the rate of those who reported a lack of safety for Jewish people on Australian campuses since October 2023 is 3.47 times higher than the rate of reported a lack of safety due to sexual harassment measured in 2021.

In summary, the findings suggest that only a third (34%) of Jewish students and staff feel safe on campus. The rate of sense of lack of safety for Jewish people is 3.47 higher than the rate of sense of lack of safety due to sexual harassment. Both the physical and virtual campus environments are perceived as equally unsafe.

5.7 Perceptions of Universities' Policies and Procedures

To gain insights into universities' actions against antisemitism, a series of questions were presented. Participants were asked to rank their universities' actions and indicate: the provision of relevant information; their understanding and assessment of the complaint system; whether they had lodged a complaint; and their level of trust in the system.

5.7.1 Ranking Universities' Actions

The participants were asked: "Do you think that your university's management is taking sufficient actions against antisemitism and ensuring that campuses are safe and inclusive for Jews?" Participants were asked to rank their universities' actions on a scale ranging from 0= Not taking any actions against antisemitism to 10= Taking sufficient actions against antisemitism.

The findings revealed that 60% of participants rated their universities' actions between 0 and 3, indicating insufficient action taking by their universities. At the other end of the scale, only 17% ranked their universities between 7 and 10, indicating sufficient action taking.

This result was benchmarked against the NSSS survey, where students responded to the statement: "[My university] is trying hard to protect the safety of all students." A combined 74.5% indicated "strong agreement" or "agreement", and another 9.9% indicated "strongly disagree" or "disagree" with this statement (Heywood et al., 2022, p. 74). The comparison suggests that students were 4.4 times more likely to report that university management takes sufficient action to protect against sexual harassment than to protect the safety of Jewish people on campus.

Table 5.8 and Figure 5.12 present the distribution of responses.

Table 5.8. Ranking of universities' actions against antisemitism on a scale of 0 to 10

5.7.2 Comparing Universities

A non-parametric Kruskal-Wallis test was conducted to compare the distribution of ratings across 12 universities, each with at least 10 responses and no missing data. The test statistic is 37.75, with a significantly low p-value of 0.000086 (Kruskal-Wallis X2 = 37.75, p = 0.000086). This low p-value indicates substantial variations in response patterns between institutions.

The distribution of rankings (0-10) across universities was plotted in a boxplot (Figure 5.13). The plot allows us to compare the distribution of responses across different universities. Only universities with sample sizes ≥10 were included in the comparison, with the width of each box proportional to the number of survey responses. We can see variations in both the median responses and the spread of responses among different institutions. Some universities show more variability (taller boxes) while others have more concentrated responses (shorter boxes).

Note: The boxplot shows the median (horizontal line in each box); the interquartile range (the height of the box itself); the whiskers extending to the most extreme non-outlier points; and the individual points beyond the whiskers representing outliers. The width of each box is proportional to its sample size.

The University of Sydney, RMIT, University of Technology Sydney, and Curtin University have a low median of 2. A median ranking of 5 was obtained in La Trobe and Swinburne University of Technology.

The interquartile range indicates the spread of the distribution of responses. The smaller the range, the more participants agree on their university's ranking. Tight distribution of ranking (low interquartile range) can be viewed at the University of Sydney (2), RMIT (2) and Curtin (2). All three universities show both a low median ranking of 2 and a tight distribution.

Caution should be used when interpreting results from universities with smaller sample sizes, as their ratings are more influenced by individual responses and may not represent the broader Jewish staff and students as accurately.

A Mann-Whitney U test was conducted to compare pairs of universities with large sample sizes: Monash University (n=106), the University of Sydney (n=105), University of New South Wales (n=62) and the University of Melbourne (n=51).

The results reveal that the mean ranking of the University of Sydney was statistically significantly lower than Monash (Z=3.78, p=0.0008), and the University of New South Wales (Z=-4.18, p= 0.00015). The medians for both the University of Sydney and the University of Melbourne were identical, at 2—the lowest among the universities with large sample sizes. Figure 5.14 presents a boxplot visualisation of the distribution of rankings across the four universities with large sample sizes.

Overall, the findings suggest that while in general, universities in Australia rank low on their actions against antisemitism, they are not homogenous in their responses, as perceived by the participants.

The responses to the open-ended questions provide insights into the nature of some practices that were appreciated by the participants. For example:

- "Our VC has been good."
- "To be honest I think [university name removed] … has done a really good job with things like keeping anti-Israel/antisemitic sentiment on campus to a minimum."
- "I think it has been good at how [university name removed] has dismantled the encampment."
- "The university is doing a good job by banning posters and gatherings."
- "I have confidence in management at [university's name removed]—they have quickly responded to antisemitic posters and ensured a safe space for Jewish students on campus."
- "They were great in dismantling the encampment once the protestors started breaking every rule they were given and inviting dangerous people in.

5.7.3 Fostering Understanding

Participants were asked: “Has the university provided you with a definition of inappropriate political content in lectures and course materials?”

Only 11% reported that a definition had been provided, 16% were unsure, and 73% responded ‘no’. The ‘no’ response was similar for both staff (71%) and students (69%). Table 5.8.2.1 below presents the percentage distribution.

5.7.4 Understanding the Complaint System

Students were asked whether they understood “complaint procedures if you encounter antisemitic content in lectures or course materials”.

48% of students reported no knowledge of the complaint procedures, while 34% indicated understanding.

Staff were asked whether they understood the complaint procedures if they encountered “antisemitic comment or behaviour by colleagues, students, or other staff members”. In a near reverse of student responses, 28% of staff reported no knowledge, while 56% indicated understanding (see Table 5.9).

5.7.5 Confidence in the Complaint System

The participants were asked:

- “Do you consider that complaints procedures are adequate at your university?”
- “Have you ever lodged a complaint?” and
- “Are you confident that you can lodge a complaint without risking discrimination against you or other negative impacts?”

Concerning the adequacy of the complaint system, 45% responded that the system is not adequate, and only 16% considered it adequate.

In relation to lodging a complaint, a majority of 67% reported they had never lodged a complaint, and 32% had lodged a complaint.

Regarding confidence in the system, 51% reported no confidence and 27% reported confidence. This finding was benchmarked against the NSSS survey (Heywood et al., 2022), where students were asked about their confidence in reporting incidents of sexual harassment and assault. Only 23.5% reported a lack of confidence (“Not at all/Slightly”), which is less than half the proportion (51%) of Jewish participants reporting a lack of confidence in lodging a complaint without risking discrimination or other negative impacts.

Chi-square analysis was conducted to compare student and staff responses. Significant differences were found in response to the question: “Do you consider that complaint procedures are adequate at your university?” A significantly higher number of staff rated the procedures as inadequate ($X^2 = 6.15$, $p = 0.0463$).

Another significant difference was found in response to: “Have you ever lodged a complaint?” A significantly higher number of students reported that they had never lodged a complaint ($X^2 = 11.75$, $p = 0.0028$). Table 5.9 and Figure 4.15 present the percentages of response distribution.

Table 5.9. Perceptions of universities' policies and procedures, by "yes", "no" and "not sure"

| Question item | No | Yes | Not Sure |
|---|---|---|---|
| Has the university provided you with a definition of inappropriate political content in lectures and in course materials? | 73% | 11% | 16% |
| Do you understand the complaint procedures at your university, if you encounter antisemitic content in lectures and course materials? Answer if you are a student. | 47.5% | 33.6% | 18.9% |
| Do you understand the complaint procedures at your university, if you encounter antisemitic comment or behaviour by colleagues, students or other staff members? Answer if you are a staff member. | 28% | 55.7% | 16.3% |
| Do you consider that complaints procedures are adequate at your university? | 45.1% | 16.4% | 38.4% |
| Have you ever lodged a complaint? | 67.4% | 31.5% | 1.1% |
| Are you confident that you can lodge a complaint without risking discrimination against you or other negative impacts? | 50.5% | 26.7% | 22.8% |

In summary, 60% of participants ranked their universities' management actions against antisemitism between 0 and 3, indicating that they are not taking sufficient action on antisemitism. This contrasts with the NSSS survey, where only 9.9% of students ranked their universities' actions to keep campuses safe from sexual harassment as unsatisfactory (Heywood et al., 2022).

Seventy-three per cent of students reported that universities fail to provide a definition of inappropriate political content in lectures and course materials; 47% of students and 28% of staff reported that they do not understand the complaint system; 45% of participants do not regard the complaint system as adequate; and 67% have never lodged a complaint.

A majority of 51% of participants reported having no confidence in the complaint system. This compares to only 23.5% who reported a lack of confidence in the complaint processes for incidents of sexual harassment and sexual assault (Heywood et al., 2022).

A comparison between students and staff revealed statistically significant differences, with a higher number of staff rating the complaint procedures as inadequate, and more staff having lodged complaints compared to students. These findings are expected, given that staff are employed by universities over many years, making them more familiar with administrative procedures and more likely to lodge complaints over the course of their careers.

Overall, the findings reveal a stark contrast between the level of antisemitism experienced by Jewish people on campus—67% reported hearing antisemitic comments and 93% reported witnessing antisemitic expressions delegitimising the right of Israel to exist—and their level of trust in their universities' systems to protect them, with only 27% reporting confidence that they could lodge a complaint without risking discrimination. Taken together, the findings indicate a system failure in preventing antisemitism.

5.8. Cluster Analysis of Key Survey Items

A cluster analysis was applied to gain deeper insight into the heterogeneity of campus antisemitism experiences post 7 October. Cluster analysis groups participants are based on their distinct mean response profiles. Segmenting the sample into clusters enables us to identify and differentiate sub-groups within the surveyed population, and develop an understanding of the unique subjective experiences, attitudes, and coping mechanisms of participants in each sub-sample.

We applied k-means clustering to the survey dataset using responses from 14 prompts derived from four questions, ultimately selecting a 4-cluster solution, with the distribution fairly balanced across the sample. Figure 5.16 presents the mean responses for each cluster, followed by an interpretation.

Note: Q7— At your campus, since 7 October 2023, have you personally experienced the following behaviours towards you, because you are Jewish or Israeli? (Responses: 1-yes; 2-no; 3-not sure) Q7_1— Feeling ignored or excluded; Q7_2— Being cancelled from groups; Q7_3— Received insult or harassment on social media; Q7_4— Received verbal insult or harassment; Q7_5— Listening to anti-Semitic comments in your presence.

Q10— Since 7 October 2023, would you say that your relationship with your NON-JEWISH university friends, colleagues and others on campus has become... (responses: 1-disconnected; 2 distant; 3-stayed about the same; 4- closer; 5- much closer) Q10_1— Friends [Answer if you are a student; Q10_2— Colleagues [Answer if you are a staff member].

Q11— Please use the slider to indicate any behavioural change you might have experienced since 7 October 2023, on a scale from -5 to +5. Q11_2— Attending classes, if you are a student; Q11_3— Publicly expressing your political beliefs; Q11_4— Publicly expressing your connection to Israel; Q11_7— Mixing with Jewish people; Q11_8— Mixing with non-Jewish people.

Q12—How safe do you feel on campus since 7 October 2023? Please indicate your sense of safety on a scale from 1 to 5. Q12_1— Safety on the physical campus; Q12_2— Safety in the virtual campus (Media and online).

5.8.1 Cluster Profiles by Question Series

Cluster 0 (162 participants, 29.6%): Low-impact, resilient group

- Extent of antisemitism impact: Low
- Extent and nature of social reconfiguration: Low decrease in mixing with non-Jews; moderate decrease in mixing with Jews
- 47 Survey of Antisemitism on Australian Campuses
- Behavioural changes (fight / flight / continue as usual): Flight — low to moderate decrease
- Sense of safety: Somewhat unsafe

Cluster 1 (123 participants, 22.4%): Identity-affirming, forthcoming responders

- Extent of antisemitism impact: Medium to high
- Extent and nature of social reconfiguration: Low to moderate decrease in mixing with non-Jews; high increase in mixing with Jews
- Behavioural changes: Fight — moderate increase
- Sense of safety: Somewhat unsafe

Cluster 2 (110 participants, 20.1%): Highly impacted and sensitised group

- Extent of antisemitism impact: Moderate to high
- Extent and nature of social reconfiguration: Moderate to high decrease in mixing with non-Jews; high increase in mixing with Jews
- Behavioural changes: Flight — moderate to high decrease
- Sense of safety: Unsafe

Cluster 3 (153 participants, 27.9%): Antisemitism perceived as a non-issue

- Extent of antisemitism impact: Non-issue
- Extent and nature of social reconfiguration: Moderate increase in mixing with non-Jews; slight to no increase in mixing with Jews
- Behavioural changes: Continue as usual
- Sense of safety: Safe

Table 5.10 summarises the mean values and key findings for each cluster.

| | Mixing with Jewish people | Moderate increase (2.60) | High increase (3.78) | High decrease (3.64) | Low increase (1.8) |
| | Mixing with non-Jewish people | Low decrease (0.96) | Low decrease (1.20) | High decrease (-3.0) | Low increase (1.3) |
| Q12 (Response: Likert scale 1 = Very unsafe, 5 = Very safe) | Sence of safety on the physical campus | Feeling somewhat unsafe (3.19) | Feeling somewhat unsafe (2.43) | Feeling unsafe (2.08) | Feeling safe (4.0) |
| | Sence of safety in the virtual campus (Media and online) | Somewhat unsafe (2.92) | Unsafe (2.23) | Unsafe (2.02) | Feeling safe (3.87) |

In summary, the cluster analysis enabled the identification of four distinct groups based on their responses to the surge in antisemitism following 7 October. This analysis is particularly valuable for identifying at-risk groups and informing the development of targeted strategies tailored to each cluster profile.

In our survey, one-fifth (20%) of participants belonged to Cluster 2 (Highly impacted and sensitised), representing those at highest risk. These participants experienced direct exposure to antisemitism, felt unsafe on campus, and exhibited strong avoidance behaviours — avoiding campus, distancing from non-Jewish peers, and presumably seeking refuge within the Jewish community. Supporting this group requires targeted interventions to help strengthen their resilience.

Another fifth (22.4%) of participants formed Cluster 1 (Affirmative, forthcoming responses to antisemitism), characterised by assertive responses. Their reaction to confronting antisemitism involved strengthening their Jewish identity and increasing its public expression. Although similarly impacted as Cluster 2, their "fight" response may relate to greater resilience and a comparatively higher sense of safety.

Nearly a third (29.6%) of participants comprising Cluster 0 (Relatively resilient group) demonstrated high levels of resilience, with low impact from antisemitism. Behavioural and relationships changes expressed low to moderate flight responses.

A further 27.9% of the participants comprising Cluster 3 (Antisemitism is a non-issue) appears as a mixed group. One subgroup appeared largely unaffected by antisemitism, potentially due to limited campus presence, though they did show some behavioural shifts such as increased interaction with Jewish people. The other subgroup appeared to align with anti-Israel protestors, expressing a sense of safety on campus and increased mixing with non-Jewish people.

Further research is needed to design tailored interventions that address the distinct needs of Jewish participants across these cluster types.

The combined qualitative and quantitative findings are discussed in what follows.

6 DISCUSSION

This section summarises the qualitative findings, followed by an overview of the quantitative results and their comparison to the pre-7 October campus university students' survey (Social Research Centre, 2023). By integrating these data sources, we derive meaningful insights and implications for fostering inclusive and safe campuses for Jewish students and staff. Together, these data sources present a comprehensive picture—both in words and numbers—of the deeply troubling antisemitic climate on campus.

6.1 Qualitative Findings

The qualitative data portray a campus environment that is hostile and abusive to Jewish people, with overt and normalised antisemitic discourse. Participants described incidents such as a swastika engraved in the staff cafeteria; graffiti stating "Zionists are Nazis"; Nazi salutes at a student council meeting; the distribution of brochures bearing Hitler's face alongside the Magen David; posters promoting talks such as "Global Intifada" and "come and hear who is Hamas"; and chanting on campus declaring "Zionists aren't welcome here."

Jewish students and staff encounter exclusion and social ostracism by peers and colleagues. One respondent reported being asked to leave a share house with other university students because of "political differences." Another described how some academics ceased all communication and professional interaction with them.

Jewish students are subjected to physical and verbal harassment. A participant reported being called a "Zionist pig," while another reported being asked, "how many babies have you killed today?" simply for walking on campus wearing a Kippah. A further example involved a student being doxed and trolled on Instagram, with explicit threats that their HDR studies were at risk due to "being on the list".

In the classroom students are targeted and singled out, needing to hide their identity. One participant described a tutor "asking me my "ethnicity" on two separate occasions upon noticing that I stayed silent in the Israel discussions … Being too afraid to say 'Jewish' so saying Eastern Europe instead". Another student reported being "singled out and made to feel alienated and afraid, and having to hide or defend my Jewishness by my tutor and unit coordinator"

Students are exposed to antisemitic rhetoric from their lecturers. One tutor "described Jewish people as 'the oppressed that became the oppressors' during a class that was about celebrity culture". "A faculty member publicly expressed on social media that Zionists were not safe around her, in any space whatsoever".

Jewish academics experience hostile and abusive statements from colleagues. One participant reported that a colleague said, "Jews caused all the problems in the world. If the Arabs wiped them out, they would be doing the world a favour." Another reported a peer saying they did "not like Israelis but Jews were fine".

Jewish academics are targeted and discriminated against solely based on their Israeli nationality or Zionism. One participant reported about "cancellation of Israeli lecturer in my faculty". Another reported "urination in an ex-pat Israeli staff members' working area and writing 'RESIGN'".

Dismissal of complaints and the instilling of doubt in Jewish individuals' perception of reality, as a form of gaslighting.

One participant reported that their boss told them it was "imaginary that there is any threat to Jewish staff and students on campus and we are simply feeding each other's anxiety". Another reported that the university administration denied their complaint against protesters using the chant “intifada” on the basis that the word was context related and that the “university was not responsible for their feelings”. A further participant noted that they were offered counselling after every complaint of racism made to the university, and that this response diminished the seriousness of the antisemitism, meant perpetrators were not held responsible, and “puts the blame on me as though I am the one who needs to change because of my experience”.

Universities consistently fail to take meaningful action to protect Jewish people from antisemitism. Participants reported overt discrimination by professional staff and described institutional inaction when they sought help. One participant noted that the university responded to complaints from Jewish staff by saying they were taking concerns on board but never took any action. Another reported that when they attempted to have action taken against students in a course with explicit rules against discriminatory behaviour and statements, including online, “the university weasel-worded and equivocated me and ultimately did nothing”.

Universities are not uniform in their responses to antisemitism. While 60% of respondents indicated that their universities are not talking sufficient actions on antisemitism, both quantitative and qualitative data suggest that universities are not uniform and that some respond more appropriately than others. For example, one respondent noted, “I’m lucky to go to a university that is fundamentally different from most in that it is quite apolitical.” Another participant expressed a mixed view: “My assessment of my university's approach is very mixed. On one hand, they appeared to enforce a stricter poster policy, which helps with de-escalation; on the other hand…” Others expressed appreciation of poster removal: “I have confidence in management at my university — they have quickly responded to antisemitic posters and ensured a safe space for Jewish students on campus.” Another stated, “The university is doing a good job by banning posters and gatherings.”

These positive examples, though very few and anecdotal, suggest that some institutions apply effective practices. However, the findings of this survey are insufficient to characterise these exemplary practices in detail.

The quantitative data support these findings and shed light on their prevalence and impacts.

6.2 Quantitative Findings

Both students and staff are profoundly impacted by antisemitism, with the majority equating anti-Zionism with antisemitism.

The findings indicate that most survey participants have personally experienced antisemitism on campus. A high proportion of responses related to antisemitic imagery: “graffiti, posters or fliers: delegitimising the right of Israel to exist” (93%); and “verbally or through social media: delegitimising the right of Israel to exist” (92%).

The survey intentionally did not define antisemitism. But, with few exceptions, survey participants identified anti-Israel imagery and hate speech as a form of antisemitism. This indicates that the majority of Jewish students and staff in the sample equate anti-Zionism with antisemitism.

While both Jewish students and staff report experiencing antisemitism, students appear to be more vulnerable. The largest difference was found in “listening to antisemitic comments in your presence”, where students reported a 26% higher rate than staff (74% vs 48%). These findings are expected, given students’ higher engagement in campus life, both the virtual and physical campuses.

The profound impacts of the antisemitism surge is illustrated in participants’ accounts of fear for the first time in their lives, being afraid to leave a building “because of the violence of the student protests, …. afraid to reveal my identity” , or being “spat on for wearing my Star of David necklace”.

Antisemitism has deeply shaken Jewish people’s core sense of identity and belonging.

The findings suggest that after 7 October, there were stark changes in personal relationships and behaviours, creating a sense of an existential ""earthquake."" Critical aspects of social identity appear to have been affected. One respondent commented: “Socially, in my faculty I feel that I no longer know who my friends are”.

The tearing of the social fabric is most evident in shifts in personal relationships, with Jewish people mixing less with non-Jewish people (49%) and increasingly drawn into Jewish social circles (77%), seemingly seeking refuge. Similarly, on campus, 43% of students reported becoming distant from non-Jewish friends and 35% of staff reported becoming distant from colleagues.

At the same time, an opposite trend emerged among a minority of participants, with 8.5% of students and 6.2% of staff reporting that they became closer or much closer to non-Jewish individuals on campus. This suggests that political anti-Zionist views may have caused a rift within the Jewish community between Zionist and anti-Zionist Jews. Qualitative excerpts support this assertion, where a small minority of participants identified as anti-Zionists (e.g., “a proud Jewish person who does not subscribe to Zionist beliefs”), explicitly outlining the ideological rift: “Stop stifling protest, help young Jews to learn the truth. Anti-Zionism is not antisemitism”; “I have received comments on social media calling me a kapo, traitor, not Jewish, saying that I'm not part of the community, etc., all from Jewish Zionists.”

Free Speech, but Not for Supporters of Israel

The findings suggest that publicly supporting Israel carries the greatest social cost for Jewish individuals. The overall 49% decrease in expressions of political beliefs and connections to Israel indicates that, in effect, for the majority of Jewish people who support Israel, free speech on campus has been suppressed.

Fight or Flight Responses

The findings reveal two distinct responses to the hostile campus environment resembling fight- or-flight behaviour, with a reported 39% decrease versus 40% increase in wearing Jewish symbols, and a 49% decrease versus a 32% increase in publicly expressing political beliefs or one's connection to Israel. These bifurcated behavioural responses suggest an underlying emotional stress pushing people towards survivalist responses in opposite directions. Among the flight responses, hiding identity and avoidance are prevalent.

Hostile Excluding Campus Environment

By triangulating the three data sources—anecdotal reports from participants on what makes them feel safe, qualitative responses related to the physical environment, and quantitative data on exposure to imagery—it becomes evident that the campus environment, with its antisemitic imagery, is itself a form of harassment, a source of intimidation, and a driver of alienation.

The category "The campus environment" in the qualitative data had the highest frequency of responses, accounting for nearly half (45%) of all excerpts in the survey. Within this category, the most frequently cited theme was "Hostile and exclusionary physical environments," which comprised 32.9% of the total 45% of excerpts.

The quantitative findings reinforce this conclusion by highlighting the significant role of the physical environment in shaping perceptions of safety. When asked whether they had personally witnessed antisemitic expressions on campus since 7 October, 92% of participants reported seeing at least "rarely" graffiti, posters, or flyers that delegitimised Israel's right to exist.

This finding is critically important because it suggests that restoring a substantial sense of safety and inclusivity on campus can be achieved through minimal efforts by universities. It only requires the consistent enforcement of existing rules and codes of conduct prohibiting campus defacement.

Avoiding the Threat, Hiding Identity.

The atmosphere of alienation and isolation on campus has led a large minority of Jewish students to avoid attending classes, and Jewish people on campus to make behavioural changes in order to hide their Jewish identity and its intrinsic association with Zionism.

The combined qualitative and quantitative data indicate behavioural patterns of campus avoidance among students and staff. Class avoidance was reported by 48% of students ("I deliberately stay off campus as much as possible in the hope of avoiding direct encounters with antisemitism"; "I have specifically chosen a distance education course in order for me to avoid attending the campus"). Participants also reported avoiding specific hostile areas on campus ("I was constantly checking these groups' social media in an attempt to always avoid going anywhere near them, even taking much longer indirect routes to avoid even passing them").

Hiding Jewish identity was also extensively reported and took various forms, such as non-disclosure of identity ("I am a first-year student and have not yet told anyone at the uni that I am Jewish"); avoiding academic work that may reveal identity ("I am afraid to tell anyone I'm Jewish and I'm afraid to produce Jewish artwork"); and removal of Jewish symbols, as previously discussed ("Plenty of friendly non-Jews have gone up to me telling me to hide my Star of David for my own safety").

Jewish respondents perceived the primary source of concern about campus antisemitism came from the political Left (84%). There was much less concern about the political Right (37%). Antisemitism on campuses, particularly in the form of anti-Zionism, appears to be embedded in liberal progressive ideologies, where hostility toward the Jewish minority is justified, and Jews are framed as "oppressors" (Hirsh, 2017).

The data reveal that participants in our sample differ in the extent to which antisemitism impacts them emotionally, affects their daily lives, and influences their sense of safety on campus. These differences, in turn, are reflected in the extent and nature of social reconfiguration and behavioural change. Two groups stand out in particular: Cluster 2 – "Highly Impacted and Sensitised Group", and Cluster 3 – "Antisemitism Perceived as a Non-Issue".

Cluster 2 is of particular concern due to the high impact of antisemitism. This group comprises individuals who are likely struggling to perform academically, with potential long-term implications for their career trajectories and social adjustment. Focused research is needed to evaluate the broader impacts of antisemitism on this group and to identify effective means of community support.

Cluster 3 appears as an outlier across the four key dimensions: impact of antisemitism, social reconfiguration, behavioural change, and sense of safety. Findings for this group tend to show trends that are generally opposite to those observed in the rest of the sample.

However, this cluster is not homogeneous and could potentially have been subdivided into two distinct groups. One subgroup includes Jewish individuals who do not perceive campus protests as personally targeting them. Since 7 October, this group has become closer to the non-Jewish community and more distant from the Jewish community. As noted above, the dividing line between this subgroup and the broader Jewish community is most likely their identification as anti-Zionists.

The other subgroup comprises participants who maintain a sense of closeness with the broader Jewish community, which has even slightly strengthened. However, they adopt a more neutral stance on the conflict and, overall, do not feel personally threatened by the post-7 October campus antisemitism.

The decision not to divide these into separate clusters was informed by the finding that a four- cluster solution offered the most meaningful differentiation while preserving a relatively balanced distribution. Further research is required to better understand the specific characteristics of the subgroups within this cluster, their roles in the current discourse on campus antisemitism, and the implications of their outlier status within the Jewish community."

"Betrayed by Leadership: Lack of Confidence in University Administration

Most students and staff expressed little trust in their universities' administration, with 60% rating their institution's actions against antisemitism between 0 and 3 on a scale from 0 to 10. Universities failed to provide adequate guidance on inappropriate content (72%), and only 17% of participants agreed that "the complaints procedures are adequate at your university."

Among the few students and staff who reported filing complaints, frustration with institutional inaction was a common theme. In most cases, complaints were dismissed or met with advice for the complainant to remain at home. Such responses invalidated the complainants' lived experiences and signalled that the issue lay not with the aggressors—who faced no consequences—but with the complainants, who were seen as "too sensitive." Unsurprisingly, formal complaints by Jewish students and staff were rare.

The gap between the frequency of reported antisemitic comments (67%) and the relatively low rate of formal complaints (32%) indicates a systemic failure in university grievance and complaints procedures. Indeed, 51% of participants reported a lack of confidence that they could lodge a complaint without risking discrimination or other negative repercussions. This concern was affirmed by qualitative data. One participant reported: "Please note that I have made a complaint about antisemitism to the university and have been discriminated against for making the complaint."

Inadequate disciplinary measures, lack of transparency, and fear of retaliation appear to have created a culture of distrust and reluctance to report incidents.

This poor institutional performance stands in stark contrast to the response to sexual harassment and assault following the 2021 release of the National Student Safety Survey (Heywood et al., 2022).

For example, Professor Mark Scott, Vice-Chancellor and Principal of the University of Sydney, committed his institution to "renewed and targeted action to create a safer and more supportive environment." (University of Sydney, 2022). He noted that since 2018 the university had required all new students to complete a Consent Matters module, and consent workshops were held twice a year for all student leaders and first-year students in residential accommodation. In addition, a mandatory module was introduced for all executive office holders in student clubs and societies to address the drivers of sexual assault and harassment.

Despite progress, Professor Scott commented about ongoing incidents:

> Frankly, one case is one too many. To every person who has experienced sexual harassment or sexual assault, we are deeply sorry. Every student has the right to feel safe and supported and to be treated with respect and dignity, whether on campus, online or offshore. Anything less is unacceptable. (University of Sydney, 2022).

Across Australia, universities implemented a suite of measures, including new policies, educational modules, and support systems. For instance, the University of Melbourne released a standalone Sexual Misconduct Prevention and Response Policy in 2021, and Deakin University updated its Student Code of Conduct to explicitly address sexual harm. Educational programmes on respectful relationships and consent were made mandatory, and support systems were restructured to include centralised contact points.

These measures demonstrate that universities have adopted a zero-tolerance policy towards sexual harassment and have actively implemented comprehensive systems to ensure all students feel safe on campus. In contrast, no such institutional response has been extended to Jewish students and staff experiencing antisemitism. Despite two-thirds of the Jewish campus population reporting that they feel somewhat unsafe to very unsafe, universities have, to date, not demonstrated a genuine commitment to uprooting antisemitism from their campuses.

6.3 Comparison of The Jewish University Experience Survey (Social Research Centre, 2023) Survey Findings to Antisemitism in Australian Universities Post 7 October (5A, 2024) Survey Findings

As discussed above the two surveys of antisemitism on Australian campuses were conducted almost a year apart, one— The Jewish University Experience Survey (Social Research Centre, 2023)— prior to 7 October and the other—Antisemitism in Australian Universities Post 7 October (5A, 2024)—after. By comparing key variables across the two surveys, it is possible to gain a quantitative glimpse into the sharp rise of antisemitism on campuses over the course of just one year, and thus assess the magnitude of the impact of the 7 October aftermath.

Table 6.1. Comparison of survey findings: The Jewish University Experience Survey (Social Research Centre, 2023) vs. Antisemitism in Australian Universities Post 7 October (5A, 2024), by key variables

| Item | The Jewish University Experience Survey (Social Research Centre, 2023) | Antisemitism in Australian Universities Post 7 October (5A, 2024) | % Change | Rate of Growth |
|---|---|---|---|---|
| Avoid attending campus due to antisemitism | Avoid attending campus due to the antisemitic behaviour of others – 19% | Decrease in attending classes – 57% | +38% | 3.0x |
| Social exclusion due to antisemitism | Being involuntarily singled out or excluded due to matters relating to Israel – 25% | Feeling ignored or excluded – 43% | +18% | 1.7x |
| Intimidation based on antisemitism | People or events that made you feel intimidated because of your Jewish identity – 47% | Verbally or through social media: Calling for, or justifying the killing or harming of Jews – 76% | +29% | 1.6x |
| Comparing Israel to Nazis | Comparing Israel to Nazi Germany – 37% | Witnessed graffiti, posters, or fliers with Nazi imagery – 54% | +17% | 1.5x |
| Lack of confidence in complaint mechanisms | Lack of confidence about making a complaint – 38% | Not confident to lodge complaint without risk of discrimination – 51% | +13% | 1.3x |

Examination of the table reveals a 1.5- to threefold rise across all four indicators of antisemitism, alongside a 1.3-fold decline in Jewish people's confidence in their universities' complaint systems. The strongest evidence that campuses have become increasingly unsafe for Jewish students is the threefold reduction in class attendance following 7 October.

These findings provide quantitative evidence of the post–7 October eruption of full-blown antisemitism—a sentiment that has been lurking on campuses since the turn of the century (Rutland & Allington, 2023). While the quantitative comparison offers insight into the rise in antisemitism rates, the full extent of its nature and scope could only be revealed through the integration of both quantitative and qualitative data collected in this survey. These findings give rise to a series of recommendations for cultural reform on campuses.

SUMMARY OF KEY FINDINGS & RECOMMENDATIONS

7.1 Antisemitism is Systemic Across University Systems.

Antisemitism was revealed across systems, in policy enforcement, disciplinary procedures, administration, teaching and research practices and coursework materials.

Recommendation: The persistent gap between rhetoric and action—where universities profess zero tolerance for antisemitism but take little to no concrete action to prevent it—needs to be addressed. Institutions must demonstrate the same level of commitment to tackling antisemitism as they have shown in addressing sexual harassment. While the two social maladies differ markedly in nature and characteristics, lessons can be drawn from the impact of serious institutional commitment.

7.2 Addressing Antisemitism in Both Physical and Online Spaces

Virtual campuses increasingly merge with physical environments, with the boundaries between them becoming blurred. Participants report that both the physical and virtual campuses are equally hostile.

Recommendation: Universities need to develop policies that ensure the safety of Jewish people not only on physical campuses but also within virtual spaces. As the boundaries between these spaces continue to blur, institutions must proactively address antisemitism across both domains, including broader outreach efforts such as prohibiting hate speech by staff and students—even beyond the confines of the university community.

7.3 The Impact of Campus Imagery

Campus environments and imagery are among the most influential factor affecting Jewish students' and staff members' sense of safety and inclusion.

Recommendation: There needs to be strict prohibition of campus defacement. Universities must enforce and strengthen existing policies that prohibit and penalise the defacement of public spaces. Campuses should be cleared of unauthorised posters, flyers, megaphone use during class hours, and other physical disruptions. Their removal is expected to significantly contribute to restoring a sense of safety.

7.4 Jewish people's freedom of speech has been silenced

Recommendation: Universities need to implement explicit educational measures to restore and protect this right. Effective initiatives may include university-led public debates, compulsory educational modules for all students and staff, and a requirement that coursework materials relating to the Middle East present all sides of the conflict fairly and equally.

7.5 Antisemitism has become normalised

Regardless of the campus or the specific segment of the Jewish university population surveyed, findings consistently show that antisemitic culture has become pervasive and normalised across Australian universities.

Recommendation: Universities need to take immediate, strong, and decisive action to challenge and reverse this normalisation of antisemitic discourse. This can only be achieved through a dual strategy of education, combined with rigorous enforcement and disciplinary processes. Hate-driven discourse inevitably leads to hateful actions. If left unaddressed, escalation is inevitable.

7.6 The majority of participants equate antisemitism with anti-Zionism

Recommendation: Universities need to fully adopt the definition of antisemitism as understood by the majority of Jewish people, treating it as non-negotiable—just as other minority groups are granted the right to define their own identities. Accordingly, a suite of policies and disciplinary procedures must be developed and implemented to prevent this form of antisemitic harassment.

7.7 Jewish staff and students Lack Confidence in the Universities' Disciplinary Systems

More than half of the participants reported lacking confidence in their ability to lodge a complaint without risking discrimination or other repercussions.

Recommendation: Universities need to establish centralised complaint systems dedicated to addressing antisemitism on campus in all its forms, including those related to the Middle East conflict and anti-Zionism. These systems should be staffed by specially trained officers with understanding of contemporary manifestations of antisemitism, Jewish history—including the Jewish people's three-millennia-long connection to the land of Israel—and the impact of anti-Israel bias on Jewish individuals. The centralised disciplinary system should be mandated to address all forms of antisemitic expression on campus, including inappropriate teaching materials, biased practices in nomination processes, and other forms of offensive antisemitic conduct.

7.8 Responses are not uniform across universities.

The high variability among Australian universities in the ranking of their actions on antisemitism suggest that some may be more effective in addressing certain issues of antisemitism than others.

Recommendation: Further research is needed to systematically evaluate university actions and identify effective practices.

8 CONCLUSION

The findings of this survey align with those of campus antisemitism studies conducted in other Western countries, including the UK, USA, Canada, and Europe (e.g., Lierens, 2024; Santos and Yogev, 2023; U.S. House of Representatives, 2024). In today's globalized world, it took a few weeks for the COVID-19 virus to spread to each corner of the planet. Similarly, it seems to have taken only one day for the brutal massacre of Jews and non-Jews in Israel on October 7, to trigger a rapid surge of antisemitism on university campuses worldwide.

Rabbi Lord Jonathan Sacks (2020) famously described antisemitism as a virus that mutates. He compared it to a social disease, noting that just as biological viruses adapt to their environments, antisemitism evolves in response to societal changes. In the Middle Ages, antisemitism was anchored in religious hostility; in the 20th century, it was anchored in racial ideologies; and in the 21st century, it is anchored in anti-Zionism—the denial of Jewish self-determination.

As institutions that shape intellectual discourse and lead academic thought, universities bear a profound responsibility to confront this modern mutation of antisemitism. It is imperative that they take decisive action to eradicate antisemitic hostility from their campuses and uphold their commitment to fostering safe, inclusive, and respectful learning environments.

Universities must act now to stop campus tribalism and restore the foundational values of academic conduct—respectful dialogue, ethical engagement, and shared responsibility toward all members of the university community.

APPENDIX C

EXEMPLAR EXCERPTS FROM QUALITATIVE DATA

Category: The Campus Environment

Theme: Physical and virtual campus environments: hostile, excluding and unsafe for Jews.

Exemplary excerpts:

- The vile chants shouted at the recent protest were quite unnerving. While I was sitting in class it was impossible to focus while people outside were chanting intifada, calling for the death of Jews and Israelis. It is incredibly scary to walk around campus knowing that these people are around you.
- On the … university encampment the members were using microphones and yelling "f off Zionists" and "bye bye Zionists".
- Constant barrage of anti-Israel posters - everywhere - on doors, windows, posts and even chalk on the footpaths
- Chalk saying "Zionists not welcome"
- Certain students and student bodies labelling Zionists as racists, genocide lovers; Israeli guest lecturers cancelled owing to pressure from these students; posters around campus showing a Nazi-like caricature of a Jew representing Israel saying "if I don't steal it someone else will;" people protesting with signs saying that Israel is a terrorist state
- Handed brochures with Hitler's face with Magen David. Posters with talks of Global Intifada and "come and Hear who is Hamas"
- Posters including the words of the "case for the intifada" and "who are Hamas". Protests which made me feel unsafe on campus. Needing a security escort to come into campus.
- Recently I heard chanting on campus "Zionist's aren't welcome here". Prior to this it was lies on posters - how Israel was created as a mean to control the Middle East, how it is evil etc… accusations of genocide every day on the posters, ripping of kidnapped posters, and all staff announcements on the intranet from various staff members.
- Posters of the hostages taken by Hamas defaced and torn down, stickers with the Israeli flag crossed out in prominent public spaces and amenities (toilets, on drinking fountains, poles), innumerable posters depicting the map of Israel in Palestinian flag colours (to suggest Israel be destroyed and replaced by a total Palestinian state), posters saying "Zionists not welcome here", speeches and megaphones shouting "From the River to the Sea" and "Globalise the Intifada" and absolutely no acknowledgement that this would be threatening to Jewish students and staff, students / protestors publicly interrupting lectures and disrupting the teaching, protestors aggressively pushing petitions in your face when you're trying to get into a building…
- The encampment where people refuse to talk and walk around with their faces covered with keffiyehs - Megaphones being used to scream into people's ears close up
- Swastika engraved in staff cafeteria
- Graffiti on university property "Zionists are Nazis"

Theme: Constraint movement on campus; interruptions to campus core businesses

Exemplary excerpts:

- Locked out of Melbourne Connect because of anti-Israel protestors
- Hijacking of the Arts Degrees Graduation ceremony
- I was not able to use the Arts West building to study or work in, like I normally would
- Encampments on campus blocking entrances to buildings
- My lecture theatre was outside the .... encampment and I had to walk through to get to the theatre. On my way out of the theatre I saw a group of protestors linking arms preventing Jewish students from entering, most notably those who told the protestors to do so were Arab men who didn't even attend the university
- I walked to a meeting I needed to attend in the ... building and there was a protest right out the front of the building. The building was in lockdown, I had to ask the police that were in attendance where to get in. They directed me incorrectly and I had to walk right up to the protest only to be turned away. I had to go to a side door, I had to prove I was staff and that I had a meeting in the building, all the while having to listen to the protesters. I was shaken up and my anxiety was through the roof by the time I got into the building
- The Israeli women who were invited to the campus for their exchange program being locked in a room with aggressive protestors and then being asked to leave. Now all Jewish or other students who may have been interested in the exchange can no longer do it
- The encampments that blocked everything during my graduation and a man wearing a terrorist scarf sitting right next to me at my graduation

Theme: Needing to hide Jewish identity; avoiding campus

Exemplary excerpts:

- I am a first-year student and have not yet told anyone at the uni that I am Jewish
- I have specifically chosen a distant education course in order for me to avoid attending the campus
- ...the presence of the encampment as well as the antisemitic chants have drastically affected me, while on campus I was constantly checking these groups' social medias in an attempt to always avoid going anywhere near them, even taking much longer indirect routes to avoid even passing them. Furthermore, their presence had a significant impact on my mental health, the last few weeks feeling as though I couldn't attend my university, making sure that I don't look "too Jewish" to avoid being the victim of racial vilification, feeling unsafe to represent my Jewish culture
- I was in my office, unable to leave, because of the violence of the student protests. For the first time in my life, I was afraid to be Jewish, afraid to reveal my identity
- I deliberately stay off campus as much as possible in the hope of avoiding direct encounters with antisemitism

- At the Paddington campus there have been protests to free Palestine and there are hundreds of posters all over campus. Constantly chanting “from the river to the sea Palestine be free”. I know that means the elimination of Jewish people and I am afraid. There is nothing that is pro-Israel. I chose UNSW as it is known in the community as JEW NSW. I am afraid to tell anyone I’m Jewish and I’m afraid to produce Jewish artwork

- I was spat on for wearing my Star of David necklace. This has happened twice. Also, plenty of friendly non-Jews have gone up to me telling me to hide my Star of David for my own safety

Theme: Hostility toward Jews across unions

Exemplary excerpts:

- NTEU circulating letters condemning Israel without mentioning Hamas or the October 7 attacks or hostages and holding a “wear your kaffiyeh to work day” with no thought to how Jewish students and staff may feel.
- Jewish students see purple Student Union gazebos in the middle of the encampment and feel alienated by their own student representative body
- My union has engaged in some hate speech, lots of signs around campus calling for an “intifada”. Most notably I went to speak to the protesters and asked if they thought the hostages should be released, and they replied with “those Jews deserved it”.
- … the ANU Student Association - a body that is elected to apolitically represent students has been the greatest perpetrator of antisemitism. Displaying and giving out Palestinian flags, encouraging students to go to antisemitic marches and putting in student newspapers and welcome booklets pages upon pages of horrifyingly antisemitic contents
- I attended a student council meeting and during the council there were various Nazi salutes
- The official Sydney Uni student union group “Autonomous Collective Against Racism” …exists to ensure that no "Zionist" students can run for student council (SRC). In practice, this involves scanning social media accounts of prospective new candidates and barring any Jewish students unless they outwardly condemn Israel
- Blocked from Facebook pages by the student Union

Category: The Student Experience

Theme: Ignored, cancelled, expelled

Exemplary excerpts:

- Being asked to leave my share house with other university students because of “political differences” and different “values”
- People … actively ignoring me where we used to all be really friendly. One kid invited everyone in my course (it’s a small course) to a house party except myself. Many people who used to be my friends from uni have unfollowed me on social media and shared harmful propaganda because they do not know any better.

- I have experienced people gossiping about me when they thought I wasn't in the vicinity, saying things like "Jew hatred can't be that bad... especially at Melbourne Uni," in relation to me specifically, alongside people in my degree going around spreading word about how I'm a Zionist as if I'm the scum of the earth. Some people have even unfollowed me on Instagram, give me dirty looks, eye rolls, mock my personality (I've heard that when they thought I wasn't in the room once again), and just a general energy where people are disinterested in talking or communicating with me since October 7th
- Previous "friends" no longer speak to me. There was an incident on campus where my Jewish friend got shoved for speaking up
- I was uninvited from gathering due to my "political standing" which I had never shared with them and also noticed all their Jewish friends had been uninvited
- Some academics stopped speaking or dealing with me completely

Theme: Attacks on Jewish students by other students

Exemplary excerpts:

- I was spat at by one of the pro-Palestinian students as I was walking to the library
- A girl I walked past who knew I was Jewish saying "f the Jews" under her breath
- I have been called a "Zionist pig". Been followed. Made to feel that I need to hide my identity
- I have regularly been called "Jew boy" or "Jew" and singled out by passersby while with no Jewish friends
- heard students talking about anyone who supports Israel as not being human
- Getting asked "how many babies have you killed today" due to simply walking around on campus with a Kippah - plus many other slurs and accusations such as being labelled "a right-wing fascist" that should be kicked off campus, again after doing nothing but wearing a Kippah
- Other students singing Nazi songs in my presence, knowing I am Jewish
- I was included on the list of Zionists who were doxed. As a result, I was trolled by someone on Instagram who made reference to the fact my HDR studies would be at risk and my academic future would be under attack due to my being on the "list"
- My uni friend ... told me that she doesn't want to go to a restaurant in Melbourne because the chef there is from Israel. I felt very confused as I thought she knew I was Jewish and confused on how somebody could think that an Israeli chef in Melbourne can hurt or impact the war in anyway
- I was approached by 4 "pro-Palestinian" students who called me names such as a "pig", a "genocide supporter" and a "Nazi". They tried to intimidate and harass me whilst I was waiting to attend a class. I asked them if they would like to have a civil discussion about the conflict and they were reluctant to

- One incident was upon finding out I was Jewish, another student began to complain about how many Jews there are at USyd. When he found out he beat me in a maths quiz, he yelled out “Revenge!” This same person said he did his HSC by imagining the markers were Zionists and he was charging into battle against them; when asked what a Zionist is, he replied “Jews”
- I've been verbally assaulted when I wore a "bring them home" necklace, someone came up to me and shouted "Fuck you Zionazi" in my ear

Exemplary excerpts:

- The same tutor asking me my “ethnicity” on two separate occasions upon noticing that I stayed silent in the Israel discussions and asking where my family name is from. Being too afraid to say “Jewish” so saying Eastern Europe instead.
- Hearing students wanting to work out who is Jewish and talking about how they might do so, such as asking about where their name comes from while I was sitting in the room, I guess they didn’t know I was Jewish but from a room of 20 people no one thought to tell them that it’s wrong to go searching for Jews like it’s a witch hunt. The way they said Jewish with such venom was quite terrifying for me given that my surname is a Jewish name and if they think of me during their witch hunt it won’t take long to figure it out
- When pro Palestine activists entered my lectures and forced everyone to participate in a vote to split the classroom into who was pro-Israel and who was anti-Israel. They took a photo of the results
- I've been singled out and made to feel alienated and afraid and having to hide or defend my Jewishness by my tutor and unit coordinator, that made me feel distressed and scared and alienated, separate and bad for the team, as they were negatively affected and encouraged to treat / view me differently as I am Jewish from the faculty

Exemplary excerpts:

- A tutor described Jewish people as “the oppressed that became the oppressors” during a class that was about celebrity culture
- A professor saying that all casualties in Gaza should be considered non-combatant because Israel put the Gazans in a bad enough situation that Hamas should be considered protected civilians
- I was in a subject where we had a lecture on the Israeli-Palestine conflict where the lecture opened by saying that she will be antisemitic in the lecture, which caused me to have a panic attack after the lecture and eventually drop the subject because I felt unsafe in the subject
- I determine courses according to lectures/ tutors' biographies and if they are affiliated with antisemitic groups, I choose another course as I am scared of being discriminated against
- My tutor for Art History walked into class wearing a keffiyeh and, unprompted by any student, began to explain his reasons for wearing a “symbol of resistance against a genocidal regime". The non-topical nature of his speech, and the uncalled-for political posturing were deeply unneeded and offensive to my own family in Israel, who are by no means genocidal or oppressive

- I have encountered teachers saying during lectures "free Palestine from the river to the sea" making me so uncomfortable during class, fellow students who knew I was Jewish saying "stop talking Jew" when I never even stated my support for Israel to them
- I do not feel comfortable or safe ... My lecturers, subject coordinators and tutors all impose their personal opinion of the Israel-Gaza conflict on the class and don't encourage debate or a balanced discussion. My tutors emailed my classes encouraging us to attend the schools strike for Palestine as it was an "effective public relations campaign" and raises awareness for the injustice of Palestinian people. My educators signed the petition which called for "UTS to cut all ties with Israel" - meaning they want to cut ties with me? Anti-Zionism IS Anti-Semitism. Why are there posters everywhere reading "from the river to the sea ...". Why are my subject coordinators publishing information which is really hurtful to Jewish people?"
- In a citizenship and communications class, one student used Free Palestine protests as an example of how protesting works saying "no matter how much we protest, nothing seems to happen". The teacher then responded saying "soon the government will appeal to reason and stop supporting Israel and go on to support Palestine". It made me feel like the pro-Israel position was simply viewed as wrongful and invalid. As the rest of the class nodded in agreement, I realised I couldn't stand up for what I believed was right. Everyone seemed to share pro-Palestinian/anti-Israeli values
- My tutors wearing a Palestinian flag on their shirts everyday

Theme: Antisemitism and hostility within learning settings; disruptions to learning

Exemplary excerpts:

- My lecturer announced that attendance to our class would not be taken due to the encampment and encouraged everyone to follow what was happening in Gaza. I later saw him at the protest, actively participating and confronted him about influencing his own political agenda in the classroom. I described feeling unsafe on campus as a Jew, he told me to go on zoom. I am now anxious to go to this class
- Being a student at a university in which a faculty member publicly expressed on social media that Zionists were not safe around her, in any space whatsoever
- At the very beginning of one of my classes, the club/group "Students for Palestine" issued fliers to everyone, urging for us to strike ... repeatedly said that "genocide" is being committed - felt incredibly isolated and shocked that this was allowed in a classroom setting. I was extremely uncomfortable for the remainder of the lesson
- In a maths lecture in the first or second week of university a pro-Palestinian speaker co-opted the forum and made a statement that included somewhat inflammatory and certainly not objective statements about the war in Gaza.

- When people disturbed my lecture (that I paid for) twice about how there's a genocide but that's not true at all, it made me feel unsafe
- People coming into my classroom to promote the anti-Israel encampment
- Disruption of lectures and even graduation ceremonies. The one-sided material given and talked about at some lectures. UNBEARABLE
- Only just a few weeks ago I was sitting in the library next to a group of uni students when I heard, and I quote "If Hitler had done his job properly, the Israel and Palestine war wouldn't be happening"
- Students in class discussing the effects of boycotting Israel as though this is a consensual matter. The question was not whether this is morally ok, but rather, how effective is it
- Sitting in quiet libraries and people walking around putting pro-Palestinian posters on tables

Category: The Academics and Staff Experience

Theme: Jewish academics and staff personally attacked, targeted; feeling unsafe

Exemplary excerpts:

- I was assaulted by a Deakin student who I have reported internally and provided the student's name, photos and contact details of several eyewitnesses
- Demonising comments from colleagues. Defamation of my image on poster. Derogatory drawings posted in public spaces
- I was openly falsely accused of - and threatened with disciplinary action for - allegedly providing favourable treatment to a rabbi over other faith leaders in relation to a university event on the basis that I am Jewish
- A Jewish colleague has had an office door trashed; another has been asked to teach from home
- Numerous colleagues could no longer look at me, and stopped speaking to me after Oct 7th, or were unusually cold, unfriendly, or suspicious. I feel strongly that decisions about whether or not to work together were made on the basis of my identity or perceived political opinion because of my identity
- On October 9th, had a student who identifies as Lebanese Palestinian enter the lab in which I teach 25 students. He came in, unfurled his Keffiyeh in front of me, then rolled it up and put it on. He knows that I am Jewish as we have had many discussions about it prior
- I was asked to provide a list of Jews who opposed the Overland petition by someone with a watermelon emoji in their name
- Urination in an ex-pat Israeli staff members' working area (their name is not public knowledge), and writing "RESIGN".
- Being doxxed on Twitter by a Senior Professor in my faculty
- My colleague, who is not Jewish, but who spent time in Israel and married an Israeli, was accused of taking bribes by our Lead Tutor, who is not Jewish, because he argued in favour of a student's higher mark. An ex-tutor from the unit, who was friendly with the Lead tutor, suggested it is because of my colleague's connection to Israel. Upon further inquiry, the ex-tutor/friend detailed our Lead Tutor's history of antisemitism including a specific disdain for me, although I never disclosed that I am Jewish in my limited interactions with the Lead Tutor. The subject of my heritage is not relevant to our unit in any way. I was also not hired back to tutor on that unit, nor was my colleague with the Israeli wife.

- Extreme anti-Israel sentiment that quickly morphed into personal vitriol when I disagreed. Accused of authoring genocide. Doxxed on X
- A student in my class of about 15 who was asked to use creative arts in designing a lesson, suggested, (knowing I was Jewish) that they act out being Hitler. This was a clear attempt to intimidate

Theme: Antisemitism among academics and staff

Exemplary excerpts:

- When a colleague described … the Holocaust as being a term reserved to describe the trauma of "white" people
- Peer saying - does not like Israelis but Jews are fine
- My experience has been at [university name omitted] with the rewriting of a piece I wrote for them. They "edited" it so dramatically- and refused to change it, even though I had been asked to write as a subject specialist- that the piece was incorrect and misleading. It was so awful, and their response so intransigent that I had to withdraw it from publication.
- … a colleague said to me, "Jews caused all the problems in the world. If the Arabs wiped them out, they would be doing the world a favour." When I asked if it was a joke the colleague said it was not
- The official USYD staff communication channel, Viva Engage (formerly Yammer) is a cesspool of misinformation and hate, with daily calls to sign boycott petitions and condemn Israel and constantly stating things like there is no evidence for rape on October 7 …including links to really concerning fringe websites. These posts appear in the email inbox of all staff at the university and apparently are not moderated. Day after day of these email notifications and the visual onslaught of posters and speeches (by staff, not just students) makes the campus a very hostile place for anyone who is Jewish
- Fellow academics promoting barely disguised Jew-hatred
- Academics in the Law School organised a hate fest discussion on the conflict
- Former [details omitted] of UNSW continuously posting online under his title "Emeritus Professor of UNSW" outrageous anti-Israel posts. Constantly maligning online Jewish alumni. Complete refusal of UNSW to take any disciplinary action
- …having colleagues inform me that as I am white. I cannot experience racism

Theme: BDS, cancelling Jewish/Israeli academics

Exemplary excerpts:

- Cancellation of Israeli lecturer in my faculty
- Cancellation by Engineering of the Technion Professor's visit

- … the cancelling of the visiting Israeli academic
- … a postgraduate conference disinviting a speaker due to the organisation they represent tackling antisemitism. A formal complaint was made, the investigation concluded it was an ""outside function"" merely renting space at the university, so the university would not take the investigation forward. This is despite the chair of the conference not even mentioning their role within the conference committee, but instead introducing themselves as a researcher at the university in their email disinviting the speaker. The university has a policy on antisemitism, but seems unwilling to apply it when considering outside bookings.

Category: The Universities' Systems Failure

Theme: Discrimination against Jews by professional staff and management

Exemplary excerpts:

- Another encounter was with an International Student Advisor …. I told her that I want to have my recreational leave and then a sick leave back home. She asked me “where is home? Portugal?” … I told her “no, Israel”. The second I said that her face changed, and she just told me she can’t help me and it’s best I’ll contact another advisor. Practically expelled me from her room. And after she closed it, I was sticking around pretty shocked she screamed something like “OMG! Blablabla” (couldn’t hear the rest of it).
- The institution denying me special considered for Jewish holidays. … and the Muslim students were granted special consideration for Ramadan and I wasn't for Pesach.
- A very senior executive has been overly scrutinising my social media posts and publicly criticised them trying to shame me in front of senior colleagues with mocking comments about my position at [university name omitted]. in turn I have seen that she had liked an anti-Semitic post on social media which gives me a strong clue to her motivation. This person is also trying to restrict my academic freedom in other ways

- I had students in my class at UNSW perform a Nazi salute to me on three occasions. I reported this to UNSW College ….. They did not take my complaint seriously. I reported it to the NSW Police, who took the case very seriously UNSW College Admin only took the complaint seriously once the police were involved. This occurred last term. For more than the past 12 months, my contract hours have been renewed every term, with the same hours and the same classes, however since complaining about antisemitism, UNSW College did not renew my contract. The only possible explanation in my opinion is that this is because I raised the issue of antisemitism with the police.

Theme: Systems’ failure to deal with complaints and protect Jewish students and staff

Exemplary excerpts:

- I’m on cloud campus - but during online lectures, there have been ‘casual’ comments made against Israelis and slowly against Jews. This was made by the same handful of students - I reported this to my professor but they told me to just ignore them and complete the Unit. The fact that I was told to move on and no one told these students off for their antisemitic and racist comments made me feel like I do not matter, insignificant

- I had placement last year at a known antisemitic school, guess, and once they found out I was Jewish, the admin and management attitudes changed and I felt unsafe, always looking over my shoulder - when I reported this to my placement officer, I was once again told to finish up my placement and move on. No actions have ever been taken, I was just told to move on and ignore their hatred through my entire degrees and placements. Their apathy hit me deep, time and time again

- Multiple students in my course … made posts following the attacks—… in which the attack was described as justified (in other words, it was terror apologism, not just anti-Zionism). When I went to the university and attempted to have action taken against these students, as my course has explicit rules about discriminatory behaviour and statements (including online), the university weasel-worded and equivocated me and ultimately did nothing about it, essentially telling me that the posts were made out of 'ignorance' and because I couldn't prove the posts were made with malicious intent, literally defending terrorism didn't count. This was before Israel had even responded militarily and these course members knew that I was Israeli and could have had friends and family die in the attack.
- During an Anti-Israel protest in the Hawken engineering building a person smashed a window and escaped. UQ has not followed with an investigation or a concrete attempt to identify the attacker… During one of the days of the first half of May, in extensive video interview, participants of the anti-Israel camp stated they 'would be terrorists'. …UQ has claimed that it has is taking disciplinary action, yet there is no evidence of any disciplinary action that was taken

- Staff and Students denying the state of Israel has a right to exist. The managements unwillingness to address any of this on campus up to needing a committee to figure out if antisemitic posters were really antisemitic
- The university responds to complaints from Jewish staff by saying they are taking concerns on board but never take any action. I feel that if the same were experienced by any other minority it would be the targeted minority group that was called on to define what counts as harassment for them, however, this has not been extended to Jewish people. My boss has told me it is imaginary that there is any threat to Jewish staff and students on campus and we are simply 'feeding each other's anxiety'
- I was leaving campus on the Wentworth footbridge, and saw a poster titled 'The Case for a Global Intifada' with a bulldozer through the Gaza fence on it, advertising an event on campus the next day. I immediately felt intense rage and fear; I drank some water to try stop myself from vomiting. My smart watch showed my heart rate spike. I kept crossing the bridge, I didn't rip down the posters, I just took a photo. At the end I saw two men putting up more, smiling and joking about something, so I took a photo of them and walked off as quick as I could without making it seem like I was running. After all the discussions that day about campus security allegedly removing posters, and free speech, and the Vice Chancellor emailing over and over about both sides and calm political discussions, it really hammered home that no one really gives a shit about us, and our concerns are not valid

- University administrations denied my complaint against protesters using the chant 'intifada' on the basis that the word is context related and that the university was not responsible for my feelings. Being offered counselling after every complaint of racism made to the university - this reduces my pain and the effect of the antisemitism, means perpetrators are not held responsible, and puts the blame on me as though I am the one who needs to change because of my experience.

This report from the Monash Initiative for Rapid Research into Antisemitism (MIRRA) examines how antisemitism is affecting Australia's cultural and creative industries (CCIs). Based on interviews and workshops with artists, leaders and philanthropists, it reveals that many Jewish stakeholders now feel excluded, unsafe and professionally at risk. While recent global events have intensified these experiences, the findings also point to deeper structural issues across the sector.

ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

We thank the 95 participants, Jewish artists and philanthropists, industry leaders and representatives who so courageously and generously shared their experiences, insights and wisdom.

We acknowledge all our philanthropic partners for making this crucial research possible. This work is not possible without your vision and generosity. We are grateful to the Australian Centre for Jewish Civilisation (ACJC) Advisory Council for sharing their insights. We are especially grateful to Dr Alan Finkel AC who guided the team through the project. We thank Romi Kupfer and Dominic Weintraub and the team at the Centre of Jewish Artists (COJA), whose partnership has been crucial in bringing these stories to light.

Finally, we would also like to acknowledge all Traditional Owners from all Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander lands on which we conducted interviews, focus groups and workshops.

NOTES ON TERMINOLOGY

In this report, we use the abbreviation “CCIs” to refer to the cultural and creative industries. Throughout the document, we use the terms “arts and cultural sector” and “cultural and creative industries” interchangeably to describe the same field. Additionally, we use the term “stakeholders” to refer to research participants who contributed to this study. The views expressed reflect participants’ individual experiences and do not represent entire communities.

EXECUTIVE SUMMARY

ANTISEMITISM IN THE CULTURAL AND CREATIVE INDUSTRIES (CCIs)

EXECUTIVE SUMMARY

The Monash Initiative for Rapid Research into Antisemitism (MIRRA) has been established to better understand the nature and depth of antisemitism in Australia, and to develop best practices to combat it. This inaugural report presents the findings from research examining antisemitism within Australia's cultural and creative industries (CCIs).[1] Drawing from conversations with 64 interviewees and 31 attendees of workshops co-hosted with the Centre of Jewish Artists (COJA), including artists, philanthropists, arts industry leaders and representatives from major arts organisations, this research reveals significant challenges facing Jewish stakeholders in the sector following the Hamas attacks on Israel on 7 October 2023.

This research draws on literature and studies examining contemporary antisemitism globally and in Australia, including in the CCIs, to inform its analysis of how definitions of antisemitism are shaped and applied in research reporting (see: Lange et al. 2018; Campaign Against Antisemitism 2020; Gandel Foundation 2022; Mattsson et al. 2024; Union of Jewish Students 2024). In addition, relevant national anti-racism and sector-specific frameworks were reviewed to understand how antisemitism is currently recognised in practice (see: Australian Human Rights Commission 2024; Creative Australia 2023; Nexus Task Force 2024).

The research uses the concept of "ambient antisemitism" to better understand the issue within the CCIs. This term refers to a climate marked by anti-Israel hostility that, while not necessarily inherently antisemitic, creates an environment that feels unwelcoming and unsafe for many Jewish stakeholders (Boyd 2024). The research documents a dramatic shift in the cultural landscape, with one stakeholder noting: "I've never known this sector to be this divided and fractured" (Stakeholder A35). Although the landscape after 7 October was implicitly referenced and detailed by the majority of Jewish research participants as a catalyst for negative experiences in the sector — and remains the focus here, as evidenced by stakeholders' experiences — we acknowledge that some of these issues reflect longer-standing structural issues within the sector.

This research addresses key gaps in the study of contemporary antisemitism in Australia, which has been largely dominated by quantitative analysis, such as survey-based data. By capturing impact through in-depth conversations and documented stories from stakeholders across the sector, this qualitative approach enables a deeper understanding of antisemitism and its impact on Jewish artists, and in the CCIs more broadly.

KEY FINDINGS

Jewish voices are often absent from diversity and inclusion efforts, with anti-Zionist discourse and online harassment contributing to ambient antisemitism. Many Jewish creatives have withdrawn from former networks or public roles, citing a sense of cultural homelessness. The report calls for stronger sector-wide recognition of antisemitism and clear, consistent strategies to support cultural safety for Jewish communities.[2]

SYSTEMIC EXCLUSION FROM DIVERSITY FRAMEWORKS

The research reveals that despite the cultural sector's stated commitment to diversity and inclusion, Jewish stakeholders feel systematically excluded from prevailing diversity frameworks. This sense of exclusion exists within a broader context of structural inequities, rooted in long-standing patterns of exclusivity along race, class, gender and able-bodiedness, which have not only been experienced by Jewish stakeholders but also acknowledged by non-Jewish cultural leaders as issues that have persisted for years.

Recycled antisemitic narratives regarding perceived proximity to wealth, power and White privilege have contributed to perceptions among many Jewish stakeholders that they are not viewed as deserving of cultural sensitivity and care.

Jewish stakeholders report feeling betrayed by a sector they have historically supported and in which they have participated as artists, supporters and audiences. Many expressed that the sector's selective application of anti-discrimination ethics has amplified feelings of exclusion and hostility, with one stakeholder noting: "whether consciously or unconsciously, we feel left out of organisations' efforts to be more inclusive and diverse" (Stakeholder A1b).

ANTI-ZIONISM AND POST-COLONIAL DISCOURSE

Anti-Zionist discourse has become deeply embedded within the sector's post-colonial framework.[3] This discourse resonates strongly within arts communities committed to decolonisation, and the centring of Indigenous voices and marginalised perspectives. Commentary has increasingly shifted from critiques of Israeli policy to framing Israel as "a white colonial project in the Middle East" (Stakeholder A10). This creates a hostile environment where Jewish stakeholders with diverse views on Israel find themselves collectively demonised.

[1] Our use of the term "CCIs" in the context of this report and its findings encompasses diverse practices and organisations that span the performing arts, such as theatre and comedy; music; visual arts; graphic design and architecture; print publishing and digital media; cultural heritage sites; galleries, libraries and museums (GLAM); television; film-making; festivals; creative research; government and philanthropic funding bodies; as well as researchers who deliver policy recommendations in this sector.

[2] We use the term "cultural safety" in line with its common usage within the sector, as seen in the work of organisations such as Diversity Arts Australia and the National Association for the Visual Arts (NAVA), while recognising the labour, knowledge and leadership of First Nations peoples in shaping and advancing this concept, particularly in addressing the systemic issues they continue to face in the CCIs. Our use of the term is not intended to dilute or distract from the pressing need for dedicated First Nations policy that supports and empowers a First Nations workforce in Australia.

[3] Anti-Zionism is a spectrum of ideas and attitudes towards Israel. Historically, within the Jewish world, it was opposition to the establishment of a Jewish state as the solution to antisemitism. After the establishment of Israel, anti-Zionism was often characterised by opposition to the centrality of Israel in global Jewish life. In the eastern bloc, anti-Zionism was used to justify a veiled attack on Jews by communist regimes. In more recent times, anti-Zionism typically denotes that Israel as a Jewish state ought to be abolished. The reasons for this are varied and complicated. Antisemitism can certainly intersect with anti-Zionism, although the latter is not inherently or necessarily antisemitic. The post-colonial shift in the arts and cultural sectors has led to a deeper reflection on White privilege and the impact of colonisation on First Nations people in Australia. It includes calls to "decolonise" the sector by centring Indigenous, minority and non-White migrant voices in storytelling and arts programming.

The timing of these tensions, with the 7 October attack occurring just one week before the Voice to Parliament referendum, created what stakeholders described as an emotionally charged environment where disappointment with the anticipated referendum result was channelled into an intensified focus on Israel. Many Jewish stakeholders feel that, with this shift, they are being held collectively responsible for the Israeli Government's actions, regardless of their personal political views.

Stakeholders identified a connection between the arts sector and academia, with several noting that higher education institutions serve as ideological incubators for anti-Zionist or anti-Israel views that then permeate the CCIs.[4]

CULTURAL ACTIVISM AND ONLINE HARASSMENT

The research documents how social media platforms have become sites of political mobilisation and harassment within creative communities. Unmoderated digital environments have enabled the "amplification of hatred" (Stakeholder A7a), with calls to boycott Jewish-affiliated organisations and individuals gaining momentum online. Additionally, doxxing, threats, abuse and harassment have become the norm online.

Arts organisations report being overwhelmed by rapidly growing online campaigns that threaten employees, programming and operations, and they often lack the appropriate resources to withstand online harassment. In response, Jewish philanthropists withdrew funding to reduce potential risks, such as coordinated online harassment and doxxing, both to the artists they supported and to themselves as funders in this space.

A notable finding is that, within the sector, the line between artistic expression and political activism has become increasingly blurred, surfacing tensions over where the boundaries of artistic freedom lie within institutional contexts. This has created particular challenges for institutions balancing artists' political activism with their duty of care to staff, audiences, board members and funding partners. The challenge lies in "giving people spaces to express themselves" without enabling harm (Stakeholder A1b).

JEWISH PHILANTHROPY

A significant finding concerns threats of cultural boycotts against Jewish philanthropic funding in the arts.[5] Antisemitic narratives about "wealthy Jewish families contributing 'Zionist blood money'" have circulated across creative circles, informed by harmful tropes about Jewish power, influence and control (Stakeholder A17). The research documents specific instances where Jewish philanthropists were forced to withdraw funding from cultural organisations and creative initiatives after being targeted by coordinated social media campaigns. These dynamics have created what one stakeholder termed "the weaponisation of generosity" (Stakeholder A35), where Jewish funders face a difficult choice between [4] Anti-Israel attitudes tend to manifest not only as opposition to the government and its actions, but as opposition to the existence of Israel as a Jewish state.

[5] The research also notes cultural boycotts where Jewish artists' work was cancelled or the marketing was significantly scaled back, representing a form of cultural erasure that impacts Jewish artists regardless of their political views.

withdrawing support and potentially reinforcing antisemitic tropes around Jews wielding financial power for nefarious ends, or remaining engaged despite hostility towards them.

Jewish board members have faced similar challenges, with some resigning or reporting heightened anxiety or discomfort after being targeted by online harassment campaigns or receiving inadequate support from their organisation. These resignations have raised concerns within the broader Jewish creative community about reduced representation in organisational governance structures.

PROFESSIONAL AND PERSONAL IMPACTS

The research documents the many negative professional and personal impacts on Jewish stakeholders:

Career ramifications: Loss of work opportunities, reduced networks and diminished motivation to pursue career development
Cultural safety concerns: Reluctance to attend performances or arts venues due to safety concerns
Identity concealment: Pre-emptive behaviours to hide Jewish identity or connections to Israel
Psychological distress: Heightened stress, feelings of professional homelessness and the impact of intergenerational trauma.

The research reveals specific instances of hostile workplace and professional network interactions. Many stakeholders described navigating “enemy territory” (Stakeholder A2b) and retreating from spaces that “once felt like home” (Stakeholder W1SN5.5). Some have pivoted entirely to Jewish cultural initiatives, creating tension between desires for safety and maintaining integrated relationships with the broader community.

DEFINITIONAL AUTHORITY

A critical finding concerns who holds authority in defining contemporary antisemitism. Jewish stakeholders report being told by non-Jewish colleagues what does and does not constitute antisemitism, with one noting: “I feel like we’re the only minority who is told what is and isn’t discrimination” (Stakeholder A15). This dismissal of Jewish experiences manifests in various ways, including instances where Jewish stakeholders were expected to justify their understanding of antisemitism to non-Jewish colleagues (educated professionals) in the CCIs.

STRUCTURAL ISSUES IN THE SECTOR

The research identifies how the sector’s structural challenges, including chronic under-resourcing, reliance on freelance and contract work, and limited organisational capacity, have amplified the impact of antisemitism on Jewish stakeholders. These precarious conditions have made Jewish independent artists and freelancers particularly vulnerable to professional exile and a reduction in their ability to sustain their practice and income.

“I feel like we’re the only minority who is told what is and isn’t discrimination”

The sector's fragmented structure, with complex relationships between governance, operational teams and contracted artists, has created vulnerabilities in managing indirect or remote relationships with artists. This has made it difficult for organisations to address harmful behaviour or provide adequate support to Jewish stakeholders when issues arise.

CULTURAL HOMELESSNESS

A significant finding is the feeling of cultural homelessness among Jewish stakeholders, with many expressing a sense of exile from their former networks and spaces. This has led to increased orientation towards Jewish cultural initiatives and community spaces. The language used by stakeholders often evokes historical Jewish experiences, with references to the "ghetto" or "shtetl" indicating anxiety about the creation of insular creative spaces as a result of antisemitism.[6]

IMPACT ON JEWISH CULTURAL ORGANISATIONS

The research reveals how Jewish arts and cultural and cultural heritage institutions have been impacted, facing internal pressure from the Jewish community regarding programming choices while grappling with concerns about institutional identity and long-term viability. For Holocaust education organisations, for instance, the current situation has prompted critical reflection about the effectiveness of historical approaches to antisemitism education. Many have shifted to welfare provision and are increasingly called upon to lead anti-antisemitism education efforts. Security has also become a heightened concern for many Jewish cultural organisations.

IMPACT VS. INTENT

Given the harm felt by most participants, the findings and recommendations focus on impact rather than intent, acknowledging that even "ambient" or indirect antisemitism can have profound psychological effects, including negative impacts on emotional safety and wellbeing, equivalent to more direct experiences.

[6] Shtetl refers to a small town or village in Eastern Europe with a high proportion of Jewish residents. See: Shandler (2014).

RECOMMENDATIONS

The following recommendations are grounded in the lived experiences of those most directly impacted and shaped through meaningful consultation with stakeholders. This participatory approach ensures the strategies reflect the realities, needs and insights of the community.

These recommendations are intended to guide leaders across state and federal government, the sector and individual institutions and organisations.

RECOMMENDATION 01

DEMONSTRATE ACCOUNTABLE AND COLLABORATIVE LEADERSHIP

Antisemitism in the CCIs is often enabled by unclear policies, inconsistent responses and a lack of accountability. Effective leadership is essential for addressing antisemitism and fostering cultural safety within the sector.

1.1 Acknowledge past harms and gaps in leadership and frameworks

1.1.1 Meaningfully acknowledge the harm evidenced by Jewish stakeholders' experiences

1.1.2. Develop clear and consistent guidelines for cultural safety that include Jewish experiences of antisemitism

1.1.3. Provide reassurance through visible commitment to addressing antisemitism within the CCIs

1.2 Rebuild trust through dialogue and collaboration

1.2.1 Leverage the creative community's skills to facilitate nuanced, empathetic conversations about the issue of antisemitism in the CCIs and its impact on stakeholders

1.2.2 Establish collaborative forums and cross-sector debriefs for sharing expertise and effective practices for addressing key challenges, including antisemitism, in the sector

RECOMMENDATION 02

EMBED CULTURAL COMPETENCY IN SECTOR-WIDE RESPONSES TO ANTISEMITISM

Building cultural competency around Jewish identity is vital for fostering safe, inclusive spaces. In progressive and artistic settings, antisemitism often appears subtly, requiring community-specific, trauma-informed approaches to address it effectively.

2.1 Build trauma-informed, sector-specific responses to antisemitism

2.1.1 Establish accountability mechanisms for addressing stakeholder harm, including training senior management in direct outreach approaches and ensuring serious consideration of concerns raised by Jewish employees, colleagues, partners and stakeholders

2.1.2 Use concrete examples of incidents that have occurred in the sector to demonstrate impact on Jewish stakeholders, rather than focusing on definitions of antisemitism

2.1.3 Implement educational programs that capture cultural specificities, including religious and historical connections to Israel, diversity of views on Zionism and intergenerational trauma of the Australian Jewish community

2.1.4 Address specific forms of antisemitism emerging from the CCIs, including doxxing, exclusion, harassment and targeting Jewish individuals, organisations and institutions

2.1.5 Develop educational workshops tailored to arts and cultural departments in universities, building on existing campus-based interventions with department-specific content

2.2 Train for culturally safe and inclusive creative spaces

2.2.1 Implement or revise cultural awareness training for leaders, organisations and institutions on the Australian Jewish community's diversity and practices, ensuring cultural competency training reaches all levels from governance to contracted artists

2.2.2. Address the particular sources and subtle expressions of antisemitism that emerge in progressive creative, arts and cultural spaces

2.2.3 Implement or revise training that emphasises how to respond when Jewish stakeholders share experiences of trauma or harm

2.3 Consult on resource development and access

2.3.1 Draw on existing databases, support networks and training resources for Jewish creatives and professionals experiencing discrimination

2.3.2 Consult Jewish arts and cultural organisations — such as the Centre of Jewish Artists (COJA), the Shalom Collective and the Sydney Jewish Museum — to effectively guide Jewish colleagues, staff and team members to appropriate resources and support

2.3.3 Consult diverse Jewish stakeholders to expand or adapt existing initiatives and training resources such as the Creative Equity Toolkit (Diversity Arts Australia) and Creative Workplaces (Creative Australia)

RECOMMENDATION 03

STRENGTHEN SECTOR RESILIENCE THROUGH STRATEGIC POLICY REFORM

Strategic policy reforms are key to ensuring consistent, accountable responses to antisemitism across CCIs and clarifying responsibilities for fostering inclusive, culturally safe environments.

3.1 Strengthen institutional accountability and governance

3.1.1 Outline clear remits and responsibilities for all stakeholders at every level of cultural institutions and organisations — from board members to contractors — through explicit policies, guidelines and frameworks

3.1.2 Develop adaptable templates for policies and frameworks that can be tailored accordingly

3.1.3 Ensure internal alignment between different teams and management levels in institutional approaches and responses

3.2 Revisit cultural safety guidelines

3.2.1 Establish or expand cultural safety guidelines to encompass emotional safety and trauma-informed approaches to Jewish experiences of antisemitism

3.2.2 Outline the responsibilities that accompany creative freedoms and ensure that principles regarding political discourse and expression are applied consistently

3.3 Manage digital platforms

3.3.1 Address the growing influence of social media in shaping institutional responses by developing strategies to manage rapidly growing online campaigns that threaten employees and operations

3.3.2 Create or update policies that promote thoughtful engagement in online spaces, supported by training and education to implement long-term cultural shifts regarding online interactions

3.3.3 Develop or enhance organisational guidelines and social media policies for managing online discourse

RECOMMENDATION 04

CENTRE JEWISH LIVED EXPERIENCE AND DIVERSE PERSPECTIVES

Building cultural competency around Jewish identity is vital for fostering safe, inclusive spaces. In progressive and artistic settings, antisemitism often appears subtly, requiring community-specific, trauma-informed approaches to address it effectively.

4.1 Elevate Jewish lived experience in sector response

4.1.1 Ensure Jewish voices are at the heart of creating solutions to the issues and experiences that they encounter in the sector, rather than applying outside approaches that may not reflect their experiences

4.1.2 Acknowledge the emotional and cultural load for Jewish participants who design, contribute to and deliver education programs on antisemitism

4.2 Embrace diversity within Jewish communities

4.2.1 Build awareness about the diversity within Jewish communities regarding Israel, Zionism and responses to antisemitism

4.2.2 Create space for differing viewpoints while maintaining commitment to safety and inclusion

4.2.3 Ensure diverse representation in decision-making teams and processes, including in interpreting what constitutes harm[7]

[7] This should be informed by broader diversity and inclusion frameworks, aligned with ratified or legal definitions of antisemitism, and consistent with an organisation's overall cultural values and mission

CONCLUSION

The research reveals that antisemitism in Australia's CCIs is a systemic issue, exposing contradictions in the sector's values around cultural inclusion, diversity and the importance of lived experience. Many stakeholders attributed their experiences to "unconscious antisemitism", which is a lack of understanding that certain views are harmful or damaging, resulting in the perpetuation of harm without anticipating the consequences[8]. This framework does not preclude conscious hostile intent, but emphasises that the focus should be on addressing impacts experienced by Jewish stakeholders rather than debating motivations.

The findings emphasise that addressing antisemitism requires both acknowledging Jewish stakeholders' capacity to define their experiences and implementing practical solutions that create genuinely inclusive environments. As one stakeholder noted: "If someone is offended and hurt and upset and feels that [something] has happened to them, then that has happened to them – it's about impact, not intent" (Stakeholder B24).

The creative community's capacity for empathy and nuanced dialogue positions it well to lead constructive responses to these challenges. However, this requires sustained commitment to trauma-informed approaches, meaningful community consultation and recognition that creating truly inclusive spaces means ensuring Jewish stakeholders feel safe, valued and heard.

Success will be measured not only by policy changes but by whether Jewish artists, creatives and cultural professionals can participate fully in Australia's cultural life without fear, concealment or professional ramifications. The sector's response to these findings will determine whether it can fulfil its stated commitment to being a place for every story and ensuring every Australian can contribute as creators of culture.

ANTISEMITISM IN THE CULTURAL AND CREATIVE INDUSTRIES (CCIs)

MIRRA

OVERVIEW OF FULL REPORT

Established by the Australian Centre for Jewish Civilisation (ACJC) in late 2024, the Monash Initiative for Rapid Research into Antisemitism (MIRRA) is a quarterly series of studies that seeks to understand the causes of antisemitism in Australia, and how it harms Australian Jewry and Australian society more broadly. Each study aims to provide a root cause analysis of why antisemitism occurs so that governments, institutions and individuals can better understand the roles they play in minimising its impact. This first report stems from the inaugural MIRRA project focusing on the arts and culture sector, with an eye to developing strategies that effectively address contemporary antisemitism in the cultural and creative industries (CCIs).

One of the pressing challenges facing Australia's cultural and creative arts sector is navigating the heightened tensions following the Hamas attacks of 7 October 2023 and Israel's subsequent assault on Gaza. In that time, the sector has experienced a notable strain in relationships between institutions and their artists, and supporters and internal leadership, as many arts organisations attempt to manage their various stakeholders who have a range of attitudes and relationships to Israel and Palestine. As one interviewee for this project notes: "I've never known this sector to be this divided and fractured" (Stakeholder A35).

Through grassroots initiatives, notably open letters, social media posts and campaigns, artists from various creative industries came together to declare their support for Palestinians and their condemnation of Israel in the days after 7 October before Israel launched its campaign in Gaza. Many Jewish creatives, artists and cultural professionals were "reeling" (Stakeholder A12b) from the news from Israel, receiving reports from friends, family members and loved ones about the unfolding situation. Initial distress was soon followed (compounded or at times eclipsed) by intense feelings of shock and confusion as colleagues, peers and friends, including individuals who run or work in arts organisations, posted their reactions online:

> And then it happened…this tsunami feeling of being completely overwhelmed [and] thinking: "Oh my god" (because of the pogrom nature of [the Hamas attacks]) and because by October 8th everyone said: "Oh, they had it coming to them." (Stakeholder A12b)

For some, the silence or apathy exhibited by certain industry peers in the aftermath of the attacks was made all the more jarring by the context in which the violence occurred:

> I just remember when I heard about it – [the Hamas attacks took place] at a music festival…I just couldn't believe that the music industry was silent. (Stakeholder A15)

In the days that followed, there were hints that polarised discourses surrounding Israel-Palestine would emerge on a much larger scale, not only confined to online spaces, but playing out visibly across Australia's creative arts and cultural landscape. On 9 October 2023, hundreds of demonstrators waved Palestinian flags to protest a decision to light up the Sydney Opera House in the colours of the Israeli flag in a statement of solidarity.

> People were waving burning Israeli flags at the [Sydney] Opera House and chanting. And whether it's: "Fuck the Jews" or "Gas the Jews" [or "Where's the Jews?"] is immaterial – it's violent. (Stakeholder A9)

This protest signalled how these arts, cultural and creative spaces have become arenas where discourses surrounding the Israel-Palestine conflict are performed and contested. When deciding whether to issue public statements or internal communications regarding the unfolding situation in the Middle East, or when responding to positions taken by those within their networks or institutional settings, many arts and cultural organisations entered reactive crisis management mode, convening emergency or after-hours board meetings. These, at times, took place with key decision-makers absent or overseas, or without consulting community representatives from the impacted parties.

> I think a lot of organisations made statements quite reactively…without necessarily considering the wording very carefully. That wording led to a lot of pain in the Jewish community – organisations that artists had dedicated ten years of their life to working towards, all of a sudden, without consulting anyone in the organisation (let alone any of the Jews that they work with) [made statements]. (Stakeholder A1b)

> The impression you get is boards coming together at 10[pm] at night, panicking… scrambling to try and get their position right. And they went from one extreme to the other extreme and, in the process, they hurt everyone. (Stakeholder A22b)

The recent reversal of the decision by Creative Australia to reinstate artist Khaled Sabsabi as Australia's Venice Biennale representative after concerns about two of his previous artworks resulted in his contract being rescinded, along with the ongoing legal repercussions faced by the Melbourne Symphony Orchestra for cancelling a performance by an artist after they made onstage comments about the war in Gaza, highlight that risk management in the arts sector has been a major challenge for leaders and institutions trying to balance the often-competing needs of their different constituents effectively (see: Cmielewski 2025).

As creatives, artists and staff in the cultural sector engage with discourse around Israel, Gaza and Palestine, institutions are balancing freedom of expression with creating culturally safe and inclusive spaces in their venues, workplaces and board meetings.

> There's a lot of pressure…[cultural and arts organisations are] getting smashed from all sides, in terms of the positioning on Israel, on Jews and on artists, and how to separate art from artists, and how to deal with people getting up on stage, making political statements, upsetting people and creating unsafe environments. (Stakeholder A5b)

Such points of tension have seen Jewish board members and philanthropists stepping away from arts-cultural organisations in response to programming decisions, and to the institutional handling of calls for boycotts and online harassment of Jewish artists, funders and arts workers. Internal and public backlash to key incidents has resulted in significant organisational strain, as well as career ramifications and severe personal tolls on artists and those in positions of leadership. As one stakeholder noted: "I started getting death threats. I was not used to getting that kind of attack. I'm not a politician. [I'm] someone who was managing an arts organisation" (Stakeholder B23). These organisational impacts provide an important contextual foundation for the findings of this preliminary report, which focuses predominantly on the impacts of the sector's management of discourse surrounding the Israel-Palestine conflict. This engagement has created conditions that have led to the emergence of antisemitism and anti-Jewish hostility, often linked to anti-Israel discourse, with significant consequences for Jewish stakeholders within the CCIs.

ABOUT THIS REPORT

This report presents urgent insights into the lived experiences of Jewish stakeholders as well as professionals and board leaders in the CCIs. We draw on their voices from interviews and focus groups with 64 participants, as well as a series of workshops with 31 attendees co-hosted with the Centre of Jewish Artists (COJA) to analyse key themes that highlight the causes and impacts of Jewish experiences of marginalisation and discrimination in the sector and evidence of impact. Our aim is not to label any specific incident as antisemitism or not, but to better understand the implications of Israel-Palestine discourses within workplace and sector-wide contexts. This benefits not only Jewish stakeholders who are the focus of this report but also prompts reflection on what it means to foster an inclusive and culturally diverse arts and creative sector.

The qualitative findings of the project raise broader concerns about how discrimination is recognised and addressed, particularly when antisemitism falls below the threshold of overt exclusion or is otherwise unquantifiable, yet is articulated strongly through stakeholders' testimonies. While the quantifiable impact of reduced creative output by Jewish artists is yet to be measured, the findings presented in this report highlight the urgency for an empathy-led and trauma-informed approach, one that focuses especially on impact, not only intention, to address the experiences outlined by Jewish stakeholders in the CCIs.

This research addresses a critical gap in the study of antisemitism that is dominated by quantitative analysis and survey-based approaches. While some recent work has explored cultural responses to antisemitism — often focusing on media narratives or prominent Jewish figures (e.g., Sutcliffe 2024 on the UK) — there remains a lack of attention to grassroots, affective expressions within Jewish creative communities. This study takes a different path by centring the lived experiences and voices of independent Jewish creatives and artists. In doing so, it not only acknowledges their perspectives but places them at the heart of our analysis and recommendations for moving a divided sector forward.

METHODOLOGY

RESEARCH AIMS

The project's research aims were to:

- explore how antisemitism manifests within Australia's CCIs
- identify the conditions that contribute to the emergence of antisemitism within these settings
- investigate how the experiences of Jewish artists, creatives and cultural professionals with antisemitism can inform the adaptation of existing frameworks and resources in the creative and cultural sector to more effectively address antisemitism.

Conversations with research participants were guided by the project's overarching research aims, with indicative or guiding interview questions for Cohort A and B centred on the following themes:

- how participants understand and describe antisemitism
- if, how, when and where participants experience antisemitism (i.e., the settings and instances where antisemitism occurs)
- the personal and professional impacts of antisemitism on those who experience it, including their behavioural or emotional responses
- how participants perceive and interpret the current strategic priorities of their organisation or institution related to cultural diversity, equity and representational practices
- how participants understand antisemitism is currently being addressed at both organisational and individual levels
- recommendations for strategies and/or frameworks to identify and address antisemitism in the creative and cultural industries.

RESEARCH PARTICIPANTS

The selection of stakeholders for this research project was guided by the dual aim of exploring Jewish experiences in the arts and cultural sector and identifying practical solutions to address antisemitism within this industry. Our selected stakeholders span a wide range of creative, cultural and arts spaces, including institutions that sustain Australian arts, culture and heritage, providing a comprehensive perspective on the intersection of antisemitism within the creative and cultural industries. In alignment with the spirit of Australia's national cultural policy, Revive, and its commitment to recognising the "contributions of all Australians as the creators of culture" (2023: 18), this project uses a broad definition of the CCIs. Our use of the term "CCIs" encompasses diverse practices and organisations that span the performing arts, such as theatre and comedy; music; visual arts; graphic design and architecture; print publishing and digital media; cultural heritage sites; galleries, libraries and museums (GLAM); television; film-making; festivals; creative research; government and philanthropic funding bodies; as well as researchers who deliver policy recommendations in this sector. Our stakeholders have been selected to represent two distinct but interconnected cohorts:

Cohort A: Jewish artists, creatives, cultural industry professionals, organisations and philanthropists
Engaging with this cohort is key to developing a deep understanding of the challenges Jewish stakeholders face in their workplaces, networks and creative-professional settings, including the impact of the sector's engagement with discourses related to Israel-Palestine.

Cohort B: Representatives of Australian creative bodies, cultural spaces and institutions (not explicitly identified as Jewish)
Engaging with this cohort ensures broad representation across creative sub-sectors to better understand both the impact and conditions of the sector's engagement with Israel-Palestine discourses. These stakeholders – representatives of creative organisations and cultural institutions not explicitly identified as Jewish – are selected because they may benefit from greater support in addressing antisemitism, having been involved in or impacted by recent incidents. This engagement provides an opportunity to help organisations better incorporate antisemitism awareness into their frameworks.

These categories are intended as guiding frameworks rather than fixed classifications, reflecting the fluid and complex realities of the sector, including the diverse roles and practices of its many stakeholders. For example, many representatives or leaders of arts organisations also maintain a personal creative praxis. In some cases, Jewish stakeholders participated in the research as representatives of arts or cultural organisations categorised under Cohort B (i.e., institutions not explicitly identified as Jewish). Conversely, we also engaged with non-Jewish representatives working within Jewish cultural spaces. By focusing on these two cohorts, this research aims to bridge the gap between the lived experiences of Jewish creatives and the institutional structures that shape these experiences within the broader arts and cultural sector.

The views and experiences of Australia's Jewish community are diverse, and we have attempted to capture that diversity in our research. To this end, we sought to speak to a broad cross-section of artists and institutions that reflect these different understandings of antisemitism and its impact on the CCIs. These include Jewish artists who feel that antisemitism has deeply affected their livelihood and artistic practice, and others who see antisemitism as not a serious phenomenon in the arts community or in Australian life more broadly. Among this group are artists and creatives who see public discourse around antisemitism as a distraction from the more urgent task of advocating on behalf of Palestinians and other marginalised groups.

> With all due respect, this project is a distraction because there's no antisemitism in the arts. There's a lot of structural issues within the arts and for artists — queer artists, Black artists, Brown artists, non-white artists, Jewish artists, white artists, all sorts of artists — to access things, but that's not a problem of antisemitism. (Stakeholder A8b)

> I've seen a lot of racism, sexism, transphobia – but I haven't seen antisemitism. (Stakeholder A19a)

This research endeavours to capture the complexity of the structural issues involved in understanding how antisemitism emerges and operates in the sector, focusing on its impact on Jewish stakeholders, while also considering how these dynamics intersect with broader systemic challenges within the creative and cultural sector.

RECRUITMENT

INTERVIEWS AND FOCUS GROUPS

Potential stakeholders were approached to participate in this project through an email invitation, with contact information solicited from a public domain source or from the participants themselves. The project also used a snowballing approach to recruitment. Many stakeholders gave referrals by recommending other people in their networks who they thought might be interested and suitable to participate in the project. Potential stakeholders were invited to a one-hour interview, either in-person or online. With informed consent (confirmed verbally before the commencement of conversations), these interviews were recorded (for in-person, audio recording; for online, audio-video recording) for transcription and subsequent analysis. Interviews and focus groups took place between mid-March and early June 2025.

WORKSHOPS

As part of this project, we partnered with COJA to capture the voices of the Jewish creative community. To this end, we invited COJA members, recruiting participants through the centre's community networks and channels, to participate in a group workshop exploring shared experiences of antisemitism in their professional lives as creatives and artists. We hosted three workshops in total (one online and two in-person) in early April 2025.

QUALITATIVE METHODS

This project takes a qualitative approach through interviews, focus groups and workshops to explore how our research participants interpreted and articulated their experiences within the context of the CCIs. In Australia, researchers have previously used qualitative methods to investigate the Jewish community's experiences of antisemitism and their opinions on its sources and solutions (see: Creese 2018). By applying this approach to the creative and cultural industries, this research uses a qualitative methodology to understand how stakeholders interpret their lived experiences and articulate their thoughts and feelings about antisemitism in their own words.

INTERVIEWS AND FOCUS GROUPS

In-depth, semi-structured conversations are often used by researchers to engage with their research participants on a deeper level, to understand their "experiences, opinions, attitudes…behaviours or predictions" (Rowley 2012: 261-2). In light of the sensitive subject matter, we approached these interviews as "contextualised conversations" to build rapport, adopting an "informal and emergent" style that contrasts with more formal ethnographic interviewing (Stage and Mattson 2003: 97-8).

WORKSHOPS

Inspired by methodological approaches in contemporary qualitative research (see: Baker, Cantillon and Evans 2023, 2024), workshops were structured around activities to encourage conversation in response to the project's overarching research questions. Workshop attendees were provided with physical and virtual materials (e.g., paper, e-documents and sticky notes) to record their responses to activity prompts from the workshop facilitators. These materials were requested or collected (with consent) for data analysis. These activities aimed to help participants process their thoughts and articulate themselves, while providing the project with qualitative data. As one workshop attendee commented: "It's a nice way to process – it can be really cathartic" (Stakeholder W3A1.5). The workshops were designed with remedial intent, providing participants with what one attendee described as an opportunity to "offload the burden" (Stakeholder W1A1.3) in a safe environment that encouraged candid self-expression.

Through group activities and informal conversation, this participatory and collaborative approach aimed to capture participants' lived experiences, inspire dialogue and reflection between attendees, and foster a sense of community. A key outcome of the workshops was a participant-created manifesto on cultural safety and inclusion, outlining how to create culturally safe and inclusive spaces for Jewish artists in Australia based on their experiences and perspectives. The recommendations of this report draw from these collated suggestions.

DATA ANALYSIS

We used thematic analysis (see: Clarke and Braun 2006) to transcribe and code interview, focus group and workshop data to identify recurrent themes and narratives. Once organised into themes and subthemes, stakeholders' articulated experiences revealed patterns that could be broadly categorised as causes (or conditions) and impacts, helping to distil key discussion points for the preliminary report.

ETHICAL CONSIDERATIONS

In line with procedures outlined by the Monash University Human Research Ethics Committee (MUHREC), all stakeholders received an explanatory statement and consent form ahead of their participation. The former outlined potential emotional and reputational risks, including discomfort for Jewish stakeholders (Cohort A) recounting personal or professional experiences, and concern among cultural sector representatives (Cohort B) regarding public perceptions of their organisation's responses to antisemitism.

Potential participants could choose (via the consent form) whether they, as an individual and/or representative of an organisation, and their affiliated organisations were named in the publication of the research data and findings. Where anonymity was preferred, names and organisational identifiers were removed and/or referred to generically. Potential participants were informed that, although full anonymity could not be guaranteed in all cases, every effort was made to de-identify individuals and organisations in the project's outputs. For this preliminary report, all participant quotes have been de-identified to ensure consistency and ease of reading. Organisations discussed or referenced by participants are identified generically, and participants are cited using generic "stakeholder" designations to protect their identities while maintaining the integrity of their contributions.

CONCEPTUAL FRAMEWORK

AMBIENT ANTISEMITISM

For many stakeholders, 7 October 2023 created a shift in how they understood their place in the arts and creative landscape, namely their placement and navigation of its networks and spaces, while marking a definitive turning point in how they view the prevalence of antisemitism in Australia. As one stakeholder (A35) explained: “I thought that I lived in a world that was largely free of antisemitism.” Referring specifically to antisemitism in the arts, another noted: “I was one of those glass-half-full people who thought: mate, no way – it doesn’t exist” (Stakeholder A23). The post–7 October landscape was referenced by the majority of Jewish research participants as a catalyst for negative experiences in the sector and remains the focus here.

Stakeholders were asked to define or describe antisemitism in their own words or as it pertains to their own experiences. A Jewish creative working in an arts advisory organisation (Stakeholder B10), noted that antisemitic incidents can be mapped on a “spectrum” from “microaggressions to full-out violence”. Adapting typology created by Keller and Galgay (2010: 249), microaggressions might include the “denial of antisemitism experience”, which occurs when personal experiences of antisemitism are minimised or denied, often described by many Jewish stakeholders as a form of gaslighting (see: Johnson et al 2021). Notable incidents of antisemitic violence in Australia since 7 October 2023, including the firebombing of the Adass Israel Synagogue in Melbourne and the arson attack on a Jewish child care centre in Sydney, demonstrate that antisemitism continues to pose a deadly threat to Jewish individuals and communities.

In the context of the CCIs, the evidence presented in this report focuses on experiences of antisemitism that do not cross the “threshold” into physical violence and criminality (see: Sengul and McSwiney 2024). Much of the reported antisemitism is unquantifiable, yet it is strongly conveyed through the lived experiences of stakeholders. These observations raise broader concerns about how antisemitism is recognised when it is abstract or difficult to measure, or when its impacts are felt in embodied ways as “a mild sense of unease that’s sitting in my system” (Stakeholder B10) or “a constant sense of being discriminated against and whether it’s reality or not, I just don’t know” (Stakeholder A15).

As creatives, artists and professionals in the arts and cultural sectors engage with discourse on the Israel-Palestine conflict, many Jewish participants described antisemitism as difficult to disentangle from anti-Israel sentiments: “A lot of antisemitism is directed at Israel at the moment” (Stakeholder A12a) and “instead of Jew-hating, it’s Zionist-hating” (Stakeholder A21). According to the Institute of Jewish Policy Research (UK), “ambient antisemitism” is characterised by incidents such as “defacing or tearing down posters of Israeli hostages, that, whether strictly antisemitic or not, create a broader milieu that feels threatening and hostile to many Jewish people” (Boyd 2024). The current climate of anti-Israel hostility within the sector, although not necessarily or inherently antisemitic, has created an environment that feels unwelcoming, unsafe or unsettling for many Jewish stakeholders interviewed for this project. As one stakeholder (A37) explained: “I didn’t actually feel anyone was going to attack me, but I felt attacked so deeply to the core of who I am [which] is being Jewish.” Such concerns speak to the concept of cultural safety – principles of which are outlined in various reporting on creative and cultural engagement, especially for racialised and minority groups (see: A New Approach 2024; Australian Human Rights Commission 2024) and the creation of spaces free from "challenge or denial of identity" (see: Diversity Arts Australia 2019 and Victorian Government 2024 on cultural safety for First Nations people).

The reported feelings of ambient antisemitism (as articulated by various stakeholders) help to contextualise and bridge the gap between their lived experiences of unease and the documented incidents of overt exclusion within the CCIs and violent antisemitism beyond the sector:

> Nobody has personally commented or said something directly to me… it's just more in the air… I can't say I'm experiencing direct antisemitism [but] it's probably been more than in the air because there've been real physical incidents. (Stakeholder A16)

For many Jewish stakeholders, their personal negative experiences in arts and cultural spaces are compounded by the circulation of anecdotes within the Jewish creative community. One stakeholder (A1b) noted: "I've heard a number of stories [that] has created a feeling in me that Jews [are] not receiving grants, prizes or things based on the fact that they're Jewish. [I] feel like I internalise that in some way." While one stakeholder described their experience of antisemitism as "all-consuming" (Stakeholder W1SN3.7), others drew attention to the implications of a "hyperfocus" (Stakeholder A32) on antisemitism within the Jewish community, which can intensify feelings of vulnerability and victimhood. This shapes how Jewish creatives and artists navigate their broader networks, often requiring the investment of significant emotional labour, while surfacing divergences in how Jewish stakeholders think and talk about antisemitism:

> I'm also worried that we — as a community — are spending too much energy worrying about antisemitism. We are allowing it to become the centre of gravity of our communal identity and existence. (Stakeholder A6a)

> I think that some commentators [on antisemitism] who have felt more intimidated, it is partly to do with their perception rather than the reality. I grant that [it] is legitimate, but I'm wary of creating a narrative that suggests that antisemitism is rife and violent and all-consuming. (Stakeholder A11a)

It is important to recognise that even when antisemitism is described by stakeholders as ambient, its psychological impact can be as profound as more direct experiences. One stakeholder (A28) noted: "I remember my psychologist said [to me] one time: 'It doesn't matter if something is real or imagined, the psychological impact can feel the same'." This captures a key tension in these discussions: the challenge of quantifying non-overt or indirect antisemitism. Other reporting on antisemitism within the CCIs similarly uses the term "indirect" to describe the experiences of Jewish artists and creatives who encounter hostility in their sector (see: Artists Against Antisemitism UK, n.d.). Stakeholders described various forms of this indirect experience. As another stakeholder reflected: "the antisemitism that I've encountered from organisations [is] very subtle and very covert, which only makes the feelings of ostracisation even more difficult to deal with" (Stakeholder W3A1.10). Since its expression is often subtle or coded, such experiences are easier to deny, downplay or dismiss, reinforcing plausible deniability within the sector and enabling those unwilling to acknowledge its impact to dismiss these experiences more readily. Finally, to recognise an ambient antisemitism, consisting of indirect encounters with discrimination and general feelings of hostility, is not to discount the overt experiences of antisemitism reported by stakeholders. As one stakeholder (A12b) noted: "Well, maybe you haven't experienced [antisemitism] but other people are and it feels pretty real." At the heart of many of these conversations lies a growing concern among Jewish stakeholders that they are not entrusted with defining the parameters of antisemitism — what constitutes an act, incident or a statement that "feels very antisemitic if you're Jewish" (Stakeholder A9) — which raises critical questions about who holds authority in naming harm:

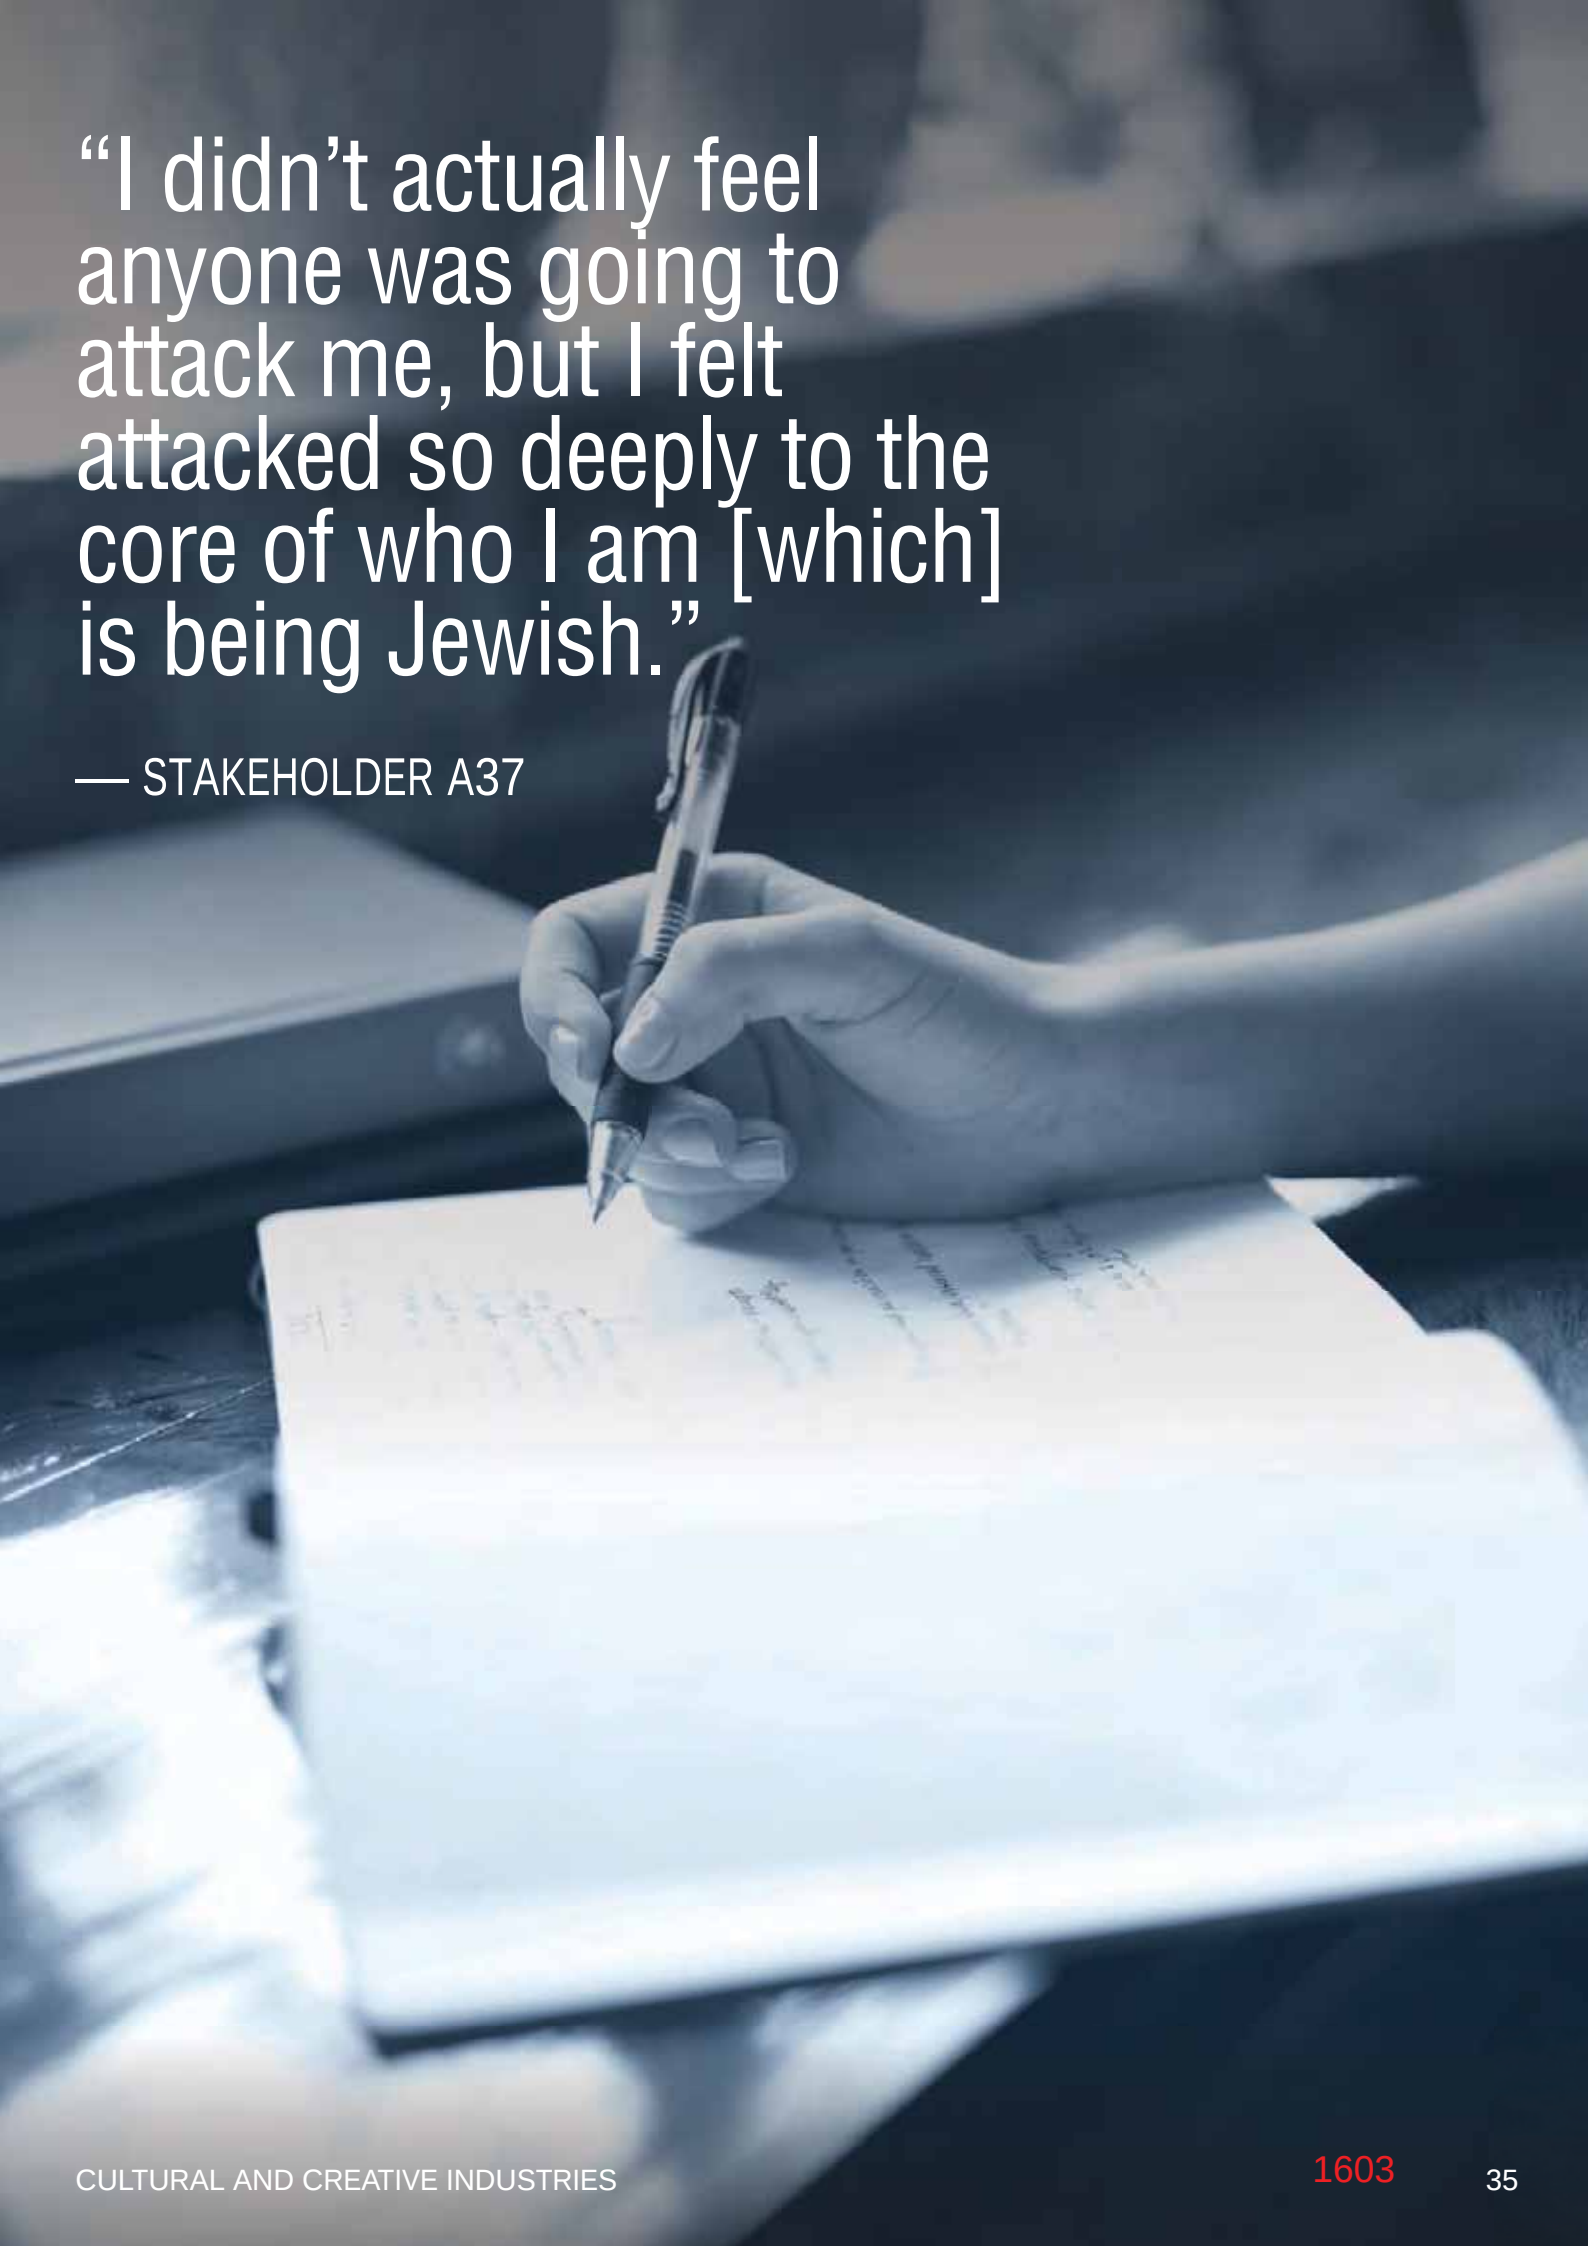
> I feel like we're the only minority who are told what is and isn't discrimination…the number of conversations I've had where I've been told "this isn't antisemitism and this is why." You can't tell a minority what is or isn't discrimination [against them]. (Stakeholder A15)



“I didn’t actually feel anyone was going to attack me, but I felt attacked so deeply to the core of who I am [which] is being Jewish.”

AFFECT

Affect provides a productive lens for examining how antisemitism shapes both the personal and professional lives of stakeholders. Conversations with several research participants across both cohorts surfaced intense emotional responses. For many non-Jewish and Jewish stakeholders we spoke with, these issues and experiences are confronting and existential. They evoke strong emotional responses, not only to the rise of antisemitism globally and in Australia but also to its impact within their professional and personal lives. The ongoing violence in the Middle East further intensifies these feelings. These affective responses are often non-verbal (e.g., tearfulness or pauses to compose oneself) but can also be inferred from explicit references to emotions:

> [October 7th] had a massive impact on me, psychologically and emotionally. And, to be honest, how am I at the moment? I'm not sure. I feel like I'm going off the rails a little bit. (Stakeholder A2b)
> Look, I feel like crying. I'm absolutely devastated. (Stakeholder A9)

Affective frameworks, which emphasise the role of emotion and feeling (Reckwitz 2012), offer deeper insight into these impacts, such as the perceived shrinking of professional and creative networks or heightened feelings of marginalisation and "otherness". This conceptual lens affords "space and serious treatment" for the "personal, embodied and emotional" (Lowry 2019: 190), thus allowing us to identify instances of antisemitism that cannot be quantifiably measured. Through affective methodologies, this research centres lived experience and takes seriously the claims of antisemitism that emerge from our research because "all claims of antisemitism made by Jews, like all claims of discrimination and oppression in general, should be given serious attention" (Nexus Task Force 2024). In doing so, our methodological approach draws attention to and responds to a recurring sentiment expressed by many stakeholders, namely the trivialisation of their experiences within and by the sector:

> I can't think of a different community, whether it be religious, cultural, race (or whatever), where their lived experience isn't held at the highest regard…[whereas] my lived experience doesn't matter. (Stakeholder A15)

Waxman, Schraub and Hosein (2022: 1805) note that "the lived experience of people dealing with antisemitism matters. Perceptions of antisemitism are not a conclusive sign of antisemitism, but they must be treated seriously and not dismissed as mere bad faith: they are a crucial trigger for further investigation." As with any other aspect of cultural awareness, if someone experiences something as harmful, discriminatory or hostile, that experience should be acknowledged and taken seriously. Beyond serving as a valuable lens for examining the impacts of antisemitism (or hostility emerging from anti-Israel sentiment) on Jewish stakeholders within the CCIs, affect also provides a conceptual framework for analysing the emotional conditions that can give rise to such hostility, which are not necessarily underpinned by malicious or exclusionary intent. Alacovska and Bissonnette (2021: 135, 141) observe that creative workers engage in a "diverse array of practices of care arising from an affective concern with the well-being of [even unknown] others", such as expressions of solidarity with oppressed groups. Speaking to the affective impulses and underpinnings of care within the creative and cultural industries, one stakeholder (A2b) noted that those who are drawn to the arts "care about the soul, they care about feelings, they care about equality".

Recognising the sector's orientation towards and capacity for "solidaristic affectivities" (Alacovska and Bissonnette 2021) helps to ease the often-perceived tension between art and activism — a recurring theme among many stakeholders interviewed for this project — by aligning with and reinforcing the sector's inherent or expected ethics of care. It is this expectation of care that is so often acknowledged as motivating many creatives' engagement with Palestinian advocacy, but is observed as absent when it comes to the Jewish experiences of suffering. Speaking to this perceived disparity, Stakeholder A21 observed their response to an unprogrammed statement made by actors on stage in November 2023:

> If the actors had come out with a sign that said "Peace in the Middle East" that would have been fine. But in saying "We support solidarity with Gaza," they are acknowledging the pain of one by completely denying it to the other. Those artists were being humane and showing their humanity for the Palestinian people, which is wonderful, but why is your humanity not extending to the victims of October 7th?
> [A response from one theatre patron was:] "before I take out my subscription, I want to know that we're going to feel safe and welcome here" and that's absolutely all that our audiences are asking for. And, you know, what Israel does to the Palestinian people is appalling, but [there is no acknowledgement that] October 7th happened. People were sitting in that theatre and they felt unsafe. "We don't care about what happened to you. We don't care about October 7th. We don't care about the hostages." (Stakeholder A21)

This particular anecdote reflects recurring themes voiced across several stakeholder discussions: The expectation of empathy from industry peers for the victims of 7 October, heightened by preconceived ideas about the sector's capacity for inclusion and cultural awareness; the emotional pain experienced by Jewish stakeholders when that empathy is absent, which often registers as exclusion, discomfort, and/or unsafety; and the recognition that arts and creative settings are inherently politicised, with many stakeholders demonstrating an expansive empathy that includes recognition of Palestinian suffering. As one interviewee observes, "all sides are in pain [but] the progressive artists are only taking one side's pain" (Stakeholder B30) – a perception that, for some, reflects not just a lack of empathy for the victims of 7 October, but a deeper sense that their peers lack care or concern for Jewish people who are struggling to process these events and their aftermath. It is arguably this observed "inconsistent concern for the suffering of others" (Arnold and Taylor 2019: 21) that better explains many participants' experiences of antisemitism – one that is not necessarily motivated by anti-Jewish hatred, but stems from a place of concern and care for Palestinians:

> The people that I encounter in this sector have deep concern with what's happening in Palestine and Gaza [and] it is horrible what's happening, but it has become really taken up by the sector in a way that other tragedies haven't. (Stakeholder A31)

Many of the responses reported by Jewish stakeholders, such as "one-sided statements" (Stakeholder B30) in the immediate aftermath of 7 October, reflected a sense of dehumanisation: "they never saw Jews as real people" (W3SN4.7). In the context of their interviews (or relaying of professional encounters), some have felt compelled to appeal for empathy — for others to simply recognise their humanity — not as a denial of the suffering experienced by other communities, but because such empathy is often perceived as not being extended to them. One stakeholder recounted being in a room among peers who work for a major arts organisation and "having to stand in front of them, very aware of the gaze, having to plead my innocence, having to do a little bit of Shylock, to try and bring our humanity back to an equal place" (Stakeholder A2b). Anecdotes like this one reflect deeper individual and communal perceptions of a persistent thread running through historical and contemporary forms of antisemitism, namely being "othered."

Using affect to consider the impact rather than the intention of these political discourses, we can better move from negotiating definitions and focus on the lived experience of antisemitism. This conceptual lens makes space for both the empathetic strategies of numerous individual artists and creative workers who have engaged in activism to support Palestinians, and the evidence from Jewish creatives, artists and cultural workers who are experiencing hostility, discrimination and exclusion. This approach also expands collective understanding of antisemitism to encompass expectations of empathy, safety and recognition of cultural sensitivities informed by identity and collective memory, including intergenerational trauma in Holocaust survivor communities in Australia, while not discounting the legitimate concerns and activism of those advocating for Palestinian rights, safety and self-determination.

FINDINGS

This section of the report is divided into an analysis of the conditions and impacts of antisemitism in the CCIs, as inferred or otherwise expressed in stakeholder discussions across both cohorts.

CONDITIONS

The first section on conditions (causes) presents key themes that emerged from discussions with stakeholders across both cohorts (A and B), highlighting the distinctive ways antisemitism manifests within the cultural, creative and arts sectors. These themes shed light on sectoral practices and responses that may have contributed to perceptions or experiences of anti-Jewish discrimination. They include perceived shortcomings in diversity and inclusion frameworks, the framing of anti-Israel discourse as part of a global post-colonial endeavour and the online cultural activism of artists and creatives beyond institutional control.

These challenges reflect a sector grappling with limited capacity, resources and competing priorities. Reactive approaches often reveal the fragility — or even absence — of clear and consistent due process, and the need for some organisations to re-evaluate the working relationships between governance, operational teams and artists. The implications for a sector reliant on contracted and freelance work resound loudly in conversations with stakeholders, some of whom have highlighted the difficulties of managing indirect or "remote" (Stakeholder A10) relationships between their organisations and artists. Others have reflected on whether the challenges their organisation faced might have been avoided through "better internal communications between our freelance work population and full-time employees" (Stakeholder B24), for example.

These issues highlight underlying vulnerabilities in a sector already described as "challenging at the best of times" (Stakeholder A2b), where organisations face constrained budgets and increasingly scarce resources (Stakeholder A35). As many organisations and independent creatives struggle to find opportunity in a sector that is chronically under-resourced, recurring concerns (especially among freelancers and independent artists) include financial insecurity or vulnerability (Stakeholder A14; A28) and the struggle for viability (Stakeholder B10) within a competitive sector. These structural issues form some of the precarious conditions of the sector that have heightened impact on Jewish independent and freelance artists through: (1) professional exile and reduced ability to sustain practice, livelihoods and income, and (2) the targeting of Jewish philanthropy in the arts sector.

THE LIMITS OF INCLUSION IN DIVERSITY FRAMEWORKS

Strategic priorities in the creative arts and cultural industries are largely centred on improving representation, recognition and accessibility for minoritised groups and communities – and creating safe work practices towards this end. There is broad, collective recognition of the need to make creative workplaces, spaces and programming more inclusive through cultural diversity and safety initiatives. Despite the rhetorical commitments of many key organisations, bodies and leaders in the sector, some note a disconnect between diversity, equity and inclusion frameworks in theory and in practice. This disconnect is particularly evident in the reflections of Jewish stakeholders who have worked within major cultural institutions and later recognised that "those policies, policies, policies meant nothing on the ground" (Stakeholder A14).

Several participants framed antisemitism in the sector as both stemming from and contributing to the exclusion of Jewish people from prevailing diversity frameworks. Jewish individuals can feel excluded from inclusion efforts within the sector, as one interviewee explained: "whether consciously or unconsciously, [we] feel left out of organisations' efforts to be more inclusive and diverse" (Stakeholder A1b). Another stakeholder reflected on this sense of misrecognition: "We don't belong. We're 'other' in the wrong way. [We don't have] the right kind of 'otherness'" (Stakeholder A16).

This exclusion is underpinned by recycled antisemitic narratives about Jews' perceived proximity to wealth, power and White privilege, which have led the majority of stakeholders to believe that the sector does not view Jews as a "subjugated minority" (Stakeholder A2b). Consequently, in a sector that is "all about supporting the underdog" (Stakeholder A21), Jewish stakeholders feel they are not afforded the same cultural "sensitivity or care" shown to other minorities (Stakeholder A18), specifically because they are "[seen] as a successful minority" in Australia (Stakeholder A23). These perceptions are further reinforced by persistent antisemitic tropes within the arts community itself. Stakeholder A12b, for example, recounted anecdotal evidence of a former employer (a non-Jewish leader of an arts and cultural organisation) who repeatedly referred to a so-called "Jewish art mafia."

Despite antisemitism being a long-standing topic of concern among many non-Jewish practitioners and professionals in the CCIs — "since October 7, I don't think there's a day I haven't had a discussion about [antisemitism]" (Stakeholder B33a) — many Jewish stakeholders express a general sentiment that governing bodies, organisations and sector leaders remain reluctant to address it directly. This reluctance is often framed as a matter of "risk management" (Stakeholder A1b), tied to concerns that prioritising Jewish concerns, particularly when not explicitly linked to other forms of racism or discrimination, might be perceived as coming at the expense of other communities. Some have encountered these attitudes first-hand in their workplaces or during efforts to engage in outreach within the creative sector:

> Every single time it comes up at the board meeting [that] we need to reach out to our Jewish community… how the company needs [a] strategy to [welcome back] the Jewish community, [one of our board members says]: "Well, what about the other communities?" (Stakeholder A21)

> I've had lots of questions like…"Why isn't there a Palestinian version of [what you are doing]? How can we run a Jewish cultural safety seminar if we're not doing one about Palestinians?" (Stakeholder A1a)

A critical tension lies in the expressed sentiment among stakeholders that a sector that actively champions diversity in lived experience and identity has failed to adequately address (or, at times, listen to) the concerns of Jewish artists, creatives and arts professionals. It reveals feelings of betrayal and accusations of the sector's hypocrisy: the fact that the arts are rhetorically positioned as a progressive sector, inherently and primarily committed to anti-racism and anti-discrimination ethics. This is what one stakeholder (B30) referred to as “the irony of the arts.”

Many Jewish stakeholders feel they have been integral to the perceived success of multiculturalism in the arts, often serving as representatives of cultural diversity by “diversifying” (Stakeholder A3a) the teams and settings they have worked in. For example: “I was the only Jewish [board member], right? At the time, I saw it as great and I think everyone else saw it as great” (Stakeholder A3b). The sector’s selective framing of its commitment to not tolerating exclusionary practices against minority groups or individuals amplifies the felt effects of exclusion and hostility that many Jewish stakeholders have encountered.

ANTI-ZIONISM AND POST-COLONIAL DISCOURSE

Many participants recognise that anti-Zionism, as a means to advocate for the rights of Palestinians, is considered an accepted and acceptable discourse within the arts and cultural sector. This discourse resonates strongly within the arts owing to the sector’s ideological commitments to decolonisation (such as reflexivity regarding White privilege and interrogating the colonial legacies of European settlement on First Nations people in Australia) and calls for symbolic decolonisation by centring Indigenous, minority and non-White migrant voices in creative storytelling and arts programming.

In a sector where such ideas are normative (see: Grieves 2025), commentary within the artistic and creative community about Israel-Palestine has increasingly shifted from a critique of Israeli military policy to focus on “Israel itself as a white colonial project in the Middle East” (Stakeholder A10) and the “sentiment that Israelis [are] colonialists” (Stakeholder A16). While criticism of the nation-state as a concept (not limited to Israel) forms part of a broader critical discourse surrounding colonial structures, some stakeholders have identified the particular hostility reserved for Israel within this discourse as a contemporary expression of historical patterns of discrimination against Jewish communities: “whatever is most hated at the time, that is ‘the Jews’. And I think the thing that is most hated now is colonisation and therefore that’s what Jews are” (Stakeholder A21). This shift facilitates the targeting (typically online) and exclusion of many Jewish creatives and artists and their work from arts spaces, peer networks and workplaces based on their ethnicity, cultural background and assumptions about their political positioning.

The 7 October attack occurred just one week before the Voice to Parliament referendum, creating what some stakeholders noted as an emotionally “fertile” (Stakeholder B24) environment in which disappointment over the anticipated referendum outcome intensified focus on Israel as a colonial-settler project.

In discussing the application of a blanket “coloniser narrative” (Stakeholder B26) to Zionism, several stakeholders have noted a connection between the arts and academia in Australia. The sentiment expressed by many stakeholders is that higher education institutions, namely universities and their organisations, serve as ideological incubators for anti-Zionist or anti-Israel views under the guise of decolonising pedagogy and political activism. As one stakeholder observed: “all the anti-Israel rhetoric and politics is growing and growing and growing within universities” (Stakeholder A2b). Another stakeholder reinforced this perspective, noting: “it all comes from academia” (Stakeholder A35).

This report surfaces a conflation — or at times a symbiotic relationship — between antisemitism and anti-Israel or anti-Zionist discourses in the CCIs, where, as one stakeholder (B26) observed: “No one would acknowledge they were being antisemitic.” For many stakeholders, however, anti-Israel discourse or anti-Zionism registers as an inherently anti-Jewish discrimination (i.e., it targets them in their identification as Jewish).

> We’re one and the same, a lot of us – when you’re talking about Zionists, you’re talking about Jews. (Stakeholder A22)

> If you’re anti-Israel, that’s one thing, but if you’re anti-the-people-who-are-for-Israel – well, that’s me, because I’m a Jew. (Stakeholder A1a)

What many participants seem to be saying is that they are being targeted because of their connection to Israel, which, for many Jews, forms a core part of their sense of Jewishness. They are, they feel, being held collectively responsible for the actions of the Israeli Government, whether or not they support that government. Some Jewish stakeholders, however, do not equate Zionism with their sense of Jewish identity and, as such, have claimed to not have experienced antisemitism in their creative circles and workplaces; for example, “I am not Zionist [and] I have not seen a whiff, a gust of wind of antisemitism. I’ve never seen anything that would be problematic at all [and I’m] incredibly Jewish” (Stakeholder A19a). Stakeholders’ anecdotes are revealing of blanket assumptions (or stereotypes) whereby Jewish individuals are treated as a monolith, leaving little conceptual space afforded for nuanced or critical perspectives on Israel or Zionism:

> I think when you’re lumping a group of people together and making an assumption about them, you’re in slightly dangerous territory… There’s generalisations that happen to the point of a feeling of exclusion. (Stakeholder A16)

The reality is that, like any community, Jewish stakeholders hold a wide range of political views and should be understood as individual political actors, not as representatives of a single position or view. Across the sector, antisemitism is often detected in interactions where Jewish individuals feel obligated to assert their positionality or distance themselves from presumed political stances or affiliations. Several stakeholders noted that this particular scrutiny plays out in their professional settings, where employers seek to assess the validity of online claims about the perceived risks of employing Jewish arts and creative professionals; for example, suspicion over whether they might show bias and exclude pro-Palestinian voices from their programming:

> There was a level of social media critiquing me (as a Jewish Australian) making decisions about programming [in the arts organisation]. I can only view it as antisemitic because I have never > publicly discussed my views on Israel's action in Gaza since October 7th. (Stakeholder A10)

> [When our organisation announced] our program, there was this huge, huge, huge undertaking of crisis comms [because] I was an issue that needed to be accounted for and dealt with. Everyone is scrambling to deal with the Jewish problem [because] the person who had created the program [was Jewish], therefore, was potentially going to put the event at risk. (Stakeholder A15)

For some, the intensity, described as "laser-focused" (Stakeholder A33b), of an anti-Israel discourse within their networks is deeply unsettling, registering as a form of exceptionalism for this particular geopolitical issue. There was notable commentary on the spectrum of how stakeholders understood Zionism, with several Jewish stakeholders observing what they perceived to be deliberate or malicious repurposing of the term within the sector.[9] One stakeholder noted that the term has been "twisted" to equate with negative social conditions, such as colonialism, apartheid and White supremacy (Stakeholder A17). The disputed understandings of the term within the non-Jewish community and personal meanings of Zionism among Australian Jews are summarised by one interviewee: "the definition of Zionist to me [is] believing Israel has a right to exist, but to other people, it means land-grabbing and abusing Palestinians and murdering. That's not what it means to me" (Stakeholder A21). This contrast is further illustrated by another Jewish stakeholder who explained: "I do believe you can be, like, Zionist and pro-Palestinian – you can believe in Palestinian statehood and sovereignty, and also the existence of a Jewish state" (Stakeholder A28). Stakeholders also observed a growing permissibility of vilification and incitement to violence directed at those who identify (or have been identified) as Zionists based on their Jewish identity:

> [After 7 October] certain phrases and language were okay, and then it has become more and more extreme where now people can say: "all Zionists deserve to die." (Stakeholder A15)

It is the reported lack of nuanced understanding (or intentional repurposing, for some) of the term and its meanings for Jewish stakeholders that has surfaced hostile interactions and the normalisation of dehumanising language or incitement to violence in their professional and creative circles. A Jewish creative managing a non-Jewish arts organisation (Stakeholder B10) relayed an experience of networking socially with fellow creatives when one artist spoke about the importance of respecting everybody's humanity, "and then she said: 'except Zionists. I want to kill all Zionists'". While it is broadly acknowledged among research participants that there is an important distinction to be made between antisemitic and anti-Zionist rhetoric, since many Australian Jews identify as Zionist (or have a personal or familial connection to Israel), the impact of such vilification ought to be considered in light of this fact. This is not to marginalise the views of those in the Jewish community who oppose Zionism as a concept (or debate its centrality to Judaism), but to recognise that the normalisation of dehumanising language creates settings in which many Jewish stakeholders feel unsafe, and social matrices in which antisemitism is more likely to emerge.

Many stakeholders' experiences point to the growing normalisation of antisemitic tropes embedded in anti-Israel rhetoric. In the words of one stakeholder (A28): "I don't think everyone who's pro-Palestinian is inherently antisemitic or anti-Israel, [but] there is often such a bleeding between them." The following exchange is indicative of this overlap, while capturing the emergence of "a feeling of antisemitism" (Stakeholder A9b) as an affective response triggered by familiar antisemitic tropes that are regularly incorporated into anti-Israel or pro-Palestinian advocacy and discourse:

> Stakeholder A9b: I had an experience where I went into a toilet stall after a rehearsal and there was an anti-Zionist sticker in the bathroom — I don't know who the person was, but it was an image of a stereotypical overweight Chabadnik guy on a blue-and-white background with a big red cross through it.[10]
> Stakeholder A9a: I can provide context: there's a very famous video of a guy who stole a person's house [in Palestine]
> Stakeholder A9b: This is where it gets complicated — I'm not following all this stuff. I walk in and experience a feeling of antisemitism, because that's all I see…when there's nothing written to provide context and you just see that image on a toilet stall after rehearsal — that's what it feels like.

Loeffler (2020: 40-1) notes that it is not necessarily the content of an anti-Israel, anti-Zionist or pro-Palestinian stance that determines whether it is antisemitic, "but the context in which criticism occurs" (emphasis added). For example, while the regular rallies organised by the Free Palestine Coalition outside the State Library of Victoria are not antisemitic — although "disconcerting" (Stakeholder A9) for some Jewish stakeholders, especially when considering that some protestors have engaged in antisemitic rhetoric — the example perhaps becomes more complex when considering the institution's traditional philanthropic support or the subject matter of its exhibitions and programming.

In late October 2023, a collective of creatives afforded fellowship funding from the philanthropy of the Sidney Myer Fund released a statement online in solidarity with Gaza. A freelance Jewish artist (Stakeholder A2b) commented on this action, noting that this "major art award" (the Sidney Myer scholarship) is awarded by a philanthropic organisation "that was set up by a Jewish family. And suddenly all the Sidney Myer Creative Fellows [are] getting together to write a statement". What can we infer from the fact that the stated commonality among this group — aside from working in the creative and arts sector more broadly — is their affiliation with a collective named after (and shaped by the legacy of) a Jewish patron of Australian arts and culture?

CULTURAL ACTIVISM AND CREATIVE-POLITICAL EXPRESSION

As creatives, artists and staff in the cultural sector engage with discourse around Palestine, questions have emerged among stakeholders about whether activism and political expression are an inherent component of artistic expression and practice, or of the sector at large.

> It's a very political industry… and it attracts a lot of people who are very politically engaged… people who are drawn to political activism are also drawn to the arts as a way of practicing their political activism… The industry has absolutely been taken over by political activists, not artists. (Stakeholder A2b)

In an industry where "freedom of expression has always been held at the highest levels" (Stakeholder A17), a notable tension arises around defining the boundaries of an artist's creative freedoms within institutional contexts. While artists often self-identify (or are recognised) as "dissenters [or] political envoys" (Stakeholder A16), institutions carry responsibilities, especially when artists are employees or recipients of government funding.

> We work with a lot of independent artists [who] are very outspoken… they tend to be quite far away from "the establishment". And so we're in a situation where [we are connected to] the main stakeholders (the state government [and] institutions) and we're working with very independent artists. And so we're at the nexus between these two worlds. (Stakeholder A10)

For many stakeholders across both cohorts, the notion of institutional neutrality or apoliticality (an already debunked notion for some) is increasingly being challenged by these dynamics. This includes not only questions around how organisations respond to political and social issues, but also a broader rethinking of whether it is appropriate (or within their remit) for arts organisations to position themselves as spokespersons on matters of current affairs.

> We're not going to be able to solve Middle Eastern politics and, quite frankly, we shouldn't try to because we're a [performing arts] company in Australia… what surprised me was some of the expectations of what some people felt we could or should do, or in fact, were capable of [doing]. (Stakeholder B24)

Many stakeholders in Cohort B, for instance, emphasised the importance of allowing for artistic freedom (inclusive of political commentary or activism) while ensuring organisational responsibility and due diligence when it comes to organising and hosting an events program, cultural production or performance. In an organisational context, balancing the demand for freedom of expression with a duty of care to audiences, staff and board members has become increasingly urgent. Regarding the stage and programming, the key challenge (as outlined by various stakeholders) lies in "giving people spaces to express themselves" (Stakeholder A1b) without enabling harm. One stakeholder noted that harm is not necessarily the issue, but rather that the stage itself, for example, is not the appropriate platform for any political stance:

> But when people go to the [theatre] and the play [has] nothing to do with the Middle East and the actors come out wearing the keffiyehs... I just don't see the reason for that in the arts – it's not what we're about. There will be places where that discourse can occur, but that's not appropriate to hijack something that's got nothing to do with anything political. (Stakeholder A9)

Such comments regarding freedom of expression reflect a broader tension within the sector — not confined to any single geopolitical issue — but rather concerning how to create space for difficult or nuanced conversations while ensuring respectful dialogue that does not veer into "hate speech, intimidation or promotion of [extremist views]" (Stakeholder A17) or antisemitism. A key challenge for the sector has been balancing support for artists, creatives and staff with pro-Palestinian views, while sanctioning anti-Israel discourse that uses dehumanising language, antisemitic tropes or otherwise threatens the safety of audience members. To this point, one stakeholder (a Jewish creative worker in an arts organisation) noted their approach to setting expectations among contracted artists or performers, surfacing another tension that emerged across stakeholder discussions: Where do we draw the line between safety and comfort, and who determines what qualifies as an "unsafe" setting, program or statement?

> Look, if you wish to speak your mind, we understand that art is political and that we absolutely accept that, and people do have the right to state their opinions… but if you create an environment that's unsafe in a way that is really unsafe – it can be uncomfortable, but we won't accept hate speech, any kind of riot, any potential violence and any extreme disrespect to both community groups and individuals. (Stakeholder A10)

Crucially, while arts and cultural organisations at times grapple with defining and regulating the boundaries of artistic freedom, the online space allows for its immediate and unrestricted expression, often exempt from institutional oversight, management or intervention. The online space has become a key site for political mobilisation among creative communities and artist groups. It is where calls to boycott organisations, events and funding bodies perceived to be complicit in the suffering of Palestinians have gained momentum. These unmoderated digital environments are an inescapable part of the contemporary creative landscape for many users. They are often "potent" spaces where people "feel least accountable for how they express themselves" (Stakeholder A1b) that can lead to the "amplification of hatred" (Stakeholder A7a). What becomes increasingly clear through conversations with stakeholders is that the "negative impact of social media cannot be understated, particularly within the arts" (Stakeholder A7a).

The online space — particularly social media — has become the most active arena for artists' activism, including the initiation of boycotts targeting Jewish board members, professionals and funders affiliated with cultural and arts organisations. These efforts often take the form of coordinated social media activity, such as tagging institutions, sharing petitions and amplifying calls for institutional accountability. It is also an unregulated zone for discourse and calls to action, including incitement to harass Jewish individuals identified as "Zionists" or having affiliations with Israel, and one that many arts organisations lack the capacity or oversight to manage safely or in a timely manner. As a result, these organisations can become overwhelmed by rapidly growing online artist movements that threaten to disrupt their programming, operations or reputational standing. One arts organisation faced "serious boycott potential" from artists protesting its funding from a Jewish philanthropist, noting that "there was a lot of noise becoming louder and louder" on social media, creating a "high risk situation" (Stakeholder A10). In response to these "insidious and underhanded" online attacks, the philanthropist and their team chose to withdraw funding to minimise risk for the arts organisation, which lacked "the resources to withstand" an online attack (Stakeholder A22b). In some instances, the social media activity of Jewish professionals working in arts institutions, such as engaging with posts about Israel-Palestine or challenging perceived misinformation about the conflict, has been cited by other artists as evidence of ethical misconduct and reported to their affiliated institutions or organisations as grounds for investigation, disassociation or boycott.

IMPACT

This section examines the impacts of the sector's engagement with discourse on Israel and Palestine on Jewish creatives, artists and professionals working in the arts who participated in this research. For many Jewish stakeholders (individuals and organisations), the "professional ramifications" (Stakeholder A18) include loss of work, networks, income, revenue and opportunity. Psychological impacts include diminished motivation — "I've found it very difficult to be creative" (Stakeholder W3SN5.7) — to pursue career development pathways (such as applications for jobs and project funding) and increased concerns for safety in engaging with the arts. Various stakeholders referred to the "Zio600" doxxing incident in which the names, professions, locations and contact details of 600 Jewish creatives in a WhatsApp group chat were circulated on social media: "I was doxxed. I was in that group, you know, the 'Jew list' — people love making lists of Jews" (Stakeholder A15).

Regardless of whether these safety concerns are realised, they are "undermining our ability to fully engage in our profession" (Stakeholder A1a). Some also reported a noticeable impact on their physical and mental health, for example, stress, weight-loss and the "return of anxiety and panic attacks" (Stakeholder W1SN4.1). Overall, the root causes of such impacts, described by one stakeholder (A25) as "pernicious", are difficult to state definitively or quantify for several stated reasons:

> It's very hard in the arts to specifically say they didn't get that job because they were Jewish. (Stakeholder A22c)

> [Was] the reason people were [not] coming to [the Jewish event] because of a cultural boycott of Jewish culture? [Or] did we do a good enough job at marketing? (Stakeholder A6a)

> I've creatively been pretty stunted, but it's been impossible to know if that's because of antisemitism or just how depressing the whole situation is with the war. (Stakeholder 39a).

Three core narratives related to impact emerged from our research, highlighting key themes that shape the experiences of Jewish stakeholders in the arts and cultural sector: (1) cultural boycotts of Jewish creatives and professionals (and their work), and the circulation of antisemitic tropes related to Jewish funding of the arts; (2) growing concerns around cultural safety, often manifesting in the dismissal of concerns about platforming or programming anti-Israel perspectives, or hostile interpersonal interactions with colleagues and industry peers, or in withdrawal and exclusion; and (3) feelings of cultural homelessness among Jewish participants within professional and creative spaces (arts venues, workplaces and networks) across the sector.

We can also note that antisemitic discourses operating at higher levels (such as those targeting Jewish philanthropic institutions) have a trickle-down effect on independent Jewish artists and creatives. These narratives about philanthropy not only shape how individuals in the broader cultural sector perceive and engage with Jewish artists (e.g., discrimination, exclusion, antisemitic comments), but also influence how these artists navigate their professional and creative spaces, often with increased anxiety or self-censorship stemming from a hostile or unsettling environment (or expectation of).

CULTURAL BOYCOTTS

The funding, programming and governance decisions of certain arts organisations have come under increased scrutiny as some creative workers and artists protest what they perceive as the sector's complicity in Palestinian suffering and the silencing of Palestinian voices or their advocates within the creative arts community. At times, this has resulted in the threat or enactment of a boycott of Jewish philanthropists, board members and artistic producers/creative programmers. For example, an independent Jewish creative working in the performing arts sector faced online rumours accusing them of trying to cancel a pro-Palestinian event: "a ridiculous, absurd accusation because how am I going to do it?" (Stakeholder A15). In response to the rumours, the organisation they were working with initiated an internal investigation involving "months of auditing" their emails and social media, with no regard for their mental wellbeing or other personal ramifications.

Key incidents involved an artist-led online boycott on social media aimed at pressuring organisations to remove Jewish board members identified as "Zionist" or having pro-Israel sentiments over concerns about their influence on programming decisions or, in some cases, simply on the board. In one instance, a board member of an arts organisation became the target of an online harassment campaign after being publicly identified as a Zionist by artists on social media. The individual received hostile direct messages and saw multiple posts tagging the organisation and accusing them of supporting Zionism through having this individual on the board: "There were a couple of comments from other artists I knew saying: 'How dare you have a Zionist on the board?'" (Stakeholder A3b). Despite the public targeting, there was initially no outreach from the organisation's leadership — "there was no empathy" (Stakeholder A3b) — until an urgent board meeting was called days later, which appeared more focused on protecting the organisation's reputation with artists than addressing the board member's concerns:

> [I was] trying to explain to them what I'd gone through, what antisemitism was, [but] the message was: You are affecting our reputation with artists. Artists are allowed to say whatever they want. You have a responsibility to this organisation as a board member to support them.

Feeling unsupported, the board member resigned. The resignation of board members has raised concerns among Jewish creatives about the wider implications for Jewish representation in the arts sector: "If there's no Jewish representation on the board, there's going to be even less Jewish representation in programming" (Stakeholder A18) and "I'm worried we haven't got a seat at the table" (Stakeholder A4b). Such concerns echo broader anxieties articulated by Jewish stakeholders across the arts and cultural ecosystem.

In a similar scenario, a Jewish board member engaged with artists' political posts on social media, which were later forwarded to the arts organisation as a complaint. As one example, an artist demanded to know "why would they have someone like me (a Zionist) on their board" (Stakeholder A23). The board member was also called into an emergency meeting and reprimanded for unacceptable conduct by the marketing department; however, they did not resign their position as they felt supported at board-level because their concerns were not dismissed: "I've got a perspective of someone who's directly impacted and I felt that that's been listened to – I'm not saying it's always been understood" (Stakeholder A23).

Some Jewish creatives and artists whose work or productions were programmed prior to 7 October 2023 faced institutional decisions to either cancel their work entirely or significantly scale back its marketing: "there was no press coverage" (Stakeholder A11a), "there were no posters outside" (Stakeholder A9) and "they didn't even send one mail-out to say that my show existed" (Stakeholder A25). These actions were experienced as a form of erasure of their creative labour and presence, or as evidence of their host organisation's limited understanding of the cultural specificity and diversity within the Australian Jewish community. For example, one stakeholder, referring to a Jewish-themed exhibition, observed that institutional hesitancy around its public promotion stemmed from concerns about security and public relations, driven by fears that elements of the work could be misinterpreted as "Zionist objects" (Stakeholder A11a).

One Jewish creative described facing institutional pushback from a partnering arts organisation, where staff expressed concern that hosting a planned production centred on Jewish themes unrelated to contemporary politics could be perceived as endorsing the actions of Israel. Upon hearing about a potential staff boycott at the organisation, the Jewish creative team took a proactive approach: "We want[ed] to come in and meet with all the staff who are feeling uncomfortable, field their questions and see if we can get everybody back on the same page" (Stakeholder A2b). During the process of community-led cultural consultation, the staff asked for an explanation of the difference between antisemitism and anti-Zionism: "[this is] someone in the cultural sector (we're talking about a literate community) – do I need to say anything more?" (Stakeholder A2a). This incident raises several discussion points: gaps in knowledge regarding the diversity of Jewish experience within the creative sector, the role of community consultation in educating about Jewish experience, and the cultural burden and emotional labour placed on Jewish creatives who must navigate hostile environments in the absence of adequate institutional frameworks for staff training on cultural awareness of minority groups. As one stakeholder noted: "Why is the onus on me to try and solve this for you?" (Stakeholder A2b).

ANTISEMITIC NARRATIVES TARGETING JEWISH PHILANTHROPY IN THE ARTS

Having explored cultural boycotts and the navigation of threats targeting Jewish artists, their creative work and their presence on boards for arts organisations, it is notable that some institutions have also faced boycott threats from artists and employees — "worried about being in receipt of funding from a Jewish funder" (Stakeholder A22b) — who have used social media platforms to demand accountability. Antisemitic discourses surrounding "wealthy Jewish families contributing 'Zionist blood money' to progressive [arts] spaces" (Stakeholder A17) were circulated across creative circles online. These narratives surrounding philanthropic giving from Jewish funders are informed by recycled antisemitic tropes about the wielding of wealth and "undue influence" (Stakeholder A22c) to control artistic programming:

> People are suddenly seeing all these Jewish philanthropists not as philanthropists who are benevolent. They're seeing them as Zionist propaganda controllers. And so, suddenly, the reason that they're giving them money is not because they care about the arts or they care about culture. It's because they have an agenda that they need to manage and control. (Stakeholder A2b)

> I was the point of contact for all the major donors, all the grants, the corporate partners [in my organisation] at a time where [staff] were talking about "not taking blood money from Zionists". I feel really conflicted about the way that people are talking about really important philanthropic organisations who have been instrumental in holding up institutions like this. (Stakeholder A14)

These antisemitic narratives about "the nefarious, underhanded, secret tentacles of Jewish power" (Stakeholder A2b) are not reserved for those operating at a philanthropic level, but manifest in the everyday interactions of artists and creatives in the context of their professional roles or when navigating potential career opportunities. One Jewish stakeholder outlined the interview process for a development role at an arts organisation where the interviewer posed a series of questions around the ethics of funding:

> So this person came back to me [and said:] "but would you agree that there may be organisations that we would not be wanting to accept money from?" … they came back to me again with: "But surely you would agree that there could be [philanthropic] organisations that would not agree with [our] mission and we would not want to accept money from these organisations?" (Stakeholder A3a)

The accounts from a range of Jewish stakeholders reveal the emotional impact and harm caused by antisemitic narratives that circulate freely within their creative and professional circles. For one Jewish philanthropist, the only viable response to online attacks and protests from creative workers and artists (compounded by a lack of support from leadership) was to withdraw financial support from a partner organisation, despite a long-standing relationship.

> We just can't afford to [fund the arts] because of the hateful social media that [the funded organisation] gets from some artists. We could foresee having problems and we didn't want that for the organisation or for us. (Stakeholder A22a)

This risk management strategy was welcomed by the partner, a performing arts organisation, which sought to minimise operational disruption. The organisation had come under pressure when it was revealed via informal channels that several programmed artists were being urged to boycott the event due to perceptions that it was "being led by or supported by or funded by Zionist organisations" (Stakeholder A10). While the philanthropic organisation maintained an "arms-length" approach to funding, with no influence over programming or operations (Stakeholder A22a), the festival team had assumed this was understood by their community:

> [We just assumed people knew that funding] does not give any of those people influence on how the organisation operates (who was booked, what staff could or couldn't speak about, or what they could wear). It's all completely false and wrong. They have no influence whatsoever. (Stakeholder A10)

As online backlash intensified, the philanthropic organisation met with the arts organisation team to assess whether they could manage the mounting “aggression forming on social media” (Stakeholder A22b). Although reassured the situation was under control, the festival later asked the Jewish funding organisation to issue a public statement denying the accusations “which the festival organisers knew had no merit, and yet they still, in order to prevent a boycott or financial sanction by artists and audiences, were willing to effectively throw the funder under the bus so they could come out unscathed or less damaged” (Stakeholder A22b). When the funder declined, the organisation instead published a disclaimer on its website distancing itself from the funder, which was perceived as a public disavowal with subtle antisemitic undertones:

> You’re putting us out there as these Jews. “This is the Jews who are doing this…we’re not getting funding from the Jews.” Do you understand how it feels [when] I’m seeing “we’re not funded by the Jews anymore”? (Stakeholder A22a)

While some Jewish philanthropists remain open to the possibility of returning to support arts organisations that have recently lost their backing — “[your organisation] isn’t ‘no’ forever, but it’s ‘no’ for now” (Stakeholder A14) — others have started redirecting their support towards explicitly Jewish cultural initiatives and artistic endeavours.

Some stakeholders noted their concern that the withdrawal of support from Jewish philanthropists might fuel resentment in a sector that is already navigating resourcing challenges, while bolstering antisemitism tropes that “we’re the ones who hold the purse strings” (Stakeholder A14). This is what one stakeholder has termed: “the weaponisation of generosity” (Stakeholder A35). Similarly, there is a sense of concern among several stakeholders that using one’s influence (e.g., as a Jewish board member or philanthropist) to signal disagreement with what they perceive to be antisemitism within the context of their affiliated organisation may reinforce antisemitic discourses across the sector.

> We need to find another way… no one should write any letters. No one should make any phone calls to anybody… because all that does is feed into the toxic narrative.
> (Stakeholder A2a, emphasis added)

When Jewish stakeholders identify or challenge antisemitism using their available resources or channels, they risk reinforcing harmful antisemitic tropes about disproportionate power or influence. However, some feel that remaining silent (or in the case of board members or funders, choosing not to withdraw from certain organisations despite their concerns) might be “characterised as acquiescence” (Stakeholder A35). This paradox places many Jewish stakeholders in an impossible position and highlights how antisemitism within the creative arts and cultural sector operates in a self-reinforcing cycle.

CULTURAL SAFETY

The impact of 7 October on Jewish staff working in arts and cultural organisations was profound, particularly in workplaces where their emotional responses were neither acknowledged nor understood by non-Jewish colleagues. For some, returning to work the following day was an emotionally fraught and challenging experience:

> On October 8th [2023], walking into work that morning would have been the hardest thing that you could do…you had to walk in [while in] a state of grief and face questions: "Hey, how was your weekend?" (Stakeholder A6a)

In the weeks and months that followed, and as the violence between Israel and Palestine escalated, many Jewish staff described feeling increasingly isolated or vulnerable. Often these feelings of exposure were heightened by the fact that they were the only Jewish person in their organisation, whether on the board or in the office.

> People [were] walking around in my small office with "Free Palestine" [on their shirts] all the time. So it was very, very confusing and lonely. But on top of it all, I was terrified I was going to lose my job. (Stakeholder A14)

There are also several reports from interviewees and workshop attendees of microaggressions and instances of direct hostility in the context of interactions with industry peers and colleagues. Outlining a meeting with external contractors regarding the delivery of an education program at their cultural institution, one stakeholder (A24) noted:

> They didn't want to mention Israel. They didn't want to mention contemporary antisemitism, because they kept on saying: "it's anachronistic". And so you start questioning yourself.

The invalidation of Jewish experiences of antisemitism — "telling us we're overreacting" (Stakeholder W3SN3.7) — registers as its own form of harm while also leading to feelings of self-doubt as to whether certain actions or words are antisemitic or simply coincidental. One freelance Jewish creative (Stakeholder A28) recounted an interaction with a creative collaborator who "one time said to me: 'it's very convenient for Jewish people [to have] a shape-shifting identity that we invoke for whichever setting most serves us.' I don't feel safe working on my next [project] with them." Other reported hostile interpersonal interactions, whether online or in-person, including conversations or confrontations with colleagues and industry peers in which Jewish stakeholders are expected to explain or qualify their identity and positionality, or account for the actions of the State of Israel. For example, one stakeholder recalled "being questioned about Israeli military policy for two hours" (Stakeholder W1SN5.5); another noted that "when people find out that I'm Jewish they tell me their thoughts on the State of Israel — always negative" (Stakeholder W1SN5.8), as though simply being Jewish makes them responsible for the actions of a nation-state.

Others pointed to a broader organisational culture that mishandled their emotional wellbeing, prioritising the comfort of non-Jewish staff over the needs of Jewish colleagues. One Stakeholder (A12b) recalled being told that Jewish staff couldn't speak about 7 October "in the staff room or anywhere in the building because it might upset the non-Jewish staff." One stakeholder described how their concerns were trivialised and dismissed during a board meeting, where they were teased for being "a bit mean" to someone who had expressed antisemitic views: "And this is my problem with the arts — they wouldn't tolerate any other form of racism except against the Jews" (Stakeholder B30).

“And this is my problem with the arts – they wouldn’t tolerate any other form of racism except against the Jews”
– STAKEHOLDER B30

Several Jewish stakeholders' experiences pointed to inconsistencies in how political discourse or identity-based expression around Israel and Palestine is handled within the context of their institutions. For example, while artists may freely express political views, Jewish board members and professionals often face restrictions, based on the perception that they represent the institution and are, therefore, held to different behavioural standards (whether explicit or implied). A Jewish creative working in an arts organisation (Stakeholder A15) recalls that they were asked by their employer "not to share anything political on my [personal] social media accounts. [I'm] silenced. But one of my colleagues was wearing her keffiyeh to work, and] in the background of her screen during Zoom meetings were 'Free Palestine' posters. I know you can't prevent people from expressing themselves, but I feel like there could be a standard of safe practice." This insight reflects the practical realities of the responsibility of leadership in drawing the lines between creative self-expression and the creation of inclusive, safe spaces for diverse stakeholders.

As incidents unfold within arts organisations and debates dominate at organisational and sector levels, many in the Australian Jewish creative community feel they have become "collateral damage" (Stakeholder A22b) due to their Jewish identity. Many stakeholders are actively negotiating what it means to occupy the role of artist, creative or cultural professional in relation to that identity and how it is perceived by others. While some feel protected since they can disentangle their Jewish identity from their professional praxis, many others have felt the need to minimise it in their artistic praxis:

> I've been very careful not to include Jewish themes or have Judaism be a part of my artistic work in any way, which doesn't feel right because my creative work is so much an expression of who I am, my lived experiences and my connection to culture. (Stakeholder A1b)

Others omit or downplay their Jewish-related work or education in their applications for jobs or conversations with industry peers because "at the moment, the 'Jewish' label [is] a very, very negative brush to be tarred with" (Stakeholder A2b). Such attempts to censor themselves — for example, "I shrunk myself" (Stakeholder W3SN5.2) — can lead to feelings of guilt and shame.

Underpinning their interactions with non-Jewish industry peers is a growing sentiment among Jewish artists, creatives and professionals in the arts and cultural sector that they are now navigating "enemy territory" (Stakeholder A2b). As a result, many Jewish stakeholders have felt compelled to retreat from spaces and communities that "once felt like home" (Stakeholder W1SN5.5). Such feelings speak to the fact that many Jewish practitioners and supporters saw themselves as integral to the creation of a vibrant, multicultural arts landscape in Australia — "look at the contribution we've made across all of the arts" (Stakeholder A9):

> In this country, the Jews have played a really big role in creating the arts... I mean, I was raised by a single mother. We didn't really have much money at all, but she always found a way to [take us] to the theatre. I think [that's why] there's quite a lot of pain because it's part of the social fabric of who we are. (Stakeholder B30)

Several stakeholders described a reluctance to attend performances, exhibitions or arts venues, expressing that cultural spaces no longer feel safe. Many Jewish stakeholders are pre-emptive in their identification of antisemitism, managing their psychological safety and mental wellbeing by withdrawing from their creative praxis, networks and spaces. Some report conducting personal risk assessments before attending events or venues: “Who’s going? Who do I need to be aware of? Who’s producing it. I want to do my research” (Stakeholder A18) or pre-emptively planning their response to unexpected or unsafe interactions: “If someone said something that was distressing or upsetting, I would just walk out” (Stakeholder A22a). In articulating their self-protective measures — from withdrawal to self-censorship — some Jewish stakeholders invoke terms that draw parallels between personal and historical Jewish experiences, using analogies that speak to an “intergenerational trauma or fear of persecution” (Stakeholder A14), the cyclical nature of antisemitism and patterns of survival that are deeply informed by collective memory and intergenerational trauma:

> I’m not waiting for the flag to turn red – as soon as it goes a little bit pink in the wash, I’m gonna do [take action] because my grandfather’s family escaped before things got worse in Poland. (Stakeholder A38c)

> I find myself pretending that I’m not Jewish, but I feel a lot of guilt about hiding… it takes me back to my grandparents and a historical pattern of Jews having to hide who they are for [their] safety. (Stakeholder A1b)

> I’m terrified of going [to theatre shows]. I don’t even know how to navigate that in a safe way, so I just haven’t gone – my grandfather hid during the Holocaust and there’s definitely that trauma of [having to] hide. (Stakeholder A1a)

The presence of the Holocaust “looms large” in contemporary Australian Jewish identity and rhetoric (Creese 2023: 105) and is deeply entwined with intergenerational trauma. This explains why many Jewish stakeholders reach for certain analogies when outlining their responses to perceived threats to their safety. However, one Jewish stakeholder was keen to offer perspective: ”today’s antisemitism bears little resemblance to the antisemitism of 1930s [Europe]. Even though people want to draw an analogy, I still maintain that the world is the best it’s ever been for Jewish people right now” (Stakeholder A17). While this research aims to provide a measured assessment of antisemitism in Australia’s creative and cultural sector, it is worth noting that such improvised safety measures (and the language used to explain them) often serve as substitutes for the organisational reassurances and frameworks that would genuinely create feelings of safety among Jewish stakeholders. To minimise or dismiss these responses risks being perceived as victim blaming, rather than critiquing how individuals describe their strategies for dealing with marginalisation. Our focus should be on addressing those who perpetrate or refuse to acknowledge the discrimination.

CULTURAL HOMELESSNESS AND ENCLAVES

For many Jewish stakeholders interviewed for this research, their "artistic profession has been turned upside down because of the difficulties they've had with maintaining their art practice without the support of colleagues or galleries" (Stakeholder A7a). As a consequence, some Jewish professionals expressed a sense of professional homelessness in terms of creative opportunities, funding channels and career progression, speaking to a general feeling of exile from former networks and space:

> I want to apply for [the role], but I am 100% [saying to myself]: "they're not going to hire me". How can they hire a Jewish person after everything that's gone down [at that organisation]? I feel like I don't know how to move forward. Where do I go now? (Stakeholder A2b)

The impact of antisemitism has heightened many Jewish creatives' sense of difference, leading some to create and find refuge in their own communities of care. Others feel compelled to orient themselves in this way following their exclusion, or sense of exclusion, from the sector at large. This is not necessarily framed as a negative consequence of the challenges stakeholders have faced in the sector, with some noting positively that they are "becoming more and more Jewish" (Stakeholder A9) or "living a truer existence" (Stakeholder A15) as a result of being more actively involved or feeling more connected to the Jewish community. Indeed, many have pivoted to Jewish cultural and arts initiatives, community spaces and organisations.

However, the language used in conversations with stakeholders often tells of an anxiety related to the creation of insular creative spaces, particularly through language that evokes a historical Jewish experience; for example, "back to the ghetto" (Stakeholder A5b) and "we are a shtetl" (Stakeholder A25).[11] There is a tension between the desire for cultural safety and the necessity for building inter-community bridges so as to "normalise perceptions of the Jewish experience" (Stakeholder A18) in the wider community, often framed as an educative and proactive means to challenge antisemitism:

> One of the things the Jewish community has been complaining [about is:]… "You're not understanding the complexities [of] Israel. You don't understand the differences and the diversity in the Jewish community"... But then what do we do? We don't let you in. (Stakeholder A3a)

The tension here is the expressed need to retreat to cultural, arts and professional spaces where one feels safe, supported and understood, while recognising the need to remain an integrated community and not to "become more insular" (Stakeholder A9) as a result of antisemitism.

Although this research has primarily focused on individual stakeholders, whether as independent creatives or artists, representatives of or individuals working within arts organisations, it has also examined the broader organisational challenges faced by arts and cultural institutions that are explicitly Jewish cultural (heritage) spaces. These organisations may be defined as such by their name, their institutional history or the subject matter they engage with (for example, the Holocaust). For these Jewish cultural organisations, the impacts of recent challenges and shifts in the sector are mixed.

Some face internal pressure from within the Jewish community regarding programming choices, while others grapple with concerns about institutional identity and long-term viability as they shift from cultural programming to welfare provision. They are also increasingly called upon as community resources, tasked with leading urgent anti-antisemitism education efforts or advocating for cultural safety and inclusion. Some faced fundraising challenges as community and donor attention shifted to supporting Israel-related causes, while struggling to secure external support due to stereotypes that Jewish organisations are inherently well-funded.

Security has become a heightened concern for many Jewish organisations, particularly those worried their venues will become "places of protest" (Stakeholder A5a). This has prompted "serious conversations around lockdown and evacuation procedures" (Stakeholder A6a) and increased security presence that drains already limited budgets while serving as a "constant reminder [of] the situation you're living in" (Stakeholder A7a), impacting staff psychological wellbeing. This security is viewed as both a necessary precaution and an established norm — "as Jews, you always have to have security at every event" (Stakeholder A9) — rooted in long-standing antisemitic threats. For one cultural organisation that previously maintained an "open door policy" for intercultural dialogue, increased vigilance and security measures like "ticking off names" have replaced accessibility and opportunities for cross-cultural dialogue (Stakeholder A3a).

For professionals working in Holocaust memory and cultural heritage organisations, this resurgence of antisemitism since 7 October has prompted critical reflection and re-evaluation. Some are reconsidering what effective antisemitism education should look like, exploring new approaches to meet present urgency; for example, how to apply expertise in historical antisemitism to the "contemporary antisemitism space" (Stakeholder A7a). These are complex questions (not limited to conversations within Jewish organisations) around the apparent "failure" of relying on historical examples of antisemitism (namely, the Holocaust) when, as one stakeholder argues, "the current context is what we need to focus on" (Stakeholder A17). Highlighting an existential crisis — and the need for reflection and evaluation — for Holocaust educators, one stakeholder remarked: "We [have] to ask hard questions: Why hasn't it worked? Where have we gone wrong?" (Stakeholder A24).

SUMMARY OF FINDINGS

The findings of this report frame antisemitism as a systemic issue within the cultural and creative industries (CCIs), supported by the lived experiences of Jewish creatives, artists and cultural professionals. Through stakeholders' lived, professional and affective experiences, we gained insights into the impacts and underlying conditions they navigate within the sector.

Many stakeholders attributed their experiences to "unconscious" antisemitism: a term used by Mattsson, Andersson Malmros and Sager (2024: 3) to describe a lack of "pre-understanding" that certain views about Jews are offensive, meaning that "almost anyone can perpetuate structures through various expressions without fully understanding their origins or consequences." One stakeholder argues that antisemitism's presence in the arts can be deduced from broader industry patterns, from cultural institution governance to social media responses following 7 October, noting: "I think you can draw conclusions [that] maybe these prejudices are so deeply ingrained that they're not even conscious" (Stakeholder A18, emphasis added).

The reported dismissal of these issues (or perceived inaction in addressing them) reflects what some stakeholders describe as "innate" (Stakeholder A23) or "inbuilt" antisemitism (Stakeholder A9) within the sector. Importantly, acknowledging unconscious antisemitism in the CCIs does not preclude the possibility of "conscious hostile motive" (Waxman, Schraub and Hosein 2022: 1805); rather, this framework allows us to focus predominantly on the impacts experienced by Jewish stakeholders as a launchpad for developing recommendations for how the CCIs can address harm:

> If someone is offended and hurt and upset and feels that [something] has happened to them, then that has happened to them – it's about impact, not intent.. the very idea of being called antisemitic is so offensive to so many people [that] their own perception of what they consider to be antisemitic or not overrides any impact that it might have on [Jewish] individuals. (Stakeholder B24)

Listening to reports of harm or impact does not necessarily constitute an admission of antisemitism, particularly given that this form of discrimination often operates covertly within the CCIs and relies on contested definitions that make identification complex. However, dismissing or refusing to engage with Jewish stakeholders' experiences of harm, especially when such dismissal is based on the assumption that Jewish people are not well-equipped to recognise antisemitism affecting their own communities, itself constitutes a structural form of discrimination. This pattern of exclusion from discourse about their own experiences represents evidence of institutional antisemitism within the sector.

RECOMMENDATIONS: HOW AN INDUSTRY MOVES FORWARD

The following recommendations for how the creative and cultural industries can move forward are informed by explicit suggestions from stakeholders (Cohort A), existing institutional practices and frameworks (Cohort B) and inferences drawn from both cohorts' experiences in the sector. These recommendations can be categorised as long-term cultural shifts through sector-wide and institutional policy review, as well as short-term practical solutions that address immediate cultural safety concerns. However, consistent application of any recommendations — whether developing sector-wide cultural safety protocols or facilitating educational forums and resources — requires clear direction and principled leadership at the governmental level. As one stakeholder noted: "You can put all these frameworks and processes in place, but unless you've got a leader [who is] brave enough to do it, I just don't think it happens" (Stakeholder B30).[12]

There is notable disappointment among stakeholders across both cohorts that "during a time of real crisis and devastation" (Stakeholder A1a), the creative industries and arts sector "has been anything but the glue that holds us together" (Stakeholder B33a). Many stakeholders expressed disillusionment with top-level leadership, highlighting the need to restore sector-wide trust through supportive interventions and effective frameworks. One stakeholder expressed frustration with the government's lack of support for cultural institutions, noting they have received "very little leadership, direction, [or] information. We're very much on our own in that regard" (Stakeholder A10). In response to this gap, they convened an informal conversation with "leaders and institutions" in their local networks: "We emailed and messaged our colleagues and said: 'Do you want to come together for an evening after work and discuss these situations? Because there's probably a lot of information [but] we had been working in isolation'" (Stakeholder A10). Such grassroots efforts, collaborative forums and cross-sector debriefs, might be adapted at a sector-wide level to address key challenges and encourage sharing of expertise and effective practices.[13]

Despite recent challenges, there exists a resounding sentiment that the creative community is best-equipped to facilitate nuanced, constructive conversations that promote empathy and understanding across difference:

> The creative community [should] come together — Palestinians and Israelis, Jews and non-Jews from all walks of life — to touch the hearts and minds of people. That's what the arts should be doing. This is our core purpose. (Stakeholder A2a)[14]

EDUCATION

Conversations with stakeholders highlight the need for educational resources, such as community consultation through educational workshops or seminars, to increase knowledge of the Jewish experience. Some stakeholders called for "a general orientation on Judaism and Jewishness for non-Jewish creatives/artists" (W3A3.4). An educational framework is needed that captures the cultural specificities of this minority group, including lived experiences and impacts of antisemitism, as well as cultural awareness of contemporary and diverse Jewish identities and connections to Israel.[15]

Since stakeholders identified a specific form of antisemitism within the creative and cultural sector, educational efforts must address the particular sources and subtle expressions that emerge in progressive arts spaces, such as critiques of colonialism and power grounded in social justice movements, and how historical antisemitic tropes find their way into these narratives.[16] Within this scope, education should address the diversity of views on Zionism and Israel within the Australian Jewish community, highlighting that there is no single Jewish perspective on these matters.[17] This approach addresses concerns outlined by stakeholders working in Holocaust cultural heritage and memory, namely that education efforts to challenge antisemitism are thwarted by a historical lens that does not encompass contemporary manifestations of anti-Jewish discrimination and hatred. Given the strong connection between academia and the arts (as noted by several research participants) recommendations for addressing antisemitism in the CCIs highlight the need for educational workshops tailored to the specific needs of arts and cultural departments.[18] While some universities already offer such campus-based interventions in the form of workshops more broadly, there is an opportunity to build on these by developing department-specific content (e.g., for Arts faculties), ensuring the material is contextually relevant and responsive to the unique dynamics of the sector.

There is an urgent need to develop proactive, practical strategies grounded in trauma-informed, empathy-led approaches focused on understanding what constitutes harmful behaviour, particularly for those who have "grown up in communities that are terrified of antisemitism" (Stakeholder 39a) and who may carry the weight of intergenerational trauma.[19] A constructive question for cultural leaders and organisations committed to safety, inclusivity and respect across differences is: How should I respond when a Jewish audience member, staff or board member shares that they have experienced trauma or harm and need support? To this end, illustrative examples demonstrating the impact of recent incidents in the sector may be more effective than definitions that emphasise intention (see: Waxman, Schraub and Hosein 2022).[20] One stakeholder working at a Jewish organisation outlined their existing educational outreach initiatives with members of the mainstream creative community:

> As part of the workshop we talk about the Jewish community in Australia, [including] the epigenetic transmission of trauma… once

“The creative community [should] come together — Palestinians and Israelis, Jews and non-Jews from all walks of life — to touch the hearts and minds of people. That’s what the arts should be doing. This is our core purpose.”

> they understand that the community [is] dealing with second- and third-generation people who have been affected by their parents' and grandparents' experiences of trauma, then they can understand why the community responds in a certain way. So, for example, one of the incidents with a theatre group and the community got really upset about it. "Why has the reaction been so extreme?" [However], when they understand where the community comes from, then they suddenly understand the response of the community. (Stakeholder A7b)

Emerging from the workshops, manifestos for cultural safety and inclusion centre on the need for a more compassionate and supportive environment for individuals, particularly within the context of ongoing conflict and political tensions surrounding Israel. One manifesto outlined: "We will listen and be guided by those with lived experience" (W3A3.2). Efforts to create spaces for people to "share the impact of their experiences" (Stakeholder B24) speak to existing cultural safety frameworks in the sector that encourage "listening to community voices, and following processes of communication and consultation" (Safer Spaces at the National Association for the Visual Arts [NAVA]). Crafted on such a principle, antisemitism awareness training might borrow from existing educational sessions produced and delivered by other minority groups.[21] One stakeholder (B24) reflected on a "fantastic" workshop delivered by a First Nations individual who trained their staff on "how to shut up and listen, not react, not engage – to be able to sit in stories with people, and hear people's stories and hear them."

SOCIAL MEDIA

There is a need for long-term cultural shifts in how organisations approach social media. This includes developing policies that promote thoughtful engagement, supported by training and education that emphasise the importance of pausing between stimulus and response in online interactions.[22] There is also a need to create a database of resources where Jewish creatives and artists can seek support and guidance independently, including on navigating social and online networks and their professional workplaces.[23] One stakeholder manages an informal online support group for "Jewish [creatives] who have experienced first-hand antisemitism [and are] unsure how to deal with it" (Stakeholder 39a) to help people craft responses or individual strategies for navigating online spaces. One Jewish organisation has created cultural safety guidelines for Jewish professionals working in non-Jewish cultural spaces. This is an example of existing work created by communities best-equipped to recognise antisemitism that can be used to create protocols for organisations "unsure about best practices [on] how to look after Jewish employees" (Stakeholder A15). Community consultation ensures that trusted Jewish voices (namely, representatives of Jewish organisations) are central to developing solutions that reflect the community's lived experiences and address challenges within the sector.[24]

The creation of these resources may complement existing initiatives such as the Creative Equity Toolkit, which is a digital platform launched by Diversity Arts Australia that provides practical tools to help cultural leaders, creative workers and independent artists advance diversity and inclusion in the sector.[25] Another relevant initiative is Creative Workplaces, which plans to launch an information service designed to support individuals who have experienced discrimination in their arts-based and creative workplaces.[26]

In highlighting the need for educative initiatives, it is fair to recognise that Jewish organisations and individuals are trusted to handle antisemitism education in a "sensitive and deeply understood way because of the skills we have – there is a capability and excellence to be able to [do] what we do in the antisemitism space" (Stakeholder A7a). However, it is essential not to place the burden solely on Jewish creatives and professionals. Many already experience what Van Milders (2022: 182) describes as "uncompensated and unrecognised" emotional labour, often shouldering a disproportionate cultural load in order to "just keep going" (Stakeholder A3a) amid personal and professional challenges. This includes navigating both real and perceived expectations to act as spokespeople on antisemitism, frequently at the expense of their artistic practice or career ambitions. As one stakeholder reflected: "Now I'm only making work about antisemitism, you know. And why should I?" (Stakeholder A25). Expecting Jewish stakeholders to bear this responsibility alone only reinforces existing cultural and structural inequities.[27]

LEADERSHIP

There is a pressing need for cultural industry leaders at the state and national levels to meaningfully engage with antisemitism and the discourses that have emerged and been amplified since 7 October 2023. A reasonable starting point is acknowledging the impacts and harm experienced by many Jewish creatives, artists and cultural professionals in the sector.[28] While highlighting negative experiences, many Jewish stakeholders also recalled exceptional moments of empathy from colleagues, demonstrating the powerful effect of recognition and acknowledgement.

> I was really nervous. No one had said anything [until] my teacher goes: "You see what's happening in Israel – it's crazy. Is your family okay? [...] Are you doing okay?" And I'm so grateful. That was maybe a week or so after October 7 happened. (Stakeholder A32)

> And so she knew I was Jewish, and she's Muslim, and we connected one day on the stairwell. I was like: "How are you going?" And she was like: "I'm alright. How are you?" So we had a moment. (Stakeholder A14)

> The [only Indigenous] person on our board has reached out to me the most [and] said to me: "Are you okay? Do you need some support?" I think [they get] it the most out of anyone. (Stakeholder A23)

[25] There is also a database of resources titled 'How to be anti-racist in the arts' by Diversity Arts Australia.
[26] See: Recommendation 2.3.3 in Executive Summary
[27] See: Recommendation 4.1.2 in Executive Summary
[28] See: Recommendation 1.1.1 in Executive Summary

At an institutional level, responses can vary significantly even within the same organisation. One stakeholder (B30) noted their organisation "did a very good job" when senior management took Jewish patrons' reports of harm seriously, calling them individually. However, attending a meeting between the artistic team and one of the affected patrons, this stakeholder noticed internal misalignment: while one team member "had the capacity to say: 'I'm sorry for the hurt and pain and I'm really sorry'", another did not acknowledge or "take responsibility for the pain and hurt" caused (Stakeholder B30). While robust frameworks can help create safe workplace infrastructures, effective implementation requires principled leadership to ensure consistent organisational approaches.[29]

The same stakeholder described a positive institutional response that demonstrated such leadership through nuanced decision-making. When facing a decision about language in publicity materials for an arts program, a cultural leader made an informed choice about distinguishing between antisemitism and pro-Palestinian discourse:

> [It was] decided to remove the paragraph [which included the statement] "Free Palestine". And my chair said: "I think that's antisemitic, because the Free Palestine movement that he belongs to calls for the annihilation of Israel, so we're not going to include it". (Stakeholder B30)

This informed decision addressed potential safety concerns without cancelling the artwork or program itself, illustrating how principled leadership relies on educational frameworks that can identify and navigate nuances, and then create frameworks to ensure consistent organisational approaches that maintain both safety and artistic integrity.[30]

FRAMEWORKS

The findings of this report speak to a need for a coordinated, sector-wide initiative that supports institutions and their leaders to outline the responsibilities and remits for its various stakeholders at every level of a cultural organisation, from staff members to contracted agencies and artists, in the commitment to create and uphold safe and respectful workplaces in the arts.[31] There is also an urgent need to address the growing influence of digital platforms in shaping institutional responses and informing the personal and professional emotional life-worlds of creatives, artists and professionals working in the sector.[32]

As part of this research, we aimed to use stakeholder experiences across both Cohorts A and B to conceptualise how existing cultural safety frameworks might be adapted for broad application across the sector's workplaces, networks and spaces. We suggest that sector-wide training and support for implementing cultural safety frameworks should centre on emotional safety, thereby capturing feelings of discomfort and unease that both inform and are informed by affective or ambient antisemitism.[33] This approach aligns with existing rhetorical strategies for adhering to good practice in cultural safety. The National Association for the Visual Arts (n.d.) identifies cultural safety as essential to creating creative workplaces and settings that "recognise and respect the cultural identities of people, and creates places that [are] socially, emotionally and physically safe for people to be who they are" (emphasis added).

If arts and cultural spaces, including their administrative spheres. are expected to remain free from political discourse and identity-based expression for workplace safety, then this principle must be applied consistently. Conversely, if policies or frameworks encourage political self-expression, they must be fairly and consistently implemented in practice, with safeguards to prevent hate speech, intimidation or unsafe expressions of views.[34] In which case, such safeguards ought to be agreed on in advance and communicated effectively across all levels of an organisation.

Whether online or on stage, many of these recent incidents have prompted reflection not only on the creative remits of artists but of the working relationship (and respective remits) of creative teams, operational staff, board and funders.[35] At times, the creative separation between boards and artistic teams is upheld as a necessary condition for the functioning of arts or cultural organisations: "the separation of the board from artistic direction is always seen to be sacrosanct [like] the separation of church and state" (Stakeholder B26). Paradoxically, however, it is often this very distance between governance and operations — "I sit on the governance structure; I'm not down in the weeds" (Stakeholder B10) — that has contributed to some of the issues now manifesting across the sector. One stakeholder describes an intra-institutional conflict that arose not from a simple lack of communication, but from an organisational culture in which minimal communication or interference between staff and governance was considered appropriate:

> I think that the schism last year revealed [that] there hadn't been a lot of communication between the staff and the board about programming – it was kept quite arm's length, which is entirely appropriate from a creative perspective in my opinion. But the board didn't even know what was in the program really, in detail, or what the copy of the program would be. And then when challenges would arise, the first protocol was not to inform the board, but that would then mean that by the time [it had] escalated… the board feels out of the loop and that can be really damaging. (Stakeholder B27)

Some stakeholders feel that the term "cultural safety" is loaded or has been "weaponised" (Stakeholder B27) to police the boundaries of political dissent or opposition, and verges on censorship. Indeed, maintaining safe spaces requires consensus on definitions and parameters, including agreement on where the lines lie between antisemitism and anti-Israel or pro-Palestinian statements.[36] However, since these definitions are highly contested, clear remits are also needed to determine who is responsible for overseeing their application in practice. Despite such definitional challenges, there is already work being done to introduce or revise frameworks, procedures and contingencies to address this particular issue, including artists' code of conduct, ethical frameworks and staff guidelines, at some of the organisations discussed in stakeholder interviews. Adaptable templates that can be tailored to the specific needs of individual institutions should be developed to promote a consistent sector-wide approach and reduce the burden on organisations of creating policies or frameworks from scratch.[37]

CONCLUSION

This research aimed to increase awareness and understanding of antisemitism in the CCIs by bringing attention to the specific ways in which antisemitism manifests in these spaces, and raising awareness about the challenges faced by Jewish professionals. Antisemitism has historically and continually reshaped what it means to be Jewish. In the context of Australia's CCIs, many Jewish stakeholders have been "relentlessly thinking about this: What is my identity in an arts organisation?" (Stakeholder A21). Meanwhile, cultural and arts organisations faced "a series of more complicated layers on top of just delivering [an event or program], which were very difficult to navigate and stressful" (Stakeholder A10), as the sector appeared ill-prepared (and the individuals with them often felt unsupported) to respond to the complex and highly charged discourses that emerged following the outbreak of the conflict between Israel and Palestine in October 2023.

This research identified patterns such as reactive responses — what one stakeholder described as "a knee-jerk reaction" (Stakeholder B24) — as well as a "vacuum formed by not responding" in a timely or thoughtful manner (Stakeholder A10). These responses often pointed to a lack of preparedness at the governance level and the absence of a principled, strategic approach to crisis leadership. Despite these challenges, the research also revealed a great deal of goodwill. Leaders, representatives and staff from various organisations (Cohort B) willingly participated in interviews for this project on antisemitism in the CCIs, demonstrating a shared commitment to engage with these complex issues.

The research also proposed actionable solutions for fostering more inclusive, equitable and culturally responsive environments across the sector. These included training programs, toolkits and best practice — or, as one stakeholder (B22) notes: "better practice, because there's actually no such thing as best practice" — guidelines designed to better support Jewish creatives and organisations in addressing antisemitism. It is hoped that the findings will inform policy, strategy development and broader strategic initiatives within creative and cultural organisations, helping to more effectively embed antisemitism awareness into their diversity, equity and inclusion efforts.

ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

This report is based on data from The Gen17 Australian Jewish Community Survey, which was conducted by JCA (Jewish Communal Appeal) in Sydney and the Australian Centre for Jewish Civilisation (ACJC), Monash University, Melbourne, with data gathering managed by Research Now. Dr David Graham of JCA provided the weightings for the Gen17 data on which our analysis in this report is based.

JCA and ACJC are particularly indebted to our donors for their communal leadership and generous financial support, without which the survey would not have been possible. In Victoria, we thank Gandel Philanthropy, Pratt Foundation, Besen Family Foundation, Cher Family Foundation, Jewish Care Victoria and Australian Jewish Funders. This report on Jewish Education in Melbourne was made possible by the generous support of a Dave Grant, an initiative of the Australian Jewish Funders following the 2015 LaunchPad Retreat. Sharon Lowe, Liora Miller, Tracie Olcha, Simone Szalmuk-Singer and Amanda Smorgon played a key role in the determination and vision of this group that made this report possible.

We also acknowledge and thank the many Jewish community organisations across Australia and their executives for their assistance in developing and refining the survey questions, as well as their assistance in publicising the survey.

In Melbourne, we gratefully acknowledge the expertise and generous commitment of time of the Melbourne Planning Committee members Adina Bankier-Karp, Dr Anita Frayman, Dr John Goldlust, Dr Emmanuel Gruzman, Professor Andrew Markus, Dr Miriam Munz and Dr Ran Porat. Confidential access to databases for email and postal contact was made possible by Jewish Care Victoria. Tanya Munz, the Research Assistant on this project, co-ordinated the roll out, administration and promotion of this survey.

For this report, Dr Miriam Munz provided the information on the Jewish education provision in Melbourne and conducted all interviews with parents and school professionals across the community. Tanya Munz provided research assistance and undertook all data analysis. She transcribed the interviews and provided the draft findings that made up the structural framework of this report. Tanya created the data visualisations and designed and formatted this report. Andrew Markus directed the educational component of the Gen 17 project and wrote the final version of the report.

EXECUTIVE SUMMARY

This study presents an analysis of the wealth of data yielded by the Gen17 survey, which was conducted between February – May 2017 and completed by 8,621 respondents, of whom 4,109 live in Victoria. In addition to the Gen17 survey, twenty-nine face-to-face interviews were conducted. The objective of the study is not to develop a set of recommendations for implementation; rather, it provides a comprehensive overview of the pattern of attitudes and values that characterise those who attended different educational streams, presented for consideration by educational experts, school boards, parents and members of the community.

THE MELBOURNE CONTEXT

In Melbourne eight Jewish schools were established between 1949 and 1978. This was an ambitious educational enterprise undertaken by members of the relatively small Melbourne Jewish community. It provided parents with a wealth of educational options, ranging across the religious and ideological spectrum from Ultra-Orthodox, Modern Orthodox, and Chabad, to cross-communal Zionist, Progressive, and secular.

In addition to serving to transmit values across the generations, most of the schools achieve consistently high academic results in general subjects, as indicated by the achievement of their graduating classes. Among the more than 500 Victorian schools with Year 12 VCE classes, some Jewish schools consistently rank in the top ten, and nearly all with VCE classes rank in the top 50. In 2018 a Jewish school ranked first in Victoria.

In 2018, enrolment in the Jewish schools numbered 5,313, estimated at close to 60% of primary school age children and a higher proportion at the secondary level. However, despite their outstanding achievements, the sustainability of so many schools, with an additional three small Orthodox schools established since 2003, is an issue of ongoing discussion.

The cost of education is a concern for most parents. In 2019 average annual fees for the different school systems in Victoria were $904 for Government, $7,371 Catholic, and a much higher $27,455 for Private. While there is considerable variation between Jewish schools, and means-tested subsidies are available, the fees at some Jewish schools are among the most expensive in the state.

Not only are Private school fees high, they continue to increase at a faster rate than average earnings. These educational costs occur in the context of substantial increase in house prices, which has left young couples facing high mortgage payments and lower disposable income than earlier generations; other cost of living pressures include the steep rise in electricity and gas prices.

Contrary to fears that have been expressed, to the present there has not been a major impact on school enrolments. The enrolment at the Melbourne Jewish schools has remained largely constant, with a marginal increase of some 190 students between 2006 and 2016, although relative to the size of the school age population there has been a decline – enrolment over the ten years increased by close to 5%, but the school age population increased by an estimated 18%.

In addition to the school fees, a range of demographic issues impact on school numbers. One factor relates to family composition with a rise in the divorce rate. Once parents are divorced their income is divided between two households – one parent might decide Jewish schools are not important or that the cost is prohibitive. A second demographic factor is greater life expectancy: many grandparents have less capacity to contribute to the cost of their grandchildren's education as they apportion their savings for lengthy retirement years, and transmission of wealth to their children is delayed and may be much reduced. Thirdly, couples are marrying later in life and many defer having children and limit their family size.

At a broad level, there is an ongoing shift in the value placed on Jewish education. This is not an issue for Orthodox families for whom there is no alternative to Jewish schooling, but many in the less observant community do not prioritise a Jewish education as their parents once did.

THE GEN17 SURVEY

Studies of Jewish education typically aggregate results for 'Jewish schools'. Recent examples include the British Jewish Lives project and major Canadian and American surveys such as the 2018 Survey of Jews in Canada and the Pew Research Centre's 2013 Portrait of Jewish Americans.

This study is distinctive in its disaggregation of different streams of Jewish schooling. The analysis considers respondents aged 18-49 who had at least six years attendance at a Jewish secondary school in Australia. Most of these respondents also typically spent their primary school years in a Jewish school; close to 90% of those with six or more years of Jewish secondary schooling also attended Jewish primary for six or more years.

Data is disaggregated by two age groups and by school attended. The main focus is on recent school graduates, aged 18-29 at the time of completing the survey, who are compared with an older cohort aged 30-49 and with respondents who did not attend a Jewish school. The achieved Gen17 sample comprises 726 who attended a Jewish school, and 379 who did not.

Those who attended a Jewish school are divided into three categories; first, there are 330 attendees of the Modern Orthodox Mount Scopus Memorial College, who comprise 45% of the sample. Mount Scopus is the only school with sufficient survey respondents to make possible stand-alone analysis. A second category comprises a combination of attendees of the Orthodox schools Adass Israel School, Yeshivah-Beth Rivkah Colleges, and Leibler Yavneh College, with a total of 291 respondents. The third category comprises attendees of a non-Orthodox school, Bialik College and The King David School, a smaller 105 respondents. The second and third categories are aggregations – they cannot be read as reflecting the situation in any one of the schools. The data is useful as indicating broad patterns and is not reliable for other purposes.

Gen17 was an opt-in survey, not a random sample of the population. With an opt-in survey there is risk that one segment of the population will be over-represented, other segments under-represented, with the result that the profile of the community is skewed. This risk is largely obviated in much of the analysis here reported, which is concerned with attitudes and observances within population segments, not the whole community. The findings point to broad patterns which are consistent with the known character of different population segments and are important in providing understanding of differentiation between the segments.

Questions in the Gen17 survey typically presented respondents with four-point options, ranging, for example, from strong agreement, agreement, disagreement, and strong disagreement. Patterns of differentiation are clearest when attention is focused on strongly held views, either in agreement or disagreement. The broad pattern indicates that strong positive responses are found in highest proportion among those who attended an Orthodox school, then Mount Scopus, non-Orthodox, and the lowest proportion among those who did not attend a Jewish school. For example, for respondents aged 18-29 very strong sense of connection to Jewish communal life ranges by school from 58% Orthodox, 51% Mount Scopus, 36% non-Orthodox, and 22% among those who did not attend a Jewish school (Table 38). Strong preference for Jewish education at the high school level ranges from 82% to 32%. (Table 15)

While this broad pattern is evident in response to the majority of survey questions, there is variance which provides insight into issues on which there is the greatest and least agreement across the Jewish community. The following discussion concerns the responses of those aged 18-29.

[A] Issues on which there is a large measure of agreement or commonality, irrespective of school attended, includes the importance of Holocaust remembrance and of combating antisemitism, pride in being Jewish, Zionist identification and sense of responsibility to ensure Israel's continued existence. This is illustrated with reference to the following questions:

Remembering the Holocaust, 'very important' to own sense of Jewish identity, 63% (Orthodox), 73% (Mount Scopus), 68% (non-Orthodox), and 59% did not attend a Jewish school

Combating antisemitism, 'very important' to own sense of Jewish identity – 47%, 42%, 38%, 43%

Proud to be a Jew, 'completely agree' – 86%, 89%, 76%, 63%

Zionist identification, 'yes' – 80%, 90%, 78%, 62%

Responsibility to ensure Israel's continued existence, 'agree' – 87%, 83%, 83%, 68%

[B] On some aspects considered in the survey, however, there is a large measure of commonality among those who attended a Jewish school, differentiated from those who did not. This includes having studied for a Bat- or Bar-Mitzvah, importance attached to sharing of festivals and shabbat with family, identification with the Jewish people, friendship patterns, youth group involvement, and visits to Israel.

Bat- or Bar- Mitzvah ceremony – 94%-99% attended Jewish school, 59% did not attend Jewish school

Sharing Jewish festivals with family, 'very important' to own sense of Jewish identity – 70%-80%, 50%

Shabbat meal with family, 'always' – 67%-87%, 32%

Sense of belonging to the Jewish people, 'completely agree' – 63%-80% 43%

'All' close friends are Jewish – 41%-55%, 9%

Jewish youth movement involvement, experience growing up – 69%-85%, 43%

Visited Israel two or more times – 75%-91%, 43%

[C] On a limited number of issues there is commonality among those who attended an Orthodox school or Mount Scopus, differentiated from those who attended a non-Orthodox school or did not attend a Jewish school. These issues include importance attached to marrying another Jew, kosher observance in the home, and aspects of the peace process in Israel:

Marrying another Jew, 'very important' to own sense of Jewish identity – 54%-77% Orthodox school, 21%-22% non-Orthodox or did not attend a Jewish school

Only kosher meat bought for the home – 41%-81%, 6%-13%

Control of the West Bank is vital for Israel, 'agree' 52%-69%, 22%-28%

[D] Finally, for some questions those who attended an Orthodox school are differentiated from all other schools. These questions relate to religious belief and observance of religious law, experience of study at a Yeshivah or seminary in Israel, centrality of Jewish identity, and sense of responsibility to Jews around the world.

Observing halacha, 'very important' to own sense of Jewish identity – 48%, 3%-8%

Prayer, 'very important' to own sense of Jewish identity – 45%, 8%-10%

Studied at yeshivah/ seminary in Israel – 64%, 1%-18%

Being Jewish is 'a central element in life' – 67%, 25%-39%

Sense of responsibility to take care of Jews in need around the world, 'completely agree' – 60%, 21%-31%

SCHOOLS AND HOME ENVIRONMENT

As to be expected, parents typically chose a school for their children that is in keeping with their own values; in most cases there is congruence of the school and home environment.

The Gen17 survey provides scope to compare current attitudes with the self-described religious identification of the home in which respondents were raised. The finding is that of those aged 18-29 who attended an Orthodox school as here aggregated, 86% are from an Orthodox home; of Mount Scopus attendees, the largest proportion (60%) is from a Traditional home, a minority (26%) from a Modern Orthodox home; of non-Orthodox, the largest proportion is from Traditional (36%) or non-practising (21%) home; and of those who did not attend a Jewish school, just 6% are from an Orthodox home and 12% Traditional, with the majority (54%) from a 'Just Jewish' or non-practising home. (Table 12)

The importance of the home environment is indicated in the analysis of attitudes among those who had a common school experience at Mount Scopus. Although they attend the same school, there is a substantial difference in attitude and values between those from a self-described Orthodox or Traditional home and those from a non-Orthodox or non-observant home. For example, sense of being Jewish is 'a central element in my life' is indicated by 36%-39% of those who attended Mount Scopus and were from a Modern Orthodox or Traditional home, 16-22% from a Conservative, Progressive, non-denominational, or secular home. The relative proportions for observing halacha ('very important' or 'fairly important') are 31%-36% and 0%-10%. Importance attached to marrying another Jew ('very important') is 60%-64% and 32%-42%.

In consideration of differentiation of attitudes by category of school attended, it is important to be aware that attitudes are shaped not simply by schooling but may be impacted by the congruence (or dissonance) of the home and the school.

PREFERENCES FOR JEWISH EDUCATION

All respondents were asked for their school preference, in response to the question 'whether or not you have children, do you feel it is preferable for Jewish children to attend a school that is Jewish or non-Jewish or do you have no preference either way?'

Among respondents aged 18-49, 71% indicated 'strong preference' or 'some preference' for a primary Jewish school, with almost the same proportion (72%) indicating preference for a Jewish high school.

When survey data was analysed by the respondent's school attended, substantial difference in response was indicated. 'Strong preference' or 'some preference' for a Jewish high school was at 92% among those who attended an Orthodox secondary school, a lower 85% among those who attended Mount Scopus, 68% non-Orthodox, and 49% who did not attend a Jewish school. With attention narrowed to 'strong preference', the relative proportions were 82%, 60%, 45%, and 32%.

A second question asked respondents with at least one child under the age of 12 for their current plans for their children's education. Given the small sample, as few respondents under the age of 40 have children of that age, it is not possible to disaggregate analysis by school attended.

Of all respondents, 64% indicated 'yes, definitely' or 'yes, probably' that they planned to send their child to a Jewish high school, 24% 'no, probably not' or 'no, definitely not', and 12% that they were undecided. (Figure 1)

Among those whose marriage partner was not Jewish, there was a markedly lower preference for children to attend a Jewish school. Just 18% indicated that they planed 'definitely' or 'probably' for their child to attend a Jewish high school, 67% 'probably not' or 'definitely not', with 16% 'undecided'. (Figure 4)

This finding is significant in the context of the gradual increase in intermarriage in the Jewish population.

AFFORDABILITY OF JEWISH EDUCATION

A question on affordability of Jewish education was asked of respondents with children.

Respondents had the option of indicating if school fees were a minor or major problem. They were provided with five options: the cost was 'well within' their financial capacity, 'entails some sacrifices', 'significant financial sacrifices', 'major financial sacrifices' or was 'beyond their household's capacity.'

The combined top three responses indicating difficulty – 'beyond capacity', 'major' or 'significant' financial sacrifice – was indicated by 31% for childcare, 27% for pre-school, and a much higher 50% for school.

Respondents aged 18-49 with school age children were asked if 'the cost of school fees ever prevented you sending one or more children to a Jewish day school?'; 12% indicated that they never considered sending a child to Jewish school; 34% of all respondents aged 18-49, or 39% of those who did consider the option of a Jewish school, indicated that they had been prevented by cost. (Table 18)

Of those aged 18-49 with school age children who identify as Strictly Orthodox, only 3% indicated that they had been prevented by the cost of fees from sending one or more children to a Jewish school, but larger proportions at 22% of Modern Orthodox, 40% Traditional, and 56% who identify as 'Just Jewish' or of no denomination. This pattern of response is likely explained not by differing financial capacity within the denominations, but by the extent of commitment to Jewish schooling and willingness to prioritise and make sacrifices; an additional factor may be a greater willingness to apply for fee subsidies, and the greater availability of subsidies in some schools.

HOW SCHOOL FEES ARE PAID

Respondents were asked how they meet the cost of school fees in a multiple response question that provided scope to indicate all sources of funding, in recognition of the reality that many parents access more than one funding source: 67% percent of respondents aged 18-49 with children currently in a Jewish school indicated that they pay fees from their personal or household income, 9% obtained a bank loan, 25% received a means-tested subsidy from their school, and 19% obtained financial support from family members.

ADVANTAGES AND DISADVANTAGES OF JEWISH EDUCATION

Respondents were asked to indicate the perceived advantages and disadvantages of a Jewish education, in two questions that presented a combined 31 response options.

Of these, one response stood out for many respondents: among respondents aged 18-29, the disadvantage of high cost was indicated by a total of 44% across the full sample, but there was a marked difference by Jewish school attend: high cost was indicated by 49% of those who attended an Orthodox school, 68% Mount Scopus, 45% non-Orthodox, and 25% of those who did not attend a Jewish school.

A substantial proportion (30%) of attendees of a non-Orthodox school indicated the disadvantage of 'lack of ethnic and cultural diversity', compared to 17% of those who did not attend a Jewish school, 8% Mount Scopus and 6% Orthodox. While 3%-4% of those who attended a Jewish school indicated that a disadvantage was that Jewish schools were 'too elitist', a relatively high proportion at 14% did so among those who did not attend a Jewish school. (Table 21)

There was a large measure of agreement across the different schools that the main advantages of Jewish education were that it 'strengthens Jewish identity', selected by 22%-25%, provision of 'strong Jewish education', particularly indicated by those who attended an Orthodox school (33%), and fostering of 'a sense of belonging to the Jewish community' (13%-27%). A relatively high proportion of Mount Scopus attendees indicated the advantage of developing 'Jewish friendships and networks' (20%). (Table 20)

RELIGIOUS IDENTIFICATION

In a general question, respondents were asked if they are more or less religiously observant than they were five years ago.

As to be expected, the survey found that identity is more changeable in the younger age group. Among respondents aged 18-29, 26%-35% indicated that their level of observance has not changed over the last five years, compared to 45%-64% among those aged 30-49.

Of those who indicate change in religious observance, among the younger respondents more have become less observant. Among attendees of an Orthodox school, 26% are more observant, 37% less observant, a difference of 11%; Mount Scopus, 23% more, 29% less, a difference of 6%; non-Orthodox, 16% more, 23% less, a difference of 7%. (Figure 11)

Further insight into pattern of change across the generations is provided by two questions that asked respondents to indicate the identification of the home in which they grew up and their current religious identification.

The survey finds a consistent pattern of marginally lessened identification with Orthodox or Traditional Judaism and increase in the proportion who are no longer practising.

Of those aged 18-29 who attended an Orthodox school, 53% now identify as Modern Orthodox, down from 60% growing up; among those who attended Mount Scopus, 54% now identify as Traditional, down from 60% growing up.

Among the non-Orthodox school group and those who did not attend a Jewish school, change is best indicated by the descriptor non-practising, as relatively few indicate that they are from Orthodox or Traditional homes. Of those who attended a non-Orthodox school, 21% indicated that growing up their home was non-practising, 38% now identify as non-practising; among those who did not attend a Jewish school, 40% were from a non-practising home, 51% now identify as non-practicing.

Less change is indicated by those aged 30-49; of those who attended an Orthodox school, there is a marginal increase in the proportion indicating that they are now of no denomination, increased from less than 1% growing up to 5% today; of attendees of Mount Scopus, 63% describe their home growing up as Traditional, 52% today. (Table 23)

RELIGIOUS PRACTICE

In questions related to Jewish practice and rituals, consistent patterns differentiate the schools.

Always participating in a Sabbath meal with family or friends was indicated by 87% of those aged 18-29 who attended an Orthodox school, 71% Mount Scopus, 67% non-Orthodox and 32% of those who did not attend a Jewish school. Purchase of only kosher meat for the home was indicated by 87% of those who attended an Orthodox school, a lower 33% Mount Scopus, 20% non-Orthodox, and 6% of those who did not attend a Jewish school. Lower proportions in each group eat kosher meat outside of the home. (Figure 25)

A quarter of 18-29 year old Orthodox school attendees go to synagogue once a week, a further 14% several times a week and 12% every day, a total of 51%. Of Mount Scopus attendees aged 18-29, 21% attend synagogue at least once a week, this drops by half to 5% of the 30-49 year old. 71% of this group only attend on special occasions or on high holidays; 19% of those aged 18-29 who attended a non-Orthodox school and 10% who did not attend a Jewish school indicated synagogue attendance at least once a week. (Table 35)

The highest level of observance across the groups is indicated for participation in a Passover seder, indicated by more than 90% who attended a Jewish school and 68%-72% of those who did not. (Table 34)

JEWISH IDENTITY

The survey included two general questions on current Jewish identity. Respondents were asked 'Which of the following best expresses your sense of being Jewish?', with five response options specified: 'being Jewish is a central element of my life', 'a significant element of my life', 'limited to taking part in some communal or family activities', 'of little importance to me,' and of 'no importance to me'.

Among respondents aged 18-29, the proportion indicating 'central' or 'significant' was 97% among those who attended an Orthodox school, 89% Mount Scopus, 90% non-Orthodox, and 75% among those who did not attend a Jewish school, with a similar pattern indicated by the older age group.

At the strongest level of identification, that being Jewish was a 'central element' in life, greater differentiation is indicated: among those aged 18-29, 'central element' was indicated by 67% of those who attended an Orthodox school, 39% Mount Scopus, 34% non-Orthodox, and 25% of those who did not attend a Jewish school; there was a similar distribution of attitudes among the older age group.

Very few indicated that their Jewish identity was of limited, little, or of no importance; among respondents aged 18-29, 3% of those who attended an Orthodox school, 10%-11% of those who attended Mount Scopus or a non-Orthodox school, and a substantially larger 25% of those who did not attend a Jewish school. (

A second general question asked respondents if they agreed or disagreed with the statement: 'I am proud to be a Jew?' There was less differentiation in response to this question when the two levels of agreement, 'completely' and 'somewhat' were aggregated – more than 90% across all school groups and across both age groups indicated agreement. Very few respondents indicated disagreement, in the range 1%-3% of those who attended a Jewish school, 6% who did not. The strongest level of response, 'completely agree', was indicated by 86% of attendees aged 18-29 of an Orthodox school, 89% Mount Scopus, 76% non-Orthodox, and 63% of those who did not attend a Jewish school. (Table 25)

ATTITUDES TOWARDS INTERMARRIAGE

Two questions on attitude towards intermarriage were asked. One considered general attitude to intermarriage, the second was personalised with respect to the respondent's own children, although it is a hypothetical question for respondents without children.

The first question was worded: 'Some people are concerned about Jews marrying non-Jews, while others are not. To what extent, if at all, are you personally concerned or unconcerned about intermarriage in Australia?' Four response options were provided: 'very concerned', 'concerned', 'unconcerned', and 'very unconcerned'.

Responses were sharply divided by school attended. Of those aged 18-29, 'very concerned' or 'concerned' was indicated by a combined 77% of those who attended an Orthodox school (40% 'very concerned'), 69% Mount Scopus (19% 'very concerned'), 49% non-Orthodox (7% 'very concerned'), and a much lower 24% of those who did not attend a Jewish school (10% 'very concerned'). (Table 36)

With reference to the marriage of 'one of your children,' surprisingly there was a lower level of negative response. This finding possibly indicates disposition to accept the marriage choices of children, especially among young respondents without children who were answering a hypothetical question. 'Very considerable regret' was indicated by 49% of those aged 18-29 who attended an Orthodox school; 16% Mount Scopus; 10% non-Orthodox, and 9% who did not attend a Jewish school. The combined proportions for 'very considerable' and 'some' regret by school were 70%, 39%, 29%, and 15% respectively. (Table 37)

FRIENDSHIPS

Of those who attended a Jewish school and are aged 18-29, close to 90% indicated that 'all' or 'more than half' of their close friends are Jewish: this comprised 93% of those who attended an Orthodox school, 89% Mount Scopus, and 89% of those who attended a non-Orthodox school.

There was again a substantial difference with those who did not attend a Jewish school. Of those aged 18-29, just 24% indicated that 'all' or 'more than half' of their close friends are Jewish, while the majority, 53%, indicated that 'less than half' or 'none' of their close friends was Jewish. 39% of this group also felt unconnected to Jewish communal life, compared to 5% Orthodox, 6% Mount Scopus and 4% non-Orthodox. (Table 38 and 40)

ANTISEMITISM

Respondents were asked a series of questions on the seriousness and experience of antisemitism in Australia. Relatively little difference in response was found among the different schools.

In response to a question that asked respondents if they had witnessed any antisemitic incidents in the last twelve months, physical attack was rarely witnessed or experienced, indicated by 2% or less.

But experience of harassment was indicated by a substantial minority. Witnessing of incidents of verbal insult or harassment by those in the 18-29 year age group was indicated by 30% of those who attended an Orthodox school, 11% Mount Scopus, 21% non-Orthodox, and 24% who did not attend a Jewish school.

There is a large degree of commonality in appraisal of the significance of antisemitism among the different schools; in the age group 18-29, a substantial minority are of the view that antisemitism is a 'very big' or 'fairly big' problem, in the range 31%-46%. A larger proportion, in the range 45%-65%, view antisemitism as 'not a very big problem', with the highest proportion among those who attended a non-Orthodox school. (Table 41)

However, when asked if antisemitic content is a 'very big' or 'fairly big' problem on social media and other internet sites, a large majority agree, in the range 74%-82% among those aged 18-29.

Among those aged 18-29, Facebook is by a large margin the social media platform on which antisemitism is most likely to have been encountered, indicated in the range 76%-89%. Among those aged 30-49, antisemitic content is most likely to have been encountered on Twitter, in the range 61%-71%. (Table 45)

ZIONISM

Respondents were asked if they regarded themselves as a Zionist, in a question that was worded:

> Although there are different opinions about what the term Zionism means, in general, do you consider yourself to be a Zionist?

The majority of respondents in each school group indicated that they regarded themselves as a Zionist, with some variation by school attended, and consistently higher proportion in the younger age group.

Of those aged 18-29, 90% of those who attended Mount Scopus responded 'yes', just 2% 'no' and 8% did not know. The proportion responding yes was 80% for Orthodox, 78% non-Orthodox, and a lower 62% among those who did not attend a Jewish school, with a high 28% responding 'no'.

Among those aged 30-49, a marginally lower proportion indicated that they regarded themselves as Zionists, 71% Orthodox school, 75% Mount Scopus, and a significantly lower 54% who did not attend a Jewish school. (Table 47)

ISRAEL CONNECTEDNESS

For a large majority within the Melbourne Jewish population, Zionism is not an abstract concept but a central element in their lives. Most have visited Israel, typically on a number of occasions, have friends and relatives living in Israel, and keep up to date with events impacting on Israel. Concern for the security of Israel is the immediate issue that more than any other unifies a community which in many other respects is divided in attitude, observances and other aspects of behaviour.

Almost all respondents indicated that they have visited Israel at least once: well over 90% among those who had attended a Jewish school, a lower 68% who did not. Further, a substantial majority had lived in Israel or had spent considerable time on visits.

Of those who had visited Israel and were aged 18-29, a substantial proportion who attended a Jewish school had spent at least four months in Israel: 81% Orthodox, 63% Mount Scopus, 65% non-Orthodox, and a lower 46% who did not attend a Jewish school.

Among the respondents aged 18-29, more than half from each school grouping have close friends living in Israel, with the proportion ranging from 82% Orthodox, 66%-69% Mount Scopus and non-Orthodox, and 52% who did not attend a Jewish school. There was a similar pattern with regard to family living in Israel but indicated by a marginally lower proportion.

Level of personal interest and emotional identification with Israel was indicated in questions that asked respondents the extent to which they kept up with events involving Israel, their level of concern when Israel is in danger, and their feeling of responsibility to ensure that Israel continues to exist.

With regard to keeping up with current events which involve Israel, those who indicated a lack of interest are a very small minority: less than 3% of those who attended a Jewish school indicated that they did not keep up with events in Israel 'at all', 9%-10% of those who did not attend. A substantial majority indicated 'a lot' and 'quite a lot' of interest, in the range 52%-70% among those aged 18-29, 50%-57% aged 30-49. (Table 51)

With regard to international events that put Israel in danger, the majority of respondents who attended a Jewish school selected the response options that indicated concern that was 'almost the same as if my own life was in danger' or 'a special alarm', with little difference by age group: 79% (aged 18-29)-80% (30-49) of attendees of an Orthodox school, 65%-72% of Mount Scopus, 59% non-Orthodox, and 46%-58% of those who did not attend a Jewish school. (Table 52)

In response to the proposition that 'I feel a sense of responsibility to ensure that the State of Israel continues to exist', a significant finding is that more than 80% (in the range 83%-88%) of attendees of Jewish schools in both age groups indicated agreement, and a substantial majority, in the range 68%-79%, among those who did not attend a Jewish school. (Table 53)

ISRAEL – PEACE AND POLITICS

Responses to four propositions about Israeli society and three propositions about the peace process found substantial critical views, with negative sentiment consistently higher among those aged 18-29. The highest proportion in agreement with a critical view was amongst those who attended a non-Orthodox school or did not attend a Jewish school.

The proposition that 'there is too much corruption in Israel's political system' obtains majority agreement among those aged 18-29 across the different schools, in the range 51%-63%, and in the range 43%-51% among those aged 30-49.

The proposition that 'Orthodox Judaism has too much influence in Israel' obtains agreement in the range 62%-76% among those aged 18-29 who attended Mount Scopus, a non-Orthodox school and those who did not attend a Jewish school, a minority at 29% among Orthodox school attendees.

The proposition that 'democracy in Israel is alive and well' finds majority agreement across the two age groups among those who attended an Orthodox school (79%, 70%) and Mount Scopus (60%, 70%), also a majority or close to a majority agreement among those who did not attend a Jewish school (47%, 68%), but not among attendees of a non-Orthodox school, with agreement among those aged 18-29 at 33%, disagreement at 50%.

Regarding statements concerning the peace process, there is a divide between those who attended an Orthodox school or Mount Scopus, on the one hand, and non-Orthodox and those who did not attend a Jewish school on the other.

Thus the proposition that 'Israel should give up territory in exchange for guarantees of peace with the Palestinians' finds minority agreement among respondents aged 18-29 from an Orthodox school (24%) and Mount Scopus (47%), but a substantial majority among non-Orthodox (70%) and those who did not attend a Jewish school (69%), with agreement consistently higher among the younger age group. (Table 54)

ALIYAH

A final question asked 'how likely is it that you will choose to live permanently in Israel in the future?'

The highest proportion at 16% indicating 'very likely' was in the younger age group and among attendees of an Orthodox school; the proportion for other schools was below 10%.

'Not at all likely' among those aged 18-29 was indicated by 19% of those who attended an Orthodox school, 33%-38% Mount Scopus and non-Orthodox, and 46% of those who did not attend a Jewish school. (Table 56)

PART 1

THE JEWISH SCHOOLS OF MELBOURNE

When Holocaust survivors arrived in Australia after World War II, they were committed to reviving the intense Jewish life they had known in pre-war Europe. Most did not turn their backs on Judaism, despite the horrific experiences they had endured; they were committed to giving their children a Jewish education and strong Jewish identity.

Mount Scopus Memorial College, Melbourne's first post-war Jewish day school, opened in 1949 with an enrolment of 120, and reached a peak of more than 2,600 in the mid-1980s. Although the school was set up to serve the community, a succession of ideologically diverse day schools were soon established in competition with Mount Scopus. Although originally limited to primary education, over time they developed to Year 12, with the exception of Sholem Aleichem.

The first of these schools, in the 1950s, were the ultra-orthodox Adass Israel (1953) and the Chabad established Yeshivah-Beth Rivkah Colleges (1955-56), a day school for boys and girls respectively. In 1962 the Modern Orthodox Mizrachi organisation established Yavneh College as a religious Zionist school. Bialik College, a pluralist Zionist school, began as a day school in 1963, building on the foundations of the Bialik Sunday school and kindergarten founded in 1942 in North Carlton. In 1975 the Yiddish speaking community established the Sholem Aleichem kindergarten and primary school, in succession to two part-time Yiddish schools with their origins in the Sunday and afternoon I.L. Peretz school which first opened in 1935. In 1978 the Progressive Jewish community's King David School opened, firstly at the primary school level. [1] These eight competing day schools formed an ambitious Jewish educational enterprise within the relatively small Melbourne Jewish community, which was further augmented in the early twenty-first century, when three breakaway orthodox schools were established

Apart from the Jewish day school movement, a number of children attend supplementary Jewish education programs. These are run under the auspices of the United Jewish Education Board (UJEB), conducted in several State schools with a large Jewish enrolment and include Hebrew language tuition and Jewish studies lessons, and through a variety of synagogue programs such as Spiritgrow or Hamerkaz, or Hebrew language schools.

School enrolment data indicates that in 2006 the total Victorian Jewish day school population was 5,040. Twelve years later, in 2018, the Victorian Jewish school population had increased marginally to 5,313, a growth of 5.4%.

New South Wales, which has an estimated Jewish population of 47,800, almost as large as Victoria's estimated Jewish population of 54,735, has a substantially lower Jewish school attendance, 3,443 in 2018, up marginally from 3,312 in 2006, an increase of 1%. In other words, the New South Wales Jewish population is 13% lower than Victoria's, but its Jewish school population is 35% lower.

[1] Paul Forgasz and Miriam Munz, 'The jewel in the crown of Jewish education in Australia', in Helena Miller, Lisa Grant, Alex Pomson (eds.), International Handbook of Jewish Education, Part 2, Springer, 2011, pp, 1125-1140

There are five Jewish day schools: Moriah College, with an enrolment of 1,427 students; Emanuel School (827), Masada College (537), Kesser Torah College (316), and Mount Sinai College (286). The lower enrolment is explained by several factors, including the option of a larger number of selective Government schools in Sydney, a lower level of religious observance, including a relatively small ultra-Orthodox community in Sydney.

In other Australian states, enrolments between 2006 and 2018 declined from 676 to 489, a fall of 187 (28%). This decline is partly explained by the closing of two Jewish schools, one on the Gold Coast in Queensland in 2008 and the other in Adelaide in 2011, leaving just two day schools outside Melbourne and Sydney, the Carmel School in Perth (enrolment 459) and the small Sinai College, which offers classes to Year 5, in Brisbane (enrolment 30).

Table 3 shows the changes in enrolments in Jewish day schools in Australia over the twelve-year period to 2018. The data does not include kindergarten enrolments, as there is no official census, nor uniform method of calculation. Some Jewish schools offer sessional kindergarten and some offer transition to kindergarten, as well as creche where children under the age of three attend.

A second data source on enrolments is the Australian census, which includes a three-fold classification of school attended: Government, Catholic and Private or Independent. The problem with reliance on the census is that it is not possible to identify the total Jewish school population as the religion question is optional and is not answered by all. The best available estimate indicates that between 2006 and 2016, the total Jewish population in Victoria grew from an estimated 51,682 to 54,735, an increase of 6%. Over these years, according to the census, the Jewish school age population (aged 5-18 years) increased by an enumerated 16% and an estimated 21% between 2006-2016.

The census indicates that an increasing proportion of Jewish children attend a Government school. The increase is particularly evident at the primary school level. Between 2006 and 2016 at primary level for ages 5 to 11, the proportion attending a Government school increased from 30% to 38%; at high school level, aged 12 to 18, a lower but also increasing proportion attend a Government school, 20% in 2006 and 24% in 2016. # JEWISH EDUCATIONAL PROVISION IN 2019

Education within the ultra-Orthodox community is provided by the Adass Israel School. Today the school's population is close to 500 students who study in separate girls' and boys' streams. The main focus of the school is the study of Jewish text and ritual. The Adass Israel community is an insular and self-sufficient group, furthered by the use of the Yiddish language as the language of daily communication and instruction within the boys' school. Children are raised without access to television, internet, radio or general newspapers. From a young age, usually around 8, boys and girls are kept separate outside the family home. Most of the school students leave during Year 11 to spend some years studying Jewish text in special institutions of higher learning – Yeshivot, for men, Seminaries for women – in Victoria and overseas. The community neither articulates support for, nor actively supports, the State of Israel, believing in the coming of the Messiah to gather the Jewish people from around the world into the Promised Land.

Yeshivah-Beth Rivkah Colleges teach more than 1000 students and is an integral element of the orthodox Chabad community. The school's ethos is in accordance with the beliefs and philosophy of the Chabad Hasidic movement and is imbued with the religious standards of Chabad Hasidism. The boys' and girls' schools are separate, but in an adjacent facility and managed by the one Principal, at the time of writing by two acting principals. After completing their schooling, which includes a range of VCE subjects, students regularly spend a gap year or two studying Jewish text in a Yeshivah or Seminary. On their return most go on to study at tertiary level to gain a professional qualification. Yeshivah-Beth Rivkah identifies as an inclusive community school – open to the wider community, and because of this, attracts a significant number of families who support the intense Jewish learning offered by the school, but are not personally Chabad Hasidim.

Three breakaway ultra- and strictly-orthodox schools have been recently established in Melbourne.

Yesodei HaTorah College, registered in 2003, is a boys' school serving years Preparatory to Year 12 and has an enrolment of 163. Unlike the ultra-orthodox, Yesodei parents do not reject modernity. The school aims to provide students with intensive Jewish learning coupled with general studies; the teaching is designed to ensure that boys graduate with the textual skills and knowledge to enable them to engage in high-level yeshiva study and independent learning, as well as the grounding to provide the opportunity to train for a professional career. Parents are part of a small, homogenous, strictly observant community.

Divrei Emineh, registered 2012, has a current enrolment of 134 and with classes from Preparatory to Year 7, is a coeducational school, with most of its students at the primary level. It draws its students from the Adass ultra-orthodox community. It is distinctive in its emphasis on the provision of bilingual immersion in both English and Yiddish to both boys and girls.

Cheder Levi Yitzchok, established in 2016 is a Chabad Preparatory to Year 9 school with a current enrolment of 58. It is a Chabad Hasidic school differentiating itself from the Yeshivah school in that it minimises general studies in order to emphasize the study of Jewish text.

Leibler Yavneh College is a Modern Orthodox Zionist school with approximately 570 students from Preparatory to Year 12. It is dedicated to adherence to Torah (Jewish law) and Zionist ideals. It nurtures a strong commitment to Israel and identification with Israel and the Jewish people. The school balances Jewish and general studies and virtually all students go on to attend university or other tertiary institute – often after spending a gap year in Israel. Boys and girls attend class together and participate in activities within the framework of a Modern Orthodox outlook. Mixed gender contact sports are not allowed and prayers are conducted according to Jewish orthodox practice. The majority of Yavneh families are observant, however, the school does include a significant number of families who are not personally orthodox but are attracted to the school's mission and outlook.

Mount Scopus Memorial College has a school population of approximately 1300 students from Preparatory to Year 12. It is a co-educational school which, according to its website, defines its mission in terms of 'providing Jewish learning, values and experiences, within a Modern Orthodox and Zionist framework.' The school aims to enable each student 'to make an informed choice as to the meaning of their Jewish identity.' Year 10 students choose between a nine-week or a six-week program in Israel where they are immersed in the country's history, culture and language. The informal programs offered by the school develop a connection to Israel and to the Australian Jewish community and to Jewish life and learning. Mount Scopus College families come from across the spectrum of the Jewish community, including those not observant of Jewish law. Many families consider themselves traditional Jews.

Bialik College identifies as a cross-communal Zionist school which has an inclusive approach to all streams of Judaism. There are approximately 875 students from Preparatory to Year 12. A pluralist Jewish life is woven into many aspects of the school program, both formally and informally. Every student in Year 10 travels to Israel for a six-week immersion experience, reflecting the school's emphasis on the central role Israel plays in the lives of Bialik students. Bialik families are generally not observant, but the majority are strongly connected to the Jewish community and Israel.

The King David School is affiliated with the Union of Progressive Judaism and has approximately 600 students from Preparatory to Year 12. The school embraces diversity and does not teach one way of being Jewish. As a progressive Jewish school its mission, as stated on its website, includes 'provision of rich opportunities to express values through learning Jewish tradition and observing mitzvot' and encouragement of students 'to openly explore and question their connection to their history and heritage.' It utilises an egalitarian approach, values 'individuality and self-expression' and nurtures 'a strong Australian identity and a close and meaningful relationship with the land and State of Israel.' All schools travel to Israel in Year 10. Israel is seen as central to contemporary Jewish identity and students are encouraged to engage with all facets of Israeli society.

Mount Scopus, Bialik and King David are distinguished by the broad range of subjects and activities that they offer and their state-of-the-art facilities.

Sholem Aleichem College offers classes from kindergarten to Year 6 and has an enrolment of approximately 190 students. It is one of only a handful of schools worldwide that offer Yiddish language instruction. Its philosophy and values are explained in terms of fostering awareness of all aspects of Jewish life with a particular focus on promotion of the Yiddish language and literature, Hebrew language and Jewish culture, with a secular approach to Jewish history, customs, ethics and values. The Sholem Aleichem College Community Education Centre is a new initiative established a decade ago that offers high school students and former students the opportunity to continue to learn Yiddish up to VCE level.

SUPPLEMENTARY JEWISH EDUCATION

In addition to Jewish schools, Jewish education is provided to students in a several State schools in Melbourne.

The United Jewish Education Board (UJEB) is a communal provider of supplementary Jewish education for students in State and Private non-Jewish schools across Victoria. The programs they offer vary in structure and duration, from 30 to 90 minutes, and include classes before school begins, at lunchtime and after school. Jewish Life classes operate in approximately 20 schools around Melbourne. HIP (Hebrew Immersion Program) is a language program which runs in three schools: Caulfield Junior College (80 students), Caulfield South Primary (50), and Gardenvale (30), with programs developing in two others. In the first two schools it runs three times each week before school, in Gardenvale twice each week. A third program teaches Hebrew after school hours at three schools, Coatesville, Tucker Road and Elwood, once each week for 75 minutes, with a total of approximately 50 students. Additionally, there are after-school centres at Bentleigh State school and Caulfield Junior College where Hebrew and Jewish studies are offered for 90 minutes once a week, with a total of 80 students enrolled.[2]

UJEB's high school program, J-Lunch, is available at four schools – Glen Eira College (40 students), McKinnon (30), Brighton (15) and Sandringham (10). UJEB offers a camp at the end of the first semester and between 70 and 100 young people attend. As well, UJEB joins with the Board of Jewish Education in Sydney to send students on a 5-week program in Israel. In 2018, twenty Melbourne students participated, and for 2019, 32 students are enrolled.[3]

In 2018, enrolment in UJEB classes was in the 500-600 range and it is expected that in two years they will reach 1000. UJEB charges for its classes; depending on the number of classes per week, the programs cost between $130 and $450 per term. To supplement revenue from fees the organisation receives donations, which cover approximately 80% of its budget.

Several Chabad synagogues offer supplementary Jewish schooling. Chabad of Glen Eira offers Hebrew Gems where students from State schools and non-Jewish Private schools study Hebrew language and Jewish heritage and history once a week for two hours.[4] There are approximately 80 students who attend the classes in 2018. Chabad Glen Eira also offers a day camp during school vacations and Campteens which is an overnight camp for students from State schools.[5]

The Chabad Hamerkaz Centre in Glenhuntly Road has developed the Lamdeni school to offer weekly after school lessons in Hebrew language, Jewish heritage and history. Lamdeni provides supplementary education to approximately 200 young people, most in the age range 5-12, each week.[6]

In addition to these supplementary Jewish education programs, a number of organisations, including UJEB, Lamdeni, Stand Up, Twelve and Thirteen, the Spiritgrow Centre and other synagogues, including Mizrachi, Caulfield, St Kilda, and TBI, offer Bat- and Bar-Mitzvah learning programs.

SCHOOL FEES

In 2018, close to 66% of Australian students attended Public (Government) Schools, 20% Catholic 15% in Independent (Private). The combined proportion in Catholic and Independent schools is higher at the secondary school level – it is 30% in primary, 41% in secondary.[7]

There is a significant difference in the fees charged by the different sectors: without consideration of additional costs, such as uniforms, camps, excursions, optional classes, and transport, in 2019 the average annual fee in Government schools is $904, Catholic $7,371, and Independent $27,455. [8]

All schools receive funding from both the Commonwealth and the State Governments. This makes Australia unusual, as in the United States there is almost no public funding of Private schools and in Canada and New Zealand the proportion of Government funding of Private schools is much lower than in Australia.

Most of the funding for Australian schools comes from the State Governments. A report on recurrent school expenditure for 2014-2015 indicated that close to 92% of State education funding goes to public schools, compared to just 36% of Commonwealth funding, which allocates most of its funding (64%) to the private sector.[9]

Commonwealth funding is calculated based on the estimated cost to educate a child and is termed the Schooling Resource Standard (SRS). In 2019 the SRS was $11,343 per child in primary school, $14,254 in secondary. On top of that funding, there are loadings for disadvantage.[10] Government schools receive the full amount per child, Private schools obtain a percentage of the full amount depending on the estimated capacity of schools to raise funds from parents and other sources, ranging from 90% of the SRC at the lowest end of the scale to 20% of the SRS at the higher end. While most of the funds of Catholic schools is provided by Government, other Independent schools get most of their funding from fees and private donations.

Since 2001, the relative need of Private schools for recurrent funding is measured according to the Socio-Economic Status (SES) of the school community, using Australian Bureau of Statistics Census data. The SES of Private schools is calculated by linking student residential addresses to the latest Census Collection Districts and then applying an SES Index to obtain an average SES score for each school. It is based on average family income, education and occupational level in the area in which each family lives. Schools with well-off parents have higher SES scores and receive lower base funding per student. The average SES score is 100, and 97% of scores fall between 85 and 125.[11]

SES scores for Jewish schools are indicated in Table 5, they range from 88-89 for the ultra-orthodox and Chabad schools, to 117 for Sholem Aleichem, 120 King David, 121 Leibler Yavneh, 122 Mount Scopus, and 124 Bialik.

Relatively disadvantaged students in Independent schools, including students from non-English speaking backgrounds, those attending a small school, students with a disability, and students with patents in the lower two quartiles of educational advantage, attract additional Government funding, above base recurrent funding. [12]

The Commonwealth and State Government funding received by each Jewish school, as indicated on the My School website, is provided in Table 5. Combined Commonwealth and State funding is $16,989 per student

Schools also receive Commonwealth and State Government funding to cover capital expenditure, which includes buildings, grounds and equipment – not just new construction, but also refurbishment or expansion of existing facilities and replacement of dated material. Between 2015-17 the highest level of Government funded capital expenditure was received by Adass Israel ($1,659,395) and Yeshivah- Beth Rivkah Colleges ($1,498,738). Total capital expenditure, which includes funding from private sources, was at the highest level at King David ($18,216,240), Cheder Levi Yitzchok ($11,149,694), Mount Scopus ($10,223,924), and Yeshivah Beth Rivkah ($7,868,949). A further factor is that education costs increase at a faster rate than the increase in the cost of living – the increase in consumer goods and services, such as transportation, food, and medical care – as calculated by the Consumer Price Index – between June 2015 and June 2019 the CPI increased by 8.2 index points, the education index which includes school fees increased at almost double the rate, by 15.3 points[13]

Indication of fees charged is available for the majority of Jewish schools on their websites, in one additional case fees were provided in response to request for information. Yearly fees for four schools that offer classes from primary to secondary level range from $18,600-$22,580 at primary level to $32,600-$37,880 at senior secondary, in addition to which there a range of levies for transport, security and building. Discounts are provided where more than one child is enrolled in the school, as indicated in Table 7. Fees at Yeshivah-Beth Rivkah Colleges for households with income of less than $350,000 per annum are capped at a percentage of household income, irrespective of the number of children enrolled. Fees at Sholem Aleichem College, which only teaches at the primary level, are in the range $14,495-$16,445. These amounts, however, are only indicative of full fees paid and many parents receive subsidies; some schools have a policy of not turning away any child simply on the basis of cost.

EDUCATIONAL ACHIEVMENT

An important reason for the continuing appeal of the Jewish schools outside the Strictly Orthodox stream of Judaism is the achievement of consistently high academic standards leading to high scores obtained at the university entrant level.

One indication of the level of achievement of the schools is the Index of Community Socio-Educational Advantage (ICSEA), which is a scale that represents relative levels of educational advantage. It is based on research that indicates a strong correlation between the occupation and level of education of parents and the educational achievement of their children. The development of ICSEA involved collecting student family background data with reference to parents' occupation and parents' education, along with consideration of school factors including geographic location. ICSEA does not describe or reflect the wealth of parents of students in a school or the wealth or resources of that school.[14]

The score or value assigned to a school is the average score for all students in the school. The average for all schools is scaled to a score of 1000. Below the average indicates relative educational disadvantage, above indicates relative advantage. ICSEA values range from around 500 (representing extremely disadvantaged backgrounds) to about 1300 (representing schools with students from very advantaged backgrounds).

Data available in 2019 indicates that the ICSEA value of two Jewish schools is below the average: Divrei Emineh at 905 and Adass Israel at 939; Cheder Levi Yitzhok is rated close to the average at 1022 while the remaining schools are above, in the range 1087-1181, with Mount Scopus gaining the highest score by a small margin. (Table 8)

ICSEA also enables comparison of the performance in literacy and numeracy of students in a given school with that of schools serving students with similar backgrounds. A school's ICSEA value is used to select a group of up to 60 schools serving students from statistically similar backgrounds. This is referred to as the statistically similar schools group (SSSG). These schools are located across Australia but, based on ICSEA, their students have similar levels of relative educational advantage. The student population is divided numerically into four equal groups (quartiles) and ranked in terms of educational performance measured against the SSSG. Two schools have a relatively high proportion of students in the bottom quartile: Divrei Emineh (83%), Adass Israel (65%). Eight schools have relatively high proportions in the top quartile, ranging from 70%-80% for Sholem Aleichem, Bialik College, King David, and Mount Scopus, 45%-59% Yesodei HaTorah and Leibler Yavneh, and 36%-43% Yeshivah-Beth Rivkah.

Where data is available, Yeshivah and Beth Rivkah Colleges have been disaggregated.

Results for schools offering classes at VCE level provide a further indicator of performance. VCE performance can be ranked using a range of indicators, including (i) VCE completion; (ii) the median VCE score achieved by students, expressed as a score out of 50, which is the maximum for VCE subjects, and (iii) as a proportion of students obtaining a score of 40 or above, a score which places students in the top 9% in that subject.

VCE completions provide no basis for differentiating between schools, as nearly all students at Jewish high schools satisfactorily complete their VCE studies.

With regard to ranking in terms of median VCE scores and percentage of study scores over 40, among the more than 500 Victorian schools with VCE classes some Jewish schools consistently rank in the top ten, and nearly all rank in the top 50.

In 2015, among schools with VCE enrolments of more than 20 students, of the top ten ranked schools achieving median VCE score and percentage study scores over 40, four were Jewish: Beth Rivkah, Bialik, Mount Scopus, and Yeshivah.[15]

In 2016, Bialik gained first place in Victoria; Yeshivah ranked third; Mount Scopus, fourth; Leibler Yavneh, twelveth, Beth Rivkah and King David, thirteenth; and Yesodei HaTorah within the top 50.[16]

In 2019, seven Jewish schools ranked within the top forty Victorian schools for VCE results, three in the top 10. Among non-Government schools, Bialik ranked second, Mount Scopus ranked third and Beth-Rivkah Ladies College eighth[17]. According to the Australian Jewish News, Bialik has ranked in the top five school list for 21 of the last 22 years.[18]

CHALLENGES FACING JEWISH DAY SCHOOLS

In addition to drawing on the findings of the Gen17 survey, twenty-nine face-to-face interviews were conducted for this report, including seven with school professionals discussed in this section.

School administrators perceive new challenges in a time of rising costs, changing values, security threats, and shift in the demographic profile of the Jewish community. The challenge for the schools is predicting how these trends will affect enrolments. This section identifies six broad challenges facing Jewish day schools. The section that follows explores challenges from a parental perspective.

RISING COSTS

The impact of rising costs is the fundamental issue; school fees need to be understood in the context of rises in the costs of living, which include house prices, taxes and utilities.

The annual rise in school fees is consistently higher than the increase in the Consumer Price Index. Most Jewish schools have an expensive fee structure, in order to provide the best education possible, as well as to enable subsidies to poorer families.

Families struggle to afford housing in the suburbs in which the Jewish population is concentrated, the sought-after Glen Eira and contiguous Local Government Areas. Indicative of cost pressures over recent decades, in 1980 a graduating accountant earned a salary in the range $10,000-$15,000. A modest house in the Jewish area may have cost $36,000, around three times an annual salary. Today a graduating accountant may earn in the range $55,000 - $65,000, but a similar house may cost over $1,000,000, close to twenty times the salary. In 1976 school fees cost $4,000 per annum and Year 12 fees were $15,000. Today, Jewish kindergarten fees may be $20,000 per annum and Year 12 costs $35,000 or higher.

DEMOGRAPHIC CHANGE

Demographic change impacts on the number of Jewish children. Couples are marrying later in life and many defer having children. Many also plan for smaller number of children. Birth rates are highest is the orthodox community, where twenty years ago there were families with 9, 10, 12 or even 14 siblings. Today, families with 4 or 6 children in the Chabad/orthodox schools are more common.

> "What have they done with that extra five or six years of not having a family? Have that generation saved money or just spent it? When they're in the 30's are they going to be able to afford Jewish education or not?"

One school administrator states with reference to the non-orthodox that 'kids aren't marrying. They're not marrying, forget the marrying out.' He gives the example of a 26-year-old who finished Jewish day school nine years ago. Out of her class of 140, perhaps two have married. He supposes that the vast majority of young people up to the age of thirty are not married and regardless of any other impact this might have, they will certainly have children later in life which will result in a gap in enrolments. 'It will be interesting to play out. What have they done with that extra five or six years of not having a family? ... Have that generation saved money or just spent it? ... It will be interesting when they're in the 30's are they going to be able to afford Jewish education or not?'

While age at marriage is increasing, another demographic factor with potential impact on the affordability of schooling is life expectancy. People are living longer, so transmission of wealth across the generations is delayed, or it is much reduced, as the older generation draw on their savings to sustain them late in life. In this context many grandparents are not able to assist with school fees to the extent of earlier generations.

A further demographic factor relates to family composition, in the context of increase in the divorce rate since the early 1970s. Each of the school administrators raised the issue of split families. Single parents may be left to raise children on their own, struggling just to make ends meet. One school financial officer commented on the plight of newly single mothers who have 'been out of the work force because they've had kids, then struggling through a divorce, they're already in their mid-30s and they've got young kids, they've got to be back for school pick-up… What hope do they have of getting ahead? They're always living on that poverty line.'

Another school administrator discussed the complications of dealing with divorced parents: 'It's the amount of time and effort it takes my department to deal with families like that in a compassionate way, in a deserving way.' Once parents are divorced, their income is divided between two households, 'what we find often is that … parents fight over money, but also fight over how important it is to keep their children here.' One parent might decide that it's no longer as important or that they simply cannot justify keeping their child at the school for financial reasons. At a time when the school is possibly their only stable environment, it is difficult for the children to have to leave, so a lot of time goes into finding a way to provide assistance.

> "What we find often is that [divorced] parents … fight over how important it is to keep their children here."

OPTIONS

The cost of sending children to Jewish day schools is not the only issue with potential impact on enrolments in Jewish day schools. It is recognised that some parents are keen for their children to feel part of the broader and more diverse Australian society, to have experiences which they perceive to be lacking in Jewish day schools. They themselves are often graduates of the Jewish schools, but reason that their children should grow and be educated with a wider perspective than was provided by their schooling.

Some parents plan to send their children to Jewish kindergartens, given that kindergarten costs are similar to those charged by non-Jewish providers, but then move them into State primary schools and have them re-enter the Jewish schools for secondary education. An increase in enrolments is seen at Years 5, 6 and 7 in some schools, as parents see a benefit to settling their children in upper-primary prior to Bat- and Bar-Mitzvah. 'There's a great interest in those year levels for secondary…the reason being networking, Jewish programs, Jewish informal studies and academic results.'

On discussing this trend, one bursar commented: 'I think we will see a trend, between Prep and Year Five and Six … where people will not send their children to a Jewish day school for those years. They like Kinder, because it's a good way to playfully introduce Judaism, and then Primary is considered less important … A lot of them say 'we chose not to for financial reasons' and that is often because they want to prioritise for other things.'

> I think we will see a trend, between Prep and Year Five and Six … where people will not send their children to a Jewish day school for those years. They like Kinder, because it's a good way to playfully introduce Judaism, and then Primary is considered less important.

The availability of good local Government primary schools with a large proportion of Jewish students presents a challenge for the Jewish schools. Reflecting on the experience of his school, an administrator noted that 'You can see our numbers at kinder are strong and there's a real dip at Prep, 1, 2, 3, and then it starts to pick up 4, 5, 6 and then it jumps … It's understandable, you've got great State schools within the zone.'

ABSORBING THOSE WHO RETURN

With this pattern of enrolment, where students attend Government schools for most of the primary years, the schools face the problem of integrating those who return. This may entail the need to provide beginner's Hebrew classes; one administrator commented that 'we get a few kids who come with no aleph-bet whatsoever.' Some have no background in Jewish studies, others have attended supplementary classes.

SHIFT IN VALUES AND PRIORITIES

At a broad level, the problem is that there is an ongoing shift in the value placed on a Jewish education. This is not an issue for the vast majority of orthodox families for whom there is no question of choice, but many in the less observant community do not prioritise a Jewish education in the context of the financial pressures they face. One school administrator commented that past generations 'felt that prioritising a Jewish education, a Jewish day school, over other expenditure was greater and more important to them than it is today.'

There is a view among administrators that many parents could find a way to meet the cost of fees, even if it entailed borrowing money, but they decide that they can do better for their family by devoting their resources elsewhere. In the words of one bursar, 'The main change over time is that people value Jewish education differently. Now obviously fees have gone up and its expensive, there's no doubt about that, but in terms of priorities in life, people felt that prioritising a Jewish education, a Jewish day school, over other expenditure was greater and more important to them than it is today.'

> The main change over time is that people value Jewish education differently… people felt that prioritising a Jewish education… over other expenditure was greater and more important to them than it is today.

PARENTS' PERCEPTIONS OF JEWISH SCHOOLING

In addition to interviews with school professionals, twenty-two parents were interviewed about the decisions they are making or have made regarding to their children's schooling. Interviews were audio recorded, transcribed and analysed for key issues and themes. In the following discussion, contextual details, including names, have been withheld to prevent identification of individuals.

The parents interviewed were asked about their own Jewish background and education and that of their partner; their past involvement in youth movements; the Jewish influences in their childhood and adolescent years; and the extent of their contact with Israel. The major focus was on the education they planned for their children. Interviewees were asked to consider reasons for and against sending children to a Jewish day school. They were asked to comment on viewpoints within their friendship groups and the views of their contemporaries. The parents sending their children to Jewish day school were asked about the sacrifices that they have to make, whether grandparents help with school fees, and whether they are prepared to accept fee assistance from the schools.

Analysis of the parent interviews indicated four broad attitudinal profiles concerning the education of children.

1. 'We cannot afford it'

The first group are those who have decided against sending children to a Jewish school for financial reasons. Some literally cannot afford the fees now and they know that fees will only increase: 'it's a commitment throughout your kid's life … Fees are going to go up and you're looking at 12, 13 years of ever-increasing fees.'

The issue evident in nearly all discussions is that school fees are unaffordable for families who earn the average Australian salary, which in May 2018 was $86,000. Even if their Jewish school of choice offers a half fee subsidy, for many the cost remains unaffordable. One parent reflected:

> [We have] three kids. Even at half price it's about seventeen to eighteen grand per kid, [and that is after tax]. Where am I going to find a spare $75,000? Where? We have reached a situation where unless you have wealthy parents or unless you are earning huge money, it is beyond reach. Think of where we are if we are both teachers, think of two Jewish parents, who are teachers, and can't send their kids to a Jewish day school. Can't do it.

Some parents who had sacrificed to send their children to a Jewish school, or had seen the sacrifice of their parents, were left with very negative memories. In the words of one parent, 'it was financially very hard for us. It was probably too ambitious … We could not make more sacrifices. There's nowhere that we can spend less other than completely stepping outside the community and living a very different sort of life.' They had not purchased a new car for 15 years, nor had family vacations, had no home help, and were left with a $60,000 debt through school fees.

Some who witnessed the impact of fees on their parents simply couldn't justify following the same course: '…from personal experience, having seen two parents incredibly stressed, I wasn't prepared to follow that.' One parent who listed cost as the biggest reason in her decision explained that 'I saw my parents compromise so much for this education… and I don't know if my life would be any different had they not compromised that insane amount of money. I wonder if the benefits of those hundreds of thousands of dollars could have been better spent in our lives in general.'

Many in this group are driven by a different motivation to their parents; they prioritise owning their home, or only working part-time to spend more time with their young children. Some are influenced by different lifestyle choices than the ones made by their parents. One commented that 'it's very typical of my generation to 'kinda want to have it all' and we don't want to necessarily just work to pay school fees, we want to go on holidays and all of that.' One parent envied a friend with children at a Government school who was able to take the family to Israel for Pesach.

> "I saw my parents compromise so much for this education…I wonder if the benefits of those hundreds of thousands of dollars could have been better spent in our lives in general."

Within this group there are those who know that they can apply for reduced or waived fees but are uncomfortable asking for support and prefer not to go through the process involving assessment, and regular reassessment, of their financial situation. 'We're not comfortable asking for help…because then we have to explain ourselves on every level, and we're very private people, we're proud people.' Another parent commented that 'nobody wants to ask for a handout … [We are] embarrassed to ask,' and expressed concern about possible future interference in their lives: 'I've heard stories about families who have asked for support. They get support and if they want to take a holiday, it gets a bit tricky.'

In June 2018 Becci Krispin, a young mother, wrote a carefully reasoned article about the cost of Jewish schooling, published in J-Wire and posted on social media.[19] She argued that 'school fees in the majority of JDS [Jewish day schools] have become completely unaffordable for a large part of the Jewish population in Melbourne.' She and her Israeli born husband reached the decision that:

> Paying full fees for a Private JDS was out of the question. Our after-tax income simply cannot accommodate a total cost of between $340,000 – $390,000 per child (in fees and levies at four of the main JDSs) plus extras, for Prep to Year 12.

The compromise was to send her children to a local Government primary school and to educate her children Jewishly through the supplementary system, home Hebrew lessons and maintaining a traditional home environment. They did not want 'to compromise … basic financial security as a family because of Jewish day school fees.' But Becci concedes that 'in all of the hours they spend at school, they are not learning even a tiny bit about their own history, culture, language, community or connection to Israel.' That is obviously important to her and negates the assumption that all parents who send their children to Government schools are not wanting a Jewish education for their children. Becci calls for 'finding ways that the community can cooperate to ensure an affordable and suitable Jewish day school education for every child and family that wants it.'

In one interview, a parent compared the high cost of Jewish schooling to Catholic schools and argued that 'if it cost the same as the Catholic schools, you'd find a way to make it work. Because there is the perceived benefit of the private education and you'd find a way to make it work. But it's just not possible, it's not even worth contemplating.'

2. The primary school years: 'wait and see and in the meantime save'

Most of the parents interviewed sent their children to Jewish kindergartens. The reasoning was simple, working parents require full-time day care and there was no option but to meet the fees. As they were paying a fee then it was better to find a Jewish provider, as long as the cost was similar to other providers; 'if you want a long day care you have to go private and you just don't have a lot of choices. So if you're gonna spend the money … you go to a Jewish one'; 'if your options are between long day care and Jewish kinder, your cost is roughly the same… so people are more likely to choose a Jewish kinder because they're not massively out of pocket compared to their other options.'

None of the parents raised the issue of costs involved in sending their children to kindergartens and early learning centres, even though after the Government rebate they are still expensive. For a private, early learning centre, which is usually full-time, the annual fee ranges from $21,000 to $24,000. This is, however, substantially offset in most cases by the new means-tested Government Child Care Subsidy. The level of subsidy a family receives depends on three factors: combined family income, the number of hours of approved activity of the parent (such as paid work), and the type of approved child care service used. A low-income family (combined household income of up to $68,163) may receive a subsidy of 85% of the childcare fee charged up to an hourly rate of $11.98, a higher income family (combined income of $173,163 - $252,453) a subsidy of 50%, with no subsidy where income exceeds $352,453.[20]

But beyond the kindergarten a number of interviewees indicated that they had sent their children to a Government school at primary level, but kept open the option of a Jewish high school. One parent reasoned that 'if we spend these primary school years saving, paying off our mortgage, then we might be in a position to send them to a Jewish high school.'

> "If we spend these primary school years saving, paying off our mortgage, then we might be in a position to send them to a Jewish high school."

For many parents still weighing up their options, the decision came down to a cost/benefit calculation. One interviewee indicated that 'sometimes we say, 'how much more would they get, at a Jewish school, for the amount of money?' How do you measure? I don't quite know what the measure is. Is it the degree of Jewish study knowledge that your child ends up with at the end? Is it the sense of community that you're given?'

One parent, whose children will be starting Prep next year, explained her thinking: 'The biggest consideration is financial for us as a family and if you're going to choose – if you say 'it's too much to commit to sending your kids to JDS for their entire school career' then you've got to choose when do you do it? When is more important? Is it primary, is it high school? Is it half of primary? I don't know.'

One mother, with two children at a local Government primary school explains: 'our philosophy is to see how our kids go and if they thrive in this environment. And if they don't, we might then consider Private schooling and making certain sacrifices and taking on more stress.'

Many made it clear that it would be much better to enrol in a Jewish day school when the financial circumstances allowed for it, instead of having their finances reviewed by the school annually. 'You don't want to pull them out because you can't afford it, you'd prefer to put them in when you can.'

> "You don't want to pull them out because you can't afford it, you'd prefer to put them in when you can."

Several parents spoke of their plan to send their children to a Jewish school when they reached high school age. One commented:

> There's definitely value in a Jewish schooling. If you said to me, is it worth 15 years of fees? No! If you said, is it worth three years of fees? Yes! Where does the see-saw tip? For me, somewhere between 3 and 6 years but not more … I'm not sure that it's worth $240,000 when it means sacrificing or giving up or compromising so many other things in one's life … I think the value increases towards the end of school. Which is why I think there is almost no value in Jewish primary school.

In the view of one interviewee, the most difficult situation was faced by the majority of parents whose financial status was in-between, who did not have the income to make school fees easily affordable, but also did not have such low income that they would directly qualify for subsidies fees:

> A very small percentage [are] … in that bracket of people who are extremely wealthy, who basically can afford to do all those things plus send their kids to a Jewish school. … [Then there is] that percentage of people who really are very low earners and can go to the school and show their finances inside out and the school can recognise, 'Yes, actually you can't afford it so were going to help you'. But the people who are in between, who I'm imagining are the biggest chunk of people. … either don't feel comfortable asking or … can't justify asking because you feel like 'oh there are people worse off than me and yes, I guess if I do scrounge a bit here and scrounge a bit there we can pay for it, but then we can't really pay off our house, or we can't live in Caulfield, or we can't live in a house where each of our kids have their own bedrooms', whatever the case may be.

The availability of Government schools with a large number of Jewish students gives comfort to some parents. One commented: 'I think it would be a very different situation if we didn't have schools like Caulfield South or Gardenvale where they do have a lot of Jewish kids … It was kind of an easy decision because there are so many Jewish kids there and you speak to so many families and Jewish parents who've had their kids there and they're happy … I think it would be very different if we were in a position where we had to send our kid to a primary school where there weren't many Jewish kids.' Another parent observed: 'I do feel sad that we haven't been able to send the kids, to have them continue at Scopus all the way through but at the same time, because there are these schools like Caulfield South that have such a large Jewish population that it just makes it a little bit easier, you feel little bit better about it because you're not the only ones.' Another put the stress on the quality of Government education on offer: 'If the school that we were zoned for wasn't any good we wouldn't be going there, we would keep him at the Jewish school.'

> "I think it would be very different if we were in a position where we had to send our kid to a primary school where there weren't many Jewish kids."

> If the school that we were zoned for wasn't any good we wouldn't be going there, we would keep him at the Jewish school.

With this decision, comes a clear moral dilemma expressed by a number of those interviewed. 'I'm comfortable with my decision but I do question it sometimes...every now and then I have a little panic.'

Ambivalence is expressed by a mother who moved her daughter from a Jewish kindergarten to Caulfield Junior College: 'I was terrified at the beginning. I was like 'are we making a good decision?' I think of all the fears that I had, that you're compromising because though money shouldn't be the be-all-and-end-all of a decision but it is so much part of the decision that you worry that you are compromising on education.'

Those that did chose a local Government school expressed hope that whatever they did at home would be enough. 'The flipside is that it puts a greater onus on us, that we take the responsibility as parents to provide that [Jewish] education.' One mother, despite not being a member of a synagogue herself, considered that perhaps it would be in her daughter's best interests if they did go to a local synagogue more regularly because 'that's something that we could do to try and help them to form some kind of Jewish identity and form some connection to the Jewish community.'

Typical among interviewees, those with children at Government schools supplement their education with Hebrew and Jewish studies before or after school hours, although not without difficulty. One young mother noted that when her daughter was in Prep 'we enrolled her in Hebrew Gems through Glen Eira Chabad. And we did that for most of the year, but I pulled her out because I found that she was getting quite tired. I was having trouble getting her there. She was tired and she didn't want to sit in the classroom, she struggled and there were tears. So, we swapped from Hebrew Gems to UJEB … but since the baby was born, she hasn't been able to go because it's just hard to get there at 8 o'clock in the morning.' She indicated that 'as the kids get older, we will have to think more about getting back to Hebrew Gems or I think there are other UJEB programs that are a bit longer than 45 minutes. Because the plan is to send them back to Jewish school in secondary, so they'll need to know some Hebrew.'

3. 'We want our kids to get a broader perspective of life'

For another group of parents, there are advantages of a non-Jewish school, in preference to what they perceive to be a Jewish day school education: these advantages include a less pressured environment, the opportunity for children to make friends in their local neighbourhood, and the greater diversity both in subjects taught and in the ethnic and cultural environment.

Some young couples are looking for more social diversity, what they describe as exposure to a broader range of people and perspectives. A parent with children in a Government school commented that 'one of the things I'm also seeing now that the children are at a school with much more diverse student population is how much of a blessing that is. They have friends who are Jews, Christians, Asians, all kinds, and it's very natural for them…' One mother explained that "we chose [our local school] … because we love the community feel.'

Another parent made it clear that it was less a money issue, more a conscious choice to have a mix of Jewish and non-Jewish friends, 'to be exposed to different people, backgrounds, religions.' There is a perception of Jewish schools as being 'very single-minded.' There are also negative comments on what is perceived to be a pressured environment in Jewish day schools, the 'need to achieve': 'I don't like the push that the Jewish schools have. I feel like there's so much more drive from day dot. You know, there's so much more need to do certain things and be in certain places, and I just don't think a five-year-old needs to worry.'

Another expressed the view that schools and their communities are 'clicky.' She felt more comfortable being in a school community of like-minded parents 'who understand' the struggle to make ends meet and who are not able to afford luxuries. One parent commented on the difference she has seen in the sense of entitlement in kids who come from a Private school versus those from a public school. 'It's not just a Jewish versus non-Jewish, it's very much a Private versus Public thing too.'

> "It's not just a Jewish versus non-Jewish, it's very much a Private versus Public thing too."

Others indicated preference for a school with a specialised educational focus such as Montessori or Steiner. One family sends their children to the Montessori school 'because it's about the individual and then the community … and that fits well with our family values and the way we see the world.' They plan to go to Montessori through to Year 12, but 'I've enrolled him at Bialik in grade two just as a back-up, in case he doesn't like it.'

4. 'It's a no brainer': Jewish schooling all the way

For the last group, despite the financial pressures, attending a Jewish school is the only option, irrespective of their financial position. Many of the parents in these families were educated in one of the Jewish schools and grew up in orthodox or ultra-orthodox homes. These parents believe that an intensive Jewish day school education is fundamental; they set tremendous value on Jewish learning and observance. Families that cannot afford fees depend on support from the schools and from grandparents. They know that there are schools that will not deny a Jewish education to any Jewish child on financial grounds. Nevertheless, within this group there are significant differences in the expectation of school curriculum between the Ultra-Orthodox (Hareidi), Strictly Orthodox, and the Modern Orthodox communities.

Some within this group expect that a Jewish school will provide a strong Jewish identity, knowledge of Jewish rituals, and connection to Israel. For others, 'growing up with Jewish friends is a big factor,' as well as feeling part of a community.

These parents look for the school that best fits their own religious outlook. One parent explained: 'people want to choose a school that they feel comfortable at their level of Jewish observance or culture, where they see that they sit culturally and religiously. So that cuts out some of your options as well.' For one Chabad parent, Yeshivah-Beth Rivkah was the school of choice; 'there probably wasn't that much thought that went into it, given I went to Yeshivah and was very happy with the education I had there.' The parents both support the curriculum that allocates half of the teaching time to Jewish studies, imbued with the rituals and practice of strict religious observance. Nevertheless, they appreciate that the school is open to those less observant and is inclusive in its outlook. 'We both value that it's frum, a religious school, but it's open to others… And the kids can take slightly different paths if they want. I have a very strong association with the school and support the philosophy of reaching out to others and being inclusive.'

Within this group, during discussion of the different schools, none mentioned academic results, rather the focus was on the school culture and where they felt, as parents, they might best fit. In one interview, when The Yeshivah-Beth Rivkah CAPS fees were mentioned the parents quickly dismissed it as an option, remarking that 'we just wouldn't fit in there,' their preference was for Mount Scopus 'even though it is the most expensive Jewish school in Australia.' Another parent whose partner was against any religious practice said they felt Scopus was too religious because the boys wore kippot. They preferred Sholem 'because they don't talk about God.'

> "Within this group, during discussion of the different schools, none mentioned academic results, rather the focus was on the school culture and where they felt, as parents, they might best fit."

Another parent, who grew up in a Modern Orthodox home and has enrolled his child at Yavneh says that he and his wife were both committed to sending their children to a Jewish day school even though the fees will be 'an issue for the foreseeable future.' When asked about his contemporaries, he says 'I think everyone views the finance as a consideration, but I don't think it's what's going to make or break a decision.'

Educated in Jewish day schools in both South Africa and Australia, another mother cannot imagine sending her three children to a State school or a Private non-Jewish school. Her husband came from a traditional home but was educated at a Private Anglican school in Melbourne and has always felt the disadvantage of not having connections with other Jewish people and not knowing Hebrew and basic Jewish ritual. He always wanted his children to have a different experience to his own and together with his wife decided that 'Scopus was probably the school that fitted closest to us and our lifestyle.'

Another mother interviewed was educated at Jewish schools in Melbourne, as was her husband. 'It was always going to be a Jewish school education because we wanted our kids to feel part of a community and I think that sending them to a Jewish school is probably, you know, the ultimate way and fortunately we can afford to send them ... I want them to know what I know, because I feel that they have the right to know what I know.' She discussed her Jewish identity and expectations of a Jewish education: 'I believe also that my Judaism is about being a good person, about being a kind person, about teaching my kids how to respect other people's traditions and all of that. It's probably more important to me than learning texts. That's true. But I do like the idea that it's there and if you want to explore it you have that opportunity.'

PART 2

This report builds on the Preliminary Report on the Gen17 survey published in 2018, which presented an overview of education issues, including discussion of perceived advantages and disadvantages of Jewish day schools, affordability of day schools, and range of educational experiences. The report was limited to general findings, with disaggregation limited to age group and comparison of Melbourne and Sydney. This second report goes further, with a particular focus on the different religious and ideological streams of Jewish schooling.

Reports of survey findings on Jewish education often aggregate findings across a number of schools, without consideration of the different character of individual schools. Their focus is on 'Jewish schooling'. Recent examples include the British Jewish Lives project,[21] and major Canadian and American surveys such as the 2018 Survey of Jews in Canada (see, for example, p. 38) and the Pew Research Centre's 2013 Portrait of Jewish Americans.

In this report the wealth of data produced by the Gen17 survey is analysed by age of respondent and character of the school attended, with a focus on recent attendees of the day schools, aged 18-29 at the time of completing the survey, compared with an older cohort aged 30-49.

Where sample size is limited by additional criteria, such as respondents with children under the age of twelve, aggregated findings for respondents aged 18-49 are presented.

To provide for in-depth rather than superficial understanding of Jewish day experiences, the criteria for inclusion is restricted to those who had at least six years attendance at a Jewish high school in Australia. The survey indicates that of those who meet this criterion, 88% also attended a Jewish primary school for at least six years. Where respondents attended more than one Jewish day school, they were asked to indicate the school attended for most of their schooling and this school is used in the classification of schools.

A further category of analysis considers those who did not attend a Jewish school, the criteria requiring no years at a Jewish school in Australia or overseas[22].

[21] Jewish Chronicle, 16 June 2019 'What pupils – and parents – think about Jewish schools'

[22] The 'Did Not Attend a Jewish School' group comprises those who selected 'never attended a Jewish day school in Australia or overseas at any stage' to the question 'Have you ever attended/currently attend a Jewish Day School (or school in Israel) and if so, for how many years?' It also includes those who selected '0 years' in response to that question.

SCHOOLS ANALYSED

Only one school – the Modern Orthodox Mount Scopus – had a sufficient number of respondents to enable stand-alone analysis. Of the total who meet the requirement of at least six years of attendance at a Jewish high school, there were 330 Mount Scopus respondents aged 18-49, 45% of the sample; the next highest was the 125 from Leibler Yavneh and 104 Beth Rivkah. (Table 10)

Table 10: Sample size, Victorian high school attended for six or more years, by age group, Victoria residents only, unweighted (number)

| | Victorian Jewish High Schools | | | | | | | |

| Total 18-49 | 20 | 104 | 42 | 125 | 330 | 68 | 37 | 726 |

Given the limitations of the sample, four categories of analysis are included in this report; those who attended:

- Mount Scopus Memorial College
- Orthodox high school: Adass Israel School, Yeshivah College, Beth Rivkah Ladies College, and Leibler Yavneh College
- Non-Orthodox high school: Bialik College and The King David School
- Did not attend: never attended a Jewish school in Australia or overseas

There are at least 50 respondents for each category (aged 18-29 and 30-39), with the exception of the non-Orthodox aged 30-49 with only 34 respondents; given the small number, this group is excluded from analysis in this report.

SCHOOLS AND HOME ENVIRONMENT

As to be expected, in the large majority of cases parents chose a school for their children that is in keeping with their own values, the values of the home in which children are raised.

Thus of those aged 18-29 who attended Orthodox schools as here defined –86% are from an Orthodox home.

Of those who attended Mount Scopus, the largest proportion (60%) are from a Traditional home, a further 26% from Modern Orthodox, and 14% from homes described as 'just Jewish' or secular.

Among those who attended a Non-Orthodox school, a more diverse background was indicated; 9% are from an Orthodox home, the largest proportion from Traditional (36%) or non-practising (secular/ cultural) (21%), a further 12% Progressive/reform and 12% 'just Jewish'.

Of those who indicated that they did not attend a Jewish school, the largest proportion (54%) were from a non-denominational or non-practicing home, 19% Progressive/Reform, 12% Traditional, 10% Conservative, and 6% Orthodox.

There is a similar pattern for those aged 30-49, with the qualification that there is some indication of having come from more observant homes. Thus, of those who attended Orthodox schools, 39% indicated that they were from Strictly Orthodox or Hareidi homes, compared to 26% of those aged 18-29; of those who did not attend a Jewish school, 28% aged 30-49 were from a secular home, 40% of the younger age group.

When considering attitudes by category of school attended, it is not assumed that those attitudes are simply shaped or impacted by the school education; while attitudes are considered by category of school, the partnership of parents and schools – the congruence (or dissonance) of school and home environment – is a key factor to be kept in mind in broad interpretation of findings.

> While attitudes are considered by category of school, the partnership of parents and schools – the congruence (or dissonance) of school and home environment – is a key factor to be kept in mind in broad interpretation of findings.

This is illustrated by considering attitudes of those who attended Mount Scopus and hence had a common school experience correlated with the religious identification of the home. Because of the limitations of sample size when focus is narrowed to one school, the 18-29 and 30-49 age groups are aggregated.

The finding indicates that with reference to many issues there is substantial difference in attitude and values between those from an Orthodox or Traditional home and those from a non-Orthodox or non-observant home. For example, sense of being Jewish is 'a central element in my life' is indicated by 36%-39% of those who attended Mount Scopus and are from a Modern Orthodox or Traditional home, 16-22% from a Conservative, Progressive, non-denominational, or secular home. The relative proportions for observing halacha ('very important' or 'fairly important') are 31%-36% and 0%-10%. Importance attached to marrying another Jew ('very important') is 60%-64% and 32%-42%.

PREFERENCE FOR JEWISH LEARNING ENVIRONMENTS

A question posed to all respondents asked for indication of their school preference, in response to a question worded 'whether or not you have children, do you feel it is preferable for Jewish children to attend a school that is Jewish or non-Jewish or do you have no preference either way?' Respondents were asked to indicate separately their preference at primary and high school level.

71% indicated 'strong preference' or 'some preference' for a Jewish school at primary level, almost the same proportion (72%) indicated preference for a Jewish high school. (Table 14)

Table 14: 'Whether or not you have children, do you feel it is preferable for Jewish children to attend a school that is Jewish or non-Jewish or do you have no preference either way? Please answer for both primary and high school.' All respondents aged 18-49

| | PRIMARY SCHOOL | HIGH SCHOOL |

Differences in preferences were found when survey data was analysed by the respondent's school attended. 'Strong preference' or 'some preference' for a Jewish school at primary school level was at 94% among those who attended an Orthodox high school, 80% among those who attended Mount Scopus, 60% non-Orthodox, and 53% among those who did not attend a Jewish school. The relative proportions indicating 'strong preference' were 83%, 55%, 38%, and 31%. (Table 15)

Similar results were obtained when respondents were asked for their preference for Jewish high school education: 'strong preference' or 'some preference' was indicated by 92% of those who attended an Orthodox school, 85% Mount Scopus, 68% non-Orthodox, and 49% who did not attend a Jewish school. The relative proportions indicating 'strong preference' were 82%, 60%, 45%, and 32%. (Table 15)

PLANNING FOR A JEWISH SCHOOL EDUCATION

The previous section looked at general preferences, this section considers the planning of respondents with young children.

Respondents with a child in pre-school were asked if they considered that it was preferable for young Jewish children to attend a pre-school that is Jewish; 87% indicated a 'strong preference' or 'some preference' for a Jewish pre-school, of whom 67% indicated a 'strong preference.'

Those with young children (under the age of five) were asked 'are you currently planning to send this child to a Jewish primary school?', and those with older children, under the age of 12, were asked in identical terms 'are you currently planning to send this child to a Jewish high school?'

As noted, 71%-72% of all respondents aged 18-49 indicated a strong preference or some preference for a Jewish school. However, in response to the specific question concerning education of their own children, a lower 62% of respondents with a child under the age of five indicated that they plan 'definitely' or 'probably' to send their child to a Jewish primary school; with reference to a Jewish high school, an almost identical 64% indicated that they plan to send their child 'definitely' or 'probably' to a Jewish high school. (

33% indicated that they did not plan to send their child to a Jewish primary school (19% 'probably not', 14% 'definitely not'), a lower 24% did not plan not to send their child to a Jewish high school (13% 'probably not', 11% 'definitely not').

Figure 1: 'Earlier you indicated at least one of your children is aged under five years old. Are you currently planning to send this child to a Jewish primary school?' (N = 285) and 'Earlier you indicated at least one of your children is aged under 12 years old. Are you currently planning to send this child to a Jewish high school?' (N=519) by respondents aged 18-49

INTERMARRIED COUPLES

In the Gen17 survey, 121 respondents aged 18-49 indicated that the person they married was not Jewish[23].

Among those whose marriage partner was not Jewish there is a markedly lower preference for children to attend a Jewish school.

With regard to the general question asked of all married respondents, where both parents are Jewish 'strong preference' or 'some preference' for a Jewish day school is indicated by 80% (primary) – 81% (high), among intermarried couples it is a much lower 47% (primary) 38% (high).

With attention narrowed to 'strong preference', where both parents are Jewish the proportion is 62%-64%, where one parent is not Jewish it is 19%-16%.

'No preference either way' or 'some' or 'strong' preference for a non-Jewish day school is indicated by 19%-15% where both parents are Jewish, 46%-52% of intermarried couples. (Figures Figure 2 and Figure 3)

These findings are significant in the context of the increase in intermarriage.

"Among those whose marriage partner was not Jewish there is a markedly lower preference for children to attend a Jewish school."

[23] This is based on the question in the Gen17 Survey 'Was your current, or most recent, marriage held under Jewish religious auspices?' which was asked of all respondents who indicated that they are either currently or previously married (ie 'Married and living with your spouse', 'married, but separated' 'Divorced' and 'widowed'), where the respondent selected 'No, the person I married was not Jewish'.

Figure 3: 'Whether or not you have children, do you feel it is preferable for Jewish children to attend a high school that is Jewish or non-Jewish or do you have no preference either way?' by respondents who are/were married, aged 18-49

In response to the specific question concerning plans for their own children, of those whose marriage partner was non-Jewish and with a child under the age of five, just 13% indicate that they plan attendance at a Jewish primary school, 79% 'probably not' or 'definitely not', with 9% 'undecided'.

Of those with a child under the age of twelve, a marginally higher 18% plan attendance at a Jewish high school, 67% 'probably not'' or definitely not', and a relatively high 16% indicate that they are undecided. (Figure 4)

Figure 4: 'Earlier you indicated at least one of your children is aged under five years old. Are you currently planning to send this child to a Jewish primary school?' (N = 42) and 'Earlier you indicated at least one of your children is aged under 12 years old. Are you currently planning to send this child to a Jewish high school?' # MELBOURNE AND SYDNEY COMPARED

The first section of this report presented data on Jewish school enrolments. Melbourne Jewish school enrolments are more than 50% higher, although Melbourne's Jewish population is larger by an estimated 15%.

Indication of school preferences is consistent with the pattern of school enrolments.

In Melbourne, a markedly higher proportion of parents indicate 'definite' plans to send their children to a Jewish school. Of those with a child under the age 5, 19% in Sydney and 48% in Melbourne indicate that they are 'definite' in their plans for Jewish primary school attendance; of those with a child under the age of 12, almost the same proportion in Sydney at 20% indicate 'definite' plans for a Jewish high school, 43% in Melbourne.

COSTS AND AFFORDABILITY OF JEWISH EDUCATION

The survey included questions on the affordability of Jewish education, with reference to capacity of the household and how the cost is met.

Respondents had the option of indicating if school fees were a minor or major problem: 'well within financial capacity' or 'entailing some sacrifices'; major problem was indicated by the response options of a 'significant' or 'major financial sacrifice.' Respondents could also indicate that the cost was not affordable, 'beyond' their financial capacity.

The question on affordability was asked of respondents with children; the analysis is presented in aggregated form for parents aged 18-49, as there are very few respondents in the 18-29 age group with children approaching school age.

With reference to childcare, 'major financial sacrifice' or 'beyond household capacity' was indicated by 13%, 10% in reference to pre-school, and a substantially higher 22% for school.

The top three levels of response combined – 'beyond capacity', 'major' or 'significant' financial sacrifice – was indicated by 31% for childcare, 28% pre-school, and a much higher 50% school.

The child care and pre-school Government rebate lessens the cost for parents with children in those facilities. However, by the time the children reach upper primary school or high school the fees are many multiples of the pre-school and childcare rates, with no direct Government rebate, although the schools receive substantial subsidies which make possible lower fees than would otherwise be required for financial viability.

Affordability indicated by the responses 'well within' capacity or 'entails some sacrifice' was at 68% for childcare, 71% for pre-school, and a much lower 47% for school.

Table 16: Comparing costs for childcare, pre-school and Jewish day schools, by respondents aged 18-49 with children[24]

[24] The wording of the questions are: ''Would you say the cost of this care…' (Respondent has at least one child in childcare or pre-school) AND 'Earlier you indicated that at least one of your children attends a Jewish Day School. Would you say the cost of sending your child/children to a Jewish Day School…' (Respondent has a child attending either primary or secondary school).

HOW ARE SCHOOL FEES PAID?

The concern with the high cost of fees was reflected in the conversations with young people deciding where they will send their children to school. All the parents discussed the high cost of a Jewish education. Some had decided to send their children to a primary Government school after a Jewish kindergarten, in the hope that a Jewish high school would be made more affordable through savings made in the interim years, or through a change in their financial circumstances.

Respondents were asked how they meet the cost of school fees in a multiple response question that provided scope to indicate all sources of funding, in recognition of the reality that many parents access more than one funding source; 67% percent of respondents aged 18-49 with children currently in Jewish day school indicated that they pay fees from their personal or household income; 14% use their savings; 9% obtain a bank loan; and 19% obtain financial support from family members. One quarter of respondents indicated that they receive a means-tested subsidy from their school.

Table 17: 'In what way or ways are you currently financing your child's/children's Jewish Day School fees?' (multiple response), respondents aged 18-49 with one or more children currently at a Jewish school

| Means-tested subsidies from the school | 25% |

| Bank loan / use of home loan | 9% |
| Other financial arrangement(s) | 8% |
| Prefer not to say | 6% |
| N (unweighted) | 377 |

A final question asked parents aged 18-49 with school aged children if 'the cost of school fees ever prevented you sending one or more children to a Jewish day school': 12% indicated that they never considered sending a child to Jewish school; 34% of all respondents aged 18-49, or 39% of those who considered the option of a Jewish school, indicated that they had been prevented by cost. (Table 18)

Analysis by school attended is limited by the relatively small number of respondents with children. The available data indicates that 12% of those who attended an Orthodox school had been prevented from sending their child to a Jewish school, 30% Mount Scopus, and 48% of those who did not attend a Jewish school. This pattern of response is likely explained not by differing financial capacity among those who attended different schools, but by the extent of commitment to Jewish schooling and willingness to prioritise and make sacrifices; an additional factor may be a greater willingness to apply for fee subsidies, and the greater availability of subsidies in some schools.

Of those aged 18-49 who identify as Strictly Orthodox or Hareidi and with children, only 3% indicated that they had been prevented by the cost of fees from send one or more children to a Jewish school, 22% Modern Orthodox, 40% Traditional, and 56% who identify as 'Just Jewish' or of no denomination.

PERCEIVED ADVANTAGES AND DISADVANTAGES OF A JEWISH DAY SCHOOL EDUCATION

Across the community there are different views on the advantages and disadvantages of a Jewish education.

Within the 18-29 age group who attended an Orthodox Jewish day school, 33% saw the main advantage in terms of 'strong Jewish education'. A lower 19% of the respondents who attended Mount Scopus saw the main advantage in terms of the strength of Jewish education; for both, the second advantage was the strengthening of Jewish identity.

Of those who attended a non-Orthodox school or did not attend a Jewish school, the main advantages were the strengthening of Jewish identity and providing a sense of belonging to the Jewish community.

A 'strong secular academic education' was the main advantage for only 3% of those who attended an Orthodox school, but 9%-11% of Mount Scopus and other school groupings.

For respondents who attended Mount Scopus, 20% indicated that developing Jewish friendships and networks was important.

There was a similar pattern of response among those aged 30-49, with the main advantage for those who attended an Orthodox school being the strength of Jewish education (37%), also indicated by the largest proportion (26%) of Mount Scopus attendees, while the largest proportion who did not attend a Jewish school indicated the strengthening of Jewish identity (24%).

DISADVANTAGES

The high cost of fees was by far the most often indicated disadvantage of a Jewish day school education: of those aged 18-29, high cost was indicated by 68% who attended Mount Scopus, 49% who attended an Orthodox school, 45% non-Orthodox, and 25% who did not attend a Jewish school. The cost of fees was indicated in the range 41%-64% by those aged 30-49. No other disadvantage was indicated by more than 10% of those who had attended an Orthodox school or Mount Scopus.

However, among those who attended a non-Orthodox Jewish school, as well as those who did not attend Jewish school, a substantial minority indicated 'lack of ethnic and cultural diversity', among those aged 18-29 selected by 30% of those who attended a non-Orthodox school and 17% who did not attend a Jewish school.

Among those who did not attend a Jewish school two other disadvantages were indicated by more than 10%: 'too elitist' (14%) and 'too Zionist' (12%), while 9% indicated 'fail to prepare students for life after schooling is complete', a disadvantage also indicated by 9% of those who attended an Orthodox school.

While there was some difference between the two age groups, there was a large degree of commonality in the ranking of disadvantages.

NON-SCHOOL EXPERIENCES

The most common Jewish education experienced outside of Jewish schools is studying for the Bar and Bat-mitzvah, indicated by 94%-99% of those who attended a Jewish school and are aged 18-29. It is substantially lower, 59%, for those who did not attend a Jewish school.

Jewish youth movement meetings and camps were also indicated by a high proportion of those aged 18-29 who attended a Jewish school – 90% of those who attended an Orthodox school also attended a youth movement camp, 83% of non-Orthodox and 72% of Mount Scopus – and a substantially lower proportion (40%) among those who did not attend a Jewish school.

More than half of respondents who attended Mount Scopus or a non-Orthodox school indicated involvement in a sports group and close to half of those who attended a Jewish school also indicated involvement in a Jewish student organisation at university or other tertiary institution.

One major difference was study at a yeshiva or seminary in Israel, indicated by 64% of those who attended an Orthodox school aged 18-29, 53% aged 30-49, compared to 18% of Mount Scopus attendees aged 18-29 and 10% aged 30-49, and 1%-5% of those who attended a non-Orthodox school or did not attend a Jewish school.

While there is a large extent of commonality between the two age groups, substantially greater experience of Israel was indicated by the younger age group. In response to a question that asked respondents to indicate all listed experiences that applied to them, 86% of those who attended Mount Scopus indicated participation in an organised youth trip to Israel of less than one year in duration, compared to 49% of those aged 30-49; participation in a year-long youth program was indicated by 50% of the younger Mount Scopus attendees, compared to 18% of the older group. A majority of non-orthodox school attendees indicated participation in Israel trips and programs, but a minority of those who did not attend a Jewish school.

Close to one- in-three 18-29 year old respondents who did not attend a Jewish school did not experience any of the non-school experiences listed.

RELIGIOUS IDENTIFICATION

This section considers beliefs, attitudes and values. It begins by considering the religious identity of each group through self-described affiliation and observance.

It considers change across the two age groups employed in this analysis, the most recent attendees of the Jewish day schools (and those who did not have a Jewish education), aged 18-29, and the older age group 30-49.

Insight is provided by a question that asked respondents concerning the religious identification of the home in which he or she grew up – and religious identification today.

- 'How would you describe the religious/Jewish identification of the home in which you grew up?'
- 'And how would you describe your current religious identification?'

Gen17 finds a consistent pattern of marginally lessened identification with Orthodoxy and self-described Traditional Judaism within the younger age group, and an increase in secular or cultural identification, across all schools.

> "Gen17 finds a consistent pattern of marginally lessened identification with Orthodoxy and self-described Traditional Judaism within the younger age group… Less change is indicated by those aged 30-49."

Of those aged 18-29 who attended an Orthodox school, 53% now identify as Modern Orthodox, down from 60% growing up; among Mount Scopus attendees, 54% now identify as Traditional, down from 60% growing up. In the non-Orthodox school group, 38% now identify as non-practising, up from 21% growing up; and among those who did not attend a Jewish school, 51% now identify as non-practicing, an increase from 40% growing up.

Less change is indicated by those aged 30-49; of those who attended an Orthodox school, there is an increase in the proportion indicating that they are now of no denomination, 'Just Jewish', from less than 1% growing up to 5% today; and of attendees Mount Scopus, 63% describe themselves as Traditional growing up, down to 52% today, with a marginal increase in four religious identifications, the largest among those who describe themselves as no denomination, 'Just Jewish', up from 6% to 11%.

*Non-Orthodox not included due to insufficient number of respondents

In a general question, respondents were asked if they are more or less religiously observant than they were five years ago.

As to be expected, the survey found that identity is more changeable in the younger age group. Among respondents aged 18-29, a relatively low 26%-35% indicated that their level of observance has not changed over the last five years, compared to 45%-64% among those aged 30-49.

Of those who indicate change in religious observance, among the younger respondents more have become less observant. Among those who attended an Orthodox school, 37% indicated that they less observant, 26% more observant; Mount Scopus, 29% less observant, 23% more; non-Orthodox, 23% less observant, 16% more.

A different pattern is evident among those who did not attend a Jewish school, although this may reflect a bias in the sample, in that those who did not attend a Jewish school but have become more observant are more likely to have completed the survey than those who have moved away from Jewish observance: the finding is that 12% in this grouping have become less observant, 30% have become more observant.

Comparing the relative proportions indicating more and less religious observance among those aged 30-49, a marginally higher proportion of Orthodox grouping (+4%) and Mount Scopus attendees (+7%) indicate that they are less observant, while a higher proportion of those who did not attend a Jewish school indicate that they are more religiously observant (+6%).

HEBREW LANGUAGE ACQUISITION

Hebrew language is a core subject in Jewish education. It is a compulsory subject in Melbourne Jewish schools, although to different levels: In 2019 among the larger schools it is compulsory to Year 10 in Mount Scopus College and Leibler Yavneh College, to Year 9 in Yeshivah Beth Rivkah, to Year 8 in Bialik College and King David School. At some schools, including Yesdodei HaTorah College and Yeshivah Beth Rivkah, Hebrew is a required language for text study, central to the curriculum.

Gen 17 asked respondents in three questions to indicate their self-perception of how well they can read, speak and understand Hebrew. Respondents were provided with four response option, 'very well', 'quite well', 'not well', and 'not at all'.

Respondents had highest confidence in their ability to read Hebrew. The proportion indicating ability to read Hebrew 'very well' or 'quite well' was 95% (aged 18-29) and 90% (30-49) among who attended an Orthodox school; 83% and 66% Mount Scopus; 73% and 59% a non-Orthodox school; and a much lower 33% and 44% among those who did not attend a Jewish school.

The relative proportions indicating ability to understand Hebrew 'very well' or 'quite well' was 78% (aged 18-29) and 70% (30-49) among who attended an Orthodox school; 81% and 58% Mount Scopus; 56% and 37% a non-Orthodox school; and 27% and 34% among those who did not attend a Jewish school.

The lowest proportion was indicated for ability to speak Hebrew. The relative proportions indicating 'very well' or 'quite well' was 65% (aged 18-29) and 58% (30-49) of those who attended an Orthodox school; 60% and 46% Mount Scopus; 49% and 34% a non-Orthodox school; and 24% and 32% of those who did not attend a Jewish school.

JEWISH VALUES

The discussion of 'Jewish values' is based on questions that consider the relative importance of a broad range of attitudinal statements that define Jewish identity, and the relative importance of their Jewish identity for respondents.

SENSE OF BEING JEWISH

The survey included two general questions on Jewish identity. Respondents were asked 'Which of the following best expresses your sense of being Jewish?', with five response options specified: 'being Jewish is a central element of my life', 'a significant element of my life', 'limited to taking part in some communal or family activities', 'of little importance to me' and of 'no importance to me'.

The strongest differentiation was among those who indicated that being Jewish was a 'central element' in their lives, with only marginal difference between the two age groups; of those aged 18-29, 'central element' was indicated by 67% of those who attended an Orthodox school, 39% Mount Scopus, 34% non-Orthodox, and 25% of those who did not attend a Jewish school.

3% of those aged 18-29 who attended an Orthodox school, and 10%-11% of those who attended Mount Scopus or a non-Orthodox school, indicated that their Jewish identity was limited or of little or no importance, a substantially higher 25% of those who did not attend a Jewish school. Among the older age group there was a similar pattern of response, with a marginally higher proportion (30%) of those who did not attend a Jewish school indicating that their identity was limited or of little or no importance.

A second general question asked respondents if they agreed or disagreed with the statement: 'I am proud to be a Jew?' There was less differentiation in response to this question: very few respondents indicated disagreement, in the range 1%-3% of those who attended a Jewish school, 6% who did not, while more than 90% across all school groups and age groups indicated agreement. The strongest level of response, 'completely agree', was indicated by 86% of those aged 18-29 who attended an Orthodox school, 89% Mount Scopus, 76% non-Orthodox, and 63% of those who did not attend a Jewish school.

JEWISH IDENTITY

The Gen17 survey presented respondents with eighteen attitudinal and behavioural statements and asked for indication of importance or unimportance of each 'to your own sense of Jewish identity.' Each statement provided six response options, 'very important', 'fairly important', fairly unimportant', 'very unimportant', 'don't know,' and 'prefer not to say'. In the following discussion the main focus is on the strongest level of positive response, providing insight into the extent of differentiation with regard to firmly held views. With the two positive responses combined, sense of difference is less evident, pointing to the general level of shared values across the community when they are broadly defined.

The eighteen statements are grouped into broad four categories: [1] related to aspects of behaviour; [2] community, culture and learning; [3] religious observance; and [4] supporting Israel.

For 12 of the 18 statements, 60% or higher indicate that they are 'very important' or 'fairly important'.

Narrowing the analysis to indication of 'very important' among respondents aged 18-29, 60% or higher indicated 'very important' for seven statements among Orthodox school attendees; four statements each for Mount Scopus and a non-Orthodox school, and one statement for those who did not attend a Jewish school.

'Upholding strong moral and ethical behaviour' was indicated as 'very important' by more than 60% across the four categories of analysis, 'sharing Jewish festivals with family' and 'belonging to a Jewish community' across the Jewish schools. (refer to data presented in Table 26 - Table 30 and illustrated in Figure 17 - Figure 19)

Table 26: Statements related to Jewish identity that were ranked as 'very important' by over 60% of respondents in each school grouping. Respondents aged 18-29 by school attended

| Orthodox | | Mount Scopus | | Non-orthodox | | Did not attend Jewish school | |
|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|
| Upholding strong moral and ethical behavior | 81% | Belonging to a Jewish community | 77% | Sharing Jewish festivals with family | 71% | Upholding strong moral and ethical behavior | 60% |
| Sharing Jewish festivals with family | 80% | Remembering the Holocaust | 73% | Upholding strong moral and ethical behavior | 68% | | |
| Belonging to a Jewish community | 79% | Sharing Jewish festivals with family | 70% | Remembering the Holocaust | 68% | | |
| Marrying another Jew | 77% | Upholding strong moral and ethical behavior | 67% | Belonging to a Jewish community | 61% | | |
| Learning about Jewish history | 66% | | | | | | |
| Remembering the Holocaust | 63% | | | | | | |
| Feeling part of the Jewish people worldwide | 60% | | | | | | |

For 14 out of the 18 statements presented, the highest proportion who responded 'very important' were those who attended an Orthodox school. The four statements for which the highest proportion was not among attendees of an Orthodox school are 'remembering the Holocaust', visiting Israel, 'supporting social justice causes' and 'Jewish cultural experiences.'

Table 27: Statements related to Jewish identity for which the highest proportion indicating 'very important' were not attendees of an Orthodox school, respondents aged 18-29 by school attended

| | Orthodox | Mount Scopus | Non-orthodox | Did not attend Jewish school |
|---|---|---|---|---|
| Remembering the Holocaust | 63% | 73% | 68% | 59% |
| Supporting social justice causes | 30% | 36% | 47% | 53% |
| Jewish cultural experiences | 21% | 44% | 49% | 34% |
| Visiting Israel | 52% | 54% | 46% | 33% |

The largest differentiation in Jewish identity markers is obtained in response to four statements concerning religious belief and observance: believing in God, observing halacha, prayer, and studying religious texts, with an average level indicating 'strong agreement' at 50% for those who attended an Orthodox school, 10% or lower for other school streams. There was also significant difference obtained in response to three additional statements: marrying another Jew ('very important' in the range 77% to 22%), donating to charity (53% to 25%), and learning about Jewish history (66% to 46%).

JEWISH PEOPLEHOOD

Respondents were asked to indicate the extent of their agreement with the propositions that

- 'I have a strong sense of belonging to the Jewish people'
- 'I feel connected to other Jews even if I do not know them personally'
- 'I have a special responsibility to take care of Jews in need around the world'

Four response options were presented: 'completely agree', 'somewhat agree', 'somewhat disagree', 'completely disagree.'

For sense of belonging to the Jewish people, among respondents aged 18-29 the combined two levels of agreement ('completely' or 'somewhat') was 99% Orthodox schools, 96% Mount Scopus, 99% non-Orthodox; 84% did not attend a Jewish school.

There is a marginally lower level of agreement with sense of special responsibility' to take care of Jews in need around the world; among respondents aged 18-29, 93% Orthodox schools, 87% Mount Scopus, 85% non-Orthodox; and a much lower 60% for those who did not attend at Jewish school. There is only minor difference among respondents aged 30-49. With consideration narrowed to strongest level of agreement ('completely agree'), there is greater variation in response.

Among respondents aged 18-29, the proportion indicating complete agreement that they have a sense of belonging to the Jewish people is 80% Orthodox, 75% Mount Scopus, 63% non-Orthodox, and substantially lower 43% among those who did not attend Jewish school.

Complete agreement with a sense of connection to other Jews ranges from 69% Orthodox, 57% Mount Scopus, 44% non-Orthodox, and 34% did not attend.

Responsibility towards Jews in need finds a larger gap between attendees of Orthodox and other schools – 60% Orthodox, 31% Mount Scopus, 26% non-Orthodox, and 21% did not attend Jewish school.

While there is only minor difference by age group, with two exceptions there is a lower proportion in complete agreement among the younger age group.

CHARITABLE GIVING

Three questions were asked with regard to charitable giving:

- To which of the following causes, if any, do you give the highest priority?
- How much in total have you or your household given to Jewish and/or general charities in the past 12 months? If you are unsure, please estimate. Please exclude synagogue membership and Jewish school fees.
- Approximately what proportion of these charitable donations you or your household gave over the past 12 months went to Jewish charities? If you are unsure, please estimate.

When asked to indicate their priorities in supporting charitable causes, a majority across the school and age groups gave priority to Australian charities. Among attendees of an Orthodox school, a substantial majority (63%-76%) prioritised Jewish charities in Australia, a lower proportion (43%-44%) among those who attended Mount Scopus. Among attendees of non-Jewish schools and those who did not attend a Jewish school, opinion was close to divided, a larger proportion favoured general charities in Australia over Jewish charities.

Priority for Israeli charities is discussed in the Financial Support for Israel section on page 101 of this report.

By contrast, 32% of 18-29 year old and 29% of 30-49 year old respondents who did not attend a Jewish school indicated that none of those charitable donations were for Jewish charities.

RELIGIOUS PRACTICE

Detailed insight into Jewish life and practice was provided in response to a series of questions. These include:

- 'Are you currently a member of a synagogue?'
- 'In the last twelve months, how often did you attend any type of synagogue or organised Jewish religious service?'
- 'How often, if at all, do you attend Friday night Sabbath (Shabbat) meal with your family/close friends and how often did you do so growing up?'
- 'How often, if at all, are candles lit at home on Friday night Sabbath (Shabbat)?'
- 'How often, if at all, do you attend a seder meal at Passover (Pesach)?'
- 'How often, if at all, do you fast on Yom Kippur?'
- 'What kind of meat, if any, is bought for your home?'
- 'Do you eat non-kosher meat outside your own home? (eg in restaurants or private homes)'

Attending a Passover seder 'always' was observed by the highest proportion in all four groups, indicated by more than 90% of those who attended a Jewish school and 68%-72% of those who did not attend.

Always participating in a Sabbath meal found greater variance: among respondents aged 18-29, 87% who attended an Orthodox school, 71% Mount Scopus, 67% non-Orthodox and 32% of those who did not attend a Jewish school.

Comparing the age groups finds a higher level of observance consistently indicated by respondents aged 18-29 among those who attended an Orthodox school or Mount Scopus.

Indication of synagogue membership is lower among the younger age group, possibly explained by the younger respondents retaining a family membership. However, the younger cohort attend synagogue or an organised religious service more frequently than the older age group. Of Mount Scopus attendees aged 18-29, 46% regularly attend synagogue (from at least once a month to every day), this drops by half to 23% for the 30-49 year old group. 71% of this group now only attend on special occasions or on high holidays.

A quarter of 18-29 year old Orthodox school attendees go to synagogue once a week, a further 14% several times a week and 12% every day.

A quarter of those aged 18-29 who did not attend a Jewish day school did not attend synagogue in the last year at all, 20% of the 30-49 age group.

Excluding vegetarians, among respondents aged 18-29 who attended an Orthodox school, 87% indicated that they only bought kosher meat for their home, much lower proportions for other schools: 33% Mount Scopus, 20% non-Orthodox, and 6% of those who did not attend a Jewish school.

Close to 30% among those who attended Mount Scopus or a non-Orthodox school bought non-kosher meat, including pork products, for their home, 75% among those who did not attend a Jewish school.

Findings for individual (as distinct from households) indicates that 76% of those who attended an Orthodox school only ate kosher meat outside the home, 26% of those who attended Mount Scopus, 6% non-Orthodox, and 2% who did not attend a Jewish school.

ATTITUDES TOWARDS INTERMARRIAGE

To establish the extent of intermarriage, the most reliable data source is the Australian census, which will be analysed in a separate report to be issued by this project.

With regard to attitude towards intermarriage, two questions were included in the Gen17 survey. The first asked for general attitude to intermarriage in Australia, the second was personalised with respect to the respondent's own children, although it is a hypothetical question for respondents without children.

The first question was worded:

> 'Some people are concerned about Jews marrying non-Jews, while others are not. To what extent, if at all, are you personally concerned or unconcerned about intermarriage in Australia?'

Four response options were provided: 'very concerned', 'concerned', 'unconcerned', 'very unconcerned'

The second question asked:

> 'If one of your children said they were going to marry a non-Jew, how would you feel about it?'

Six response options were provided: 'very pleased', 'pleased but with some reservations', 'accepting or neutral', 'feel some regret', 'feel very considerable regret', 'would have no further association with my child'.

The general question on intermarriage in Australia found divided opinion. Of those aged 18-29, concern was indicated by 77% of those who attended an Orthodox school (40% 'very concerned'), 69% Mount Scopus (19% 'very concerned'), 49% non-orthodox (7% 'very concerned'), and 24% of those who did not attend a Jewish school (10% 'very concerned').

"The general question on intermarriage in Australia found divided opinion. Of those aged 18-29, concern was indicated by 77% of those who attended an Orthodox school, 69% Mount Scopus, 49% non-orthodox, and 24% of those who did not attend a Jewish school."

Comparison of those aged 18-29 and 30-49 finds that with the combined 'very concerned' and 'somewhat concerned' responses, there is little difference among those who attended an Orthodox school or Mount Scopus; however, among those who did not attend a Jewish school, concern was indicated by 24% of the younger age group, 51% the older.

With attention narrowed to those indicating 'very concerned', there is consistently lower level of concern among the younger age group; among those who attended an Orthodox, 40% aged 18-29, 52% aged 30-49, Mount Scopus 19% and 27%, and among those who did not attend a Jewish school 10% and 21%.

The second question was personalised with reference to the marriage of 'one of your children'. It found a lower level of negative response, possibly indicating a disposition to accept the marriage choices of children, especially among young respondents without children who are possibly responding to a hypothetical question and who may themselves be considering marrying a non-Jewish partner.

Among those aged 18-29, just 12% of those who attended an Orthodox school indicated that they would be pleased, accepting or neutral at a marriage of a child to a non-Jew, a higher 50% of Mount Scopus attendees, 65% non-Orthodox, and 67% among those who did not attend a Jewish school.

> "With reference to the marriage of 'one of your children' a lower level of negative response is found, possibly indicating a disposition to accept the marriage choices of children, especially among young respondents… who may themselves be considering marrying a non-Jewish partner."

There is a markedly lower proportion in the younger age group indicating that they would feel 'very considerable regret': for an Orthodox school, 49% aged 18-29, 67% aged 30-49; for Mount Scopus, 16% and 32%; and for those who did not attend a Jewish school, 9% and 22%.

Very few respondents (2% or less) indicated that they 'would have no further association with my child' if married to a non-Jewish partner.

CONNECTEDNESS AND FRIENDSHIPS

Community connectedness and friendship were considered through three questions:

- 'How connected do you feel to Jewish communal life?'
- 'You indicated you do not feel that connected to Jewish communal life. Are there any particular reasons leading you to feel this way?'
- 'Thinking of your close friends, how many of them are Jewish?'

A large majority among the 18-29 year-old indicated a sense of connection to the Jewish community; of those who attended a Jewish school, close to 90% feel 'somewhat connected' or 'very connected' to Jewish communal life. Among those aged 30-49, a similarly high proportion indicate connectedness among those who attended an Orthodox school, a lower 75% Mount Scopus.

There is a different pattern among those who did not attend a Jewish school: only 45% of those aged 18-29, indicate sense of connectedness, substantially lower than the 61% aged 30-49.

Those who did not feel connected to Jewish life were asked to indicate the reason, with ten possible responses offered and the option of specifying up to three.

Given the relatively small proportion indicating that they do not feel connected, reasons specified were aggregated for both the 18-29 and 30-49 age groups. (

The response chosen by the largest proportion is 'secular outlook/lifestyle', followed by the general response option 'you don't feel you fit in'. Among those who did not attend a Jewish school, close to one-in-five respondents who did not feel connected also indicated lack of 'interest in Jewish communal life', 'don't know many Jewish people', and 'views on Israel'.

With regard to friendships, of those who attended a Jewish school close to 90% aged 18-29 indicated that 'all' or 'more than half' of their close friends are Jewish; 93% of those who attended Orthodox school, 89% Mount Scopus, and 89% of those who attended a non-Orthodox school.

Again, there was a substantial difference among those who did not attend a Jewish school. Of those aged 18-29, just 24% indicated that 'all' or 'more than half' of their close friends are Jewish, while the majority, 53%, indicated that 'less than half' or 'none' of their close friends at Jewish. This contrasts with the 30-49 age group, in which more than half (54%) indicated that 'all' or 'most' of their close friends are Jewish.

ANTISEMITISM

A PROBLEM IN AUSTRALIA?

Survey respondents were asked for their view on the seriousness of antisemitism in Australia today, their personal experience of antisemitism, perception of antisemitism in the print, electronic and social media, and any actions they took when confronted with antisemitism on social media.

Opinion is divided about the extent of antisemitism in Australia today, with more of the view that it is 'not a very big problem' than of the view that it is a 'very big' or 'fairly big' problem.

> "Opinion is divided about the extent of antisemitism in Australia today, with more of the view that it is 'not a very big problem' than of the view that it is a 'very big' or 'fairly big' problem."

There is a large degree of commonality in appraisal of antisemitism among the attendees of different schools; in the age group 18-29, those of the view that antisemitism is a 'very big' or 'fairly big' problem is in the range 31%-46%, in the age group 30-49 a higher range, from 41%-45%.

The response option favoured by the largest proportion of is that antisemitism is 'not a very big problem', selected in the range 45%-65% among those aged 18-29, with the highest proportion among those who attended a non-Orthodox school; assessment of the extent of the problem finds opinion most evenly divided (46%-47%) among those who did not attend a Jewish school. Among those aged 30-49, an identical 51% across attendees of Orthodox school, including Mount Scopus, and those who did not attend a Jewish school, indicate that that antisemitism is 'not a very big problem'.

Very few respondents across the two age groups, less than 3%, are of the view that antisemitism is 'not a problem at all'.

EXPERIENCE OF ANTISEMITISM

Respondents were asked if they had witnessed any antisemitic incidents in the last twelve months, with reference to insults, harassment or physical attack.

The majority, in the range 65%-78% among those aged 18-29, 70%-87% aged 30-49, did not witness antisemitic incidents. But a relatively large proportion – in the range 10%-30% – indicated that they had witnessed Jews being verbally insulted or harassed, with a higher proportion in the 18-29 age group. The range within the 18-29 year age group is 11% Mount Scopus attendees, 21% non-Orthodox, 24% did not attend a Jewish school, and a high of 30% Orthodox.

Physical attack was rarely witnessed, indicated by 2% or less, with the exception of 4% indicated by those aged 18-29 from a non-Orthodox school, and 6% aged 30-49 from an Orthodox school. (Table 42)

With regard to personal experience of these forms of antisemitism, a marginally lower proportion is indicated. Personal experience of physical attack ranges from zero to 2%, experience of verbal harassment is in the range 19%-21% for Orthodox schools, non-Orthodox, and did not attend, but a lower 8% among those who attended Mount Scopus.

Those indicating that they have not experienced these forms of antisemitic incidents is in the range 74%-87% among those aged 18-29, 82%-92% aged 30-49.

There is relatively little difference among attendees of different schools, with the highest proportion indicating lack of personal experience of antisemitism among those who attended Mount Scopus.

ANTISEMITISM ON SOCIAL MEDIA

A fourth question asked respondents to consider antisemitic comments in personal discussions, on social media, in media reporting, and in graffiti. The question was not time limited and asked for assessment of the extent to which antisemitism was a problem is each of these contexts, whether is was 'a very big problem', 'fairly big problem', 'not a very big problem', or 'not at all a problem'.

Indication of 'very big' or 'fairly big problem' finds a large degree of commonality across the schools and age groups.

Almost three quarters of respondents – in the range 74%-82% among those aged 18-29 – consider that antisemitic comment a 'very big' or 'fairly big problem' on social media and other internet sites.

Antisemitic reporting in the media is seen as a 'very big' or 'fairly big problem' across the age groups by 55%-61% of those who attended an Orthodox school, or Mount Scopus, in the range 37%-41% of those who attended a non-Orthodox school and those who did not attend a Jewish school.

A majority of attendees of an Orthodox school, or Mount Scopus, in the range 55%-61%, consider that antisemitic reporting in the media is a problem, with a lower proportion (37%-41%) among those who attended a non-Orthodox school and those who did not attend a Jewish school.

Antisemitic graffiti was considered to be a problem by more than 40% of among those who attended a Jewish school, a marginally lower proportion of those who did not attend a Jewish school.

Antisemitic comments in discussions at work or at school was indicated by close to one-third of respondents, with a higher level indicated in the younger age group, and a high point of 51% among those aged 18-29 who did not attend a Jewish school.

A fifth question specified antisemitic content seen over the last twelve months on specific social media platforms.

Only a very small minority, in the range 3%-13%, indicated that they had not seen antisemitic content online.

As with findings for previous questions, there was only minor difference by school attended, an important finding that highlights the pervasive nature of antisemitism content which is witnessed.

Among those aged 18-29, Facebook is by a large margin the social media platform on which antisemitism is most likely to be experienced, indicated in the range 76%-89%, compared to the range 44%-50% among those aged 30-49. This difference is likely to be explained by frequency of use, which is likely to be higher among younger age group.

Among those aged 30-49, antisemitic content is most likely to be experienced on Twitter, in the range 61%-71%, compared to 18%-31% among those aged 18-29.

A final question asked respondents if they took any action the most recent time when they encountered antisemitism online, with the option of indicating more than one form of action taken, for example making a report to more than one organisation and writing an online comment.

Between a third and half took no action, with some variation by school attended: of those ~~who~~ aged 18-29, 53% of those who attended an Orthodox school took no action, 47% who did not attend a Jewish school, 42% who attended Mount Scopus, and 35% who attended a non-Orthodox school.

Among respondents aged 18-29, a majority (53%) of those who attended a non-Orthodox school made a report to platform operator, 39% who attended Mount Scopus, 36% who did not attend a Jewish school, and 30% who attended an Orthodox school; 7%-11% of those aged 18-29 who attended a Jewish school wrote a response, a substantially higher 26% who did not attend a Jewish school; and 12%-17% shared the content with family, friends or colleagues.

Of those who attended a Jewish school, only 7%-8% reported the antisemitic content to a Jewish authority, no one who did not attend a Jewish school. Almost no one (2% or less) made a report to the police.

CONNECTION AND ATTITUDES TO ISRAEL

The Gen17 survey included a broad range of questions that considered connection and attitude to Israel:

- 'Do you consider yourself to be a Zionist?
- 'How many different times in your life have you visited Israel, if at all?'
- 'What was the longest time you spent in Israel at any one visit?'
- 'What have been your reasons for visiting Israel?'
- 'Have you any close family living in Israel?' and 'Have you any close friends living in Israel?'
- 'To what extent do you keep up with current events which involve Israel?'
- 'To what extent do you agree or disagree with the following statements: I feel a sense of responsibility to ensure that the State of Israel continues to exist'
- 'When international events put Israel in danger … how [do] you feel?'
- 'How important is supporting Israel financially to your own sense of Jewish identity?'

For a large majority for the members of the Melbourne Jewish community, Zionism is not an abstract concept but central to their lived experience. They have visited Israel, typically on a number of occasions, have friends and relatives living in Israel, and keep up to date with events impacting on Israel. Concern for the security of Israel is the immediate issue that more than any other unifies a community which in many other respects is divided in attitude, observances and other aspects of behaviour.

ZIONISM

Respondents were asked if they regarded themselves as a Zionist. The question was worded:

> Although there are different opinions about what the term Zionism means, in general, do you consider yourself to be a Zionist?

The majority of respondents in each school group indicated that they regarded themselves as a Zionist, with some variation by school attended – and consistently higher proportion in the younger age group.

Of those aged 18-29, 90% of those who attend Mount Scopus responded 'yes', just 2% 'no' and 8% did not know. The proportion responding yes was 80% for Orthodox schools, 78% non-Orthodox, and a substantially lower 62% among those who did not attend a Jewish school, with a high 28% responding 'no'.

In all school groups the proportion who identified as a Zionist was lower in the older age group, with a range from 75% of those who attended Mount Scopus to 54% of those who did not attend a Jewish school. Those responding 'no' was at a high point of 32% among those aged 30-49 who did not attend a Jewish school. Close to one in ten did not know how to answer or preferred not to say.

VISITING ISRAEL

Of those who attended a Jewish school, only a small minority responded that visiting Israel was unimportant ('fairly unimportant', or 'very unimportant') to their Jewish identity: among those aged 18-29, 10% who attended an Orthodox school, 13% Mount Scopus, 23% non-Orthodox, and a higher 31% who did not attend a Jewish day school. Similar results were obtained for the 30-49 age group.

With regard to the number of times they had visited Israel, of those who attended a Jewish school and were aged 18-29, a substantial majority had visited over three times: 71% Orthodox school, 69% Mount Scopus, 61% non-Orthodox, but a minority of 27% among those who did not attend a Jewish school.

Very few (4% or less) in the younger age group who had attended a Jewish school had not visited Israel, compared to a substantial 31% who did not attend a Jewish school.

Reasons for visiting

Respondents who had visited Israel were asked to indicate their reason for visiting in a question that provided respondents with options to indicate all reasons, other than to attend a youth program.

The top two reasons indicated by respondents aged 18-29 were tourism and to visit family.

The highest proportion indicating tourism were those who attended Mount Scopus (73%), the lowest those who did not attend a Jewish school (28%).

A relatively even proportion across the schools indicated 'to visit family', in the range 47%-62%.

Those who attended an Orthodox school differ in the relatively high proportion indicating visit to undertake religious study (49%, compared to 8% Mount Scopus), to attend a simcha celebration (48%), and to visit friends (43%).

Of those who attended a Jewish school, 10%-14% indicated that they had lived in Israel, but not to make aliyah, a lower 7% of those who did not attend a Jewish school.

Visiting Israel to volunteer at a kibbutz was indicated by 10%-13% of Mount Scopus and non-Orthodox school attendees, 6% who did not attend a Jewish school and 2% from an Orthodox school.

LENGTH OF TIME IN ISRAEL AND PERSONAL CONNECTIONS

Of those who had visited Israel and were aged 18-29, a substantial majority who attended a Jewish day school spent at least four months in Israel: 81% Orthodox school, 63% Mount Scopus, 65% non-Orthodox, but a lower 46% who did not attend.

Of these, a substantial proportion indicated that they had spent one or more years in Israel – 61% from an Orthodox school and a consistent range of 28%-30% from the other schools, including those who did not attend a Jewish school. (Table 50)

In a significant finding, the younger group have spent more time in Israel, even though they have lived a shorter span of years in which to visit. The relative proportions for four or more months of those who attended an Orthodox school are 81% aged 18-29, 61% aged 30-49, for Mount Scopus 63% and 35%, and for those who did not attend a Jewish school 46% and 27%.

Of respondents aged 18-29, more than half from each school have close friends living in Israel, ranging from 52% who did not attend a Jewish school, 66%-69% Mount Scopus and non-Orthodox, and 82% Orthodox. There was a similar pattern with regard to family living in Israel, but indicated by a marginally lower proportion, lower by 4%-10%.

INVOLVEMENT WITH ISRAEL

Level of personal interest and emotional identification with Israel was indicated by questions that asked respondents the extent to which they kept up with events involving Israel, their level of concern when Israel is in danger, and their sense of responsibility to ensure that Israel continues to exist.

With regard to keeping up with current events which involve Israel, those who indicate a lack of interest ('not at all') are a very small minority: less than 3% of those who attended a Jewish school, 9%-10% of those who did not attend a Jewish school.

Indication of 'a little' interest ranges from 27% to 47% across the schools and two age groups, indicated by 27% of the those aged 18-29 who attended an Orthodox school, 41% Mount Scopus, 47% non-Orthodox, and 36% who did not attend a Jewish school. There was a similar pattern of response among those aged 30-49, with the exception of a relatively high 40% among those who attended an Orthodox school.

A substantial majority indicated 'a lot' and 'quite a lot' of interest, in the range 52%-70% among those aged 18-29, 50%-57% aged 30-49.

With regard to reaction when international events put Israel in danger, there was little difference by age group in the proportion who indicated no special concern: this response was indicated by 1%-3% among those who attended an Orthodox school, or Mount Scopus, 9%-11% non-Orthodox and those who did not attend a Jewish school.

In contrast, the majority of respondents who attended a Jewish school selected the response options that indicated their concern was 'almost the same as if my own life was in danger' or 'I feel a special alarm', indicated by 79%-80% attendees of an Orthodox school, 65%-72% and Mount Scopus, 59% non-Orthodox, and 46%-58% who did not attend a Jewish school.

In response to the proposition that 'I feel a sense of responsibility to ensure that the State of Israel continues to exist', a significant finding is that more than 80% of attendees of Jewish schools in both age groups indicated agreement, and a substantial majority of 68% aged 18-29 and 79% aged 30-49 among those who did not attend a Jewish school.

'Strong disagreement' is at a minimal 1% for attendees of Jewish schools, 6%-7% of those who did not attend a Jewish school. The combined 'tend to disagree' and 'strongly disagree' is at 10% or less across the age groups and schools, with the exception of those aged 18-29 who did not attend a Jewish school, where is 17%.

VIEW OF ISRAELI SOCIETY: PEACE AND POLITICS

Responses to four propositions about Israeli society and three propositions about the peace process found substantial agreement on some propositions that are critical of Israel; negative sentiment was consistently higher among those aged 18-29 compared to those aged 30-49. The highest level of negative sentiment is amongst those who attended a non-Orthodox school or did not attend a Jewish school.

The response to each proposition is presented in Table 54, providing summary indication of those who agree ('strongly agree' or 'tend to agree') and disagree ('tend to disagree or 'strongly disagree').

The proposition that 'there is too much corruption in Israel's political system' is the only one that obtains majority agreement among those aged 18-29, in the range 51%-63%; among those aged 30-49, agreement is in the range 43%-51%.

The proposition that 'Orthodox Judaism has too much influence in Israel's society' obtains agreement in the range 62%-76% among those aged 18-29 who attended Mount Scopus, a non-Orthodox school and those who did not attend a Jewish school, and a similar pattern of agreement with the proposition that 'In Israel, non-Jewish groups suffer from discrimination', in a lower range from 52%-72%. The highest level of negative response is among attendees of a non-Orthodox school. Only a minority of those aged 18-29 who attended an Orthodox school, 29% and 33% respectively, indicate agreement with the two propositions.

The fourth proposition that 'democracy in Israel is alive and well' finds majority agreement (60%-79%) across the two age groups among those who attended an Orthodox school or Mount Scopus, also majority or close to majority agreement among those who did not attend a Jewish school (47%, 68%), but not among those who attended a non-Orthodox school, with agreement at a low 33% and disagreement at 50%.

With regard to statements concerning the peace process, there is a divide between those who attended an Orthodox school and Mount Scopus on the one hand, and those who attended a non-Orthodox school or who did not attend a Jewish school on the other.

Thus the proposition that 'Israel should give up territory in exchange for guarantees of peace with the Palestinians' finds minority agreement among respondents aged 18-29 from an Orthodox school (24%) and Mount Scopus (47%), a substantial majority among non-Orthodox (70%) and those who did not attend a Jewish school (69%), with agreement consistently higher among the younger age group.

A majority aged 18-29 of those who attended an Orthodox school (69%) and Mount Scopus (52%) agree that Israeli control of the West Bank is vital for its security. This contrasts with just 28% of attendees of a non-Orthodox school and 22% who did not attend a Jewish school, substantially lower than the older age group who did not attend a Jewish school (47%).

Among respondents aged 18-29 the proposition that 'Israel should negotiate with Hamas in its efforts to achieve peace' obtains minority agreement among Orthodox (23%) and Mount Scopus (25%), a larger minority in agreement among non-Orthodox (40%) and those who did not attend a Jewish school (46%). Again, the trend is for the younger respondents to be more open to the negotiation to achieve peace.

FINANCIAL SUPPORT FOR ISRAEL

The survey included two questions on financial support for Israel. First, respondents were asked to indicate the importance of supporting Israel financially in terms of their Jewish identity. Later in the survey, respondents were asked to indicate their priority in charitable donations, with Israel included in the list of possible causes for support.

Among those aged 18-29, supporting Israel financially was deemed important by two thirds (66%) of those who attended an Orthodox school and lower proportions among those who attended other schools: 46% Mount Scopus, 33% non-Orthodox, and 22% those who did not attend a Jewish school. Consistently higher proportions among those aged 30-49 indicated that financial support of Israel was important.

When asked to indicate their priorities in supporting charitable causes, a majority across the school and age groups gave priority to Australian charities. Israel charities were the highest priority for close to one-in-ten respondents, with the exception at 19% of 18-29 year-old who attended an Orthodox school and 14% of 30-49 year-old who attended Mount Scopus.

A final question in the Israel module of the survey asked, 'how likely is it that you will choose to live permanently in Israel in the future?'

The highest proportion at 16% indicating 'very likely' was in the younger age group and among those who attended an Orthodox school; the proportion for other schools was below 10%.

'Not at all likely' among those aged 18-29 was indicated by 19% of those who attended an Orthodox school, 33%-38% Mount Scopus and non-Orthodox, and 46% of those who did not attend a Jewish school.

APPENDIX1: METHODOLOGY

This discussion is extracted from David Graham and Andrew Markus, Gen17 Australian Jewish Community Survey Preliminary Findings (2018). The principal author of the methodological discussion was Dr David Graham.

Questionnaire design

Whilst the survey instrument was broadly based on the Gen08 questionnaire,[25] it was by no means a carbon copy. In the first instance, the survey team was keen to try to shorten the length of the survey in order to reduce the time burden on respondents. But amendments were also implemented following a comprehensive consultation exercise with the community. For example, in NSW, the survey team met with key stakeholders and communal representatives (e.g. school presidents, the NSW Jewish Board of Deputies, the Community Security Group, the Executive Council of Australian Jewry, Jewish Care, and the Sydney Jewish Museum) to test questions and identify new topics and issues facing different service providers. Questions were also amended or removed where it was felt they had not worked optimally in the 2008 survey or were no longer relevant or required amending for other reasons.

One key difference made to the 2017 instrument was the implementation of a set of questions enabling the survey team to uniquely identify households without compromising the confidentiality requirements of Monash University's ethics review panel. Importantly, this avoided the possibility of double counting households, and also reduced the total response time burden by ensuring only one person in each household completed household-specific questions.

Sampling

It is not possible to carry out a random probability sample of Australian Jews, since no universal and up-to-date list of names and contact details exists from which a sample can be drawn. Therefore, alternative approaches must be sought to identify Jews in a scientifically reasonable manner. In the United States, major national community studies (such an NJPS 2000-01 and the 2013 Pew Research Center Survey) have been carried out using random (or stratified-random) digit telephone dialling.[26] But in Australia, where the Jewish population, in relative terms, is four times rarer than in the US, and where the Jewish population is well understood from census data on religion, such a strategy is financially unviable, but also unnecessary.[27]

Thus, a pragmatic approach to sampling was devised considering the limited budgets available, but one that also minimised the extent to which data integrity might be compromised. The approach utilised and built on the methods successfully employed in the Gen08 project as well as those used internationally such as in the UK's 2013 NJCS study.[28]

Sampling procedure

The initial approach taken was a geographically stratified, non-probability convenience sample. It was carried out online[29] and eligibility was assessed by a series of questions starting with whether respondents saw themselves 'as being Jewish in any way at all'. Independent approaches to sampling were developed in order to maximise the response level. In NSW/ACT the sampling frame was initially based on a combined list provided by the extensive and very well-maintained databases held by JCA and the NSW Jewish Board of Deputies (NSWJBD). In Melbourne there is no community database of comparable size and reliability to those in Sydney. As a consequence, the Australian Centre for Jewish Civilisation (ACJC) worked with a wide range of community organisations to promote the Gen17 survey. A key partner, Jewish Care Victoria, posted invitations to participate to 3000 randomly selected households on their database and an additional 3000 on their email database. A follow up email was sent three weeks later. Other invitations were sent to email lists and via their newsletters by various organisations including synagogues and schools and other community organisations. In Melbourne the survey was also promoted via a designated Gen17 Facebook page and individuals were encouraged to promote the survey to their social media networks. An animated video was created which was viewed and shared in emails and on Facebook. The Gen17 Facebook page, managed by ACJC, generated 379 'followers', 10 (of several) posts were 'boosted' (i.e. turned into paid campaigns to a target audience) reaching 7,630 people and leaving 17,790 impressions.

[27] Even though the US Jewish population is over 55 times larger than the Australian Jewish population it was still necessary for NJPS to screen 175,000 phone numbers and Pew to screen 71,000 phone numbers.

The survey was promoted for six weeks in both Sydney and Melbourne in paid advertising in the Australian Jewish News and in the Jewish Report. In Melbourne promotional cards were distributed at key communal events, outside kosher establishments, on university campuses and at the In One Voice festival. A promotional flier was generated for the elderly community and distributed by Jewish Care and Emmy Monash, encouraging members of their family to help them complete the survey. A flier was also translated into Russian and distributed by Jewish Care and members of the Russian Jewish community. The survey was also promoted to Israelis via specific Facebook groups, websites and blogs…

In Victoria those who received a direct invitation to participate were also provided with a password providing access to the survey; people could also visit the survey website and request a password, which was sent to them by an automated survey. A significant finding, as presented in this report, is the large measure of consistency in response across the two major states surveyed, which was obtained despite the different approaches to recruitment of participants.

The Gen17 survey questionnaire was highly complex and necessitated the recruitment of a professional polling company to program the online instrument, send out and track thousands of unique invitations, and securely collect and collate the responses. The international polling company Research Now was enlisted for this task based on the success of previous collaborations with ACJC and work on Gen08 itself.

The team also undertook a sophisticated marketing campaign prior to, and during, the fieldwork. This was designed to increase communal awareness of the project pre-launch and publicise it as widely as possible during the fieldwork period. To do this, a professional PR/ad agency was enlisted to create a design concept, theme, logo, branding and messaging for the campaign using traditional and new media outlets. Finally, to encourage maximum participation, a financial incentive was offered in the form of a prize draw for the chance to win one of three cash vouchers each worth $400AUD.

Response diagnostics

The graph below plots the total time taken to complete the Gen17 survey by frequency. This shows most respondents completed the survey in between half an hour and three quarters of an hour; the modal[30] time taken was 37 minutes. This is reflective of the considerable investment by respondents in the Gen17 project. It also shows a long tail (truncated at 120 minutes in the graph) since many people completed the survey in multiple sittings and did not necessarily log out of the system between sessions.

The median[31] time taken to complete the survey was 49 minutes. However, Householders (i.e. those randomly selected to complete household-specific questions) took slightly longer to do so (52 minutes) than non-householders (46 minutes). Respondents in NSW spent longer completing the survey (53 minutes) than respondents in Victoria (45 minutes).

* This chart shows 80% of the data. For reasons of space we have not shown the long tail of data beyond 120 minutes (see text)

Gen17 was in the field for just under 14 weeks. It went live on 15 February 2017 and was finally closed on 22 May 2017…

Sample evaluation and data weighting

It was the intention of the survey team to achieve a very large sample in order to facilitate more detailed statistical analyses. The final Gen17 sample size was 8,621 respondents including 4,571 unique households. (The survey also contains information on other household members so in total there are data on 13,643 people.)

The size of the Gen17 sample is enormous by any comparative standards and almost 50% larger than the Gen08 survey containing 5,840 respondents. Since there were between 85,000 and 90,000 Jewish people aged 18 and above in Australia in 2016[32], Gen17 represents 10% of the entire Jewish population. The sheer size of the sample means that detailed sub-group analyses can be carried out that are simply not feasible using smaller sample sets. By way of contextualisation, the 2013 Pew survey of the United States' Jewish community contains a sample of 3,475 Jewish [30] The mode is the point in a distribution where the highest frequency occurs (in other words 'the most').

[31] The median of a distribution is the point where half the population is below the point and half is above.
[32] The number of people aged 18 or over in 2016 was 71,479. However, this is the reported number unadjusted for non-response due to the voluntary nature of the religion question. Further, the 2016 Census changed the format of the religion question which further depressed the likelihood of Jews reporting their religion as Jewish.

respondents[33] for a population of six million Jews and the UK's NJCS achieved a sample of 3,736 respondents[34] for a population of 300,000 Jewish people. The New York 2011 study (population 1.5 million) contained 5,993 responses making it 'the largest such study ever conducted in North America'[35].

However the key question, as far as the quality of the data are concerned, is less about the absolute size of the sample and more about its representativeness. Given Gen17 is a non-probability sample, even a very large sample size may be skewed towards certain demographics and particular sections of the community who are more predisposed to such a survey than others. In the post-field context, the best way to address this issue is through weighting. In this regard Australia is fortunate in being able to rely on high-quality quinquennial national census data that includes a voluntary question on religion to bolster communal surveys.[36]

Weights have been applied to the final dataset in order to statistically adjust the data so that they more accurately reflect the known structure and distribution of Jews in Australia. For example, since the survey was primarily focused on NSW, VIC and ACT, other states were likely to be undersampled. Similarly, since the survey was carried out online people such as the very elderly were more likely to be undersampled. Weighting adjusts the actual data so that they align with a reliable baseline such as the census. Weights were created to adjust the survey data in line with 2016 Census[37] results on age, sex, state, and country of birth.

Further, a survey like Gen17 is also vulnerable to oversampling the communally engaged and connected as compared with communally distant and less engaged Jews. No amount of census weighting can adjust for this type of self-selection bias. Therefore, in addition to the census baseline data, a synagogue membership survey was carried out in NSW and Victoria to provide a baseline measure of Jewish communal engagement with which to further weight the data.[38] By subtracting the total membership figures from the total population size recorded in the 2016 census,[39] it was possible to create a baseline for weighting by 'Jewish identity': 1) those affiliated to an Orthodox synagogue; 2) those affiliated to a non-Orthodox synagogue; [40] and 3) those not affiliated to any synagogue.

In addition to the above measures taken to ensure the data are as representative as possible, we can also carry out some basic comparisons with fine-grained census data. For example, what evidence is there to indicate that the sample obtained is indeed representative of the Jewish community? This question can be considered with reference to the two major centres of Jewish population, Melbourne and Sydney, where close to 90% of the survey respondents were located.

Examination of the 2011 and 2016 Australian censuses in terms of the geographic location of the Jewish population shows consistent findings between the location of the Jewish population and the geographic location of survey respondents. Tables A3.1 and A3.2 indicate the distribution of the Jewish population in the census and Gen17 survey. Suburbs are ranked in terms of Jewish population size; first the five suburbs with the largest Jewish population, then succeeding groupings by five suburbs. Comparison with the weighted Gen17 data, which has been used throughout this report, is comparable to within 3 percentage points, an acceptable margin of error for such sample data.

[36] Graham D 2014 The Jewish Population of Australia Key findings from the 2011 Census
[37] It was mentioned earlier in this report that changes in the formatting of the census question on religion between 2011 and 2016 give us cause for concern about the accuracy of the 2016 Census count for Jews (and some other religious groups). However, we have taken the view that although these changes probably resulted in a Jewish undercount in 2016, our initial assessment suggests the relative (between-group) measures should still be reliable. As such, 2016 Census data form the basis of the Gen17 survey weighting.
[38] Synagogue membership data were gathered in NSW by the NSW Jewish Board of Deputies and in Victoria by researchers at the ACJC at Monash University. Despite considerable effort, attempts to gather synagogue membership data in other states and territories could not be achieved in a timely manner.
[39] As discussed, this was complicated by concerns that the 2016 Census data appear to have undercounted the total size of the Jewish population relative to the 2011 census. Detailed examination of this issue is ongoing but for the purposes of Gen17 the 2016 Census is assumed to have surveyed 88.4% of the Jewish population it would have sampled had the question format remained unchanged from 2011. Note this adjustment does not account for any non-response that may have occurred due to the voluntary nature of the census question.
[40] Orthodox = Hareidi, Strictly Orthodox, Modern Orthodox, Inclusive Orthodox, Chabad, Orthodox, and Sephardi synagogues; Non-Orthodox = Masorti, Progressive and Renewal, Progressive and Egalitarian, Conservative/Masorti, Liberal/Reform, and Jewish Humanist synagogues.

* Note Gen17 weights only accounted for state-level geography, not sub-state level

It is also possible to compare demographic indicators in the Gen08 and Gen17 surveys to establish if like is being compared with like. Have the two surveys reached a similar cross-section of the Jewish community, or are these significantly different samples that would invalidate their use in establishing change (or otherwise) over the last decade?[41]

One directly comparable indicator is self-assessed financial status. Respondents were asked in both surveys 'which of the following best describes your financial status/circumstances?' There is again a high level of consistency in response in the weighted results (Tables A3.3), with a maximum variation under 3 percentage points within the categories.

* Columns may not sum to 100% due to rounding

[41] As previously noted, care should be taken in drawing direct comparisons between Gen08 and Gen17 data. Unlike Gen17, the Gen08 data were not weighted to account for varying levels of Jewish identification. In other words, Gen08 data are more likely than Gen17 data to have over-represented the more engaged sections of the Jewish population.

1. INTRODUCTION

Executive Summary

During the twelve-month period, from 1 October 2022 to 30 September 2023, there were 495 antisemitic incidents logged by volunteer Community Security Groups (CSGs), official Jewish state roof bodies, and the ECAJ. In the previous 12-month period, ending 30 September 2022, these same bodies logged 478 incidents. Accordingly, there was an increase of 3.5% in the overall number of reported antisemitic incidents compared to the previous year (2022).

Overall, from 2022 to 2023, there were substantial increases in the number of reported incidents in three categories: assault (up 120% from 5 to 11), vandalism (up 100% from 11 to 22) and verbal abuse (up 36% from 138 to 188). There were significant decreases in two categories: messages (down 17% from 76 to 63) and posters (down 30% from 123 to 86). Graffiti remained the same at 125. Of note, most of the incidents of assault were generally mild, people throwing objects at Jews, slapping and pushing Jews rather than assault causing serious physical harm.

The average number of reported antisemitic incidents each year from 2013 to 2022 was 316. As such, the total number of reported incidents in 2023 is above that average by 179 incidents.

Looking at the incident data state by state, two things stand out. Firstly, unlike all previous years, more incidents were recorded in Victoria than in NSW, a difference of 20%, and not only in the total, but also in four categories. (In the past, it was understood that NSW had more recorded incidents due to more streamlined reporting methods). Secondly, for the first time, a smaller state, Queensland, had a higher number of incidents than in NSW or Victoria, in one category, that of posters/leaflets.

Of the three major groupings of incidents:

- 51% of incidents were direct non-physical attacks on Jews: verbal abuse, gestures, or directly-addressed messages via email, phone, letters.

- 42% of incidents were in the form of anti-Jewish propaganda: graffiti, posters, leaflets, stickers and the like.

- 7% of incidents involved some form of violence, either against Jewish individuals or against property.

In regard to the monthly tallies, there was a distinct spike in September 2023, coinciding with the annual Jewish High Holy Days. Most of the incidents in September were verbal abuse, particularly around synagogues, but also graffiti and leaflets, with all three categories in similar proportions.

As to antisemitism in general, two issues stand out over the 2023 period.

Firstly, the neo-Nazi movement in Australia has been emboldened. Australia's main neo-Nazi organisations are the National Socialist Network (NSN) and its twin the European Australian Movement (EAM). Melbourne is the main hub of neo-Nazi activity. Members of these groups have gathered on the steps of the Victorian Parliament twice, once on 18 March 2023 in opposition to the Transgender movement, and again on 13 May 2023 in opposition to the Federal government's plan to increase immigration to Australia. At both protests, they openly performed multiple Nazi salutes. This led to the introduction of legislation to ban the Nazi salute in Victoria. One person has already been charged under that law. Previously, NSN/EAM generally held more private meetings especially in gyms, sometimes in public parks, or on mountain hikes, rather than at highly public demonstrations to showcase their existence and beliefs.

Secondly, the Voice referendum, which was announced in March 2023 and voted on in October 2023, elicited a proliferation of online and other commentary promoting anti-Jewish conspiracy theories. Common themes were: 'the Jews' are behind the Voice referendum as part of the Jewish plot to destroy European-ethnic Australians; 'the Jews' are so powerful and evil that they control the government and force the government to make decisions that are considered to be not in the best interests of Australians but are in the interests of only Jews; and giving a 'Voice' to Australia's indigenous population through the Constitution will be one way to advance that Jewish goal. Discourse and images blaming 'the Jews' for the Voice occurred on extremist social media sites and websites for many months. As well, there were several leaflets distributed at anti-Voice rallies in Brisbane and Melbourne, and in the streets of Newtown, Sydney.

In general, while neo-Nazis are still active, and plotting their next moves, and although the Voice referendum is now history, the October 7 Hamas attacks in Israel shifted focus back to another major source of antisemitism – extremist Muslims (Islamists) and extreme left-wingers. These events occurred outside the time frame of this report, and hence their impact is not included in the incidents for the year in review, but will be fully detailed in next year's ECAJ Report on Antisemitism in Australia. However, given the gravity and unprecedented nature of the post October 7 anti-Jewish incidents in Australia, some incident statistics, albeit preliminary, appear in a separate 'Epilogue' section at the end of Chapter 2 Incidents.

Antisemitism has many active sources – extremist right-wingers, extremist left-wingers, and Islamists. Two of these sources, the extremist left and Islamists, are often allied, known as the red-green alliance, and often work together on issues relating to Jews and/or Israel. However, each of the main sources operates differently. In general: right-wing antisemitism is overt, but marginalised; left-wing antisemitism is insidious, but mainstreamed.

Current situation for Jews in Australia - Security

The Jewish community is the only community within Australia whose places of worship, schools, communal organisations and community centres need, for security reasons, to operate under the protection of high fences, armed guards, metal detectors, CCTV cameras and the like. This necessity is recognised by Australia's law enforcement agencies. It arises from the entrenched and protean nature of antisemitism in Western and Middle Eastern cultures, resulting in a high incidence of physical attacks against Jews and Jewish communal buildings over the last three decades, and continuing threats. Since October 7, the security threats have become more acute.

Selection Criteria for Inclusion in the Report

All incidents and material referred to in this report occurred in Australia between 1 October 2022 and 30 September 2023, with the exception of the post-October 7 incidents, the preliminary details of which are provided in a separate section at the end of Chapter 2. All content reproduced in this report was published in Australia or is freely accessible online from Australia.

Antisemitic content (Chapters 3 - 7) includes only discourse which is clearly and overtly antisemitic, according to the 'IHRA Working Definition of Antisemitism' (see section headed "Working Definition of Antisemitism" below). If there is reasonable room for doubt about whether anti-Jewish attitudes or tropes were a factor in the publication, the publication has not been included in this Report. Antisemitic content also includes anti-Israel content that uses clear antisemitic themes, including the denial of Jewish peoplehood and basic rights, within the meaning of the 'Working Definition'. The criteria used for inclusion of events in Chapter 2 'Incidents' are more restrictive and are detailed in that chapter.

Antisemitism: Incidents and Discourse in the Report

Each year, since 1990, the Executive Council of Australian Jewry (ECAJ), the peak elected national representative body of the Australian Jewish community, has published the Report on Antisemitism in Australia.

The ECAJ records antisemitism in two broad categories: incidents and discourse. In general, incidents are what 'is done to' Jews, while discourse is what 'is said about' Jews. Nevertheless, it is recognised that the latter can have a considerable influence on the former.

Incidents comprise six categories: physical assault; vandalism; verbal abuse, harassment and intimidation; hate messages via email, postal mail, and telephone; graffiti; and propaganda material such as banners, flags, leaflets, posters and stickers. Discourse refers to public discourse in the mainstream and other media, in print and online publications, discussions at public forums, and any other public discourse where the content is antisemitic. In the annual antisemitism reports published by the ECAJ both categories of antisemitism are covered.

Two other forms of antisemitism are discrimination and casual racism. Discrimination, for example, in employment, workplace, educational institutions, clubs, and elsewhere, is not covered in this report unless there is abuse or similar overt behaviour associated with the discrimination. In most cases, discrimination is covert, making it difficult to obtain evidence of its motivation. Casual racism (also called micro-aggression) is included in this report, citing some examples, in Chapter 3.

Jewish Identity

Judaism is most often defined or understood simply as the religion of the Jewish people. However, Judaism is much more than a religion. It is a civilisation that encompasses the full spectrum of the life of the Jewish people, its identity as a nation and a people, its legal system, religion, culture, customs, language, literature, history, values, ideals and vision for a future of justice and peace for the whole of humanity.

This dual identity as both a national and faith community can be traced to the very beginnings of the Jewish people. In the Bible, the Jews are consistently referred to as a nation ('goy') and as a people ('am'). The contemporary mind, which draws sharp distinctions between religion, culture and nationality, can find it difficult to grasp the nature of Jewish identity. Yet for most of human history, these facets of human self-definition were understood as being blended into an integrated whole. It is only in the last 300 years or so, and only in western thinking, that they have become conceptually compartmentalised. Most Jewish people continue to see themselves as a part of both a national and a faith community, as they always have. (The Sikhs, for example, are also defined in this way). Jews who are atheists but identify as Jews culturally are considered, by themselves and by most in the Jewish community, to be Jewish even though they do not adhere to any religious beliefs or practices.

Part of the modern Western understanding of Jews as only a religious community and not also a national community originates with the declaration by Count Stanislas de Clermont-Tonnerre to the National Assembly in France in 1789 in the debate on whether Jews should be given civil rights in France after the French Revolution, when he stated "To the Jews as individuals, all rights. To the Jews as a nation, no rights." And so began the non-Jewish idea of Jews as only a religious community. Contemporary anti-Zionists utilise this idea to deny that the Jews are also a nation.

The Term 'Antisemitism'

The word 'antisemitismus' ('antisemitism') was coined in 1879 by the German journalist and political agitator, Wilhelm Marr (1819-1904), to replace the older word Judenhass ("hatred of Jews") which denoted traditional hatred of Jews for religious reasons. Antisemitism, despite its name, is not directed at Semitic languages or Semitic peoples as a whole - it is directed solely at Jews.

Marr founded the Antisemitic League (Antisemiten-Liga) in 1879 to promote the hatred of Jews based on supposed racial, rather than religious, attributes. Marr believed that with the emancipation of the Jews in Germany in 1871, the "Jewish race" posed an existential threat to the "German race" and called for a "war against the Jews". Inventing a new term, 'antisemitism', one based in linguistics (with its ethnic connotations) rather than religion, was deemed necessary by Jew-haters because Europe was seen to be becoming less religious and more secular, and the anti-Judaism of Christianity was becoming less relevant to western societies.

Alternative terms to 'antisemitism', although not in popular usage, are 'Judeophobia' and 'Miso-Judaism'. As well, the older term 'Jew-hatred' is making a reappearance, in part due to the word 'antisemitism' often not being understood, or not being recognized as referring only to Jews, or being deliberately misused to promote it in its literal sense to include all Semitic peoples, notably Arabs, or to claim (falsely) that Arabs cannot be antisemitic as they too are Semites.

The Spelling of Antisemitism

The original spelling of 'antisemitism' was the German 'antisemitismus'. It is translated as 'antisémitisme' in French, 'antisemitismo' in Spanish, 'antishemiyut' in Hebrew, and so on, with no hyphen and no capital letters. Only English - more particularly American English - changed the spelling to include hyphenation and a capital 's' to form the word 'anti-Semitism'.

Emil Fackenheim in his Post-Holocaust Anti-Jewishness, Jewish Identity and the Centrality of Israel, in 'World Jewry and the State of Israel' ed. Moshe David, p11, n2, stated: "…the spelling ought to be antisemitism without the hyphen, dispelling the notion that there is an entity 'Semitism' which 'anti-Semitism' opposes."

What is Antisemitism?

Antisemitism is racism and bigotry against Jews. It is a prejudice and hatred spanning approximately 3000 years.

Antisemitism has both ethnic and religious dimensions and differs from other forms of racism and bigotry. Over time it has mutated in order to adapt to changing circumstances. In pre-Christian and pre-Islamic pagan societies, Jews were berated for nurturing, rather than killing, those of their children who fell ill, and for mandating a day of rest each week. With the advent of rival forms of monotheism, Christianity and Islam, this cultural prejudice gave way to religiously based hatred. The Jews' refusal to accept the theological claims of Jesus or Mohammed elicited indignation and demonization from their respective followers. Christian doctrine for many centuries held Jews collectively to be eternally guilty of Deicide, a belief not officially abandoned until the second half of the twentieth century.

From the late 1800's onwards, religious antisemitism was eclipsed by the anti-Jewish racial theories, which were eventually embraced by the Nazis. These theories were put forward in the name of genetic "science", but without the slightest evidentiary foundation. With the discrediting of Nazi racial doctrine, antisemitism went underground for several decades. It has now returned with a vengeance.

Contemporary antisemitism can also take the form of a denial of Jewish peoplehood and basic rights. To try to redefine the Jewish people as a non-people to suit the interests or convenience of others is not only dishonest but also an assault on the human dignity of every Jew. This is quintessential antisemitism. Given their relatively small numbers, the Jewish people have always been vulnerable, and for a long interval of 1800 years, were stateless, and could usually be victimised with impunity. Much of the rage directed against the modern State of Israel and the Jewish people arises from the fact that this is no longer possible. Some antisemites see Jewish powerlessness and vulnerability as the natural order of things which they seek to restore. Thus, it is precisely when Jews defend themselves successfully that the rage against them is at its most intense.

It is therefore a mistake to equate antisemitism only with yellow badges, concentration camps and gas chambers, and to dismiss other forms of antisemitism as "lesser" manifestations or not as "genuine" antisemitism.

In summary, contemporary antisemitism is manifested through:

1. Religious anti-Jewish themes deriving from Christian and Islamic theological supersessionism and supremacism

2. Racial antisemitism deriving from racial supremacist ideologies, including Nazi and white supremacist ideologies

3. Political antisemitism disguised as anti-Zionism and the denial of Jewish peoplehood, history, rights and dignity, emanating from both the far Left and the far Right.

Antisemitism: a brief history

The Jewish people are indigenous to the southern Levant region of the Middle East, and like many ancient peoples, have faced deportation and dispersion as a result of imperial invasions of their homeland, resulting in Jews living as a minority community in various other lands after the Babylonian exile in 586 BCE, and even as a minority in their homeland Israel/Judah from the 7th century CE onwards.

As a minority community, without an independent state, Jews were subject to the whims, political expediency, and religious intolerance, of the prevailing rulers and dominant cultures. False ideas, outright lies, vilification and demonization of Jews were spread and became entrenched within these cultures, usually resulting in discriminative laws, social ostracism, enforced segregation, forced conversion, expulsions, pogroms and massacres of Jews.

Pagan antisemitism: Antisemitism first arose in the pagan Greek and Roman worlds, which objected to the Jewish belief in monotheism, and to Jewish religious customs such as circumcision and kosher food laws, Jewish opposition to human sacrifice, support for the rule of law, and strong adherence to Jewish religious law. (In contrast, other pagan empires like the Assyrians, Babylonians, and Persians, held little or no animosity towards Jews or Jewish beliefs and practices). Several Greek and Roman writers propagated false accusations about Jews, many of which formed the basis of antisemitic thinking for millennia.

Christianity and Islam: both developed out of Judaism and Jewish religious texts. However, both Christianity and Islam are supersessionist and proselyting religions. Instead of embracing Jews, Christian and Muslim religious authorities viewed Jews as a dire threat to their beliefs, and hence to the source of their power, especially as Jews refused to convert to these new religions. Beliefs about Jews, often espoused in Christian and Muslim religious texts, included teachings about Jews being guilty of deicide (Christian Bible) or being the descendants of apes and pigs (Quran). These teachings portrayed Jews as enemies and encouraged hostility and open hatred towards Jews and led to the enactment of various laws aimed at humiliating and severely restricting Jewish life.

Jews were often forced to live in ghettoes or mellahs, a segregated area, often walled in. Jews had to wear identifying insignia on their clothing eg a badge, belt or specific hat to identify them as Jews throughout Christian and Islamic lands. Jews were discriminated against in Christendom eg barred from owning land, from work in professions, from membership in trade guilds; and in Muslim societies where Jews were barred from riding horses, from walking on the right-hand side of a Muslim, and forbidden from defending themselves when stones were thrown at them. In both lands, Jews frequently suffered forced conversions, forced removal of children (even into the 20th century), expulsion, and periodic massacres.

European Enlightenment, secularism and political theorists: the Enlightenment led to the Emancipation of the Jews (1791 – 1920s) from the ghettoes, and desegregation, and although discrimination was still rife, Jews sought to integrate into European society, which was increasingly becoming more secular. However, both right-wing and left-wing movements, capitalists and socialists held anti-Jewish beliefs. Conservatives and capitalists saw Jews as communists, agitators and revolutionaries; socialists saw Jews as bankers and exploiters of the working class. Leading intellectuals and thinkers such as Voltaire (who advocated freedom and civil liberties), Marx the communist ideologue, Bakunin the anarchist, and others publicly expressed views antagonistic towards Jews. The 'Protocols of the Elders of Zion', a fabricated document published in 1903 by the Czarist police, became a popular and widespread piece of anti-Jewish propaganda, still quoted to this day by antisemites.

Race theories: As religion lost its hold on society in the nineteenth century, science rapidly filled the vacuum, and 'scientific' ideas developed around eugenics and race. Racial theorists in the late 19th century espoused ideas such as belief in the inequality, and therefore a hierarchy, of races, with European races being superior. Hatred of Jews was transformed, from being based primarily on religion, to being deemed justified on the 'scientific' grounds of race or national origin as a non-European people. Thus 'racial antisemitism' was born. These race theories included ideas about an eternal cosmic struggle between 'the Aryan race' and 'the Jewish race'; these theories were adopted by Hitler and the Nazi Party and formed the core ideology of Nazism. This led to the Nazi policy of genocide, culminating in 6 million Jewish men, women and children being targeted, hunted and murdered in what became known as the Holocaust.

Anti-Zionism: With the re-establishment of a Jewish state in 1948 in the national homeland of the Jewish people, Jew-hatred again took on a new form, expressed as hostility and discrimination against the State of Israel, as the embodiment of the Jewish People. Campaigns and movements in the West demonized the very concept of Israel and in doing so, demonized the millions of Jews who live there and millions of others who support it politically. Millions of Jews living in the Arab world and Iran were driven out from 1941 onwards, many settling in Israel, whose Jewish population is predominantly from the Middle East and North Africa.

IHRA Working Definition of Antisemitism

The most widely accepted definition of antisemitism by western governments, among others, is the 'Working Definition of Antisemitism' adopted by the International Holocaust Remembrance Alliance (IHRA) on 26 May 2016. Australia was admitted to full membership of the IHRA in June 2019.

The IHRA is an intergovernmental body composed of (as of August 2023):

- 35 member countries: Argentina, Australia, Austria, Belgium, Bulgaria, Canada, Croatia, Czech Republic, Denmark, Estonia, Finland, France, Germany, Greece, Hungary, Ireland, Israel, Italy, Latvia, Lithuania, Luxembourg, Netherlands, North Macedonia, Norway, Poland, Portugal; Romania, Serbia, Slovakia, Slovenia, Spain, Sweden, Switzerland, United Kingdom, United States;

- 9 observer countries: Albania, Bosnia and Herzegovina, Brazil, Cyprus, Moldova, Monaco, New Zealand, Turkiye, Uruguay; and

- 8 Permanent International Partners: United Nations, UNESCO, OSCE/ODIHR, Arolsen Archives, European Agency for Fundamental Rights (FRA), European Union, Council of Europe, and the Conference on Jewish Material Claims Against Germany.

  https://www.holocaustremembrance.com/countries-and-membership

The IHRA Working Definition has its roots in the 'Working Definition of Antisemitism' formulated by the European Union Monitoring Commission (EUMC), now called the European Agency for Fundamental Rights (FRA), which was adopted in 2005 and distributed to all its national monitors. The EUMC and IHRA definitions are almost identical.

For the purposes of this Report, the ECAJ uses the IHRA Working Definition of Antisemitism.

The IHRA Working Definition of Antisemitism is as follows:

WORKING DEFINITION OF ANTISEMITISM

Working definition: "Antisemitism is a certain perception of Jews, which may be expressed as hatred toward Jews. Rhetorical and physical manifestations of antisemitism are directed toward Jewish or non-Jewish individuals and/or their property, toward Jewish community institutions and religious facilities."

Manifestations might include the targeting of the state of Israel, conceived as a Jewish collectivity. However, criticism of Israel similar to that leveled against any other country cannot be regarded as antisemitic.

Antisemitism frequently charges Jews with conspiring to harm humanity, and it is often used to blame Jews for "why things go wrong." It is expressed in speech, writing, visual forms and action, and employs sinister stereotypes and negative character traits.

Contemporary examples of antisemitism in public life, the media, schools, the workplace, and in the religious sphere could, taking into account the overall context, include, but are not limited to:

- Calling for, aiding, or justifying the killing or harming of Jews in the name of a radical ideology or an extremist view of religion.
- Making mendacious, dehumanizing, demonizing, or stereotypical allegations about Jews as such or the power of Jews as collective — such as, especially but not exclusively, the myth about a world Jewish conspiracy or of Jews controlling the media, economy, government or other societal institutions.
- Accusing Jews as a people of being responsible for real or imagined wrongdoing committed by a single Jewish person or group, or even for acts committed by non-Jews.
- Denying the fact, scope, mechanisms (e.g. gas chambers) or intentionality of the genocide of the Jewish people at the hands of National Socialist Germany and its supporters and accomplices during World War II (the Holocaust).
- Accusing the Jews as a people, or Israel as a state, of inventing or exaggerating the Holocaust.
- Accusing Jewish citizens of being more loyal to Israel, or to the alleged priorities of Jews worldwide, than to the interests of their own nations.
- Denying the Jewish people their right to self-determination, e.g., by claiming that the existence of a State of Israel is a racist endeavor.
- Applying double standards by requiring of it a behavior not expected or demanded of any other democratic nation.
- Using the symbols and images associated with classic antisemitism (e.g., claims of Jews killing Jesus or blood libel) to characterize Israel or Israelis.

- Drawing comparisons of contemporary Israeli policy to that of the Nazis.
- Holding Jews collectively responsible for actions of the state of Israel.

Antisemitic acts are criminal when they are so defined by law (for example, denial of the Holocaust or distribution of antisemitic materials in some countries).

Criminal acts are antisemitic when the targets of attacks, whether they are people or property – such as buildings, schools, places of worship and cemeteries – are selected because they are, or are perceived to be, Jewish or linked to Jews.

Antisemitic discrimination is the denial to Jews of opportunities or services available to others and is illegal in many countries.

Adoption of the IHRA working definition of antisemitism

- Günther Jikeli, Associate Professor, Institute for the Study of Contemporary Antisemitism (ISCA), Indiana University, USA, 21 July 2023:

"The IHRA working definition of antisemitism was developed by an interdisciplinary group of experts and IHRA Member Countries as a practical tool to identify complex forms of antisemitism. As countering antisemitism is central to the IHRA's mandate, the definition encourages collective solutions to the global spread of antisemitic messages. The working definition is therefore a significant resource for projects improving automated identification of antisemitic content endangering democratic freedoms on a global scale. Antisemitic content changes over time, and the definition advances an approach that holistically assesses hateful content to counter new forms of hate speech."

Definition of Antisemitism by 'Elder of Ziyon'

'Elder of Ziyon' (EoZ), a prominent online Jewish activist, produced a simplified and succinct formula for identifying antisemitism composed of both the forms it takes and the types of targets.

Extract:

"The EoZ Definition of Antisemitism"

Antisemitism is hostility toward, denigration of, malicious lies about or discrimination against Jews as individual Jews, as a people, as a religion, as an ethnic group or as a nation (i.e., Israel.)

The definition has four types of general actions that define antisemitism, and five terms for the object of these actions. The objects represent the different dimensions of what it means to be a Jew.

"Hostility toward Jews" is, I believe, a better formulation than "hate towards Jews." Hate is internal while hostility is generally noticeable to others. It does little good to make antisemitism a thought crime – antisemites usually don't admit that they hate Jews, but they often display hostility towards Jews. "Hostility towards Jews" includes violence.

"Denigration of Jews" is any act or speech that unfairly criticizes Jews. This is emphatically not "criticism of Jews" – one can have criticisms of Jews as a people or a nation or as individuals without being antisemitic. Denigration crosses the line from rational to irrational.

"Malicious lies about Jews" includes all conspiracy theories involving Jews, and there are hundreds of them. It also includes any stereotyping of Jews: it is difficult to imagine a more heterogeneous group than Jews are, and any assumption that Jews all are on the same page with any issue is invariably a malicious lie.

"Discrimination against Jews" is obviously antisemitic, just as any discrimination against any people is bigotry. Notably, the IHRA core definition does not mention discrimination.

Now let's look at the objects, Jews as "X."

"Jews as individual Jews" means that the words and actions are directed against Jews simply because they are Jews.

"Jews as a people" emphasizes the peoplehood of Jews whether they are religious or not. Jews have been referred to as a people ("am") since Biblical times. Attacking Jews as a people is clearly antisemitic.

"Jews as a religion" includes attacking Judaism itself. Again, we are only speaking of unfair or malicious attacks. Judaism may be criticized as may any other religion without it being antisemitic.

"Jews as an ethnic group" includes those who attack Jews for racial or xenophobic reasons. I didn't want to say "Jews as a racial group" because Jews are emphatically not a racial group. Most Jews are, however, part of an ethnic group and have been discriminated against or attacked on that basis.

Finally, we reach "Jews as a nation (i.e., Israel.)" …

Contemporary Forms of Anti-Jewish Discourse

Some expressions are easily identified as antisemitic, for example, "God damned you Jews to hell", "Jews run the world", the "evil greedy money-loving nature of Jews", or "Hitler should have finished them off."

Other comments are not as readily recognised as antisemitic. This can be because they are seen as ambiguous, or borderline, or coded, or disguised as ordinary political criticism of Israel, or because the connection to classical forms of antisemitism is not recognised. Not all people who harbour hostility towards Jews are open about their views. Often, antisemitic rhetoric is more subtle and less overt than that expressed by those who openly admit to being Jew-haters. Many will 'dog-whistle' or convey their messages 'between the lines.'

The word 'Zionist' in the hands of antisemites is also typically a substitute for the pejorative use of the word 'Jew'. A variation of that technique is the use of classical anti-Jewish motifs and themes in the expression of what, on the surface, may appear to be merely political opinions about Israel.

For example, where once it was said that the Jews seek to control the world, now it is said that Israel seeks to control the world; where once it was said that Jews lusted after Christian/gentile blood, now it is said that Israel lusts after Palestinian/gentile blood; where once it was said that Jews/Judaism were Satanic, now it is said that Israelis/Zionists are Satanic.

Themes in anti-Jewish rhetoric

Themes commonly found and expressed in anti-Jewish rhetoric in the period of review include:

- Jews as Christ-killers; Jews and Judaism as anti-Christian and Satanic; Christianity as a Jewish plot to destroy the European races; Jews plotting to destroy Islam; killers of prophets; cursed by G-d; a cursed and damned people; the Chosen People concept mischaracterised, mocked and denied; the Talmud portrayed as evil; Jews as bloodthirsty for gentile blood; Jews as the enemy of humanity.

- Jews as powerful, influential, and wealthy; Jews as having and exercising undue and disproportionate power and influence, usually against the interests of non-Jews, especially through the "Jewish Lobby" (aka Zionist or Israel lobby).

- Jews portrayed as conspiring to rule the world through control of international finance, media, and politics; manipulating events; fomenting wars; unleashing pandemics; aimed at subjugating the non-Jewish population of the world; an existential threat to non-Jews; and possessing enormous power and drive aimed at world domination.

- Jews as 'the other', not 'real Australians', foreigners, with dual loyalty.

- Jews and Jewish organisations being accused of concocting false accusations of antisemitism to gain an advantage, especially in order to stifle criticism of Israel.

- Holocaust denial, minimisation, distortion and denigration; Jews deserve to be killed; Hitler was right to kill Jews; the Jews must be killed.

- Israel as an inherently racist and apartheid state; Jewish/Nazi analogy; Israel as a Nazi state; Jewish Star of David = Nazi swastika; Israeli Jews as terrorists; committing genocide against Palestinians, Arabs, Muslims, and other non-Jews.

- Jews characterised as barbaric, bloodthirsty, callous, cruel, dirty, evil, foreign, greedy, hateful, malevolent, money-hungry, murderous, nefarious, racist, selfish, and stingy.

- Jews described as apes, bacillus, demonic, devils, disease, dogs, filth, germs, leeches, monkeys, parasites, pigs, rats, scum, vermin, a virus.

- Denying or minimising antisemitism – its existence, intensity and veracity. Gaslighting Jews or accusing Jews of being sensitive, defensive or paranoid.

"A nationwide survey of Australian [Jewish] university students has revealed widespread antisemitism on Australian university campuses. … The survey was carried out by the Social Research Centre. It was commissioned by the Australasian Union of Jewish Students [AUJS] and the Zionist Federation of Australia [ZFA]." https://www.zfa.com.au/survey/

"Approximately one in every 14 current Jewish university students participated in the survey." https://www.zfa.com.au/wp-content/uploads/2023/08/Survey-summary.pdf

Summary of findings:

- 64% reported at least one incident of antisemitism during their time at university.
- 88% of these students had encountered antisemitism within their last 12 months of university.

- 29% reported that university staff were active participants.
- 70% reported that where staff were present but not involved, staff ignored the incident.

- 57% of students have hidden their Jewish identity to avoid antisemitism at university.
- 67% of students who have experienced antisemitism on campus hide their Jewish identity.

- 19% of Jewish students have stayed away from campus to avoid antisemitism.
- 27% of Jewish students who have experienced antisemitism on campus have stayed away from campus.

- 85% of students did not make a complaint after their most impactful incident.
- 61% of those who complained were dissatisfied with the outcome.

Types of antisemitic behaviours - Of the six types of antisemitic behaviours measured, the percentage of students surveyed reporting each type were as follows:

- People or events that made you feel intimidated because of your Jewish identity (47%)
- Antisemitism based on perceptions of Jewish money, power or influence (37%)
- Someone comparing Israel to Nazi Germany (37%)
- Antisemitism based on religion or race (31%)
- Someone denying or minimising the Holocaust (30%)
- Being involuntarily singled out, or excluded, because of matters relating to Israel (25%).

"Across all antisemitic behaviours, students who are visibly Jewish (i.e., wear Jewish clothing and/or jewellery) were more likely to report exposure to these behaviours."

Three examples of university antisemitism include:

- "A teacher told me I would be good at business because I was a Jew, and other similar remarks."

- "A person in my class heiled Hitler to me and not a single professor/ tutor or student did anything."

- "The socialist movement has said things to me, including calling me a "dirty Zionist Jew" as someone who is clearly a religious student with kippah, tzitzit and a beard."

J-Wire included comments by two Jewish students on campus antisemitism:
https://www.jwire.com.au/antisemitism-on-campus/

"I would say probably the most frequent antisemitic interaction I've had… would be just walking down the main street of campus Eastern Avenue being called a kike and dirty Jew and a Jewish pig by members of the Socialist Alternative. They were actually standing behind their stall on Eastern Avenue at the time." and "On other occasions, I was called a dirty Jew and Jewish pig on campus without wearing a yarmulke or any identifying clothes or jewellery, just walking through Sydney Uni."

- Jewish University Experience Survey (USA, 2023)

A national survey by Ipsos, on behalf of Jewish on Campus and supported by the World Jewish Congress, was conducted between 19 March and 24 May 2023. Ipsos "investigators "interviewed 2,020 college students from the general population and 1,022 who identified as Jewish about their perceptions of and experiences with antisemitism. Findings from the survey include that nearly one-third of Jewish students surveyed (29%) witnessed or experienced an antisemitic incident on their campus; 50% of them witnessed or experienced hate speech; and 72% of them witnessed or experienced microaggressions."

- UK Studies identify predictors of antisemitism

Two studies were conducted by UK based researchers Daniel Allington (King's College London, London, UK), David Hirsh (Goldsmiths, University of London, London, UK), and Louise Katz (Arden University, Coventry, UK) to identify predictors of antisemitism by examining the opinions of people with antisemitic views. The full article of the study is published at https://doi.org/10.1057/s41599-023-01624-y and extracts from its lengthy abstract is below.

Antisemitism is predicted by anti-hierarchical aggression, totalitarianism, and belief in malevolent global conspiracies

- Daniel Allington, David Hirsh & Louise Katz

Humanities and Social Sciences Communications volume 10, Article number: 155 (2023)
Published: 10 April 2023

Abstract

"Two cross-sectional studies were carried out in order to identify predictors of antisemitism… Ethnicity, support for totalitarian government, belief in malevolent global conspiracies, and anti-hierarchical aggression were identified as the strongest predictors of Generalised Antisemitism. … However, support for totalitarian government was only found to predict 'old' antisemitic attitudes … and not 'new' antisemitic attitudes … whereas ethnicity, anti-hierarchical aggression, and belief in malevolent global conspiracies were found to predict both 'old' and 'new' antisemitic attitudes.

This finding adds nuance to ongoing debates about whether antisemitism is more prevalent on the political right or left, by suggesting that (at least in the UK) it is instead associated with a conspiracist view of the world, a desire to overturn the social order, and a preference for authoritarian forms of government—all of which may exist on the right, the left, and elsewhere. …

In sum, the findings of the studies reported here align with much recent qualitative scholarship in suggesting that, at least in the UK, it is neither the left nor the right per se that threatens Jews. Rather, it is individuals (and, by extension, perhaps also groups) with a conspiracist view of world affairs, as well as those who desire to overthrow the social order, and those attracted to the idea of installing or living under a totalitarian regime, regardless of whether such people are to be found on the left, on the right, or in any other ideological space.

This implies that the focus of those who would oppose antisemitism should not be on attacking or defending the left or the right as supposedly homogeneous blocs, but rather on examining the specific ideological position of political movements or formations that may identify themselves with one, the other, neither, or perhaps even both—and applying criticism accordingly."

UK Study:

Study reveals people most likely to hold antisemitic views
10 July 2023

The findings suggest that antisemitism may be less closely linked to political beliefs than has previously been implied, and more closely linked to opinions and views on other topics such as religion, ethnic nationalism, and conspiracy theories. …

The major finding of both studies is that antisemitism is predicted by a conspiratorial understanding of the world as it is, by openness to totalitarian rule, and, above all, by a desire for revolution.

Insights into Antisemitism

Ahmed Shaheed, UN Special Rapporteur on Freedom of Religion or Belief, 2 Dec. 2020:
"I've called it [antisemitism] the oldest hatred. I've also called it one of the most violent forms of hatred. And one of the most pervasive forms of hatred. I have prioritised combating antisemitism, not only because it is so violent and so widespread, but also because it essentially threatens democracy everywhere... It's not a problem for the Jewish communities alone, it's a problem for all of us."

Alex Ryvchin, Co-CEO, ECAJ, 20 May 2023:
"There are many aspects of antisemitism that make it distinct from other forms of hatred. Its transmission through well-honed mythology and conspiracies, its characterization of Jews as both inferior and malevolently superior. But its capacity to shift from prejudice to an all-consuming quest must be its most distinct feature. Hitler unleashed the most devastating war in history in pursuit of eradicating Jews. … Another aspect of antisemitism that makes it unique is its nostalgia for a purer, bygone age and the belief that the Jew is the agent of its corruption."

Alvin H. Rosenfeld, director Indiana University Institute for the Study of Contemporary Antisemitism, 3 Aug. 2023:
"There are two important sources of antisemitism. … is the figure of the conspiratorial Jew. The other is his figurative brother, the diabolical Jew. Bring the two together, and you have the delusional but abiding portrait of Jews as a community inherently hostile to non-Jews, intent on bringing endless suffering to mankind — a community that must be dealt with decisively before it is too late. … The idea of the malevolent Jews, collectively bent on ruining the world or secretly plotting to control it (or perhaps doing the one in order to achieve the other) … Denunciations such as these branded Jews as collectively and irredeemably wicked, a designation of infamy always available to explain any source of misfortune or explain away any inconvenient evidence. … today's antisemitism comes from the reactionary Right and the progressive Left, from whites and from blacks."

American Jewish Committee (AJC), 27 March 2023:
"Israel has also become code for Jews as a collective, and symbols and images associated with classic antisemitism such as blood libel to characterize Israel or Israelis have seen a resurgence."

Avi Weiss and Eitan Fischberger, rabbi and writer respectively, 2 June 2023:
"anti-Zionism, the denial of the Jewish right to self-determination in their ancestral homeland, almost invariably manifests as a politically correct version of antisemitism."

Bennett Arron, writer, 15 Nov. 2022:
"If Jews see antisemitism yet say nothing, it continues. If Jews see antisemitism, call it out but nothing happens, we are accused of lying or playing the victim. If Jews see antisemitism, call it out and someone is punished, then we are accused of controlling everything."

Bret Stephens, editor-in-chief of Sapir journal, Aug. 2023:
"The racist and ethnic bigot thinks the objects of his bigotry are deservedly beneath him. The antisemite thinks the object of his bigotry is undeservedly above him. … It is why antisemitism can sit as comfortably with the anti-capitalist Left of a Jeremy Corbyn as it can with the xenophobic Right of a Jean-Marie Le Pen. … antisemitism … almost always takes the form of a conspiracy theory. It is the belief that behind history's greatest crimes and the world's greatest ills lies the hidden hand of a Jew: the Jew as killer of Christ, as murderer of children, as bringer of plague, as financier of war, as underminer of morality, as instigator of 9/11, as replacer of the white working class in the United States, as displacer of native inhabitants in Palestine. It never ends. … Antisemitism is a conspiracy theory that holds that Jews are uniquely prone to using devious methods to achieve their malevolent ends, and that they must therefore be opposed by any means necessary."

David Hirsh, Senior Lecturer in Sociology, University of London, 12 Jan. 2022:
"Antisemitism is not a movement against something that exists, called "Semites" or called Jews; it is a movement against a notion of "the Jews," which it itself has invented. And antizionism is a movement that similarly invents and imposes onto Jews the Zionism against which it defines itself. … Antisemitism always positioned its own notion of "the Jews" at the center of everything bad in the world. Antizionism's propensity to universalize its Zionism, or its picture of Israel, as the "other" of good things, is not so different."

Dave Rich, UK CST, and author, 18 Sep. 2023:
"antisemitism is not - or not only - about hating actual living, breathing, Jewish people. It's a set of abstract ideas and beliefs about Jews that is not anchored in reality. Fundamentally, it's the idea that Jews are always up to something and can never be trusted. And at its most developed, antisemitism is a way of understanding and interpreting world events that places Jews at the centre of everything. It's not about actual Jewish people and how they behave."

Deborah Lipstadt, US Special Envoy for Combating Antisemitism, 17 Nov. 2022:
"Antisemitism threatens democracy and a society which is based on tolerance. Antisemitism is a conspiracy theory which inculcates a lack of faith in democratic institutions – the media is no good as it is controlled by Jews, the banks are controlled by Jews, the government is controlled by Jews, so you end up not believing that your democracy works."

Hen Mazzig, writer, activist, 22 March 2023:
"Antizionism is not criticism of Israel. It's the belief that Israel should be demolished, and that no Jewish state, in any capacity has the right to exist."

Izabella Tabarovsky, scholar, Kennan Institute Washington DC, 13 Oct. 2022:
"Demonization of Zionism always, always produces antisemitic outcomes. Eventually it comes for every Jew."

Jeremy Leibler, President, Zionist Federation of Australia, 20 Feb. 2023:
"This vicious hatred of Israel quite clearly crashes over the line into antisemitism because it fuels hatred of not just Israel but of Jews. And it works – well-intentioned people fed a one-sided diet of lies come to hate Israel and anyone who defends its existence. Such hatred has led to Jews – not Israelis, but Australian Jews – facing death threats, physical intimidation and heartbreaking alienation because of their actual or perceived support for Israel. ... And while they may not be motivated by a personal hatred of Jews, their actions have consequences – they might not have antisemitic intent, but they have an antisemitic effect."

Jewish on Campus, US Jewish student union, 10 Nov. 2022:
"Like a bacteria, like a pathogen, antisemitism grows in the dark. It preys upon the dark parts of our society, the parts that give fear and instability. It preys on misinformation and mistruth until they are encompassed by conspiracy. This happens slowly. And at first the antisemites whisper. But once it spreads, as it has now, they become empowered. They feel justified, they even feel right. The antisemites don't whisper anymore. Now, they scream."

Jonathan S. Tobin, editor-in-chief of JNS (Jewish News Syndicate), 16 Aug. 2023:
"Anti-Zionists are almost always engaged in antisemitism, because their advocacy is inherently prejudicial to Jews and aimed at denying them rights that no one would think of questioning with virtually any other group. No other nation has an international movement arrayed against it, whose purpose is its extinction. The global strength and reach of anti-Zionism is inconceivable without antisemitism. And it is not an accident how easily agitation against Israel morphs into acts of Jew hatred, including violence. … The power of left-wing antisemitism stems from the coming together of two disparate factions—left-wing intellectuals, artists and political activists and Muslim immigrants to Western Europe, who brought their antisemitism and intolerance for Jews and Israel to their new homes."

Josh Feldman, writer, 19 July 2023:
"As unhinged as the mind of a conspiracy theorist may be, it can always be trusted, sooner or later, to land on the Jews. … antisemitism is not a mere bigotry, but a conspiratorial worldview that takes any society's ills or perceived evils, and rather than addressing them, scapegoats Jews. It is exceptionally malleable; in many ways, it is the ultimate conspiracy theory. … Such demented thinking goes back centuries and can invariably be found in attempts to explain contemporary economic, social, religious, and political problems. … For thousands of years, people's minds were inculcated with the image of the all-powerful Jew scheming to exploit and harm the masses. As a result, it is baked into Western DNA and is far more prevalent today than what many realize."

Julia Jassey, CEO of Jewish on Campus, 16 Jan. 2023:
"Jews don't call out antisemitism because it hurts our feelings. We call out antisemitism because it threatens our survival. We've seen it throughout our history. … Antisemitism is a threat to the safety of the Jewish community."

Kathleen Hayes, writer at Fathom Journal, March 2023:
"Antisemitism does more than provide a scapegoat. Uniquely among forms of racism, it provides adherents a seemingly all-encompassing explanation for why evil exists. From the time of the first blood libel, Jews have been cast as not only an enemy, but an ordinately powerful, sinister, scheming one."

Melanie Phillips, journalist, 7 Sep. 2023:
"The unique and unequivocal harm done by antisemitism, however, isn't generally recognized. It is not merely offensive. It is a malicious and deranged mindset that incites not just hatred of Jews but the belief that they are the mortal enemies of everyone else. It thus puts a target for destruction on the back of every Jew."

Micah Halpern, social and political commentator, 30 May 2023:
"We Jews cannot solve this gargantuan age-old problem alone. If we could, antisemitism would have been eradicated long ago. Instead, it is rearing its fury-filled, ugly head … This battle requires the masses to stand up and work together to combat this hatred."

Michal Cotler-Wunsh, Israel's Special Envoy for Combatting Antisemitism, 14 Sep. 2023:
"Antisemitism is a toxic hate that transcends politics, religion, time, and geography, poisoning the places and spaces in which it takes hold. In this troubling time of rising and mainstreaming antisemitism, politicization is one of the central factors that enables it to fester, mutate, and permeate. At a time of growing polarization, intersecting global and local challenges, and the blurring of lines between online hate and real-world harm … [we need] to comprehensively identify and combat the scourge of antisemitism in all its forms."

Oren Jacobson, co-founder and executive director of Project Shema, 10 Oct. 2022:
"All that's needed is a toxic brew of societal turmoil, unchecked antisemitic lies, & a demagogue using scapegoats to secure power. Bc antisemitism is so old, Jews so few, & antisemitic ideas so familiar & accepted, antisemitism has been a frequent, effective, rapid weapon. … Since antisemitism is built on conspiracy theories, where the lies spread, truth is destroyed. Where truth is destroyed, democracy can't survive. Without democracy, civil rights can't sustain. Thus, all marginalized groups are threatened by the spread of antisemitism."

Peter Wertheim, ECAJ co-CEO, 27 July 2023:
"Antisemitism is a disease of the human spirit that eats away at the foundations of civilisation everywhere. It is not limited by geographical borders, ideology or creed. It is a global phenomenon that requires a global response. … Whenever there's a conspiracy theory about anything, it's only a matter of time before it ultimately gets attributed to the Jewish people. So you can't say it's a left-wing or right-wing or an Islamist phenomenon, it comes from many sources. It always has, and it probably always will."

Phyllis Chesler, emerita professor, City University of New York (CUNY), 7 Aug. 2023:
"Jew-hatred is racism. Today, it is the only acceptable prejudice among "anti-racists.""

Rebecca Davis, journalist, 12 Oct. 2022:
"And when someone with the stature of Ye speaks, with his influence in mainstream culture and mass platform, these words become incitement in a world where antisemitism is ever-increasing. ... And every time something like this happens, those who hold similar views feel permitted to openly express their sentiments too. The noxious seeds of hatred creep from the fringe and into the mainstream. Normalised. The result is tangible. Jewish people are targeted."

Ritchie Torres, US Democrat Congressman, 5 Nov. 2022:
"Antisemitism is one of the most dangerous and deadliest forms of hate the human heart has ever conceived."

Steven Spielberg, film producer, 3 March 2023:
"Antisemitism has always been there, it's either been just around the corner and slightly out of sight but always lurking, or it has been much more overt like in Germany in the '30s. But not since Germany in the '30s have I witnessed antisemitism no longer lurking, but standing proud with hands on hips like Hitler and Mussolini, kind of daring us to defy it."

Todd L. Pittinsky, professor at Stony Brook University NY, 20 June 2023:
"The digital age has amplified the speed and spread of anti-Jewish tropes, extremist ideologies and antisemitic conspiracy theories."

V. Judah Khaykin, director of policy & research at ADL, 11 Oct. 2022:
"every antisemite from Pharaoh to Hitler has framed it as defensive"

Wynne Davis, writer, 1 Dec. 2022:
"It's not that people weren't making antisemitic remarks in the past, but how they're broadcast to millions of people through social media today that makes a difference."

Yair Rosenberg, journalist, 17 Nov. 2022:
"Conspiracy theorists begin by rejecting mainstream explanations for social and political events in favor of supposedly suppressed knowledge and hidden hands. These individuals may not start out as antisemites. But antisemitism has a multi-thousand-year head start on their crooked conception of the world, and has produced centuries of material casting the Jews as its chief culprit. Once a person has convinced themselves that an invisible hand is manipulating the masses, they are just a couple of Google searches away from discovering that it belongs to an invisible Jew."

Jeremy Jones AM was President of the Executive Council of Australian Jewry (ECAJ) from 2001 to 2004 and an Honorary Life Member of the ECAJ. He was also the Director of International and Community Affairs of the Australia/Israel & Jewish Affairs Council (AIJAC). Jeremy was recognised the world over for his work on antisemitism and on fostering better relations between different faith and ethnic communities.

Jeremy authored the ECAJ annual Report on Antisemitism in Australia from 1990 to 2012. His dedication, passion, energy and thoroughness produced a valuable record in documenting antisemitism in Australia for over two decades. In 2013, Jeremy handed authorship of the annual Report on Antisemitism in Australia onto me, which I eagerly took up.

It is with tremendous sadness that we, the Jewish community, Australian society, and the whole world, have lost Jeremy, who died on 6 September 2023 (20 Ellul 5783) after an illness. May his memory be a blessing.

Peter Wertheim, co-CEO of the ECAJ, said Jeremy Jones' contribution to community life was extraordinary. "There is hardly any area of Jewish communal life that did not benefit in some way from his expertise and dedication and his untimely passing is sad news for all of us. He leaves a legacy that will serve as an example to the next generation of Jewish communal activists."

Peter Wertheim, co-CEO at ECAJ, in reference to the ECAJ Report on Antisemitism in Australia and its author Julie Nathan, stated on 1 May 2023: "Few people in the community can begin to understand the hours of work and meticulous care that goes into researching and authoring the report. Researching the report is not only intellectually demanding, but also emotionally taxing, as one encounters the very worst of human nature. Even the UN Secretary-General was recently moved to describe the ubiquity of antisemitism online, as 'toxic waste dumps for hate and vicious lies'. The community owes a great debt of gratitude to Julie, who navigates this terrain day after day, and often into the night."

2. ANTISEMITIC INCIDENTS

Israel-Hamas war and antisemitism in Australia

The Hamas atrocities in southern Israel occurred on 7 October 2023, which is outside the time frame of this report. Therefore, antisemitic incidents in Australia related directly or indirectly to the ensuing war between Israel and Hamas are not dealt with definitively in this report. These incidents will be dealt with more fully in the 2024 ECAJ Report on Antisemitism in Australia. However, it should be noted that there was a massive increase in the number of antisemitic incidents after 7 October 2023, including increasing death threats, intimidating behaviour and hate propaganda against Jews. Given the gravity and unprecedented nature of the post-October 7 anti-Jewish incidents in Australia, some incident statistics, albeit preliminary, appear in a separate section at the end of this Chapter.

Executive Summary – year ending 30 September 2023

Antisemitic incidents are manifested through many different kinds of acts. As in the ECAJ's previous Antisemitism Reports, incidents have been categorized as set out in Table 1 below. Incidents are divided into six categories, based on the categories noted by the 1991 National Inquiry into Racist Violence in Australia (see details below under "Criteria for Inclusion in the Incidents Tally").

Two categories relate to violence, namely physical attacks against persons or property ('physical assault' and 'vandalism'). Two categories relate to non-physical abuse, namely verbal abuse, harassment and intimidation of people, either in person, or through a medium of email, telephone, letterbox ('verbal abuse', and 'messages'). Two categories relate to propaganda material ('graffiti', and 'posters etc').

The manner of collection of the data, and the criteria for inclusion in or exclusion from the tally, are set out in this chapter following the tables and charts.

During the twelve-month period, from 1 October 2022 to 30 September 2023, there were 495 antisemitic incidents logged by volunteer Community Security Groups (CSGs), official Jewish state roof bodies, and the ECAJ. In the previous 12-month period, ending 30 September 2022, these same bodies logged 478 incidents. Accordingly, there was an increase of 3.5% in the overall number of reported antisemitic incidents compared to the previous year.

Overall, from the year ending 30 September 2022 to the year ending 30 September 2023, there were substantial increases in the number of reported incidents in three categories: assault (up 120% from 5 to 11), vandalism (up 100% from 11 to 22) and verbal abuse (up 36% from 138 to 188). There were significant decreases in two categories: messages (down 17% from 76 to 63) and posters (down 30% from 123 to 86). Graffiti remained the same at 125.

The average number of reported antisemitic incidents each year from 2013 to 2022 was 316. As such, the total number of reported incidents in 2023 is above that average by 179 incidents.

Collection of Data

Data collected is restricted exclusively to incidents which were reported to, and authenticated and logged by, any one or more of the following:

- Jewish community roof bodies in each State and the ACT;
- their respective Community Security Groups;
- the ECAJ itself.

Criteria for Inclusion in the Incidents Tally

Incidents are included as antisemitic attacks or threats using the definition of racist violence and the categories developed by the 1991 national inquiry into racially motivated violence conducted by the then Human Rights and Equal Opportunity Commission (HREOC): Irene Moss and Ron Castan QC, Racist Violence: Report of the National Inquiry into Racist Violence in Australia (Canberra: Australian Government Publishing Service, 1991) at pp. 14-15. Criteria for inclusion:

- there must be evidence that antisemitism was a factor in the act of violence, harassment or intimidation or that the attack or threatening action targeted a person or property because the person or property was identified as Jewish.

- certain anti-Israel incidents eg graffiti which targets a synagogue or Jewish school etc, are included as they indicate hostility or prejudice towards Jews generally.

- abusive, harassing or intimidatory antisemitic messages directed specifically to an individual person or organisation via social media eg the Facebook Message function, are included, as they operate similarly to email.

Criteria for Exclusion from the Incidents Tally

Only incidents involving violence towards people or damage to or defacement of property or the threat of such behaviour are included. Accordingly, other incidents are excluded for the following reasons, even though they may be motivated by antisemitism:

- An attack or threat against a person who happens to be Jewish is excluded unless there is evidence that the attack was motivated by antisemitism – for example, the attacker makes a hostile reference to Jews in the course of the attack.

- Incidents of suspicious behaviour around Jewish institutions, which do not directly relate to a physical manifestation of violence, harassment, vandalism or threats.

- Incidents in which both Jews and people who are not Jewish are targeted, and there is no evidence that the attack was motivated by antisemitism.

- Discrimination on the basis of the actual or perceived Jewishness of the victim, whether in the workplace, educational institutions, or elsewhere, is excluded unless the incident includes violence, threats, abuse, harassment or intimidation against the victim. Incidents solely involving discrimination without any of these other elements are recorded separately from attacks or threats.

- Negative or derogatory comments made about Jews, either to Jews or to others, in the workplace, educational settings, socially, or elsewhere, but which do not constitute violence, threats, abuse, harassment or intimidation are excluded, but are recorded separately.

- Publications with antisemitic content in the mainstream, online or social media are excluded if they do not rise to the level of physical attacks, intimidation, harassment or threats against Jews or Jewish institutions. Such content is recorded separately in the section of this report covering Antisemitic Discourse.

- Social media comments which are antisemitic, including those posted on the pages of Jewish organisations and individuals, are excluded unless the comments include, threats, abuse, harassment or intimidation directed against a specific individual or individuals.

- Telephone calls, letters, email or graffiti which consist of criticisms of Israel or of political stances of the Jewish community which do not include specifically antisemitic comments are excluded (even though there is a realistic prospect that a proportion of these are motivated by antisemitism).

- Activities associated with the movement to boycott Israel, Israelis or supporters of Israel which have taken place and are arguably in and of themselves antisemitic are excluded unless they include, threats, abuse, harassment or intimidation directed against a specific individual, or individuals or an institution.

- Antisemitic emails which are sent to Jewish individuals and/or organisations which are a 'form' type of email (often an antisemitic rant of several pages in length which is forwarded to multiple Jewish recipients) rather than an email directly addressing the recipient are excluded and recorded separately.

Overall, the bias is in favour of exclusion rather than inclusion, which limits the scope for distortions to appear in the Incidents statistics over time and also protects the integrity of the data base.

Exclusion of Online Antisemitism from Incidents

In contrast to other organisations which produce reports for other targeted communities in Australia, the ECAJ does NOT include as incidents general expressions of hate against Jews that are online, unless they are directed against specific people or institutions. This is for the following reasons.

Firstly, such online postings are discourse, ie what people are saying about Jews rather than what is being done to Jews. However, it is recognised that vilification often precedes violence, and for this reason trends in antisemitic discourse during the year are analysed separately.

Secondly, the astronomical amount of online antisemitism makes counting impractical. The volume of such discourse is almost limitless – such is the nature of the internet.

Thirdly, if online hate content was to be counted and included in the tally of incidents, it would have an immense distorting effect on the number of incidents, and would therefore not give a true or accurate picture of what is actually happening to the targeted community. In our view, it would adversely affect the credibility of the data, and hence would be counter-productive to countering antisemitism.

Trends in Incidents

As has been the pattern in previous years, verbal abuse, intimidation and harassment of Jews occurs regularly around synagogues on the Jewish Sabbath on Friday evenings and on Saturday mornings, and on other Jewish holy days and festivals, when Jews are walking to and from synagogue, and attending religious services. It is common for people who are driving past Jewish venues, especially synagogues and Jewish schools, to shout verbal abuse and/or to make gun shooting gestures towards people out the front of Jewish venues. Some drivers will drive past several synagogues on the one day in order to harass, abuse, and threaten.

When issues involving Jews or Israel receive prominent coverage in the mainstream and social media, this has often led to a rise in antisemitic commentary and incidents. In addition, in the past, there has often been a correlation between spikes in violence in any of the various conflicts in the Middle East (and a concomitant increase in media coverage), whether or not the conflict involves Israel, and an increase in the number of antisemitic incidents.

Incidents Omitted: 2022 Report

Some incidents were reported to the ECAJ after the 2022 annual Report had been published. The following incident was not counted in the 2022 report, nor is it counted in the 2023 report, but is placed here to maintain a record of it.

- Shouts of "Are there any Jews here?" by neo-Nazis at a protest against Belial B'Zarr at a youth festival in Queen's Park in Moonee Ponds, Melbourne (30 Sep. 2022).

Under-Reporting of Antisemitic Incidents

It is known that many incidents of antisemitism in Australia occur but are not formally reported either to appropriate Jewish organisations or to the police. Thus, the statistics in this Report represent only a proportion of incidents actually occurring in Australia. According to the 'GEN17 Australian Jewish Community Survey' (more fully reported on below), almost one in ten adult Jews (9%) indicated that they had witnessed or experienced verbal insults and harassment or worse over the previous 12 months. This would suggest that the actual number of antisemitic incidents in any one year is many multiples of the number reported.

GEN17 Australian Jewish Community Survey

https://www.monash.edu/__data/assets/pdf_file/0009/1531791/gen17-initial-findings-report-online-version-final-22_3.pdf

The 'GEN17 Australian Jewish Community Survey' conducted by David Graham and Andrew Markus, was a nationwide study, carried out between February and May 2017, with a total sample size of 8,621 respondents. Its 'Preliminary Findings', published in 2018, found that:

- "almost one in ten Jews (9%) indicated that they had witnessed or experienced verbal insults and harassment over the previous 12 months."

- "a small proportion indicated they had witnessed (2%) or experienced (0.5%) physical attack over the last twelve months."

- "the large measure of consistency in the reports by young adults across the different streams of Judaism indicate that targets of attacks are not simply those who are identified as Jewish by visible markers such as distinctive religious clothing or ornaments."

Nazi Swastika (Hakenkreuz) - symbol of antisemitism

A common form of expression of antisemitism is the Nazi swastika, or Hakenkreuz, often found on flags or in graffiti. The following explain why the Nazi swastika is a specifically anti-Jewish symbol.

- Norman Cohn, author of "Warrant for Genocide" (1967, 1996):
  "Well before the [1914-1918] war the Austrian writer Guido von List had taught, in a whole series of popular books on the 'Germano-Aryans', that the swastika symbolized the purity of Germanic blood and the struggle of the 'Aryans' against the Jews." (page 127)

- James Waterman Wise, author of "Swastika: The Nazi Terror" (1933):
  "the Swastika – symbolizing hatred of the Jew." (page 9)

- Britannica - Swastika
  "In 1910 a poet and nationalist ideologist Guido von List had suggested the swastika as a symbol for all anti-Semitic organizations; and when the National Socialist Party was formed in 1919–20, it adopted it." https://www.britannica.com/topic/swastika#ref285600

Michaelia Cash, WA Liberal Senator, speech in Parliament, 23 March 2023:
"Since the rise of the Nazi Party in Germany in the 20th Century, Nazi symbols have been synonymous with antisemitic thoughts and actions, including the devastation of the Holocaust. That association remains to this day."

Simon Millman, WA state Labor MP, 18 Jan. 2023:
"The swastika is widely associated with antisemitism, genocide and racial hatred."

Incident Categories: Acts Covered

Assault: covers all acts under Australian law that constitute assault, and includes throwing items at people (whether it hit or missed), spitting at/on people, causing injury from physical assault right through to grievous bodily harm, and murder.

Vandalism: covers damage to property and destruction of property, including to motor vehicles, buildings, infrastructure, and other property.

Abuse: covers predominantly verbal abuse, harassment, intimidation, and bodily gestures such as the Nazi salute, raising the middle finger, shooting gestures, directly targeting Jews or Jewish communal institutions. These incidents tend to occur in public places, such as on the street, outside Jewish community venues (eg synagogues, Jewish schools), at work or in educational settings.

Messages: covers messages directly and privately sent to specific targets eg emails, material placed in selected letterboxes or posted material, telephone calls and texts to synagogues and other Jewish community venues, Jewish communal organisations, and Jewish individuals.

Graffiti: covers marking by drawing with pen, texta, paint etc, or etchings/engraving, of hate words and/or symbols on property, whether public or private. Some graffiti involves serious damage to property and may be categorised as vandalism eg when scratched on a vehicle.

Posters: covers all literature/propaganda type material publicly displayed, including banners, flags, flyers, leaflets, placards, posters, and stickers, plus images or text on clothing being worn, eg on t-shirts, bandannas, and other publicly displayed forms or expressions of antisemitism. This may include stickers and posters on the street, banners and placards in street protests, and mass letter-boxing of leaflets in residential suburbs.

Counting incidents

Some types of incidents are not one-off incidents, particularly posters, leaflets, and stickers, as these are usually mass produced and distributed on mass. For each batch of identical leaflets, regardless of whether in the tens or thousands, distributed in one suburb on one day – this is counted as one incident. Ditto for posters and stickers.

LIST of ANTISEMITIC INCIDENTS

Many of the incidents which occurred during the period in review are listed below, in chronological order for each category. The letter read as follows: "THE QUARTERLY REPORT It is with great pleasure that I present our most recent Quarterly Report. … On the political front, we send our heart felt congratulations to Dr. Monique Ryan, and thank her for the outstanding contribution in defeating the Jewish Treasurer, Frydenberg in Kooyong. Also to Zoe Daniel for removing that sub human in Goldstein. … We are very pleased to reduce the level of Jewish influence in the Australian Federal Parliament, and look forward to targeting the Federal Electorate of Isaacs at the next Election. On the economic front… Due to the Jewish economic policies, people are hurting everywhere, and masses of new supporters are embracing our message with vigour. … In Australia, we are proud to announce the formation our new Brevik Battalion, to enable us to take the fight to the Jewish Economic Saboteurs, whose negative influence will be deminished (sic) and eliminated in good time. - Email from "Ellax" to a prominent Jew composed of "… I just want you to know that you cannot stop us. It doesn't matter what laws you manipulate the Government into implementing or which politicians you guilt trip or bribe. We will continue unabated to fight for our Race and our Nation. … The arrogance and delusion of you Jews means you cannot see this. You think the World revolves around you. Just as you believe your own lies. I think this must be something about your culture or own psychosis that has passed on over generations through your Satanic text the Talmud. The truth of the matter is, Australia was built by White people from 1788 onward. We did this with our own blood, sweat and tears. Whereas Jews wish to destroy White Australia. Jews are parasitic in nature and you feed off the hard work of honest and hard working White Australians. … Constantly bringing up the alleged "Holocaust" to guilt trip Australians is another ridiculous and lame strategy. Especially as WW2 ended in 1945 and that was 78 years ago. It isn't even relevant in Australia. Israel's own real war crimes against Palestinian civilians far outweigh all the imaginary exaggerations of so-called "Holocaust survivors". In the end, you will fail and only continue to make the number of people aware of the true disgusting behaviour of Jews. … Move back to Israel where you and your rodent kind belong." Posters etc

Incidents include: banners, chants at protests, clothing, flags, flyers, gestures, leaflets, placards, posters, stickers, and tattoos. NB as flyers, leaflets, posters and stickers are mass produced, they are rarely a once-off incident, and are often placed/put up many at a time, even in their hundreds, at the same location/suburb and date, and overall may be placed/put up in their thousands at different dates and locations over a year. Of note, due to printing technologies, many posters today are actually stickers.

Three versions of double-sided leaflets, titled "Calling all White Australians", produced by the European Australian Movement (EAM), which is intimately associated with the National Socialist Network (NSN), both neo-Nazi groups, were letterboxed throughout dozens of suburbs in cities across Australia over a 12-month period. A fourth leaflet, by NSN, was also letterboxed. It is likely that tens of thousands of such leaflets were letterboxed during the period in review. Text in the leaflets include:

"... the media and government hate white people ... Our victory comes from the collective effort ... We must secure the existence of our people and a future for white children ... Be prepared to train ... Blood and Honour..." - EAM

"There is no political solution to this Jewish tyranny! The masters of mankind want you poisoned, sterilised, isolated, and living in a box eating bug! We have a different vision for the future... First Germany, this time the world. Blood and Honour! Resist the Great Reset" - EAM

"White Revolution starts with YOU. ...We know there is no political solution to this Satanic Zionist-occupied political system. White Revolution is the Only Solution!" - NSN

Epilogue:
Preliminary statistics concerning surge in antisemitic incidents following Hamas atrocities in Israel on 7 October 2023

Hamas attack in southern Israel on 7 October 2023

On Saturday 7 October 2023, several thousand Hamas gunmen and other armed Gazans crossed the border from Gaza and entered Israel by land, sea and air. Over the course of the day, they attacked many Israeli towns and kibbutzim, and young people attending a music festival. They proceeded to inflict multiple types of harm upon the people in southern Israel, including rape, mutilation and dismemberment while still alive, beheading, burning, and murder of babies, children and adults. Some 1200 people were murdered, approximately 6,000 people were injured, and approximately 249 people were kidnapped and taken into Gaza and held as hostages. Thousands of rockets were also launched into Israel. The Hamas terrorists videoed and published online the atrocities they committed.

Hamas is an Islamist organisation that calls for the violent "obliteration" of the State of Israel and for the elimination of Jews world-wide. It is a proscribed terrorist organisation in many countries including Australia.

More Jews were killed on 7 October 2023 than on any single day since the end of the Holocaust in 1945. The Hamas massacre harked back to previous times, to pogroms, the mass killing of Jews by armed mobs, often state-sponsored, that occurred sporadically but persistently throughout Europe and the Arab/Muslim world from the Middle Ages until the twentieth century.

Spike in anti-Jewish incidents in Australia

Within hours of this brutal attack directed mainly against civilians, anti-Israel groups and individuals began to mobilise politically and capitalise on the targeting of Jews around the world, including in Australia. On 8 October, a rally was held by extremist Muslims in Lakemba, Sydney, where a speaker and attendees expressed their exultation at the killing of Jews by Hamas. On 9 October, at a rally held by anti-Israel Muslims and left-wingers at the Sydney Opera House protesters chanted "Fuck the Jews" and "Gas the Jews" and burnt an Israeli flag. As the days and weeks went on, there was a surge in the number of anti-Jewish incidents across Australia.

Of great concern, were the death threats sent to Jewish organisations and the calls for killing Jews at anti-Israel street protests. There were organised acts aimed at intimidating and silencing Jews, such as convoys of vehicles from the western suburbs of Sydney, with its large concentration of people of Arab and Muslim background, to the eastern suburbs, with its large concentration of people of Jewish background. In Melbourne, there was a protest in a park opposite a synagogue on a Friday evening, the beginning of the Jewish Sabbath, necessitating the evacuation of the synagogue during a religious service. In a separate incident, anti-Israel protesters confronted and verbally abused family members of Israeli hostages in their hotel while they were on a meeting tour in Australia. There were weekly anti-Israel street protests in most capital cities.

In addition to incidents, there were many other expressions of animosity towards Israel and Jews that are not necessarily categorised as incidents but were just as damaging to, and undermining of, the sense of security of members of the Jewish community, and their sense of belonging as part of the broader Australian community. Thousands of posters of the names and photos of those kidnapped by Hamas, which had been put up around multiple suburbs in Sydney and Melbourne and elsewhere, were ripped down and/or graffitied.

Data on anti-Jewish incidents in Australia Oct-Nov 2023

The following statistics are the reported numbers of antisemitic incidents that occurred in Australia from 1 October 2023 to 30 November 2023. These figures are provisional and based only on the incidents that have been reported so far to the ECAJ, either directly or via its constituent and affiliate organisations, and the Community Security Groups. As in the past, many incidents can take weeks or months to be reported, or if reported elsewhere, for the reports to be passed onto the ECAJ.

There were 316 reported antisemitic incidents in October 2023, only 5 of which were reported between October 1 and 7. A further 346 incidents were reported in November 2023, making a total of 662 antisemitic incidents reported during October and November 2023.

By comparison, there were 495 anti-Jewish incidents reported in Australia for the entire 12 months to 30 September 2023.

When comparing the number of reported antisemitic incidents in October and November 2023 to the number for the months of October and November in 2022, the percentage increase is 738%, as shown in the Table below.

(The October and November 2021 figures are provided only to illustrate the approximate consistency of the October and November 2022 figures with the figures for the same months in the year prior).

| Date | Number of incidents | Percent increase from 2022 to 2023 |
|---|---|---|
| October 2021 | 38 | |
| October 2022 | 35 | |
| October 2023 | 316 | 803% |

3. ANTISEMITISM in the MAINSTREAM POLITICS, MEDIA, SOCIETY, EDUCATION

"The Holocaust did not begin in the gas chambers - it began with words."
- Professor Irwin Cotler, former Canadian Minister of Justice

Introduction

Even within western liberal democracies like Australia, antisemitism persists. Mostly, it is found on the fringes of society, within the political and religious extremes, and it is commonly condemned by political and community leaders, and in the media. However, racism, including antisemitism, becomes a more serious problem for a society's moral integrity and inner cohesion when it moves from the fringes into the mainstream and is not repudiated by society's leaders (or, worse, is validated by them). This sends a signal that it is socially permissible for human beings to be demonised and vilified, threatened and attacked, on the basis of their race, ethnicity, religion, or other attributes.

Antisemites, and other racists, will usually attempt to have their views publicly and widely proclaimed, and aim for acceptance and legitimacy of their racism within the mainstream of society. This can occur through the mainstream media, and also through social media commentary. When leaders in politics, the media, academia, business, clergy, or ordinary Australians, either publicly support or silently ignore the expression of racist sentiments and the commission of racist acts, including those which are antisemitic, the message this conveys to racists is that they will be able to get away with their racism.

Racism vilifies and dehumanises its targets before an audience that consists of the rest of the community. It is a form of mass psychological conditioning that breaks down the common ethical norms that apply in inter-personal relationships, and gives license and impetus to acts of violence and, in the most extreme cases, to mass murder. The expression of antisemitic hatreds, if not publicly contradicted and condemned by political and community leaders, has the effect of lending legitimacy and acceptability to such hatreds. This can lead to an emboldening of those who are hostile to Jews to go further in acting against Jews, and thus creates an atmosphere of intolerance, bigotry, fear and violence.

This chapter on Mainstream antisemitism has five sections: Politics, Media, Society, and Education, plus the Feature on the Voice referendum related antisemitism.

MAINSTREAM POLITICS

This section examines two sides of discourse and actions within the realm of mainstream politics. Firstly, it describes discourse or acts by individuals holding, or standing for, seats in any parliament in Australia, and some high-level former politicians who are still politically active. Secondly, it considers the experiences of those Members of Parliament (MP) or political parties represented in parliament who are being targeted because of stances, perceived or real, taken on matters to do with the Jewish community. Nothing in this section is intended to suggest that any of those parties or politicians are antisemitic.

1. DISCOURSE by Politicians / Candidates / Parties

Amanda Fazio: Jews are a "race of whingers"

Amanda Fazio was a state NSW Labor MP from 2000 to 2015, and president of the Legislative Council from 2009 to 2011. She is currently a member of the NSW Labor Party Executive, and on the Rules Committee. Fazio is also a member of Labor Friends of Palestine, and has attended events organised by the Australia Palestine Advocacy Network (APAN).

In reference to criticism, by some Jews, of American actor Bradley Cooper for donning a prosthetic nose in his portrayal of Jewish conductor Leonard Bernstein in a movie, Fazio wrote on her Facebook page on 7 September 2023:

- "Here we go again. The race of whingers complaining. By their logic, no Jewish actor should ever be cast as a non-Jew."

When Fazio was queried by media, she was unapologetic, responded that she had no comment to make about the Facebook post and "I don't know what they are going on about."

The NSW Labor Israel Action Committee (LIAC) wrote to the NSW Labor Party's general secretary and called for Fazio to be expelled from the party. LIAC's letter [dated 11 September 2023] noted that Fazio was in breach of at least four of the party's rules, and code of conduct, and stated that Fazio's views as expressed in her post "are unequivocally racist and antisemitic – and have no place in the NSW Labor Party, or any political party for that matter. … These comments and attitudes are grounds enough to be expelled, but Amanda Fazio's position on the NSW ALP's Rules Committee … make her violation of these rules all the more egregious." https://www.australianjewishnews.com/alp-expulsion-call/

Fazio has been charged under NSW Labor Party rules for her racist comment and will face the Labor Party's internal review tribunal.

Greens: opposition to IHRA working definition of Antisemitism

The Greens have consistently not only rejected the IHRA Working Definition of Antisemitism, but have actively opposed it, even lobbying universities to reject it. The IHRA working definition is widely accepted in the mainstream Jewish community and by Jewish organisations which represent the Jewish community and/or are active in countering antisemitism. After the Parliamentary Friends of IHRA wrote to Australian universities urging them to adopt the definition, Greens Senators Mehreen Faruqi and Jordan Steele-John wrote to university Vice-Chancellors urging them to reject the IHRA working definition of antisemitism.

Greens Letter

- Senator Mehreen Faruqi · Feb 9, 2023
  Senator Jordon Steele-John and I have written to University VCs urging them not to adopt the IHRA definition of antisemitism. The definition has been widely criticised for its ability to stifle academic freedom, silence Palestinian voices and prevent legitimate criticism of Israel. …

Responses to the letter by the two Greens Senators to Australian universities:

Executive Council of Australian Jewry co-CEO Peter Wertheim stated that the Greens have "fundamentally misconstrued" the IHRA definition. "Their opposition to it puts them on the wrong side of history. Jewish community organisations in Australia and around the world, of widely diverse political leanings, have overwhelmingly endorsed IHRA because it reflects our personal and historical experiences. The Greens do not dare to question the right of other vulnerable minorities to self-determine what constitutes racism against them. The fact that the Greens single out the Jewish community alone for this treatment speaks volumes. The Greens are clearly more interested in creating space for hate speech against Jews and Israel than in making a good faith attempt to address it."

Zionist Federation of Australia president Jeremy Leibler said it was "extremely disturbing that the Greens think it's appropriate to dictate to the Jewish community what does or doesn't constitute antisemitism without actually consulting with the Jewish community. This is not something that they have done or would contemplate doing to any other minority. This comes just a few days after Greens Senator Steele-John stood in solidarity with the eight Palestinian terrorists killed by the IDF in Jenin on 26 January, yet remained completely silent when seven Israeli civilians were murdered the very next day."

Australasian Union of Jewish Students president Alissa Foster said the IHRA definition "explicitly states that it is a guide to support existing policies and practices. It's unfortunate that instead of consulting Jewish students, Senator Faruqi has misrepresented IHRA and its purpose. Jewish students, like every other minority group, have the right to define what antisemitism means for us but rather than listening to our concerns, Senator Faruqi has assumed she knows better."

The Australian Jewish News (AJN) "asked Faruqi's office to explain how the IHRA definition prevents legitimate comment on Israel when it specifically states that "criticism of Israel similar to that levelled against any other country cannot be considered antisemitic". The AJN also asked why the senators seemingly allow other races and cultural groups to define what is racism against them, but not Jews."

Response by Josh Burns, MP:
In federal parliament on 6 March 2023, Josh Burns, Member for Macnamara, moved a motion, seconded by Allegra Spender, Member for Wentworth, strongly criticising the Greens and their opposition to the IHRA working definition of antisemitism. In Parliament, Josh Burns stated:

> "… Unfortunately, antisemitism is on the rise again, occurring far too frequently and increasing in hostility. It's why the International Holocaust Remembrance Alliance came up with a definition of antisemitism. … The IHRA definition is not legislation. It is simply a framework to help identify and combat this particular form of racism. Just as the British parliament formulated a definition of Islamophobia, IHRA created a definition of antisemitism. The IHRA definition of antisemitism was created by international holocaust and genocide scholars to academically understand what antisemitism is. Unfortunately, the Greens are opposed to recognising the IHRA working definition …
> "In other words, as clearly set out in the IHRA definition, you can be critical of Israel. Being critical of Israel is not antisemitic, nor does this definition shut down debate or limit freedom of speech. … It sits extremely uncomfortably with me that the Greens presume to know more about the manifestations of antisemitism than the Jewish community themselves. By opposing the IHRA definition, what message does that send when one examines the examples of what the Greens are actually opposing? After all, it is unfathomable to imagine the Greens, or anyone else, imposing their own definition of racism on any other minority in this country, yet they do this to the Jewish community. …"

Greens National Conference:

The Greens national conference, held on 4 June 2023, adopted several resolutions affecting the Jewish community. Primarily, the Australian Greens' resolution "Justice and Human Rights in Palestine and Israel" was passed, superseding the previous policy from 2010. The new policy contained false accusations and distortions about Israel, and blamed Israel alone for the fact that no Palestinian state exists. It called for measures that would see the elimination of the State of Israel as the only Jewish state in the world. The Greens then formally opposed the adoption of the IHRA Working Definition of Antisemitism, the most widely accepted such definition (by Jewish communities, governments, the UN, universities). Extracts from the Resolution follow.

Notably, in contrast to the 2010 policy, the new 2023 policy supports "freedom and statehood for the Palestinian people" but omits any such rights for Israelis, or of Israel's right to peace, security, or statehood. Removed from the 2010 policy is the principle of two states for two peoples. Instead, the 2023 policy calls in effect for two states for one people, namely Palestinian Arabs, and no state for Jews.

Greens Resolution:

https://greens.org.au/sites/default/files/2023-06/AG%20Pal%20resolution.pdf

"THE AUSTRALIAN GREENS: Justice and Human Rights in Palestine And Israel
The state of Israel continues to deny the right of self-determination to Palestinians and continues to dispossess them of their land. We aim to rectify this injustice…

Principles … 7. Recognise that Israel's ongoing colonisation of Palestinian land … 11. Recognise that the state of Israel is practising the crime of apartheid against Palestinians … 12. Recognise the Right of Return of Palestinian refugees and their descendants to their place of origin … 14. In accordance with the Australian Greens Resolution on Boycotts, Divestments & Targeted Sanctions, support the tactics of boycotts, divestments and targeted sanctions … 15. Affirm that criticism of Israeli government policies and actions is not antisemitic, and therefore oppose the adoption and enforcement of the International Holocaust Remembrance Alliance definition of antisemitism which conflates criticism of the state of Israel with antisemitism. Recognise the rise of hateful and violent racism and bigotry including antisemitism and Islamophobia in Australia and commit to the development of thorough anti-racism policies. …

Goals The Australian Greens will work for: … 23. The Australian government to join the international community in recognising the statehood of Palestinians and maintain the position of not recognising Jerusalem as the capital of Israel. …

As preliminary steps to the achievement of the goals, the Australian Greens call for: … 2. The immediate release of Palestinian political prisoners … 6. The immediate dismantling of the separation wall. …

Responses by Peter Wertheim, co-CEO Executive Council of Australian Jewry:

"Rarely has any political party in Australia directed such a combination of blind ignorance and insufferable patronising arrogance at a minority community. … Like a lynch mob at a pogrom, and relying only on the statements of NGOs with a long record of bias against Israel, the Greens have condemned Israel for the crime of apartheid, without even the pretence of a proper trial before a court. … Most damningly, the Greens have insulted our intelligence as a community by telling us that they know better than we do what contemporary antisemitism looks and feels like, and rejecting our community's overwhelming support for the IHRA working definition. … These bigots of the political left are every bit as bad as their right-wing counterparts."
https://www.australianjewishnews.com/greens-new-policy-accuses-israel-of-apartheid/

"The Greens have accused Israel alone of making a two-State outcome of the conflict with the Palestinians "unachievable", thereby betraying wilful ideological blindness to more than a century of violent rejection of that outcome by successive Palestinian leaders. The IHRA Working Definition of Antisemitism has the overwhelming support of Jewish communities around the world, as well as governments and civil society. The Greens' rejection of IHRA is an insult to our intelligence and a transparently self-serving attempt to create as much space as possible for anti-Zionist forms of antisemitism."

Barnaby Joyce, MP: Nazi analogy

Barnaby Joyce is the Nationals MP in Federal Parliament for the electorate of New England in NSW. In a Sky News interview with Sky host Andrew Bolt on 28 September 2022, Barnaby Joyce expressed his concern that the Indigenous voice to parliament would "reinsert racial distinctions" into the Australian Constitution, and stated:

- "It's not the same, it's vastly less, vastly less noxious, but the Civil Service Act of Germany in 1933 also delineated people's rights on the premise of their race, their belief. It's a very dangerous precedent."

Although he prefaced his remarks by acknowledging there was a vast difference between the two, Barnaby Joyce made an erroneous analogy to the Nazi German law, the Law for the Restoration of the Professional Civil Service, passed in April 1933, which banned Jews and others "not of Aryan descent" from Germany's civil service. In contrast to the Nazi law, the Voice proposal is not about depriving any Australian ethnic or religious group of any rights.

Bob Carr: "the Lobby"

Bob Carr is a former Labor Premier of NSW, and former federal Foreign Minister. He often makes harshly negative comments about Israel, and has posted comments on Twitter about "the Lobby" - Carr's description for the Jewish community leadership, but not used by him to describe the leadership or advocacy efforts of any other ethnic or religious community in Australia.

- Bob Carr@bobjcarr · Oct 18, 2022·
  And the rampant Israel lobby in Australia needed to be told you no longer intimidate Canberra. Well done @SenatorWong.

- Bob Carr@bobjcarr · Nov 13, 2022·
  Of course Israel practises apartheid. … Yet "the lobby" will go on defending Israel even as it installs the cruelest and most right wing government in its history.

- Bob Carr@bobjcarr · Feb 16, 2023·
  Cancel culture at work again trying to bully Adelaide Festival against allowing dissidents on its program. Bit rich for Israel lobby, having so extravagantly forgiven Perrottet for strutting around as Heinrich Himmler.

- Bob Carr@bobjcarr · Feb 16, 2023·
  Lobbying to block Palestinians coming here is a repeat of what I faced in 2004 with bullying from right-wingers in the Israel lobby telling me I as Premier would not be allowed to meet Hanan Ashrawi a Palestinian committed to the peace process.

Bob Carr@bobjcarr · Jun 5, 2023·
Queensland ALP State conference yesterday called on federal government to implement Labor's policy recognising Palestine. Nobody opposed it. Not surprising in view of Israel's settler violence and spread of illegal settlements blocking a two state solution.

    The 'israel' Lobby within Australia is strongest in Victoria. This development is a welcome sign that Australian politics reject the long & undue influence & pressure of the zionist lobby & sends a clear message that the ALP cannot sit on its hands on this issue.. Good news.

  Whenever one tweets about Israel, they should be required to include a disclaimer in their tweet stating whether they're Jewish or not - just as financial advisors are required to disclose whether they have a financial interest in the investment product they're pushing:

Malcolm Roberts, MP: globalists, bankers

Malcolm Roberts is a Queensland Senator for One Nation. Since his election in July 2016 (although disqualified from Parliament in 2017 due to the dual citizenship issue, and re-elected in 2019), he has been controversial for his views in which he talks about international bankers, globalists, conspiracy theories and the like, often mentioning prominent people in politics or finance who are Jewish.

Nicolette Boele, candidate: shekels

Nicolette Boele was standing as an independent candidate for the federal seat of Bradfield in Sydney, NSW. She made two comments, one on Facebook and one on Twitter, both on 4 October 2022, using Hebrew/Jewish terms (chutzpah, shekels) in calling for donations, offering bargains, and thus using and reinforcing the stereotype of Jews and money.

- Nicolette Boele · October 4, 2022
  It has been encouragingly suggested today that #TeamNic are demonstrating considerable 'chutzpah' in planning to open Australia's first Shadow Representative Electorate Office right here in #Bradfield. We don't shy away from that fact, but we really could use some more shekels to maintain our chutzpah. … some absolutely amazing bargains on offer! https://airauctioneer.com/nicolette-boele-fund-raiser... #BradfieldVotes

I don't know if you realise Nicolette, but this is very antisemitic and so it is very disappointing that you posted this. Referring to shekels and using other obviously Jewish/Hebrew terms in a fundraising appeal makes you sound like a far-right 4chan troll. Not a good look.

Severina Burner, councillor: Nazi swastika

Severina Burner is a local government Councillor in Salisbury, Adelaide. On her Facebook page she posted two images of particular concern. On 1 January 2023, in the context of Salisbury Council's debate on the Smart Cities initiative, Burner posted text and an image on her Facebook page claiming that Smart Cities are concentration camps, with the text "It's called a Smart City because if they called it a concentration camp, you might not want to live there". In point of fact, concentration camps were places of forced internment, brutality and death.

On 5 March 2023, Severina Burner posted an image on Facebook of a boy making a pose which formed a Nazi swastika, with the image accompanied by the words, "Me when I'm asked to kneel and apologize for being right", with the word "right" superimposed on the word "white". In a unanimous decision by council, Burner was removed from Salisbury Council, along with another councillor, on 13 June 2023 for breach of the Local Government Act, namely for not attending monthly council meetings three months in a row.

Stephen Wells: candidate Busselton Council, WA

Stephen Wells declared himself an independent candidate for Busselton Council in the local government elections in Western Australia to be held on 21 October 2023. Busselton is a town situated on the coast, 220kms southwest of Perth. He holds extremist views. Wells self-describes on Telegram as "Racist, Sexist, Hetrosexualist, Christian, Climate Change and CoVid Denying, Anti Vax supporting, Democracy scorning, Whites loving, shit stirrer. A sanctuary for all the outcasts of clown world. Until the small hats ban it." NB 'small hats' refers to Jews. Tylere Baker-Pearce, candidate: Auschwitz

Tylere Baker-Pearce was an independent candidate in the Victorian state election, for the Narre Warren South electorate, held on 26 November 2022. It was discovered that he had posted on Twitter, on 20 March 2020, a photo of himself grinning outside the Nazi death camp of Auschwitz-Birkenau, had added a flame/fire emoji to the image, and commented "Me @Birkenau Poland".

2. Politicians TARGETED

Politicians were targeted after posting positive comments about Jews, criticisms of antisemitism and the like, on their respective social media pages. These posts elicited antisemitic comments.

Targeting: Anthony Albanese, Prime Minister: on Jewish support for The Voice

Anthony Albanese, the Australian Prime Minister, made three posts on Twitter on 30 June 2023, each one including a photo of Jewish content - one image of himself with several prominent Jews, one of himself with a man wearing the Jewish religious head covering, and one of the Prime Minister on a podium at the Australia-Israel Chamber of Commerce. The point of the three posts was to reinforce support for the upcoming constitutional referendum on the Voice for indigenous Australians, and to showcase support for the Voice by many Jewish groups. Many of the comments in response to Albanese's posts claimed that Jews controlled government, that the Voice is orchestrated by 'the Jews', and raised issues irrelevant to the Voice such as Palestine. The main post had over 100,000 views.

  As a man who has … dealt with Jews and Australian Jewish families, I can tell you that they're the most racist, one-eyed and prejudiced people I've ever known. What they say about non-Jews is absolutely despicable. Why? Because they believe they're god's chosen people. Why? Because they personally wrote all of the scriptures that say that. What they choose to believe, is that circular, that culturally incestuous, that racist, and that dodgy. And make no mistake, they think Australian Aboriginals are the lowest of the low, of 'Goyim' sub-humans. The very opposite of a "Chosen People". But they do like to play the political and media PR game to shape-shift away from how racist their whole cultural construct is.

MAINSTREAM MEDIA

The mainstream media, print and online, visual and audio, can be influential in transforming or reinforcing people's beliefs about a range of issues. All media are selective in the issues they cover, how issues are portrayed, and the slant given. Even the more reputable media outlets often make only token attempts at objectivity in their news reporting. In addition, the internet iterations of mainstream media publishers make possible an enormous volume of public commentary on media articles. During the period in review, there were quite a few media articles and news stories in the mainstream media referencing Jews. Some of these focused on the issue of antisemitism, eg the Holocaust, and some on Israel. It was noticeable that when news or articles about Jews were published, these often did not have a comments section online, and some of these articles were not even posted on the social media pages of the media outlet – possibly to minimise the scope for posting antisemitic comments online. The following Media section is divided into two sub-sections: media output and online comments.

Media Output

Channel 10: "Auschwitz and tits"

Channel 10's program, The Cheap Seats, hosted by Tim McDonald and Melanie Bracewell, is a comedy panel show on TV. On the program on 13 June 2023, McDonald introduced a BBC clip with "not the two biggest topics on BBC radio 2", then played the BBC audio clip which was "The amazing story of Hitler and Stalin and one family. And then, is it acceptable for nudists to go into pubs and order a meal". The gist of the clip was the contrast in two very different stories that ran together. In response, McDonald said:

- "Hitler to nudists. It's a big night in the UK. It's Auschwitz and tits … It's a big night."

In addition, both hosts and the audience laughed at McDonald's comment. Within two weeks, McDonald apologised for his comment.

The Age article: gratuitous connection of wealth and Jews

An article 'The day police crashed the billionaires' lockdown soiree - and where the guests hid" by Cameron Houston and Chris Vedelago, published in The Age on 16 December 2022, was about that "Members of Victoria's wealthiest family flouted the state's strict lockdown orders in July last year when they hosted a family gathering at their historic Kew mansion Raheen." The article made several gratuitous references connecting the gathering being a Jewish gathering on Shabbat and the wealth of the hosts, eg 'mansion' and 'Shabbat', 'Judaism', 'Shabbat', 'powerful dynasty', and 'fortune'. Extracts include:

- "Video shows a number of people entering the Pratt family mansion during lockdown, appearing to be guests at a Shabbat dinner. … The family dinner on July 23, 2021, was held to mark Judaism's day of rest, known as Shabbat, and was attended by up to a dozen guests of the powerful dynasty that has amassed an estimated fortune of almost $25 billion from its global packaging and recycling business."

SBS website: omitting Hebrew in language list
https://form.myrecruitmentplus.com/applicationform?jobAdId=8819256

At SBS Careers, employment applications provide a drop-down list for applicants to choose a language other than English that they speak. The list is quite comprehensive and includes some languages spoken by only a few people in Australia (eg Assyrian, Hakha Chin, Kannada, Karen, Telugu, Twi, Akan). The list is in alphabetical order. And yet, as noted on 7 November 2022, excluded from the list was Hebrew, a language spoken by 10 million people today and the official language of a UN member country.

In comparison, Hebrew has more speakers than many European languages, such as Croatian, Danish, Estonian, Finnish, Latvian, Macedonian, Maltese, Norwegian, Serbian, and Swedish. In Australia, there are more than 10,000 Hebrew speakers, and yet languages with far less numbers of speakers in Australia are in the list. This omission is an example of negative discrimination against Hebrew speakers, who overwhelmingly are Jewish.

This article states twice that Roger Waters, a British singer formerly with Pink Floyd, has been accused of antisemitism because he supports the Palestinians and is critical of Israel. Apart from mis-stating the reasons for the accusation, the article implies that Waters is not antisemitic, but instead is simply anti-Israel, and that Jews and others are only accusing him of antisemitism to undermine support for Palestinians. Nowhere in the article is it explained why the accusations of antisemitism are made nor what Waters has said and done for people to consider him to be antisemitic. The article suggests falsely that being anti-Israel and being antisemitic are mutually exclusive.

Waters has a long history of wearing Nazi SS type garb on stage, with long black leather coat and a red, white and black armband (using Nazi colours). He has had large Nazi style banners hanging in the stage background. At his concert in Germany in May 2023, Waters fired a replica machine gun into the crowd, while wearing his Nazi style garb. Waters also had two names in red projected on stage at his concerts in 2023 making an analogy between Anne Frank (a Jewish girl murdered by the Nazis because she was Jewish) and Shireen Abu Akleh (a Palestinian-American journalist killed while she on a hazardous assignment covering gunfights between Israeli forces and Palestinian gunmen. This is Holocaust minimisation. The authorities in Germany in 2023 tried to ban Waters' concerts due to the antisemitism exhibited by Waters on stage and elsewhere. Waters flew a giant pig-shaped balloon emblazoned with the Star of David at his concert in Belgium in 2013, where he also wore a long black leather jacket with a red-and-white arm band, reminiscent of a Nazi uniform and held a replica machine gun.

A video documentary by Campaign Against Antisemitism (CAA) published in September 2023 exposed many derogatory references to Jews made by Roger Waters to his close associates. Waters referred to vegetarian food at a Lebanese restaurant as "Jew food" three times and refused to eat it. Waters made up a song that called the band's agent (who is Jewish) "'cos Morry is a fucking Jew". Waters mocked the band's saxophonist's grandmother who was murdered in the Holocaust. Waters wanted the inflatable pig floating above his concerts to be scrawled not only with a Star of David but also with the phrases "follow the money", "dirty kyke [sic]" and "scum". Waters also wanted audiences to be showered with confetti in the shape of Stars of David and dollar signs, and his directive was carried out.

National Press Club: antisemitic speaker
https://www.npc.org.au/speaker/2023/1242-francesca-albanese

The National Press Club of Australia invited Francesca Albanese, UN Special Rapporteur for Palestinian Human Rights, to address the club in Canberra on 14 November 2023. Albanese has a long record of making not only anti-Israel statements, but also antisemitic statements. The Australian Jewish News noted that "Albanese has in the past been criticised for using antisemitic imagery to demonise Israel and the Jewish people by comparing what happened to Palestinians in 1948 to the Holocaust, comparing Gaza to the Warsaw ghetto and claiming that America has been subjugated by the Jewish lobby."

Colin Rubinstein, executive director of Australia/Israel & Jewish Affairs Council, said that Albanese "has a documented history of publishing ugly tropes about Jews and extreme, virulent views about Israel, both before and during her tenure with the UN. … Francesca Albanese has made disgusting social media comments about the supposed power of the so-called 'Jewish lobby' and 'the Israeli lobby', has endorsed social media postings comparing Israel to Nazi Germany, and justified terrorism against Israeli civilians. One has to ask whether the National Press Club would host another individual who has a similar history of making derogatory comments about a minority group. We hope that, at the very least, the journalists there will vigorously seek to hold Albanese to account."

Crikey: "Melbourne Uni's new anti-Semitism guidelines are an attack on free thought"
https://www.crikey.com.au/2023/01/27/melbourne-university-anti-semitism-guidelines/

Crikey self-describes as "an independent Australian source for news, investigations, analysis and opinion." It tends to publish left-wing, and anti-Israel, content. Guy Rundle, journalist at Crikey, published an article, titled 'Melbourne Uni's new anti-Semitism guidelines are an attack on free thought', on 27 January 2023. The article argued against the IHRA working definition of antisemitism and its adoption by Melbourne University, and did so using anti-Jewish tropes. Many of the comments added by readers under the article were also antisemitic.

Rundle wrote:

> "… This is a recipe for killing and oppression in the occupied territories on a whole new scale. Arguably it represents a totalitarian impulse within Zionism … The IHRA's definition has been pushed at Australian universities by the Australian Zionist lobby for the past couple of years … But the IHRA definition, as expressed in its examples, goes a lot further … These points are either reasonably arguable or represent a ridiculous ban on thought. The intentionality of the Holocaust? … Accusing Jewish citizens of being more loyal to Israel? Well, that would be a perfectly rational course of action by Zionist Jews …
> "Comparing Israel with the Nazis? … We have to be free to ask the question as to the complex relationship of two late 19th-century national socialist movements, Nazism and Zionism. The West Bank's arrangement of ever-more powerful and prosperous Zionist settlements … looks a lot like Hitler's imaginings of how a Nazi-colonised Russia would look like. … It's not surprising that Melbourne University, "The Shop", would be the first to sign up to the definition, given the city is the centre of the Australian Zionist lobby … Well, give the Zionists their win, for the moment. …"

Comments:

- Frank Dee: So, I can't compare the illegal expansion of Israel into Palestinian lands with Nazi Germany's lebensraum? Is irony to become illegal as well?

- Hunt, Ian: … Guy correctly points to the chilling parallel between the position the new far right government of Israel has adopted for the West Bank and the future that "Mein Kampf" envisaged for European Russia. … Similarly, criticism of the present government of Israel and drawing comparisons between its policies for the West Bank and Nazi policies for European Russia is criticism and rejection of that government and not the Jewish people as such. Indeed, there is only minority electoral support for Netanyahu's Coalition just as there was only minority support for the Nazis at the last election before Hitler became fuerher.

- Bob the builder: I think you've missed a very important one: "Denying the Jewish people their right to self-determination, e.g., by claiming that the existence of a State of Israel is a racist endeavor." Given the explicitly racist nature of the state of Israel and it's contemporary functioning as (along with Russia) the last of the 19th century style European colonialist/imperialist states, combined with an increasingly Apartheid social, political and physical character, it's hard to see it as anything other than racist.

- Daibhin: … When I was much younger I had great sympathy for the Jews until I went deeper into their history, it was rather revealing in that they were chaded out of most eastern countries because they tended to take over ateas and kept on taking over more and more until they were, again, chased out as happened in Egypt; because they were taking over too much of the area in which they made their fortunes. Now, here we are again, taking over another's country, though this time with much more physical and armed force and bringing in jeweish people from around the world to grow the land they are laying claim to. It never changes except the use of force. … Now they invade what our universities and their students can think about Jews/Israelis. America is in their pocket, don't let Australia be next.

- Doubtingthomas: So Israel gets away with banning the democratic right of Free Speech at an Australian University. What next?

- Jayho: Hopefully not forced circumcisions

- Doubtingthomas: I heard Malcolm Fraser describe the Jewish Lobby when he was PM. The Melb. Uni capitulation is totally understandable.

- Doubtingthomas: … Fraser was very critical of the power of the Jewish Lobby. … I implied that it takes brave and intelligent souls to stand up to them. …

- Thucydides: I wonder if anybody in Netanyahu's government has yet proposed a "final solution" to the Palestinian problem?…….. it can only be a matter of time.

- Doubtingthomas: … Melbourne University has bowed to the Jewish Lobby and effectively, made laws about what one can and cannot say, write, and presumably think.

- Doubtingthomas: Agreed. But I think the issue is deeper: it's about the creeping power a certain lobby group has in a so-called democratic country.

- Waddy: … The fact of the international campaign for institutional adoption of the IHRA definition makes it look exactly like a stalking horse to diminish criticism of the State of Israel. Is that view antisemitic?

- Roberto: "Is that view antisemitic?" the tribe of Netanyahu says "YES".

- Robert REYNOLDS: The Israeli 'tail' has been wagging the American dog ever since 1948. It comes as no surprise that the Israeli influence now extends into the University of Melbourne. …

- Outis: The anti-semitic charge against Jeremy Corbyn & UK Labour was because of his refusal to accept the IHRA dictum. …

- Richard King: True, and his [Keir Starmer's] behaviour since — using the charge of antisemitism to purge the left of the Labour Party on the flimsiest grounds imaginable … and allowing (explicit) antisemites to say that the Jews are a powerful elite with the ability to shape the public sphere.

- mr gaucherie: By stifling all criticism of what takes place in Israel, the end result will quite possibly be exactly the opposite to what the gag was designed to stop, anti-jewishism.

Online Comments

The following section is composed of online comments by readers on the websites and/or social media pages of mainstream media outlets. The significance of antisemitic comments remaining online is two-fold: firstly, the fact that such comments are allowed to remain online without moderation demonstrates the online host's (eg media's) tolerance for antisemitic comments, and/or a lack of knowledge, insight or capacity to identify antisemitism; and secondly, the contents of the comments indicate the levels and types of antisemitic beliefs held by individuals within the general community, and reveal the extent of antisemitic hatreds that exist even in a relatively tolerant society like Australia. The following is a sample of antisemitic comments posted online on mainstream sites. The news reports about which they are commenting are also reproduced in order to provide context.

- James Robertson The 7.30 report failed to mention Australia's support of the apartheid regime held by the Zionists over the indigenous Arabs of Palestine. Is there little wonder antisemitism is on the rise when the Jewish council of Australia supports the shelling of sleeping children and the snipering of a 16 year old girl on her own rooftop garden, left to be found by her young brother or the incarceration of 4.5 million individuals, taxed at 30%, indentured labour and denial of water, electric and sewer. A charming people. Normalisation of the new Nazis will never be accepted here.

- Jaafar El-Murad Terrorists? I presume you are referring to the Zionist government.

- Caroline Cheika Why there is so much criticism of Israel ? 70 years of catastrophe maybe ? And in those 70 years there has unfortunately not been much criticism of Israel , until very recently, and now it plays the victim. It's not that complex . Roger Waters is a freedom fighter . He uses his profile , his music , to draw attention, not a bad thing

- Pat Walsh He is right. You should be able to protest Israel without being antisemitic. Its not dissimilar to apartheid. Treatment based on religious belief is abhorrent. It just seems special sensitivity to ww2 atrocities trump modern ones

- Nick Cruth He is an active exposer of Israel's atrocities in Palestine.The new far right Israeli regime is cranking efforts to discredit anyone who does. Try and further entrench the falsehood , that criticism is antisemitism. The Zionist lobby in Germany made the initial complaint.

- Adrian McGuinness He dared to criticise Israel perhaps 🤦?

- Simon Black probably because he stands against apartheid when no one else will.

MAINSTREAM SOCIETY

Although most Australians are tolerant and easy-going, and observe the Australian ethos of giving people a "fair-go", there are segments of society which exhibit and express antisemitism in various forms. Some of the issues during the period in review are outlined below.

Casual Antisemitism

The Australian Human Rights Commission (AHRC) states: "Casual racism is one form of racism. It refers to conduct involving negative stereotypes or prejudices about people on the basis of race, colour or ethnicity. Examples include jokes, off-handed comments, and exclusion of people from social situations on the basis of race." Some examples of casual antisemitism during the period in review follows.

Work colleague: "concentration camps"

A non-Jewish man with Jewish ancestry, in a conversation with work colleagues about holidays, on 20 May 2023 in Western Australia, said that in a couple of years he planned to go to Israel and mentioned that he had Jewish ancestry. One work colleague remarked:

- "Well, you Jews didn't do too well in the concentration camps."

Anti-racist chant: omitting Jews

https://redflag.org.au/article/campaign-continues-against-melbournes-neo-nazi-gym

A chant at an anti-Nazi rally, organised by Campaign against Racism and Fascism, was cited in an article 'Campaign continues against Melbourne's neo-Nazi gym' by Monica Sestito published on 24 September 2023 in Red Flag, the publication of Socialist Alternative. The chant named four ethnic minorities who should unite to fight against neo-Nazis. Omitted from the list were Jews - the prime target of neo-Nazis. Within the extreme left, ostensible anti-racists, there is an element that ignores or downplays racism against Jews. The article reported that:

- "Chants of "Black, Indigenous, Arab, Asian and white—unite, unite, unite to fight the right!" echoed across the streets of Sunshine West on Saturday, when 500 anti-fascist activists and local community members gathered to protest against Legacy Boxing Gym. The gym has become a flashpoint for anti-fascist opposition since the Age revealed last year that it is an organising base for a neo-Nazi organisation called the National Socialist Network (NSN)."

Other forms of Antisemitism

Adelaide Festival Writers' Week: antisemitic writers

The annual Adelaide Festival encompasses the Adelaide Writers' Week where authors from around Australia and the world are invited to participate. In 2023, it was held on 4-9 March. It receives funding from the state government of South Australia and other sponsors. In 2023, 160 writers were scheduled to participate. Controversy arose in February 2023 when it became known that two highly antisemitic writers from overseas had been invited - Susan Abulhawa, a Palestinian-American writer, and Mohammed El-Kurd, a Palestinian poet.
https://www.adelaidefestival.com.au/news/latest-news/2023-adelaide-writers-week-full-program-announcement/

Despite claims by some pro-Palestinian people, there was no antisemitism issue raised with platforming Palestinian activists at the event or at having no alternative pro-Israel voices. Nor was the primary objection to the disproportionately high number of Palestinian writers who were invited. Nor was there an issue with any of the other writers of Palestinian and/or Arab/Muslim background.

The objections were solely focussed on having Abulhawa and El-Kurd participate. Over the years, they have posted their hateful anti-Jewish views on social media and in their written works. Some of their rhetoric refers to 'Zionists' as a code for Jews, and other references to Israelis are based on much older anti-Jewish tropes.

Hence, while criticism of Israel is not antisemitic per se, when it crosses the line and uses anti-Jewish tropes, or makes analogies with Nazi Germany, then it becomes antisemitic. They both have expressed hatred for Zionism and support for the elimination of the only Jewish state in the world. Of note, Zionism is the Jewish national movement for self-determination in the homeland. Examples of their social media posts, including in 2023 during the controversy, include the following.

Susan Abulhawa has Tweeted:

Elsewhere, El-Kurd has described or written:

- Israel as "demonic",
- Israelis as "conscienceless pigs",
- "Israelis at large are thirsty for Palestinian blood."
- Zionists as "barbaric pigs"
- "they [Israelis] harvest organs of the martyred [Palestinians], feed their warriors our own." – in his 2021 book "Rifka"
- "I hate these pigs. I hope every one of them dies in the most torturous and slow ways. I hope that they see their mothers suffering." referring to Israelis.

Elsewhere, "el-Kurd alleges Jews are preparing to invade Muslim holy sites and constantly compares Israel to Germany under the Nazis, an allegation as incorrect as it is offensive to Jews across the globe. He glorifies the murderous Palestinian intifada and its campaign of suicide bombs that have killed many hundreds of civilian Israeli men, women and children."
– by Jeremy Leibler, The Australian, 20 February 2023.

Morry Schwartz, publisher, explained some of the issues: "When authors of hate speech are invited to our writers' festivals, it's time to worry and to lament. Antisemitism has come out.

Emerging from years of subtle innuendo, out from its various hiding places and guises, it is again showing its ugly historical face. It is again being normalised and made acceptable. When Volodymyr Zelensky is described as a "depraved Zionist trying to ignite world war III", it is Zelensky the Jew who is being demonised. He has never asserted his Zionism. When Zionists are accused of harvesting the organs of Palestinians and lusting after their blood, there is no mistaking the reference to age-old blood libels against the Jewish people."

Many people and organisations spoke out against having Abulhawa and El-Kurd participate in the festival. These included the following.

Peter Malinauskas, Premier of South Australia, condemned their participation and personally boycotted the event. "I complete abhor the comments that have been made … I'm surprised they are being facilitated at Adelaide Writers Week. I won't be going along to hear them speak. … there is a distinction between provoking thought and facilitating the spreading of a message that simply does not accord with basic human values."

Three major sponsors - MinterEllison (law firm), PwC (PricewaterhouseCoopers, an accounting and consulting firm) and Capgemini (IT company) - withdrew their support, presence and involvement with the 2023 Adelaide Writers' Week.

Gemma Jones, editor of the Adelaide Advertiser, said "The views of the two writers in question are repugnant." The Advertiser decided to continue to support the broader Adelaide Festival cultural program but withdrew its staff from the Breakfast With Papers event.

Frank Fursenko, president of the Association of Ukrainians in SA, told The Australian that the community had met this week to discuss its concerns around the involvement of Abulhawa and others at Writers Week who were spreading "conspiracies" about the war. "We are very concerned that they are giving a platform to people who are known apologists for the Russian invasion of Ukraine," Mr Fursenko said. "Everything they say dovetails perfectly with Russian propaganda."

Writers withdrew from the festival due to the presence of racists. This included three Ukrainian authors (Kateryna Babkina, Olesya Khromeychuk and Maria Tumarkin) over appearances by authors who accused Volodymyr Zelenskyy of being a Nazi and Ukraine of being a Nazi state.

Melbourne Football Clubs

There were several instances of antisemitism in some Melbourne football clubs and/or from their supporters. In particular, Harry Sheezel, a Jewish football player newly recruited, was targeted with antisemitic acts and social media posts.

Melbourne Knights Football Club: Nazi salutes

Six men performed Nazi salutes at the Melbourne Knights Football Club on 10 April 2023, while singing a song, "Za Dom Spremni" ie "For homeland, ready", extolling Ustasha, the Croatian pro-Nazi group. The Ustasha movement became the government in Croatia in 1941, and allied itself with Nazi Germany, and participated in the roundup, incarceration of Jews, Roma, and others in concentration camps, and killing hundreds of thousands of Jews, Roma, and Serbs, during WW11.

"Football Australia has refused to comment directly on the incident at the Knights, citing the fact that the salutes did not occur at a football match or function."
https://www.theage.com.au/national/healing-wounds-the-jewish-and-croatian-community-come-together-20230622-p5dijd.html

Of note, on 1 October 2022, some Sydney United 58 (formerly Sydney Croatia) fans, performed Nazi salutes at a soccer game and chanted "Za Dom Spremni" (For Homeland, Ready) - a chant used by the pro-Nazi Ustashi movement in Croatia in the 1930s and 1940s, during the Australia Cup final, held in Sydney. As this particular act was public, it appears in the Incidents chapter.

Harry Sheezel: targeted for being Jewish
Harry Sheezel, an 18 year old, was drafted into the North Melbourne Football Club within the Australian Football League (AFL) in November 2022. Sheezel is the first Jew to be drafted into the AFL since 1999, and this elicited media coverage. It also attracted a lot of anti-Jewish comments online. These included:

Comments posted on The Age Facebook post story 'History making: Harry Sheezel shapes as the first Jewish AFL draftee this century' on 26 November 2022 included:

- Joefess Dimento: Hopefully a team sponsored by a gas company pick him up. Also his teammates should not expect him to be shouting end of season drinks
- Adam Love: Zionist owned media selling a story like the Holocaust
- Darcy Balmer: Jews control the media, go figure
- Locutus Ov Borg: They tell him there is money in the football?
- Leigh Fitzgerald: And he's got the nose to prove it..
- Stu Kell: A jew actually doing physical exercise? fake news
- Johnny Guy: Hope he has enough gas in the tank
- Ryan McKane: That's great news. Now the Muslim and Christian players can be oppressed on the football field like the Muslim and Christian Palestinians are oppressed by Jewish people.

The Age Facebook post was later deleted.

Acting Age editor Michael Bachelard stated: "It's disgraceful and disappointing that sewer-dwellers on social media took such a story and turned it into an excuse for vile antisemitic abuse. … As this is, unfortunately, growing more common, we normally use our discretion to block comments on stories that even mention the religion or race of a person. (The social media companies do not allow us to pre-moderate comments.) On this occasion, unfortunately, the story was posted at a busy time – the evening of the [Victorian] state election – and the usual, cautious practice was overlooked. Comments were not blocked or adequately moderated until the issue was drawn to our attention, when the situation was rectified. For this, we apologise to Harry Sheezel and the broader Jewish community."

"The AFL is investigating "deplorable and unacceptable" anti-Semitic abuse directed at top draft prospect Harry Sheezel. … In a statement, the AFL condemned the abuse and said its integrity unit is investigating whether any of them came from club members. "The AFL is aware of discriminatory commentary online directed towards a draft nominee," the AFL said. "To denounce a young man on the eve of realising his dream of being drafted to the AFL is deplorable and unacceptable, and there is no place for this type of behaviour anywhere in our community."

SEN radio caller comment: "Jews are loaded with money"
SEN Radio is a national sports radio network covering the news of major sports such as various football codes, cricket, golf, horse racing, and other sports, based in Melbourne. On 2 December 2022, during a show hosted by former AFL players Garry Lyon and Tim Watson, a regular caller and North Melbourne Football Club fan 'John from Epping' phoned them. When asked about the recent AFL draft, which included Harry Sheezel, who is Jewish, John responded:

- "We've got this Jewish player … you know, the Jewish, they are loaded with money. … So maybe, if we can't get to Tasmania, if we needed some money, his parents might pay for it."

Instead of calling out the anti-Jewish stereotyping, Lyon replied, "I wouldn't worry about that, I'd just worry about the fact that he's a very, very good player." Later, SEN responded that "Garry [Lyon] heard one reference only, and immediately corrected course with the caller, and moved to shut the comment down. Garry and Tim spoke to the caller within half an hour of the program ending, and addressed the issue with him, and told him that sentiment is not acceptable."

AFL: ban on Israeli flag
A young Jewish football fan, Josh, brought an Israeli flag, which has the Jewish Star of David on it, to a match to wave in support of Jewish AFL player Harry Sheezel. The flag was held at the North Melbourne and West Coast Eagles game at Marvel Stadium in Melbourne on 18 March 2023. Sheezel had been recently selected in a sport that has not had many Jewish players, and this elicited a lot of anti-Jewish commentary especially on social media.

A football supporter complained about the presence of the Israeli flag, and an AFL security staff responded by email that "Once identified, it should then have been requested to be seized/confiscated or the patron in possession requested to leave if they refused to surrender the flag."

However, a few days later, an AFL spokesman apologised for the email, and stated that "For clarity, the AFL has no issue with the flag and signs supporting North Melbourne's Harry Sheezel on the weekend. … Correspondence sent to a patron that had an issue with the flag being displayed was an incorrect interpretation of our conditions of match day entry policy and we apologise for any confusion. ... An AFL match day is a place for everyone, we want fans to celebrate their clubs and players, and if that includes displaying national flags that amplify any of their team's player heritage then the AFL is fully supportive."

Carlton Football Club: targeted by antisemites
Carlton Football Club in Melbourne posted "Chag Sameach! Wishing a happy Hanukkah to all those in the Carlton family currently celebrating this special time" and an image with "Happy Hanukkah" on its social media pages, Facebook and Instagram, on 22 December 2023. This post was in recognition of the Jewish festival of Chanukah (alternative spelling Hanukkah) and used the Jewish greeting, Chag sameach, for festivals. It elicited antisemitic comments:

- helal.issa · Free Palestine. You can't delete me forever

Holocaust rhetoric / Nazi minimisation

Downplaying the seriousness of the Holocaust coarsens public debate and tends to desensitise people to the evil of antisemitism. This is regardless of whether or not that is the intent, or whether or not it is targeting Jews. Making comparisons of laws, public policies and conditions in democratic countries like Australia with the systematic and planned murder of six million Jewish men, women and children is morally repugnant, trivialises the Holocaust, minimises the crime that was the Holocaust, and is demeaning to the millions of Europeans who lived and suffered under the Nazis, and their descendants.

There were several incidents of Holocaust minimisation or inappropriate Holocaust rhetoric or analogy during the period in review, including by an animal rights activist, card games, and Hitler themed merchandise. Not only are these highly offensive, but they can lay the foundation for antisemitic acts and discourse by others.

Card Game: "I Would Kill Hitler: A Party Game of Hilarious Hypotheticals"

A card game, titled "I Would Kill Hitler" and sub-titled "A Party Game of Hilarious Hypotheticals" was spotted in a shop in Melbourne in February 2023. The game is advertised, on Amazon, as suitable for those over 14 years old, categorised as "Humour", and described as "A game of answering history's most challenging ethical dilemmas and hilarious hypotheticals. … Perfect for DND [Dungeons & Dragons] or RPG [role-playing game] enthusiasts who crave a fun party game!" This game juxtaposes 'Hitler' and 'Hilarious'.

Card Game: "Rudest Game You've Ever Played": mocking Holocaust

A card game, titled "Rudest Game You've Ever Played", is an Australian-made adult game that was created in 2019, but came to public attention on 31 August 2023 for offensiveness and crudeness. Advertising for the game claims it is the "new and improved version of Cards Against Humanity. Ideal for the Aussie sense of humour" … "grab a statement card and fill in the blanks with the rudest and most inappropriate answers that you can manage." The Game includes: 90 Statement cards (Black) and 420 Response Cards (White).

Apart from antisemitism and mocking the Holocaust, the game also mocks killing babies, dead babies, mass-murder, rape, incest, paedophilia, necrophilia, racism, homophobia, and the disabled.

Cards include:

- "Seeing things from Hitler's perspective",
- "Giving Anne Frank a drum kit for her birthday."
- "Hitler's gas bill."
- "Telling Holocaust jokes at a barbeque"
- "Torturing Jews until they say they're not jews anymore"

Spicy Baboon: selling Hitler merchandise

Spicy Baboon is an Australian online shopping site. On its website, it claims to be "We're just a bunch of Aussie mates who saw a gap in the market for frikin' hilarious gifts and apparel with outrageous designs." In January 2023, it was selling various items, such as mugs, t-shirts, stickers, cards and beer stubby holders, for Valentines Day (14 February) with a depiction of Hitler with a rose in his mouth and surrounded by four red hearts, and the caption of "Be Mein." The product description was: "Nothing says 'I love you' more than Time Magazine's Man of the Year (1938) clasping a rose."

In connection with a population celebration (Valentine's Day), the website romanticises and normalises Hitler - who orchestrated the mass murder of millions of Jews, Roma and others, and who started World War 11 in which 60 million people were killed.

Tash Peterson: "Animal Holocaust"

Tash Peterson, an animal rights activist deliberately compares the slaughter of domestic animals for human consumption to the planned genocide and murder of 6 million Jews during the Holocaust. She promotes this analogy on her Facebook and Instagram pages, in videos, in public protests where she often storms into shops, and when she speaks at rallies. At her protests she often covers her body and/or clothes in red to symbolise blood. Over the years, Peterson has been charged for various intrusions into shops where she has protested. She was charged in July 2023 after she and other animal rights protesters stormed a restaurant in Perth.

Animal welfare is an extremely important issue. However, to go down the track of claiming that the mass slaughter of animals for human consumption is the same as the deliberate and planned genocide of a people, due only to their ethnicity, is to take the issue totally out of perspective, and to lose credibility. It does not serve the cause of better treatment of animals. In summary, there is a vast moral difference between the wanton genocide of human beings out of hatred because they happen to be of a particular ethnic background, and the killing of animals for human consumption.

Peterson wears shirts with "End the Animal Holocaust" and "End this Holocaust" and holds placards which read "Kangaroo Holocaust" and "Don't celebrate Easter with a Holocaust".

Peterson has publicly stated:

- "I will continue to speak up on the victims of the animal Holocaust,"
- "It's the largest Holocaust in history with approximately three trillion non-human people brutally murdered every year for human food consumption."
- "This order is a restriction on free speech which prevents the public from learning the truth about the animal holocaust." September 5, 2023
- "Trillions of non-human people are subjected to the largest holocaust in history in the name of food, fashion, entertainment, testing, breeding and so much more. If you're not vegan, you are a part of the largest and longest ongoing holocaust in history. Do you choose veganism or a holocaust?" September 25, 2023

Nazi Memorabilia

The display, promotion and sale of Nazi and Holocaust memorabilia, although it has not been illegal, has been widely condemned as offensive and distressing, especially by Holocaust survivors and others who lived under the savagery that was Nazi Europe, and by ex-service people who fought and sacrificed so much to defeat Nazi tyranny. Such items have often been used to promote or glorify racism, bigotry, hatred and even violence. Many businesses will not sell Nazi or Holocaust memorabilia, but some auction houses and other commercial outlets do.

In June 2023, the federal government introduced a bill to parliament to ban the public display of two Nazi symbols - the Nazi swastika and the Schutzstaffel (SS) insignia. This includes banning the trade in Nazi memorabilia with these two symbols in shops, online and at auctions. However, the proposed law does not ban private ownership of Nazi memorabilia or transfers of such items if it is not for profit.

The Guardian noted that "Australian militaria shops say there is an "avalanche" of demand for Nazi artefacts in anticipation of an impending ban on the sale of Nazi symbols." One auction house, Danielle Elizabeth Auctions, in light of proposed government bans, even advertised in June 2023: "Huge Militaria Sale !! - Get it Before History is Banned & Erased".

There were several businesses across Australia which were involved in the display or sale of Nazi/Holocaust memorabilia during the period in review. Nazi items for sale included: armbands, badges (metal and cloth), banners, belt buckles, books, bullets, busts, caps, cards, certificates, coins, daggers, firearms, flags, helmets, medals, medallions, pennants, photos, pistols, plaques, posters, rings (SS), stamps, and uniforms. In one case, a Luftwaffe helmet had a bid of AU $17,500 weeks before the JB Military auction in November 2022. In addition, Nazi memorabilia is sold privately online, eg a Brisbane man advertised and sold a Nazi helmet, with the SS symbol, on Facebook marketplace for $150 on 28 August 2023.

Of particular concern were items directly related to the Holocaust including: a building sign of "Juden Unerwunscht' (Jews Unwanted), yellow Star of David badges, and blue Star of David armbands, for purchase from Danielle Elizabeth auctions in January 2023 at the Gold Coast. A Jewish concentration camp cap, a coat owned by a Jew with a yellow Star of David sewn on it, and a photo album, composed of 500 photos, titled "Jewish Concentration Camp & Atrocity Photos" (which sold at the auction for $3600), including photos showing a man facing a firing squad, death camp crematoria, and, as described by the auction house, "these folders they are filled with Jews Hanging in the street, in the concentration camps dying, piles of bones etc" sold by Danielle Elizabeth Auctions in June 2023 at Gold Coast.

EDUCATION

The education system, through its curriculum, textbooks, teaching materials and the like, plays a major role in influencing young people, whether at primary, secondary or tertiary levels, or whether in state or privately-run institutions. Over many years, antisemitism has been present in the education system, through some teaching materials, and through antisemitic incidents directed against Jewish students or Jewish teachers, by other students or staff.

Schools

During the year in review, several incidents of antisemitic bullying and harassment of Jewish students within schools came to light. Where these were verbal or physical incidents, they have been placed in chapter 2 Incidents; where antisemitic bullying occurred online, the events are described in this chapter. In 2022, in response to the level of antisemitic bullying at NSW schools, the NSW Jewish Board of Deputies launched an online portal for Jewish students and their families across NSW to report incidents of antisemitic bullying:
https://www.nswjbd.org/bullying/

King's School: WhatsApp group, called Studies of Religion Group Chat

The King's School is an elite private Anglican school for boys in Sydney. It was founded in 1831 and teaches from Kindergarten to year 12. In April 2023, a student WhatsApp group, called Studies of Religion Group Chat, was found to be engaging in antisemitic and other racist content. Examples included:

- "I'm cool with muzzlims and pretty much everyone as long as they aren't J*wish or F*ench."
- "[student's name] hates the jews."

In response, the NSW government made a commitment to introduce a digital reporting portal where students and their families can report incidents:
https://education.nsw.gov.au/teaching-and-learning/curriculum/multicultural-education/anti-racism-education/complaints-of-racism

Court case: Antisemitism at Brighton Secondary College

Five former students at Brighton Secondary College, a state high school in Melbourne, in April 2022 sued "the school, and Victoria's Department of Education and Training, over antisemitic bullying they claim to have suffered while students at the school between 2013 and 2020. The five said they left the school because of the bullying. The five plaintiffs alleged negligence, and claimed the school and department failed to protect them as Jewish students under federal racial discrimination laws and the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child. The court has heard there had been a lack of discipline of students over a rash of swastika daubings, and that one of the Jewish students had allegedly been subjected to a knife attack in a school bathroom. The court heard more than 100 swastikas were scrawled on lockers, bathrooms, fences and books, yet no student got into trouble over the swastikas."
https://www.australianjewishnews.com/brighton-trial-set-to-conclude/

For further details of the antisemitic abuse, see pages 93-95 in the 2020 ECAJ Report on Antisemitism, at https://www.ecaj.org.au/wordpress/wp-content/uploads/ECAJ-Antisemitism-Report-2020.pdf

Chief Justice Debra Mortimer declared in the Orders (FEDERAL COURT OF AUSTRALIA Kaplan v State of Victoria (No 8) [2023] FCA 1092) on 14 September 2023 that there were: "failures and omissions to: (a) take action at a systemic and coordinated level to address a high level of antisemitic bullying and harassment of Jewish students by other students at Brighton Secondary College and high levels of swastika graffiti at the school; and (b) enforce the policies of Brighton Secondary College on racial harassment in relation to antisemitic bullying and harassment of Jewish students by other students at Brighton Secondary College and in relation to the display of swastika graffiti at the school.
Kaplan v State of Victoria (No 8) [2023] FCA 1092
https://www.judgments.fedcourt.gov.au/judgments/Judgments/fca/single/2023/2023fca1092

Most disturbing were the Court's findings about the attitude of the school Principal Richard Minack and the leadership cohort among the teachers:

> "I found their reactions muted, mostly devoid of outrage and somewhat resigned to the content of what was being put to them. It struck me as odd, and surprising, that even by the time of trial, Mr Minack, his leadership cohort and BSC teachers still could not join in expressing but the mildest condemnation of the antisemitic student behaviour and did not appear at all shocked about it…. They were not especially moved. They were not outraged. They were not horrified." (Judgment, paras 244, 246).

Justice Mortimer ordered a total of just under $436,000 be paid in compensation to the five former students - Matt Kaplan, Joel Kaplan, Liam Arnold-Levy, Guy Cohen and Zack Snelling. The judge also ordered that the Victorian state government apologise to them.

The ECAJ welcomed the decision, and praised the former students saying:
"With meagre resources, they and their lawyers took on the might of the Victorian government and Education Department to stand up for truth and justice, and they were successful. We know the personal price all of them have paid in sweat and nerves, and the enormous financial sacrifice they have made, especially their lawyers. This case should be a wake-up call and stand as a warning to any students who engage in cowardly antisemitic bullying in any school-related context, and to parents, teachers and Education Departments across Australia who fail to act responsibly to curb and prevent such behaviour. They will be held to account for their actions and publicly exposed for their wrongdoing.

"It is well past time for governments to develop specialist policies, procedures, curricula and teaching materials to educate and inoculate students against specific forms of racism, including antisemitism, and to stamp out hate-motivated behaviour whenever it emerges. Bland, generic statements against racism are not enough. This case has sent a clear signal that the cost of continuing inaction by governments in dealing appropriately with racism will be far higher than the cost of taking effective action".
(This is the statement in full provided to the media.)

Universities

During the period of review there were two main issues of concern occurring in some universities: adoption or rejection of the IHRA Working Definition of Antisemitism by university administrations, and controversial resolutions and forums by student unions.

Universities and IHRA

Some universities in Australia have adopted the IHRA Working Definition of Antisemitism as an educational tool to deal with and counter antisemitism on campus. These universities include Sunshine Coast University (in March 2022), University of Wollongong (in April 2022), Macquarie University (understood to be in May 2022), Monash University (in March 2023), and the University of Melbourne (in January 2023). As well, La Trobe [University] Student Union (in June 2022) and the Wollongong Undergraduate Students' Association (WUSA) (in November 2022) adopted it.

As explained by Alex Rvychin, co-CEO of the ECAJ, on 5 April 2023:
"In response to rising antisemitism globally and in Australia, the Jewish community is seeking the adoption of a widely accepted scholarly definition of antisemitism, not as a legislative or punitive measure but to help institutions and individuals understand this deadly hatred."
https://www.australianjewishnews.com/australian-national-university-rejects-ihra-definition/

However, two universities – the Australian National University and the University of Adelaide - rejected the IHRA definition, in April 2023. This rejection of the most widely accepted definition of antisemitism by Jewish communities throughout the world, and by over 1000 entities including governments, business, universities, and others, relied in general on misunderstanding, misrepresentation, distortion and politicising of the definition.

Australian National University:

The Australian National University (ANU), situated in Canberra, justified its rejection of the IHRA definition by stating that "After extensive due diligence, the university's view is that it has sufficient protections and measures in place to help prevent and respond to any form of discrimination within its existing policies and procedures".
https://www.australianjewishnews.com/australian-national-university-rejects-ihra-definition/

Jewish responses to the ANU's rejection of IHRA:

- Australasian Union of Jewish Students (AUJS) ACT executive: "Jewish students were not consulted. Given that we are the ones who experience antisemitism on campus, it should not be too much to ask for us to be invited to the table."

- Josh Burns MP and co-chair of the Parliamentary Friends of IHRA: "Defining antisemitism helps institutions better understand this type of discrimination and assists them to take action if it occurs."

- Jeremy Leibler, president of the Zionist Federation of Australia (ZFA): "The ANU's decision betrays a profound ignorance about both modern antisemitism and the IHRA definition, which is ironic coming from a place of learning, and likely stems from the fact that the ANU didn't speak with any representative Jewish organisations before making its decision. … Adoption of the definition won't prevent criticism about Israel. It cannot and isn't designed to do so. Rather, its purpose is to help well-meaning people engage in conversations without needlessly offending a long-persecuted minority."

University of Adelaide:
The University of Adelaide, in South Australia (SA), issued a 'Statement Regarding Freedom of Speech' on 11 April 2023, which referred to its reasons for rejecting the IHRA definition:

> "The Council of the University of Adelaide … after consulting with its Academic Board, determined not to adopt the International Holocaust Remembrance Alliance (IHRA) Working Definition of Antisemitism. The University has issued the following statement regarding freedom of speech … Freedom of speech is a right everyone holds, subject to the law. The right to express lawful views about controversial matters is at the heart of a robust democracy. It is also the essence of academic freedom. The University of Adelaide is committed to the principles of academic freedom and freedom of speech. …
> The University's Behaviour and Conduct Policy (Principle 4) … encompasses vilification that can arise from bigotry, which is a prejudice against a person or people based on their membership of a particular group, including their sexuality, identity, health status, ethnicity, religion, culture, or race. One form of bigotry is antisemitism which may reflect a hatred of Jewish people, or Jewish institutions, by reason of their being Jewish, or may involve the making of adverse judgments about Jewish people or institutions based on prejudicial stereotypes. Such behaviour is reprehensible wherever it occurs, and we condemn it. It is not reflective of our wider University Community. …"
> https://www.adelaide.edu.au/governance/council/news/statement-regarding-freedom-of-speech

Of concern is that the University of Adelaide, in deciding whether or not to adopt IHRA, did not seek input from any Jewish organisation, including AUJS (the Jewish students organisation) or JCCSA (the state Jewish body). Instead, it is claimed, the university received input from AFOPA – an anti-Israel organisation which supports the BDS campaign, whose end-goal is the destruction of Israel, ie the destruction of Jewish self-determination.

Jewish responses to the University of Adelaide's rejection of IHRA:

Jasmine Beinart, AUJS SA President: "extreme disappointment, especially since there was no consultation with Jewish students, staff, or community organisations throughout the entire process" and "On top of NOT consulting with our community, @UniofAdelaide invited AFOPA to make a submission against the adoption of the IHRA definition of antisemitism without giving us the same opportunity. Is this what discrimination looks like?"
https://twitter.com/JasmineBeinart/status/1651776925982130177
https://twitter.com/JasmineBeinart/status/1651777957663510529

Jasmine Beinart, president, and Jonathan Iadarola, Vice-President, of AUJSS & AUJS SA: "The Adelaide University Jewish Students' Society (AUJSS) and the Australasian Union of Jewish Students South Australia (AUJS SA) are extremely disappointed that this is the stance the University of Adelaide has decided to take. Given that there have been a number of antisemitic incidents on campus recently, we are hurt and condemn the University's decision on this matter. Furthermore, the University of Adelaide has attempted to defend antisemitic rhetoric and discourse and normalise it as so-called "free speech". …Last year, AUJSS and AUJS SA expressed willingness to work with the University constructively on the issue of antisemitism. However, the University of Adelaide leadership and administration did not once consult with us about a definition of antisemitism or how the adoption or non-adoption of one would impact us. There remains no clear policy at the University of Adelaide that deals with antisemitism, leaving Jewish students bewildered as to how to respond to it within the confinements of the University. … They did not invite any Jewish community organisation in South Australia to make a submission about the IHRA definition. However, Deputy Vice-Chancellor (External Engagement) Dr Jessica Gallagher did manage to invite Australian Friends of Palestine Association (AFOPA) to argue against it."

https://aujs.com.au/statement-regarding-the-university-of-adelaides-rejection-of-ihra/

Peter Wertheim, co-CEO of ECAJ: "The IHRA working definition, being non-legally binding, is a tool which acts as a complement, not an alternative, to the existing law and existing university codes of practice. Sadly, this is what the Adelaide University Council has failed to grasp."
https://www.australianjewishnews.com/communal-leaders-express-extreme-disappointment/

Kathy Baykitch, Director of Adelaide Holocaust Museum & Andrew Steiner Education Centre: "By not adopting the IHRA definition the university has illustrated an institutionalised lack of understanding of antisemitism and why the definition exists."
https://aujs.com.au/statement-regarding-the-university-of-adelaides-rejection-of-ihra/

Jeremy Leibler, ZFA President: "The University of Adelaide's decision is most unfortunate. And it's reasoning shows an unwillingness to engage with what the IHRA definition is and isn't. I would have thought that a university, of all places, would seek to properly engage with an issue before rejecting it out of hand. … Given recent events, when Adelaide University took no action when a student put antisemitic rhetoric in the university newspaper, and where Jewish students have been reported as being too scared to attend campus, one would think the university would have wanted to better educate its student body as to how to avoid the bigotry the university says it detests. Instead, it has chosen to do nothing."

La Trobe University: IHRA
On 10 August 2023, La Trobe University in Melbourne, released a 'Statement on the adoption of a definition of antisemitism', which partially adopted the IHRA definition. It announced that:

"… In 2022, the Parliamentary Friends of the International Holocaust Remembrance Alliance (IHRA) requested that La Trobe University adopt the IHRA definition of antisemitism. The University undertook an internal consultation process that provided staff and students with an opportunity to express their views about the adoption of a working definition of antisemitism. … In formulating its recommendations, the Working Group considered many representations made to La Trobe by community and government stakeholders on the matter, together with feedback submitted by La Trobe students and staff. … The following recommendations made by the Working Group were endorsed by the University's Academic Board on 19 July 2023. In summary, the University will:

- Adopt the IHRA definition of antisemitism but without its eleven examples. The University was concerned that adoption of the IHRA definition with the eleven examples could pose potential limitations to academic freedom and reasonable political debate which could be misclassified as antisemitic behaviour. …"

- Adopt the Jerusalem Declaration on Antisemitism (JDA) guidelines …

- Review previous allegations or concerns of antisemitic behaviour and assess the ability of the University's internal processes to respond to antisemitism, particularly in the context of adopting a working definition of antisemitism.

- Develop an Anti-Racism Strategy,…"
https://www.latrobe.edu.au/news/articles/2023/release/statement-on-definition-of-antisemitism

In response: Daniel Aghion, president Jewish Community Council of Victoria (JCCV): "While we welcome… we regret that it has rejected, in part, the Victorian Jewish community's own preferred definition of antisemitism. The IHRA working definition of antisemitism, including its definitions, has been officially endorsed by the affiliate organisations of the JCCV, the peak representative body for the Victorian Jewish community. It is also the preferred definition of AUJS, the JCCV affiliate which represents Jewish university students. It is very disappointing that the JCCV was not consulted by La Trobe University. If we had been, we could have explained that the IHRA definition of antisemitism has not been found to hinder freedom of speech and that the Jerusalem Declaration does not enjoy broad support in the Jewish community."
https://www.jwire.com.au/a-cocktail-definition-for-antisemitism-mixed-by-la-trobe-university/

In response: Jeremy Leibler, president ZFA, said: "Clearly, antisemitism is a problem at La Trobe University. We fear that La Trobe's actions will make things worse. … Zionism is the movement for Jewish self-determination. Denying Jews such a right is antisemitic."

University Student Union Resolutions and Forums

Student union resolutions ostensibly only condemning Israel and seeking its demise and destruction have an adverse effect on Jewish students, as well as on the Jewish community as a whole. This is in two ways: firstly, opposing and denying Jewish self-determination (as embodied in the State of Israel), and secondly, by minimising and downplaying antisemitism on campus and across Australia and the world. During the period in review, several student unions passed resolutions and/or held forums which adversely affected Jewish students, faculty members and staff.

ANU SRC: Nakba motion

The Student Representative Council (SRC) at the Australian National University (ANU) held a meeting on 10 May 2023, and voted on a Nakba motion. The Jewish Students Society (JSS), a branch of AUJS in the ACT, at ANU had been consulted beforehand about the motion, given that Jewish students would be impacted. JSS did not oppose the motion, but wanted the motion to express the nuances and complexities of the Arab-Israel conflict. During the meeting, a Twitter conversation on the ANU student media account, Woroni, occurred where ANU JSS were called "oppressors" and that consulting them is equivalent to consulting white South Africans on apartheid:

- "Wren … begins by saying it is a right wing move to consult ANUJSS as they are "oppressors"…"

- "Yerin compares consulting ANUJSS to consulting white South Africans on apartheid"

- "Sarah … Says that its important to consult involved students, and its wrong to characterize ANUJSS as "oppressors""

USYD SRC: forum on "the weaponisation of Antisemitism"

The Students' Representative Council at the University of Sydney (USYD SRC) held a forum on 25 May 2023 titled "Freedom to criticise the state of Israel" and described it as a "student & staff forum on the weaponisation of Antisemitism to stifle criticism of Israel". The USYD SRC post on Facebook stated that "Universities across so-called Australia are deciding on whether or not to adopt definitions of Antisemitism, like the IHRA working definition, which encompass criticism of the Israeli state. This forum will have expert panelists from Australian universities - USYD & ANU - to speak on issues concerning these definitions."

In fact, despite the false claim by USYD SRC, the IHRA working definition of antisemitism does NOT "encompass criticism of the Israeli state." IHRA states that: "criticism of Israel similar to that leveled against any other country cannot be regarded as antisemitic." Thus, IHRA (and many others) recognise that criticism of Israel is legitimate (as it is for all countries and governments), and delineates between legitimate criticism and antisemitic criticism of Israel, the latter using age-old anti-Jewish tropes to demonise Israel. Too many anti-Israel activists prefer to ignore or minimise antisemitism, and instead to falsely assert that claims of antisemitism are used to "stifle criticism of Israel."

USYD SRC: motion 'Support for BDS'

On 15 August 2023, the Students' Representative Council at the University of Sydney (USYD SRC) released its motion on "Active Solidarity to Palestine and Support for BDS." The motion noted:

> "Preamble: … As a settler-colony, Israel has created various systems and structures to take over Palestinian land: a military occupation to suppress resistance, ethnic cleansing to achieve demographic targets and land theft, and an apartheid system of governance to give privileges to one people while denying the rights of others. … In an attempt to silence criticism of Israel and intervene in grassroots mobilisation for Palestinian liberation, Zionist lobby groups have been pressuring universities to adopt the International Holocaust Remembrance Alliance (IHRA) working definition of antisemitism, in which 7 of its 11

examples of conduct said to constitute antisemitism directly refer to conduct regarding Israel. Particularly problematic is the example alleging that it is antisemitic to deny "the Jewish people their right to self-determination, e.g., by claiming the existence of the State of Israel is a racist endeavour". This working definition has been used to suppress advocacy for Palestinian rights (for example, at universities).

"Text of the USYD SRC motion.
Platform: The University of Sydney Students' Representative Council … stands in solidarity with the Palestinian people living under an Apartheid state. … supports the BDS movement in their calls for boycott, divestment and sanctions to achieve freedom, justice and equality for Palestinians. … rejects attempts to collapse Judaism and Zionism and reaffirms its position that anti-Zionism is anti-racism. … opposes the institutional adoption of the IHRA working definition of Antisemitism as it has been used to silence and discipline pro-Palestinian advocacy and activism. … rejects normalisation with the State of Israel.

The University of Sydney Students' Representative Council will: … engage in boycott, divestment and sanctions (BDS) … Boycott purchasing future Hewlett-Packard (HP) products … Designate the University of Sydney Students Representative Council an official Apartheid-free zone. Campaign against … ties with organisations, companies and tertiary and/or government funded institutions that support/are supported by/are funded by the State of Israel. Write a letter to the University of Sydney Vice-Chancellor to: Condemn the reference to the IHRA definition as a 'useful tool to understanding antisemitism' in its new anti-racism statement and request them to remove it from the references. Express the rejection of University ties with the state of Israel…"

Referring to Israel as a "settler-colony", "apartheid", "ethnic cleansing" etc – all falsehoods – has often led to Jewish students being targeted for abuse and harassment. Israel is a Jewish majority state, and most Jewish students feel a connection, through family and tradition, to the State of Israel. This is akin to other minorities who also feel a connection to their original homeland.

USYD SRC: forum on Palestine: from Colonisation to Liberation
At the University of Sydney Students' Representative Council (USYD SRC) Festival of Radical Thinking, held in 22-25 August 2023, were 12 sessions that "will cover vast areas of left-wing political education that can be so difficult to find at University … those who have been fighting injustices the world over for many years already". One of the sessions, held on 24 August 2023, was titled 'Palestine: from Colonisation to Liberation.' The promotion image included the text:

- "Israel is, and always has been, a racist endeavour rooted in supremacy."
- "the liberation of Palestine"
- "goal of liberation for all people – from the River to the Sea – from Gadigal to Gaza."

https://www.facebook.com/photo/?fbid=313204194417661&set=pcb.313204247750989

The title and promotional text of this session clearly opposes the existence of any form of Jewish national self-determination as embodied in the State of Israel.

Feature: Voice referendum related antisemitism

Anthony Albanese, the Australian Prime Minister, announced a proposed alteration to the Australian Constitution with the wording of the referendum question. The Bill, the Constitution Alteration (Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander Voice) Bill 2023, was tabled in federal parliament. The Voice referendum was announced on 23 March 2023 and the vote was held on 14 October 2023. The referendum question was:

- "A Proposed Law: to alter the Constitution to recognise the First Peoples of Australia by establishing an Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander Voice. Do you approve this proposed alteration?"

The Voice referendum elicited a proliferation of online and other commentary promoting anti-Jewish conspiracy theories. Common false and derogatory themes were: 'the Jews' are behind the Voice referendum as part of a Jewish plot to destroy European-ethnic Australians; 'the Jews' are so powerful and evil that they control the government and force the government to make decisions that are considered to be not in the best interests of Australians but are in the interests only of Jews; and giving a 'Voice' to Australia's indigenous population through the Constitution will be one way to advance Jewish goals.

Discourse and images blaming 'the Jews' for the Voice occurred on mainstream and extremist social media sites and websites for many months. As well, there were leaflets blaming 'the Jews' for the referendum which were distributed at anti-Voice rallies in Brisbane and Melbourne, and in the streets of Newtown, Sydney.

The following is a selection of posts/comments and images appearing on Twitter/X, regarded by many as a mainstream social media site, and on Telegram, regarded as an extremist social media site. These are posted below in chronological order. Most of the images below were posted multiple times and by many different users.

Twitter/X: comments posted on Anthony Albanese's page

Anthony Albanese, the Australian Prime Minister, has a Twitter/X account, 'AlboMP'. On 30 June 2023, he made three posts, each one including text and a photo to reinforce the breadth of support for a Yes vote in the upcoming constitutional referendum on the Voice for indigenous Australians. The photos depicted the Prime Minister engaging with members of the Jewish community, including with two Jewish communal leaders and a Jewish MP. The posts emphasised that the Voice had the support of many "multicultural and faith groups" including "many Jewish groups."

Many of the comments in response to the Prime Minister's posts claimed that Jews control the government and that the Voice is orchestrated by 'the Jews', and raised issues irrelevant to the Voice such as the Israel-Palestinian conflict. The Prime Minister's main post had more than 125,000 views and hundreds of comments. A small selection of the anti-Jewish comments in response to the Prime Minister's posts included the following examples blaming 'the Jews' for the Voice. More antisemitic comments under the three Prime Minister's Tweets are in Chapter 3 under Politics.

  Of course Jews support it, this was their idea in the first place. That Jew you're shaking hands with (Mark Liebler) was the main architect of the Voice. Jewish Power in Australia is more secure if White Australia is weakened, and you are complicit in it. Treasonous.

4. ORGANISATIONS and ONLINE

Introduction

This chapter aims to highlight the main themes and expressions of anti-Jewish hatred found in the online content of certain Australian organisations and individuals. This chapter is far from comprehensive and provides only an intimation of the volume of online antisemitic content generated or elicited by organisations and individuals which is freely and directly accessible to any member of the public.

Organisations

There are many types of groups and organisations operating within Australia which openly espouse and promote an antisemitic ideology, sometimes intermixed with white supremacist and other racist themes. A decade ago, antisemitic groups and organisations promoted a motley assortment of ideologies, ranging from civic patriotism, nationalism, and racism, including National Socialism (Nazism). These organisations and groupings focused primarily on articulating and promoting societal fears, hatreds and resentments, the targets of which varied according to social conditions and political currents, but typically targeted immigrants, people of non-European ethnic background, sexually and gender diverse people, and the perennial 'other', Jews. Many of these groups also subscribed to conspiracy theories about a monolithic global Jewish elite who conspire together to exercise inordinate power over the world's governments, banks and media.

Today, many of the existing groups and organisations are neo-Nazi in ideology. This wave of neo-Nazism began in late 2016 with Antipodean Resistance. Since then, many other right-wing extremist organisations have dispersed or disappeared, while new organisations have been formed. Many of these new neo-Nazi groups are closely connected with each other. As they often tend to be geographically concentrated, they form, in effect, local branches of a broad neo-Nazi movement. There is cooperation between different groups in different states, and their members visit one another. Members meet up locally and engage in activities together, including 'physical training', and dissemination of propaganda material such as leaflets, posters, and stickers. Many of these organisations and individuals use two or more online platforms. Some have websites. Most use various extremist social media sites to showcase their presence, promote propaganda material, advertise their activities, and recruit members and supporters.

There is a distinct overlap between the ideology and rhetoric of sections of the far Right and far Left when it comes to Jews and/or Israel. Nazi-style Jew-hating comments have frequently been posted on anti-Israel or pro-Palestinian social media pages of ostensibly left-wing organisations, and elicit supportive posted comments. Left-wing antisemitism tends to be expressed in anti-Zionist or anti-Israel terms, frequently deploying the tropes of classical antisemitism. A proportion of those who are vocal or involved in political activity directed against Israel have frequently expressed themselves in terms which are coarsely derogatory of Jews and fall well within the criteria specified in the IHRA Working Definition of Antisemitism. (See Chapter 7 – 'Antisemitism in the anti-Israel Movement'.)

"Online Communities"

Antisemitic and other extremist organisational activity has changed over the years. It was once primarily sourced from actual organisations of people meeting and acting together. In more recent years, it has become much more common for people to form virtual groups of "online communities" consisting of like-minded people who may never meet physically, but who combine together to disseminate hate propaganda online, and echo and reinforce one another's extremist views. There are some groups, however, notably neo-Nazi, who maintain a physical presence and connection to members, as well as online.

Websites and social media platforms

The internet has caused a revolution in producing, disseminating and accessing information. The internet provides a relatively cheap and easy means of publication, giving anyone with a computer or mobile phone potentially a global reach. Items posted on the internet are potentially accessible not just in one local area or country, but throughout the world. Internet publishers have operated with far less stringent editorial guidelines and standards than those which constrain publishers in the print and electronic media.

With the internet, vilification and other forms of racism are easily and widely propagated, often with few restraints, and often anonymously. Avowedly antisemitic organisations and individuals have been able to express and propagate their views on websites, social media platforms, video channels, and even via online mainstream media sites. Even websites and mainstream social media sites ostensibly espousing an anti-racist agenda often fail to uphold their own principles when it comes to vilification of Jews, whether directly or with regard to the State of Israel.

However, there has been a concerted effort over the last few years by many organisations and individuals to counter hate on the internet. This has included efforts by Jewish organisations and others, and increasingly by social media platform providers and internet service providers, such as Google, Microsoft, Facebook, Instagram and Youtube. In the last few years these companies have devoted significantly more resources to detecting and eliminating content which breaches their community standards, and also to tightening their own standards. This includes removing the accounts of some individuals and groups who are gross or persistent offenders. However, although racism continues to be expressed on social media platforms, especially Twitter and Tiktok, many racists have moved over to newer platforms that allow racist and other hate content, notably Bitchute, Gab, Odyssey, Telegram, and others – these so-called "Free Speech" platforms are the main online vehicles for driving antisemitism.

Reach of Social Media

To illustrate the influence of social media, and how it can amplify hate: Kanye West (now known as Ye), American rapper, songwriter, record producer and fashion designer, Tweeted a threat against Jews on 8 October 2022: "I'm a bit sleepy tonight but when I wake up I'm going death con 3 On JEWISH PEOPLE." At that time, West had over 31 million followers on Twitter and over 18 million on Instagram – a massive audience. Online, West/Ye reached more than three times the total number of Jews in the world, which stands at only 15 million. There are many such 'influencers' on social media who have multiple millions of followers and who post anti-Jewish content online.

Popularity of Online Platforms

There are many online platforms. The popularity of each platform is illustrated by the number of Monthly Active Users (MAUs). There are several websites which show this, although the results differ according to which platforms are included in the list. The MAU of platforms, in descending order are: Facebook (3.03 billion MAUs); YouTube (2.5b); WhatsApp (2b);

Instagram (2b); TikTok (1b); Telegram (700m); Snapchat (557m); Twitter/X (556m); Pinterest (445m); Reddit (430m), according to https://buffer.com/library/social-media-sites/#the-top-21-social-networking-sites-of-2023

Elon Musk and Twitter/X

Elon Musk purchased Twitter in October 2022, and immediately made himself CEO. He rebranded Twitter as X in July 2023, replacing both the name and the iconic blue bird logo. Racists and other extremists continued to proliferate on Twitter/X, especially after people, who previously had suspended or banned accounts, opened new accounts following Musk's takeover. The re-entry of these extremists was publicly criticised by the Anti-Defamation League (ADL) in the US for the increase in antisemitism on Twitter/X.

In September 2023, Elon Musk blamed the ADL rather than antisemites for antisemitism on Twitter/X: "The ADL … are ironically the biggest generators of anti-Semitism on this platform!", then claimed he was "pro, free speech, but against anti-Semitism of any kind". He then made another accusation: "Since the acquisition, The @ADL has been trying to kill this platform by falsely accusing it & me of being anti-Semitic". Finally, instead of removing antisemites from Twitter, Musk decided that "To clear our platform's name on the matter of anti-Semitism, it looks like we have no choice but to file a defamation lawsuit against the Anti-Defamation League … oh the irony!"

Insights into online antisemitism

Carl Miller, Research Fellow, King's College London, 21 March 2023:
"In the days after Elon Musk took over Twitter in October 2022, the social media platform saw a "surge in hateful conduct," which its then safety chief put down to a "focused, short-term trolling campaign." New research suggests that when it comes to antisemitism, it was anything but. Rather, antisemitic tweets have more than doubled over the months since Musk took charge, ... Musk, a self-professed "free speech absolutist," pointed the platform in a different direction after taking control. In short order, Twitter's independent Trust and Safety Council was dissolved, previously banned accounts were reinstated and over half of Twitter's staff was laid off or simply left – including many of those responsible for enforcing the company's hate speech policies. ... Studying social media has shown me again and again just how powerfully it helps to form the cultures and ideas that underlie its users' behavior. Ultimately, the proliferation of tweets that hold Jews responsible for all the world's ills, that circulate dark conspiracies of control and cover-up, or that fire derogatory attacks directed toward Jews, can only support antisemitism online – and in the real world.

Julia Ebner, researcher and author, Institute for Strategic Dialogue (ISD), 29 June 2023:
"Slick social media campaigns and powerful influencers such as [Kanye] West have exponentially amplified extremist campaigns and brought fringe conspiracy myths to mainstream audiences. While social media platforms have become better at removal policies and content moderation, some of these developments have been reversed recently. Our research at the ISD found that antisemitic content increased by more than 100 per cent on Twitter after Elon Musk's takeover of the platform. Twitter has restored hundreds of accounts of far-right and QAnon activists who have spread hatred against minorities."

Matthew Doran, ABC political reporter, 22 June 2023:
"Elon Musk's social media platform Twitter has been issued with a demand from Australian authorities for information on what it is doing to tackle online hate. Australia's eSafety Commissioner Julie Inman Grant … Ms Inman Grant revealed she was particularly concerned about anti-Semitic content, and harmful posts directed at Indigenous Australians and members of the LGBTIQ+ community. She cited research by the Centre for Countering Digital Hate suggesting Twitter was repeatedly failing to act on harmful content posted by Twitter Blue accounts, the platform's subscription service. … Ms Inman Grant said Mr Musk's decision to let more than 62,000 suspended or banned accounts be reinstated was fuelling the situation."

Study: Online Antisemitism in 2023

The following extract, from a report released on 14 August 2023, provides some indications of the amount of each of four types of antisemitism found on nine online platforms.

Online Antisemitism in Australia 2023
By Dr Andre Oboler and Jasmine Beinart

An Online Hate Prevention Institute [OHPI] Report produced in partnership with the Executive Council of Australian Jewry [ECAJ].

Executive Summary [extract, page 6]

This report is based on a sample of antisemitic content from social media collected between November 3, 2022 and June 2, 2023. … we retained 370 items. These items form the basis of this report. … 165 (38%) of the items covered by this analysis are believed to have been posted by Australians.

The sample was gathered from nine online platforms: Twitter (116 items), Facebook (42 items), Telegram (41 items), TikTok (39 items), Gab (32 items), YouTube (27 items), Bitchute (26 items), Instagram (24 items), and Reddit (23 items). …

The taxonomy has 4 main categories and 26 sub-categories. … The most common major category is traditional antisemitism which accounts for 40% of the major classifications. This is closely followed by Holocaust related content which makes up 38% of the major classification. The remaining two major categories, Israel related antisemitism and content inciting violence each account for 11% each of the major classifications.

The relative prevalence of each major category of antisemitism (compared to the prevalence of the other major categories) varies significantly by platform. Holocaust related content was the most prevalent major category on Facebook (58%), YouTube (50%), Reddit (46%), and Twitter (39%). On Instagram Holocaust related content and traditional antisemitism were equally prevalent (44% of each). Traditional antisemitism was the most prevalent category on BitChute (61%), Telegram (61%), Gab (54%), and TikTok (43%).

All items were reported to their respective platforms and the removal rates monitored. TikTok has the best removal rate at 15%, while Reddit and Bitchute had the worst with no items removed. Other removal rates were: Gab 3%, YouTube 4%, Instagram 13%, Telegram 12%, Twitter 14%, and Facebook 12%

Ideologies embracing antisemitism

The main ideologies which espouse and exhibit, to varying levels, overt antisemitism in Australia today include the following, listed in alphabetical order. There is often overlap between one or more ideologies.

Christian Identity:

"Christian Identity is an antisemitic, racist theology that rose to a position of commanding influence on the racist right in the 1980s. "Christian" in name only, it asserts that white people, not Jewish people, are the true Israelites favored by God in the Bible. The movement's relationship with evangelicals and fundamentalists has generally been hostile due to the latter's belief that the return of Jewish people to Israel is essential to the fulfillment of end-time prophecy." – Source: Southern Poverty Law Centre (SPLC)
https://www.splcenter.org/fighting-hate/extremist-files/ideology/christian-identity

A strand within Christian Identity holds to the belief that Europeans are the descendants of Adam and Eve, while Jews are the descendants of Eve and Satan (often personified through the serpent). There are various versions of this strand, which are used to explain and justify belief in non-Europeans, notably Jews and sub-Saharan Africans, as being of a lesser humanity or even sub-human, and therefore deserving of inhumane treatment.

Christian Nationalism:

"At its core, Christian nationalism is a political ideology that advocates for the fusion of a particular form of Christianity and a country's civic and political life, and for a privileged place for Christianity in the public realm. ... Christian nationalists believe that their countries are defined by Christianity and that their governments and citizens should take steps to keep it that way. ... Christian nationalism has also been linked to a host of alarming attitudes among self-professing Christians — including racist, misogynistic, authoritarian, homophobic, and violent views." – Source: Nilay Saiya, Assistant Professor at Nanyang Technological University in Singapore.
https://www.abc.net.au/religion/christian-nationalism-is-a-global-problem/13968062

Christian Nationalism as a movement was founded by Gerald K Smith in the US in the 1950s. Over the last few years, many Australian extremists, who are racists and antisemites, but who had not previously expressed any religious belief, or were self-declared atheists, have adopted Christianity as a religion, but usually in the form of Christian Nationalism, often equating Christianity with Western civilisation and European ethnicity. This is a merger of traditional Christian antisemitism and militant white nationalism. A prominent Christian Nationalist is Andrew Torba, owner of the social media platform, Gab.

Cultural Marxism:

The "Cultural Marxism" thesis is a conspiracy theory claiming that Jewish academics associated with the Frankfurt School of social theory and philosophy conceived a plot to undermine and destroy European Western culture. This plot is said to be implemented through the promotion of equality, human rights, civil rights, feminism, homosexual rights, abortion, multiculturalism, secularism and internationalism. In this way, "Cultural Marxism" is portrayed as the ideological weapon by which "traditional" Western societal values and national identities are being undermined, and the resilience of "white people" to maintain their own traditional culture is being diminished.

Eco-fascism:
"Eco-fascism draws a link between the environmental effects of climate change and overpopulation and global migration. ... Eco-fascism has also become a vehicle to promote antisemitism, with Jews presented as a de-racinated, corrupt, cosmopolitan elite destroying the land through industrialisation, mass migration and global capitalism at the expense of 'real people'." – Source: Lydia Khalil, 2022, 'Rise of the Extreme Right', pp. 60-61.

Fascism:
"Central to European fascism is the idea that it is the Jews who are the agents of moral decay. According to European fascism, it is the Jews who bring a country under the domination of (Jewish) global elite, by using the tools of liberal democracy, secular humanism, feminism and gay rights, which are used to introduce decadence, weakness and impurity. Fascist antisemitism is racial rather than religious in origin, targeting Jews as a corrupt stateless race who seek global domination." – Source: Jason Stanley, 26 Feb. 2022

Identitarianism:
The Identitarian Movement, or Identitarianism, is a pan-European ethno-nationalist movement which focuses on the preservation of European culture and identity. Identitarians subscribe to the view that immigration to Europe (and to other ethnic-European majority countries) by non-white people and Muslims is a threat to "European identity". Identitarians therefore are opposed to non-Europeans residing in Europe and in the majority ethnic-European countries of North America and Australasia. Many subscribe to the Great Replacement concept (see White Replacement below).

Identitarian policies to ensure the continuation of European culture and identity include: stopping non-ethnic-European immigration to European lands; opposition to multiculturalism; and remigration (that non-ethnic Europeans should migrate from European lands and return to their ancestral lands). Identitarians oppose multiculturalism within nations, and instead claim to believe in ethnopluralism (the idea that each ethnic population should live in their own lands). Identitarians use the Greek letter lambda (ʌ) as a symbol, with the lambda usually encased in a circle, and typically black on yellow or yellow on black.

National Socialism (Nazism):
National Socialism (Nazism), under Hitler and in its contemporary manifestation (often referred to as neo-Nazism), is a race-based ideology. National Socialism is constructed around a racial theory and a conspiracy theory. At its core, Nazi ideology subscribes to the racial theory of a superior "Aryan race" and a sub-human "Jewish race"; that humanity consists of a hierarchy of biological races; and that all people are categorised and defined by their biological "race". In addition, Nazi ideology subscribes to conspiracy theories that "the Jews" are evil and powerful, and manipulate and control governments, finance and media, with the aim of totally dominating the world. Nazism therefore designates "the Jews" as the most dangerous threat to the "natural supremacy" of the "Aryan race". Nazis also believe there is an existential and eternal battle between the "Aryan race" and the "Jewish race". Nazis believe that for the "Aryan race" to assert its "natural supremacy" and triumph in this apocalyptic battle, Jews must be annihilated from the earth. Neo-Nazism, like its earlier incarnation under Hitler, is thus a totalitarian and genocidal ideology. In their attempt at total genocide, the Nazis and their collaborators rounded up and murdered six million Jews.

Order of Nine Angles (O9A):
"the Order of Nine Angles (O9A), a U.K.-based occultist group whose members, according to U.S. authorities, "have espoused violent, neo-Nazi, antisemitic, and Satanic beliefs, and have expressed admiration for, among others, Nazis, such as Adolf Hitler, and Islamic jihadists, such as Usama Bin Laden." The government also noted that "hatred of Jews was a unifying belief for members of the conspiracy and they regularly expressed anti-Semitic sentiments to foster trust and cohesiveness." Melzer spoke about killing Jews and "turning israel and their ppls to dust inshallah and imposing fashy [fascist] shariah" while regularly praising Hitler."

https://www.tabletmag.com/sections/news/articles/intersectional-antisemitism-america

QAnon:
"at its core, QAnon is an antisemitic, anti-establishment, fascist conspiracy theory that dovetails with right-wing extremist beliefs and goals. The core myth of QAnon is that a secret cabal is taking over the world by kidnapping children and drinking their blood to gain power, and that this cabal is composed of individuals in high positions financed by Jewish money. This is a rehashing of the old 'blood libel' conspiracy theory outlined in The Protocols of the Elders of Zion, which animated Nazi Germany. In fact, it is a modern internet version of the same antisemitic conspiracies around ritual murder and harm of children that have existed since the twelfth century. ... QAnon t-shirts read, 'Camp Auschwitz: Work brings freedom', the slogan that greeted prisoners at Nazi concentration camps. Another Q slogan, '6MWE', stands for 'Six Million Wasn't Enough', a reference to the number of Jews killed in the Holocaust."
– Source: Lydia Khalil, 2022, 'Rise of the Extreme Right', pp. 57-58.

Right-wing extremism:
"The "ingredients of right-wing extremism ... [are]: exclusionary ethno-nationalism, conspiratorial beliefs, hostility to democracy, notions of racial or religious supremacy, and the justification of violence.", "Antisemitism forms the backbone of right-wing extremist conspiracy theories..." and "Right-wing extremist movements are defined by their rejection of electoral democracy in favour of revolutionary violence."
– Source: Lydia Khalil, 2022, in 'Rise of the Extreme Right', pp. 30, 105, 184.

Sovereign Citizens:
Sovereign Citizens, colloquially SovCits, encompass a range of groups. In summary, Sovereign Citizens do not recognise the legality or authority of government, state or federal. They often view modern government as an illegitimate corporation, and therefore believe that laws, including tax laws, do not apply to them and cannot rightfully be enforced against them. Sovereign Citizen ideology embraces antisemitic conspiracy theories. Sovereign Citizens may include a white supremacist element, but also tend generally not to be racially based, apart from the antisemitism. The movement includes people of diverse ethnic backgrounds, including some indigenous Australians. People opposed to the COVID-19 countermeasures, such as vaccinations and lockdowns, have been attracted to the Sovereign Citizen movement. Australian Sovereign Citizens have adopted the Red Ensign flag, the official Australian maritime flag, to indicate their Sovereign Citizen beliefs.

In Australia, according to Toni Hassan, there appears to be a loose confederation of various groups, including the Original Sovereign Tribal Federation (OSTF - formed in 2010 by Mark McMurtrie); the Great Australian Party (which declared in a media release "the current state and federal governments of Australia are operating without license"); Reignite Democracy

Australia (a major anti-vaccine lobby group); the United Australia Party's Craig Kelly and Clive Palmer; and an assortment of others with fringe ideas.

White Jihad:
"White jihad, in this context, is when white supremacists derive inspiration from jihadists; incorporate jihadi terminology in their propaganda; support jihadi terrorism; and legitimise the collaboration between the two movements. … The two movements share hatred towards Jews, the LGBTQ+ community, the United States, and Western liberal principles. … In addition, the two movements promote a sacred armed struggle against the Jews, who are blamed for being behind governments that attack traditional societies; jihadists call this the Zio-Crusader Alliance, while white supremacists call it the Zionist Occupied Government (ZOG)."

"White Replacement" / "White Genocide" ideology:
The concept of "White Replacement" (sometimes called "White Genocide") is the false belief that there is a global conspiracy, usually described as created and orchestrated by "the Jews," to "import" non-Europeans — especially Africans, Asians and Arabs — into Europe, North America and Australasia for the express purpose of subjugating and decimating the European races and destroying Western civilisation. Those who subscribe to the "White Replacement" myth believe that through such mass immigration, people of ethnic European background will become a minority group, outnumbered and dominated — that is, replaced — in countries where once they were a majority of the population. This concept is sometimes euphemistically referred to as 'Ethnic Replacement' or 'Demographic Replacement'. Those who subscribe to the "White Replacement" myth often view both Jews and Muslims as the prime enemies — Jews as the plotters and instigators, Muslims as the means. Or, as one white ethno-nationalist phrased it: Jews are "the disease," Muslims are "the symptom."

"White Revolution" / "Race War":
Those who subscribe to the "White Replacement" myth often see the solution in terms of what they term "White Revolution" and "Race War." They advocate violence with the aim of instigating a civil war in Western countries between the majority ethnic Europeans and the various minorities of non-European ethnicity. Acts of terrorism and mass murder, such as occurred at the synagogue in Pittsburgh in 2018 and the mosques in Christchurch in 2019, aim at sparking this "Race War." The ultimate aim is the "ethnic cleansing", by deportation or murder, of all people who are not of European ethnicity from Europe, North America and Australasia. They envisage mass hangings (referred to as "the day of the rope", as glorified in the book 'The Turner Diaries') of "white" people who have "betrayed" their race by opposing racism. The term "Race War" is often used in the acronym GTKRWN ("Gas The Kikes, Race War Now"), as a signal and code that "the Jews" (derogatively referred to as "kikes") are the prime enemy, and hence are the ones to be targeted and annihilated in order to win the "Race War."

White Sharia:
""White Sharia" is a misogynistic white nationalist slogan that began as a meme & evolved into an anti-feminist vision of extreme patriarchy, where women are subjugated to the extent they are nothing more than white baby factories." – Source: Southern Poverty Law Centre (SPLC) https://twitter.com/splcenter/status/1123935222855340034

The concept of "White Sharia" was formally introduced in 2017 by white supremacist, Andrew Anglin in the USA. Since then, the idea has developed, and expanded. It is now common to see it referring to a real or perceived convergence of ideas and beliefs between European ethno-nationalists and other right-wing extremists, including neo-Nazis, and Islamic law / militant Muslims, notably around three core issues: the subservient role of women in the family and society; Jews, including Israel, as the prime enemy; and homosexuality as an expression of societal decadence. It is often expressed in memes by right-wing extremists that: "Islam is right about Women," "Islam is right about Faggots," and "Islam is right about Jews."

Codes and Terms used by Antisemites

Antisemites often use coded words, symbols and terms in referencing Jews. Some use them in an attempt to evade a crackdown on racist speech by some platform providers. Others use these terms to highlight their hostility towards Jews, or to denigrate Jews, or as a signal to others to indicate their antisemitic beliefs or political alignments.

Numbers, corresponding to letters of the alphabet, are used as code, eg the number 1 corresponds to the letter A as it is the first letter in the alphabet. For example: "18" is code for the letters AH, which stand for 'Adolf Hitler'; "88" is code for the letters HH, which stand for 'Heil Hitler'.

Other numbers have their own meanings, eg: "420" is code for "April 20", Hitler's birthday; "109" is code for the number of countries from which Jews allegedly have been expelled over the last 2000 years, and "110" includes a threatened future expulsion of Jews (presumably from western countries) advocated by these groups.

The number "14/88", and its variations, is one of the most popular white supremacist slogans. "14" refers to the 14 words of the White Supremacy credo by David Lane ("We must secure the existence of our people and a future for White children"). "28" refers to BH ie "Blood and Honour". A more recent code is "83" which refers to "Heil Christ".

The use of older terms such as 'cosmopolitans', 'globalists', 'internationalists', 'Rothschilds', and newer terms such as 'Soros', 'Cultural Marxist', 'European-Style Socialist' (coined by neo-Nazi Andrew Anglin), "Chosenite", "the Tribe", and "lizard-people", "small hats" or "little hats" (in reference to the Jewish male head-covering), can, in context, be used as code to convey the meaning of "Jew", and/or supposed Jewish wealth and power, but without saying the word "Jew". Examples of other commonly-used codes and symbols follow.

Symbol: the triple parentheses or 'Echoes' symbol ((( ))) is placed by antisemites around the name of a person who is, or is thought to be, Jewish, or around an entity considered to be controlled by Jews, to identify them as Jewish, eg (((Rosenberg))), (((media))).

Symbol: "\o" ie the back slash and "o" together refers to giving the Hitler/Nazi salute.

"blue", in context, refers to Jews.

"GTKRWN" stands for "Gas The Kikes, Race War Now".

"JQ" = Jewish Question. Alternatively, sometimes "JP" = Jewish Problem.

"Jew/Jews" may be spelt incorrectly and denigratingly as 'Joo' 'Ju' 'j3w' 'jwz' 'j€w$' ')ew' 'Juze' and other variants in order to avoid being picked up by online hate speech detectors.

"Kike" is an intensely derogatory word for Jew. It originated in the USA and has been culturally assimilated into the online vocabulary of Australian antisemites.

"ORION" stands for "Our race is our nation".

"Qui?" (French for "who") became a new code for "Jews" in June 2021 when Dominique Delawarde, a retired French General, made references in support of antisemitic conspiracy theories on a live television interview, then when asked to clarify, he responded "Qui?", as in "Who [controls...]"; the implied answer to the question "Qui?" is "the Jews"; it is recognised under French law as referring to Jews and is considered an expression of racist hate.

"Red Pill" and "Blue Pill" are terms derived from the film The Matrix (1999) and are used as metaphors by white supremacists. Taking the Red Pill refers to "waking up" and seeing the world as it 'truly' is (according to racist ideologies) eg the Jews control the world, feminism is destructive of societies etc. Taking the Blue Pill refers to remaining in one's current state of blissful ignorance or current illusion of the world (according to far-right ideologies).

"RAHOWA" or "rahowa" = Racial Holy War

"RWDS" = Right Wing Death Squad

"WN" = White Nationalist, the term by which white supremacists usually refer to themselves.

"YKW" stands for "You Know Who" and refers to Jews.

"ZOG" is the acronym for "Zionist Occupied Government" implying that "the Jews" control the government.

Hebrew and Yiddish words are used online by antisemites as to mock and denigrate Jews. The commonest example is the use of the ancient Hebrew word "goyim" which simply means "nations" ("goy" is the singular, meaning "nation"), and is often translated as "gentiles". However, antisemites falsely claim that "goy/goyim" means "cattle" in order to promote the myth that Jews believe they are superior to all other peoples.

Other Hebrew or Yiddish words and expressions are used by antisemites to convey the message that they are ethno-nationalists who are awake to the "Jewish Question". Some antisemites also use mock Hebrew words as online names eg "MosheShekelRod" or "Shabbos Shekels".

Further codes and terms used for Jews, and an explanation of why or when they are antisemitic, can be found at https://www.ajc.org/translatehateglossary

|---|---|
| A common method to caricature Jews is through the image of the cartoon stereotype, originally known as “The Happy Merchant” and later as “Shlomo” (Hebrew for Solomon). The character is a caricature, depicted as a bearded, thick-lipped hook-nosed male wearing a skullcap, rubbing his hands together in glee. It portrays Jews as greedy, deceptive, scheming, manipulative, conspiratorial, controlling – all antisemitic stereotypes. The character has been used on social media and elsewhere, and has been embellished with colour and various backgrounds. | |

Nazi symbols

Some symbols used by Nazis and/or neo-Nazis, including by Australian neo-Nazis:

| | | |
|---|---|---|
| Nazi hakenkreuz (hooked cross or swastika) | Double Sig rune (SS lightning bolts) used by the SchutzStaffel (SS), who primarily perpetrated the mass killings of Jews | Totenkopf (Death's head) used by the Nazi SS from 1934 to 1945 |
| Sonnenrad (Black Sun/Wheel) | Broken Sun Cross, or Sun Cross swastika | Celtic Cross (unstylised) |
|  Algiz rune - symbol of protection, defence |  Tyr rune - symbol of combat | Othala/Odal rune - symbol of heritage, estate, possession |
| Swastika-styled triskele (triskelion), formed like a three-pointed swastika or 3-sevens. Triskeles are usually curly and are not a racist symbol. | Emblem of the 27th SS Volunteer Division Langemarck |  and Wolfsangel (vertical & horizontal) rune to ward off wolves. It was part of the divisional insignia of several Waffen-SS units in Nazi Germany. |

Targeting Jews and Jewish organisations online

Jewish individuals and organisations are often targeted with antisemitic comments on their social media pages or website contact forms, especially if they are prominent people or Jewish community organisations. The following items do not meet the criteria of an antisemitic incident, but are illustrations of antisemitic discourse.

Targeting Jews online with antisemitic rhetoric is common on the internet. Those targeted include: Jewish community representative organisations, Jewish religious bodies, Jewish community media, Jewish educational organisations, and others. Only a very small sample of these comments is reproduced below, due to space constraints.

In addition, individual Jews and Jewish community organisations are often named and denigrated online by those who are hostile to Jews. This is especially the case for those Jewish individuals and organisations which expose and counter antisemitism. Some instances are included below.

A note on identity: The name of each person posting a comment referred to in this chapter is as described in the poster's online account, whether Facebook, Gab, Telegram, Twitter, etc, and may not be genuine.

- "Wanna know what really rustles jimmies? Putting faces to names. JULIE NATHAN Research Director, Executive Council of Australian Jewry. You have a name, you have a face. Do you have an address you filthy kike? I wonder did you think to make your phone number silent? Could it be looked up on www.whitepages.com.au ? You look boomerish in age so it could be possible! Unfortunately for the anons here I'm lazy and won't bother checking. Do sleep well knowing we know your race, religion, gender, approximate age, name, general location, etc. which is more than enough. You should have seen the doxing done for fun with less info around these parts. Just imagine if someone here were upset with you over something. Could you ever sleep soundly again? I wonder if you have the ability to take a step back and ask yourself would a good person ever have to worry about being known to strangers or would it only be an evil person with something to fear? ## Antisemitism Online - by individuals and groups

The following is a reproduction of content authored mostly by individuals, and some by groups. Many of the posted comments are on Telegram, and some on Gab - sites which allow virtually free reign to all kinds of rhetoric on their platforms, including racist hate-speech and incitement to violence. When major platforms like Facebook, Twitter/X, Instagram and Youtube, closed the accounts of thousands of racist extremists, many of them moved to Gab, Telegram and elsewhere. Although Twitter/X has allowed many to come back on Twitter/X.

As with all social media, some people use their real name, others use pseudonyms or code-names. In reproducing the following posts here, the names of page owners and authors have been left as posted and may not be genuine.

Many groups and individuals have several accounts, eg on Gab, Telegram and Twitter, and often post the exact same, or similar, content on most of their sites. Many of them also post images along with textual comments. It is worth reiterating that of Monthly Active Users (MAUs), Telegram has 700m, while Twitter/X has much less at 556m. Gab has 5 million registered users, and only 100,000 active users, as of 2021-22.

The content below is only a tiny proportion of the many hundreds of accounts and thousands of posts seen online and documented over the past twelve months for this report. Several individuals and groups have been selected, reproducing a page or two of content by each (rather than selecting a few posts each by a hundred people), as it provides a better overall view of the types of beliefs espoused by those who are hostile towards Jews. Entries below are generally in alphabetical order.

Australian Meditations

Australian Meditations is run by Stefan Eracleous, who is known as 'Medi' on Gab and Telegram and in right-wing extremist circles. He is apparently a member of the neo-Nazi National Socialist Network (NSN).

It was the JEWS who implemented the Race Discrimination Act of 1975 by means of subterfuge. It was the JEWS who lobbied the government to implement 18C and it was the JEWS who prevented it's repeal. It's the JEWS lobbying for an increased refugee intake and ultimately responsible for the Sudanese crime wave. It's the JEWS who are pushing a big Australia and even more unassimilable refugees. It's the JEWS making a bunch of money off property development while pushing mass immigration to drive it. It's the JEWS pushing left wing ideas in influential left wing periodicals. It was the JEWS who represented Eddie Mabo and gave away 10% of Australia to the Abos. It's the JEWS running the anti-white ABC Malcolm Fraser exposing Jewish power in Australia and saying they deliberately bombed the USS Liberty

Australian Sovereignty Alliance

The Australian Sovereignty Alliance (ASA) was founded by Sam Packer and Dane Pritchard. They are based in Queensland, and have been active in speaking at street protests, including the so-called 'Freedom' rallies. ASA has a website and Telegram channel. The ASA heavily promotes the pro-Nazi, antisemitic "Europa: The Last Battle" series of videos.

  Knowing the truth about WWI and WWII weighs heavy on the shoulders, especially on ANZAC Day. These wars were banker's wars, formulated by the international clique of Jews, dedicated to total global control and domination. They were successful. One fact that is rarely spoken about is that the Allied forces teamed up with the communists (Russia) to crush the Axis forces who were against the Jewish internationalist tentacles squeezing the wealth and life out of their nations.

Blair Cottrell

Blair Cottrell is a former leader of the United Patriots Front, a predominantly anti-Islam group formed in 2015. In 2017, Cottrell, along with two others, was convicted of inciting hatred toward Muslims after staging a mock beheading with a dummy in Bendigo in 2015. Over the last several years, Cottrell has focussed, at least publicly, on making body-building videos of himself, and occasionally posting antisemitic comments online. He posts mainly on Telegram, and he engages in interviews with other far-right figures.

  My intent I suppose will be to make a video series reviewing Mein Kampf, first by hitting the core themes of the book then interpreting each chapter without verbosity and helping viewers to gain a decent understanding of its contents and the general philosophy of its author (which in essence really isn't as shocking or extreme as people have been led to believe). Certain people and groups with a lot of money and influence are heavily invested in generating a stigma around German National Socialism, Hitler, his book and the Second World War. This stigma is necessary to maintain a lack of understanding, which lays the groundwork for fear, hatred, contempt and knee-jerk rejections.

- https://t.me/realblaircottrell/4502 Blair Cottrell, [30/09/2023]
  It's politics. Everybody is trying to infiltrate everything in politics. Actually, the "far-right" (read: white Australian workers with access to the internet) has been significantly less successful at infiltrating Australian politics than international Judaism & its leftist rhetoric, which has penetrated every level of social life and is the only reason we're having this referendum in the first place.

David Hiscox

David Hiscox is the editor of the XYZ website, which is based in Melbourne and was set up in 2015. He writes many articles for the site. Hiscox's articles contain antisemitic content, particularly conspiracy theories about Jews controlling the world. XYZ published articles each day, from a small cohort of far-right people. XYZ has a presence on Gab and Telegram, often posting links to articles on the website. In August 2023, Hiscox shut down the XYZ website, although left the site up "for posterity"; he claims he is "burnt out" and has "ended all irl activism". David Hiscox is reported to be a member of the neo-Nazi group National Socialist Network. The following quotes are by Hiscox in his articles published on XYZ.

  New South Wales police officers showed up to my house this morning at 7am sharp, waking myself and my young family up to inform me that my firearms licence had been cancelled/revoked by the police commissioner for New South Wales. They subsequently seized all my legally owned firearms and ammunition from my home. They seized my 2 rifles, 1 shotgun and 2 handguns and ammunition for all the aforementioned, which were all legally owned and safely stored in accordance to firearms legislation in my state.

Jewish power fundamentally comes from the positions they are permitted to hold within our societies, this means White identity politics will necessarily always threaten Jews with exclusion from the source of their power. Our rivalry is therefore unsolvable by any means but the subordination of one to the other. Jews therefore must be seen as our primary ethnoracial competitor, their very existence is predicated upon both their opposition to and inclusion within Western Civilization. Any "alliance" they offer must be held in absolute contempt. This is a non-negotiable principle, the Anglo-Right entering into collaboration with Zionists is at the root of its capitulation to everything we stand against.

National Socialist Network (NSN)

National Socialist Network (NSN) is the main active neo-Nazi organisation in Australia today. It began public operations in January 2020, and was the subject of a story in the mainstream media in May 2020. Although NSN is an innately antisemitic organisation, many of its activities and propaganda materials promote white nationalism and "white revolution" rather than overtly antisemitic themes. NSN beliefs, as expressed in public statements, include: that "the Jews" control governments, media, universities, are behind non-white immigration into 'white' countries. NSN has placed a variety of stickers regularly around many cities; NSN posts on Telegram, through several channels, but sparingly, and these often are copies of messages from Thomas Sewell, NSN leader.

National Socialist Network held several prominent public rallies in Victoria in 2023. On Australia Day, 26 January 2023, NSN/EAM members held a large banner "Australia for the White Man". Members of NSN/EAM rallied on the steps of the Victorian Parliament, on 18 March 2023 in opposition to the Transgender movement, with a large banner "Destroy Paedo Freaks", and again on 13 May 2023 in opposition to the Federal government's plan to increase immigration to Australia with a large banner of "Living Space for Whites – Stop Immigration". On 13 July 2023, NSN/EAM members rallied in Geelong, regional Victoria, to 'Stop Immigration - Keep Geelong White'. On 23 September 2023, NSN/EAM members marched with the No campaign in Melbourne's CBD. NSN members at rallies are usually clad in black clothes and with faces covered by balaclavas. At these protests, they openly performed multiple Nazi salutes, on the steps of the Victorian Parliament. This led to legislation to ban the Nazi salute in Victoria, and one person has already been charged under that law.

Two NSN members, Duncan Cromb aged 38 and Jackson Pay aged 23, were arrested in 2021, in possession of multiple documents containing instructions on how to commit a terrorist act, examples of successful terrorist acts and information based on "racist ideologies". They pleaded guilty to possessing documents and records of information for terrorist acts, and were sentenced in the South Australian District Court in June 2023 to more than 2 years in jail each.

Cromb was found in possession of advanced strategies to commit terrorist attacks including bombings and assassinations. https://www.abc.net.au/news/2023-06-02/neo-nazi-group-members-jailed-for-terror-planning/102426204

  White Australia has been betrayed by the Commonwealth; the Liberal and Labor parties are both complicit in the destruction of our people. Our highest task is to alert the men and women of our blood to the fact that their enemy is both the Jew left and the Jew right. If it were not for the Australian National Socialists, scarcely anyone would know about the peril in which White Australia finds itself. The public would not know of the great victories won by National Socialists, nor the disgusting injustice done to us by the Jews, and their servants in the police and anti-fascist groups. This century will decide the life or death of our nation. Join the White revolution!

- National Socialist Network@NatSocNetwork · Jul 18, 2023
  South Australian activists hoist the converging arrows over the enemy. So long as the Jews push for their Voice to Parliament, all White men of good conscience must fight against it. We implore all White Australians of our ideals to join the revolution! Stop hiding from the dire reality of the situation. Get involved and work towards a free White Australia with your brothers in the struggle. Blood and honour!

Ryan Fletcher

Ryan Fletcher has for many years openly espoused and promoted anti-Jewish themes and consistently called for the killing of Jews, especially since 2018. He has posted on numerous online accounts at Gab, Telegram, Twitter, and elsewhere. Fletcher has written articles and booklets, produced 2-3 minute length cartoon-style videos, and continues to create cartoon illustrations – all predominantly anti-Jewish in content. Fletcher writes books for children, one of which, published in July 2021, was listed by the US-based international organisation, Terrorism Research & Analysis Consortium (TRAC). Some of his books for children are anti-Jewish but use coded language, eg one titled 'Beware the Bad Few'. Early in 2022, Fletcher began posting about Christianity and the Bible, something he had not done before. On Gab he self-describes as a "Supersessionist Christian … Pan-Aryan."

In December 2020, Fletcher posted online that he had been arrested on 9 November 2020 by the Victoria Police Security Intelligence Unit (SIU) for an offence under the Victorian Racial and Religious Tolerance Act 2001 - Serious Religious Vilification and Incitement, and a second offence under the Commonwealth Criminal Code of "Use Telecommunications Device to Menace". This did not stop Fletcher from advocating violence against Jews, and continuing to call for the murder of Jews. In May 2022, Victoria Police dropped all charges against Fletcher without publishing a reason or reasons.

Some of Fletcher's posts on Gab and Telegram follow. Often the same item posted on Gab is also posted on Telegram and on Twitter.

Shermon Burgess

Shermon Burgess has been a far-right activist since 2015. He is a former leader of a far-right anti-Islam group, the United Patriots Front (UPF), in NSW. In the past he has used the name 'Great Aussie Patriot'. Burgess posts on Facebook, using the name 'Valhalla' (soldiers' heaven) to reflect his Odinist beliefs at the time. In November 2023 Burgess "locked his profile" on Facebook and "only his friends can see what he shares on his profile".

In early 2023, Burgess converted to Islam. However, it appears that Burgess's far-right views have not changed and align with extremist views within Islam especially in demonising Jews, opposition to LGBTI people, and support for the subordination of women. On 11 September 2023, Burgess posted a reason why he converted to Islam "This is why white people are flocking to Islam because if you slap Islam it doesn't turn the other cheek. It strikes back furiously with the sword. Strength is admired. Weakness is not."

  … Our views are becoming more and more normalised by the day. We are breaking through the floodgates of jewish censorship. They try to cancel our ideas … What a White-pill, imagine how much the jews and anti-Whites are seething right now. Die flut kommt. [the flood is coming]

  … When we defeat White Guilt (muh holocaust, muh genocide, muh slavery) we achieve White Power. We can not get over White Guilt until we normalise Hitler and defeat the holocaust narrative in any and every way.

  The jews are in a constant struggle of how to deal with the rise in White Nationalism, specifically it's strongest form - National Socialism. In Australia I have noticed a series of overlapping strategies from the multiple tentecals of the jewish tyranny that rules over us. … The most overlapping and overbearing strategy is for jewish lobby groups to directly or indirectly fund politicians and then ask them to asphyxiate/censor/harrass/dox/ban, or all of the above, groups that advocate for the existence of White people. … these jewish supremacists have the power to asphyxiate or amplify depending on how their schizophrenia is treating them that day.

… Money creation, jew vs Aryan. All interest is jewish. All forms of interest is usury/slavery. Aryan money creation is productive. jewish money creation is parasitic. Interest produces nothing. … The federal reserve and world bank are the centre of the jewish temple. … Better an Aryan order than a jewish one. … 1488

White Australia has been betrayed by the Commonwealth; the Liberal and Labor parties are both complicit in the destruction of our people. Our highest task is to alert the men and women of our blood to the fact that their enemy is both the Jew left and the Jew right. If it were not for the Australian National Socialists, scarcely anyone would know about the peril in which White Australia finds itself. The public would not know of the great victories won by National Socialists, nor the disgusting injustice done to us by the Jews, and their servants in the police and anti-fascist groups. This century will decide the life or death of our nation. Join the White revolution!

  Hitler was the slave who became King. He fought jewish communism and jewish interest slavery, and freed his people from jewish tyranny. … Because we killed the only man strong enough to free us from international judaism, now we are born into slavery. The only way to free our people once again is to rebuild Hitler's order and create a unity for all White people and break free from jewish interest slavery.

  White Nationalism is the natural response by all healthy White people to White Genocide. Whites collectively are under threat of genocide by the racial replacement policies of multiculturalism and diversity. These policies have been enacted by jewish subversives in order to destroy Whites. It doesn't matter whether you live in Australia, America, South Africa or even Iceland. The jews want you replaced. If you are of European descent, if you live in Europe or a colony of Europe, it is your moral duty to resist the jewish led genocide of your people.

5. CHRISTIAN

Christian authority figures and institutions have a history over many centuries of promoting antagonism and hatred towards Jews and Judaism. In recent decades most churches have moderated, negated and even reversed these positions; many have sought reconciliation with Jews and promoted respect for Judaism, and are very supportive of the Jewish people and Israel. However, some churches, or some of their religious leaders, maintain hostility towards Jews and Judaism, perpetuate the view that Judaism has been "superseded" by Christianity and is no longer a valid religious faith; while others have developed their supersessionist beliefs about Jews and Judaism into hostility and active opposition to the existence of a Jewish state.

Insight: Dr Teresa Pirola, an Australian Catholic faith educator, provides insight into part of Christianity's history with regard to Jews and ways to help heal the past, in her article "'Drip feed' of anti-Judaism from Catholic pulpits has to stop" published in The Swag (the quarterly magazine of the National Council of Priests of Australia) on 3 May 2023:

> "It is subtle, almost subliminal. Yet the impact is infectious and poisonous, especially when one considers that this pattern of negativity has a sobering historical backdrop: many centuries of Christian antagonism towards the Jewish people, described as the 'teaching of contempt'. While never formally adopted as church teaching, a strain of anti-Jewish sentiment crept into Christian theology and catechesis at least as early as the patristic era.
> In the centuries that followed, what had begun as theological arguments directed against Judaism mutated into antisemitic defamation, leading beyond distorted preaching to outright persecution of Jews at the hands of Christian societies. It wasn't until twenty years after the diabolical tragedy of the Holocaust that the Catholic Church, at the Second Vatican Council, decisively condemned antisemitism, effectively repudiated the 'teaching of contempt' and re-set its theological compass so as to commit to a new era of respect for and reconciliation with the Jewish people."
> "Vatican II represents a ground-breaking achievement in the history of Jewish-Christian relations. However, reception of the Council takes time. It is not possible to heal a 2000-year-old wound in just 60 years of ecclesial renewal. Thus, even today, many parish congregations unquestioningly absorb micro-messages that portray Judaism in terms of inferiority and negativity, when in fact what they need in their theological and pastoral formation is a drip feed of positive messaging to reinforce the gains of Vatican II: messages that affirm Jesus as a faithful Jew; the Jewish roots of Christianity; the Church's permanent link to the mystery of Israel; the gift of the Jewish Scriptures, upon which the New Testament depends for its foundations; the gratitude owed to Judaism for introducing ethical monotheism to the world; and Jewish covenantal life as a living, enduring reality, to name a few."
> https://www.theswag.org.au/drip-feed-of-anti-judaism-from-catholic-pulpits-has-to-stop/

In general, mainstream Christians in Australia in recent years have not published overt and vile antisemitic expressions, or been involved in antisemitic activities, of the kind that have been expressed by some Christian clerical figures in Europe and the Americas. However, there have been a small number of exceptions.

There were a couple of instances, in the mainstream media, of articles published in Australia which made derogatory commentary about Jews as a group, and which sought to justify converting Jews to Christianity. Extremist, ostensibly Christian, discourse also continues to exist on the fringes of society. In this chapter, examples of antisemitism in two articles from a mainstream Christian publication are included.

Catholic Weekly

There were two articles by Father John Flader which were published in the Catholic Weekly. Although the articles were not overtly antisemitic, the content denied Judaism its legitimacy and sought to justify and promote efforts to convert Jews to Christianity. Such themes are based on the fallacy of supersessionism, also called replacement theology or fulfilment theology, which is the belief that the Christian Church has superseded the nation of Israel assuming their role as God's covenantal people. Mainstream Christian churches have officially abandoned and discredited this belief, but unofficially it continues to be propagated. The Catholic Weekly also noted it "wishes to congratulate Fr John Flader on 900 columns! … Catholics around Australia and the world who have been informed, entertained and edified by your work."

Catholic Weekly: "Jews and conversion" to Christianity

https://www.catholicweekly.com.au/q-and-a-with-fr-john-flader-jews-and-conversion/

An article "Q and A with Fr John Flader: Jews and conversion" by Father John Flader published in the Catholic Weekly on 4 March 2023 was about how to convert a Jewish man to Catholicism. Father Flader wrote:

- "I work with a Jewish man who shows great interest in the Catholic faith, but at the same time feels attached to his Jewish heritage and all it means for him. Is there some way I can show him that becoming a Catholic still respects his Jewish heritage?"

- "one of the principal articles of Jewish belief is the expectation of the Messiah who is to come. … Today's Jews are still awaiting the coming of the Messiah. But, as we Catholics and other Christians know, the Messiah has already come and he is Jesus Christ."

- "In view of this, a Jew who comes to believe that Jesus Christ is truly the Messiah is not abandoning his Jewish heritage but rather bringing it to fulfilment. "

Catholic Weekly: "Jews become Christians"

https://www.catholicweekly.com.au/fr-flader-have-many-jews-become-christians-in-our-time/

In an article "Q and A with Fr Flader: Have many Jews become Christians in our time?" by Father John Flader published in the Catholic Weekly on 8 March 2023, uses a book by a Jew who converted to Christianity to propel the case that Jews should convert, and falsely claims it is a "fulfilment of their Jewish faith". Father Flader wrote:

- "The effort of Jewish converts to bring other Jews into the Church has a long history, going back to the very beginning of the Church."

- "Jesus himself was a Jew … But he was also the Son of God and the long-awaited Messiah, whose mission was to bring Judaism to its fulfilment in Christianity."

- "Jesus, who fulfilled the prophecy"

- "The apostles were, of course, Jews who discovered that Jesus was the Messiah. They spent their lives preaching that truth, first to their fellow Jews."

Subsequently, the Catholic Weekly published a response to Father Flader's articles:

Catholic Weekly: a response to Father Flader
https://www.catholicweekly.com.au/why-the-catholic-church-does-not-seek-to-convert-jews/
In response to Father John Flader's articles, Dr Teresa Pirola, a Catholic educator and author, and Peter Wertheim AM, co-CEO of the Executive Council of Australian Jewry, authored a joint article, "Why the Catholic Church does not seek to 'convert' Jews" which was published in the Catholic Weekly on 24 March 2023. The authors wrote:

- "In two CW articles (5,12/3/23), Fr John Flader writes about the conversion of Jews to Christianity in such a way as to give the impression that the Catholic Church advocates missionary activity towards Jews, and that Jews need to embrace Jesus to be saved. This impression is wrong on both counts."

- "The Catholic Church today recognises that the Jewish people are already in a saving relationship with G-d, which is the principal theological reason it refrains from missionary work directed towards Jews."

- "In 2013, Pope Francis taught: "We hold the Jewish people in special regard because their covenant with God has never been revoked … Francis was reinforcing the teaching of Vatican II, anchored in a Pauline text, that G-d's promises to Israel cannot be negated…"

- "Pope John Paul II made explicit this conciliar teaching in the remarkable theological formula: G-d's covenant with Israel is "never revoked"."

- "The significance of this teaching is immense. Even as the Church proclaims Jesus to be the Messiah and Son of God, Catholics recognise that G-d's covenant with the Jewish people remains in force; indeed, is eternal."

- "G-d, who is steadfastly faithful, has not "downgraded" Jewish covenantal life following Christianity's emergence; G-d's loving fidelity to the Jewish people endures as powerfully as ever."

- "The mainstream Jewish community sees the active targeting of Jews for conversion to Christianity as not only theologically, but also morally, abhorrent."

- "Deep within the collective memory of the Jewish people is the long history of persecution and violence that attended the Church's attempts to impose Christianity on small and vulnerable Jewish communities who were at their mercy: the ritual humiliations, the staged theological "disputations," the threats of expulsion, the tortures, the autos da fé, mass executions and other abominations that found their nadir in the terrors of the Inquisition."

6. MUSLIM

The Muslim communities within Australia are religiously, ethnically, and politically diverse. There are many excellent and successful interfaith programs and forms of dialogue between Muslims and Jews which seek to break down barriers and create better mutual understanding.

However, there are individuals and groups who self-identify as Muslims and who in the name of Islam have expressed and promoted anti-Jewish views, either from a religious or political perspective, or a confused amalgam of both. This is not to suggest that statements positing the themes referred to in this Chapter necessarily give expression to an authentic or legitimate Islamic belief, or are generally representative of the views of Muslims or Muslim organisations in Australia.

Statements published by two self-described Muslim organisations, one mainstream, the other extremist, are reproduced in this section.

Australasian Muslim Times

The Australasian Muslim Times (AMUST) publishes, in hard copy and online, many articles and news items of interest to Australian Muslims. As a rule, AMUST does not publish or encourage antisemitic content. However, articles by various authors do occasionally contain antisemitic content, including those below, which are listed in chronological order.

- Gary Dargan – comment October 21, 2022
  https://www.amust.com.au/2022/10/australias-reversal-on-recognising-jerusalem-as-israeli-capital-is-simply-a-return-to-status-quo/
  "That may be Australia's policy but expansionist Israel recognises no borders. Until it does it has no right to exist and should be treated like the criminal pariah it is."

In our view, the following example in the IHRA Working Definition of Antisemitism applies to the above passage:

Denying the Jewish people their right to self-determination

- Zia Ahmad | 28 Feb, 2023 |
  https://www.amust.com.au/2023/02/palestinians-amidst-occupation-oppression-violence-silence/
  "The indigenous people of Palestine, largely disempowered, betrayed by the Arab regimes and ignored by the international community, have been suffering for a long time under the global might of Zionism. … The global network of the Zionist lobby, particularly in centres of power in the West ensures that Israel's illegal occupation, attacks and spying activities are not challenged and flouting any UN based resolutions on a regular basis.

  The supporters of Israel proactively targets any one who raises the issue of self determination of Palestinians, respect for their human rights and advocates for their freedom of movement and speech. The Israel lobby does not tolerate any criticism of the Israeli state in mass media, social media, academic institutions or in public and actively monitors its critics demonising them as anti-semite. These supporters of Israel with resources for research, finance, influence in political and academic institutions have the strength to silence any one critical of Israel targeting any tweet, Facebook comment, press articles or media statement. Every time Palestinians or a genuine critic of Israel take centre stage, the pro-Israel lobby sets out to silence them."

In our view, the following example in the IHRA Working Definition of Antisemitism applies to the above passage:

Making mendacious, dehumanizing, demonizing, or stereotypical allegations about Jews as such or the power of Jews as collective — such as, especially but not exclusively, the myth about a world Jewish conspiracy or of Jews controlling the media, economy, government or other societal institutions.

- Souleiman Ould Mohameden | 24 Apr, 2023 | https://www.amust.com.au/2023/04/from-blood-and-dust-of-gaza-to-the-lucky-country-australia/
  "When 12-year-old Mohammed stepped out of his home … Their parents were killed by the Israelites. … The Israelites were oppressive people and were trying to take Palestine from the Palestinians."

In our view, the following example in the IHRA Working Definition of Antisemitism applies to the above passage:

Using the symbols and images associated with classic antisemitism (e.g., claims of Jews killing Jesus or blood libel) to characterize Israel or Israelis.

- Emeritus Professor Shahjahan Khan | 24 Jun, 2023 | https://www.amust.com.au/2023/06/acid-test-for-australia-recognition-of-stateless-palestinians-or-surrendering-to-the-pro-israel-lobby/
  "Acid test for Australia: Recognition of stateless Palestinians or surrendering to the pro-Israel lobby? … the issue of recognition of the state of Palestine by Australia … But if history is any guide, it is unlikely unless Albanese Government is led by moral conscious rather than continue to please the pro-Israel lobby. … If there is only one failure of the world leaders since the second world war, it the Israeli occupation of Palestine, continuing land siege and murder of innocent people including children and women. The only crime the Palestinians have committed is that they are not of the Jewish faith, rather Arabs – Christians and Muslims. … However, all Israeli Governments have been complicit in such war crimes. … The days of covering all crimes of the apartheid state of Israel … The horror and indiscriminate murder and wounding of mainly defenseless Palestinians under a system of apartheid, by Israeli forces, is a form of ethnic cleansing. … How Australia believes in two state solution by recognizing the occupiers and neglecting the oppressed?"

In our view, the following example in the IHRA Working Definition of Antisemitism applies to the above passage:

Making mendacious, dehumanizing, demonizing, or stereotypical allegations about Jews as such or the power of Jews as collective — such as, especially but not exclusively, the myth about a world Jewish conspiracy or of Jews controlling the media, economy, government or other societal institutions.

- Dr Aslam Abdullah | 1 Aug, 2023 | https://www.amust.com.au/2023/08/fighting-islamophobic-attacks-through-self-reflection/
  "… While Muslims regard their faith as a panacea for all problems, others consider Islam a source of all evil. Who are the others … Five influential groups are active against Islam and Muslims in one or the other way. They are Right-wing evangelists, Israeli Zionists, liberal intellectuals, Hindu nationalists, and Chinese communists. Each has constructed its narrative against Islam and Muslims. … Israeli Zionists see Islam as a threat to their survival. In their view, Muslims would never accept the state of Israel as a legitimate entity and would continue to denounce its existence. Their presence in the West is a source of anti-Semitism, and without marginalizing them, Israel would live in a state of uncertainty."

In our view, the following example in the IHRA Working Definition of Antisemitism applies to the above passage:

Making mendacious, dehumanizing, demonizing, or stereotypical allegations about Jews as such or the power of Jews as collective — such as, especially but not exclusively, the myth about a world Jewish conspiracy or of Jews controlling the media, economy, government or other societal institutions.

- Zia Ahmad | 3 Aug, 2023 | Editorial https://www.amust.com.au/2023/08/hijacked-religious-symbols-phrases-should-not-be-banned/
  "A number of states and groups who have and continue to commit human rights violations have hijacked some of these religious symbols. A prime example would be the use of the Swastika by Hitler and Neo-Nazis, Star of David by Israel, Shahada by ISIS, Cross by KKK, Om by Hindu extremists such as RSS."

In our view, the following example in the IHRA Working Definition of Antisemitism applies to the above passage:

Drawing comparisons of contemporary Israeli policy to that of the Nazis.

Israel has the Jewish Star of David on its national flag as Israel is a majority Jewish state. This is no different to dozens of Christian and Muslim countries which have religious symbols eg crosses, the crescent or Shahadah, on their national flags. In addition, Ahmed falsely compares the Nazi swastika to the Jewish Star of David.

- Dr Aslam Abdullah | 2 Aug, 2022
  https://www.amust.com.au/2022/08/why-does-the-world-need-khalistan/
  "… Christians generally expect the beneficiaries of their social work to convert to their faith while Jews are primarily concerned about Jewish life. Hindus are interested in the welfare of their upper castes while Liberals come to the aid of only those who believe in their ideals. Only the Sikh community has shown during the last few decades that it can rise above its interests and serve humanity as a whole. … Muslims, with 56 majority countries, could not live their commitment to justice while ranting about Madinah or the Islamic state. Christianity failed to distance itself from racism and white supremacy, and Judaism refused to see the humanity of Palestinians regardless of their faiths."

In our view, the following example in the IHRA Working Definition of Antisemitism applies to the above passage:

Making mendacious, dehumanizing, demonizing, or stereotypical allegations about Jews as such

Hizb ut-Tahrir Australia
https://www.facebook.com/hizbaust/
Hizb ut-Tahrir Australia (HT) (Party of Liberation) is the Australian chapter of the global Islamic political movement Hizb ut-Tahrir. HT is an organisation which campaigns for the establishment of a caliphate in Australia and throughout the world. A caliphate is a theocracy in which ultimate power rests with Muslim clerics applying their interpretation of shari'a (Muslim religious law) to all facets of public and private life. HT is banned in many countries, including some with a majority Muslim population.

Hizb ut-Tahrir opposes the existence of the State of Israel on the grounds that it is a Jewish state in what they consider to be exclusively Muslim-owned lands. HT is so vehemently opposed to the existence of the state of Israel that it does not refer to it by its proper name or to the fact that it is a state, instead consistently calling it the "Jewish entity". HT calls for the destruction of Israel because it is a sovereign State of the Jewish people where over half of the world's Jewish population lives, located on what HT considers to be "Islamic lands".

Ismail Alwahwah was the head and spiritual leader of HT Australia until his death on 17 May 2023. Alwahwah also posted on Facebook, and two of his posts appear below. Alwahwah was the subject of several police investigations for his calling for violence against Jews over the last few years, but he was never charged.

The following are extracts of content posted by HT, and Alwahwah, on its Facebook page.

In our view, statements in the extracts below meet the following example in the IHRA Working Definition of Antisemitism:

Making mendacious, dehumanizing, demonizing, or stereotypical allegations about Jews as such or the power of Jews as collective — such as, especially but not exclusively, the myth about a world Jewish conspiracy or of Jews controlling the media, economy, government or other societal institutions

This is an excerpt from a statement of Imams in 1935 showing unanimity on the issue … "We, the muftis, judges, teachers, lecturers, Imams, preachers, and all other religious scholars and religious men of the Muslims in Palestine….have examined the verdicts which have been issued by the Muftis and scholars of Islam in Iraq, Egypt, India, Morocco, Syria, Palestine and all the other Islamic regions. These verdicts all agree upon the prohibition of selling the land in Palestine to the Jews, upon the prohibition of acting as middlemen on these sales, or playing the part of a broker, or assisting the matter in any manner or form; and also upon the prohibition of being pleased with this entire affair, or remaining silent before it." - Fatwa from the religious scholars of Palestine. Another shameful and painful reminder of the brazenness of the Jewish entity whose filth soils the sacred sites of the blessed land of Palestine before the eyes of the neighboring Muslim countries. The rows of flags of the Jewish entity hoisted above for all to see, the occupiers celebrate their holidays all the while desecrating the Muslim prayer sites …

The flags represent the existence of the state that is the enemy to the people of Palestine and its lands and sanctities. Its existence that was founded by the British empire to become and remain a thorn in the heart of the Muslim lands of the Middle East to obstruct their unity as one Islamic Ummah … Yet these belligerent flags fly atop the Masjid Al-Ibrahimi in the heart of Palestine, the question is why? Muslims will continue to be bloodied, their lands occupied, their sanctities desecrated, their honour violated, and they will continue to leave their lands and embark on dangerous journeys in the vast seas. If there had been a Khilafah (Caliphate) State, the enemies of Islam would not have dared to attack Muslims or their holy places. “Q&A: #Bin_Salman and #Normalization with the Jews. … The rulers in Muslim countries have forgotten that Palestine is a blessed land, including its environs. … It is the duty for the Muslim armies to mobilize to liberate and purify it from the abomination of the Jews, and not for Palestine to be presented to the Jews on a golden platter of normalization, submission, and servility! In any case, Palestine will return, pure and blessed, as it was with the swords of the armies of truthful #Muslims under the leadership of the #Khilafah Rashidah (rightly guided Caliphate), and the Jews and their collaborators will be defeated and run away, and terror will fill their hearts until one of them hides behind a stone that reveals him more than hides him!!

7. Antisemitism in the ANTI-ISRAEL MOVEMENT

All governments are legitimately the subject of criticism for their policies and actions, including the governments of Israel as much as those of Australia or any other country. However, some ostensible criticisms of Israel cross the line from ordinary political discourse into antisemitic hate speech. Often this is through demonisation, delegitimisation, and double standards used against Israel (as explained in Natan Sharansky's article below).

Other discourse, which is dressed up as ordinary political criticism, is framed within older anti-Jewish motifs, most commonly the Blood Libel, deicide claims, and conspiracy theories of Jews as a group supposedly controlling or aiming to control the media, economy, government or other societal institutions. Thus, contemporary antisemitism, especially in the anti-Israel movement, is often expressed using classical anti-Jewish motifs and themes which have been given a modern cloak. For example, older tropes said that the Jews seek to control the world, or that Jews lusted after Christian/gentile blood; now it is said that Israel, conceived as a Jewish collectivity, seeks to control the world or lusts after Arab/gentile blood. It is this nexus which can infuse seemingly ordinary political discourse about Israel or Zionism with an antisemitic subtext, as the negative qualities traditionally attributed by antisemites to the Jewish people collectively are transferred to Israel as the contemporary symbol of Jews as a collectivity. The word “Zionist” is in some contexts used as an epithet against Jews collectively.

All such discourse is to be assessed according to its objective meaning when considered in context, rather than exclusively on the basis of the professed subjective motives or intentions of those who engage in that discourse. There are other ways in which antisemitism is sometimes expressed as anti-Zionism. To deny only the Jewish people the right to self-determine their own collective identity, or to assert that the Jewish people have inferior collective rights to other people, is clearly discriminatory and therefore antisemitic.

Taking into account the overall context, the IHRA Working Definition of Antisemitism recognises the following as examples of antisemitism even if expressed as anti-Zionism:

- Accusing the Jews as a people, or Israel as a state, of inventing or exaggerating the Holocaust.
- Accusing Jewish citizens of being more loyal to Israel, or to the alleged priorities of Jews worldwide, than to the interests of their own nations.
- Denying the Jewish people their right to self-determination, e.g., by claiming that the existence of a State of Israel is a racist endeavor.
- Applying double standards by requiring of it a behavior not expected or demanded of any other democratic nation.
- Using the symbols and images associated with classic antisemitism (e.g., claims of Jews killing Jesus or blood libel) to characterize Israel or Israelis.
- Drawing comparisons of contemporary Israeli policy to that of the Nazis.
- Holding Jews collectively responsible for actions of the state of Israel.

When Legitimate Criticism Crosses the Anti-Semitism Line
by Alan Dershowitz
1 July 2005

As Thomas Friedman of The New York Times accurately put it,
"Criticizing Israel is not anti-Semitic, and saying so is vile. But singling out Israel for opprobrium and international sanction -- out of all proportion to any other party in the Middle East -- is antisemitic, and not saying so is dishonest"

I have set out a list of criteria that distinguish antisemitism from legitimate criticism. Here are my criteria:

A CHECKLIST of factors that tend to indicate antisemitism:

1. Employing stereotypes against Israel that have traditionally been directed against "the Jews." For example, portraying Israel as devouring the blood of children or characterizing Israeli leaders with long hook noses or rapacious looks.

2. Comparing Israel to the Nazis or its leaders to Hitler, the German army, or the Gestapo.

3. Characterizing Israel as "the worst," when it is clear that this is not an accurate comparative assessment.

4. Invoking anti-Jewish religious symbols or caricaturing Jewish religious symbols.

5. Singling out only Israel for sanctions for policies that are widespread among other nations, or demanding that Jews be better or more moral than others because of their history as victims.

6. Discriminating against individuals only because they are Jewish Israelis, without regard to their individual views or actions.

7. Emphasizing and stereotyping certain characteristics among supporters of Israel that have traditionally been used in antisemitic attacks, for example, "pushy" American Jews, Jews "who control the media," and Jews "who control financial markets."

8. Blaming all Jews or "the Jews" for Israel's policies or imperfections.

9. Physically or verbally attacking Jewish institutions, such as synagogues or cemeteries, as a means of protesting against Israel.

10. Stereotyping all Jews as fitting into a particular political configuration (such as "neo-conservatives," Zionists, or supporters of Sharon).

11. Accusing Jews and only Jews of having dual loyalty.

12. Blaming Israel for the problems of the world and exaggerating the influence of the Jewish state on world affairs.

13. Denying, minimizing, or trivializing the Holocaust as part of a campaign against Israel.

14. Discriminating against only Israel in its qualification for certain positions or statuses, such as on the Security Council, the International Court of Justice, and the International Red Cross.

15. Blaming the Jews or Israel, rather than the antisemites, for antisemitism or for increases in anti-Jewish attitudes.

16. Taking extreme pleasure from Israeli failures, imperfections, or troubles.

17. Falsely claiming that all legitimate criticism of Israeli policies is immediately and widely condemned by Jewish leaders as antisemitic, despite any evidence to support this accusation.

18. Denying that even core antisemitism—racial stereotypes, Nazi comparisons, desecration of synagogues, Holocaust denial—qualifies as anti-Semitic.

19. Seeking to delegitimate Israel precisely as it moves toward peace.

20. Circulating wild charges against Israel and Jews, such as that they were responsible for the September 11 attacks, the anthrax attacks, and the 2005 tsunami.

A CHECKLIST of factors that tend to indicate legitimate criticism of Israel:

1. The criticism is directed at specific policies of Israel, rather than at the very legitimacy of the state.

2. The degree and level of criticism vary with changes in Israel's policies.

3. The criticism is comparative and contextual.

4. The criticism is political, military, economic, and so forth, rather than ethnic or religious.

5. The criticism is similar to criticism being raised by mainstream Israeli dissidents.

6. The criticism is leveled by people who have a history of leveling comparable criticisms at other nations with comparable or worse records.

7. The criticism is designed to bring about positive changes in Israeli policies.

8. The criticism is part of a more general and comparative criticism of all other nations.

9. The criticism is based on objective facts rather than name calling or polemics.

10. The critic subjects his favorite nation to comparable criticism for comparable faults.

Antisemitism in 3-D
by Natan Sharansky
21 January 2005 [extract]

I offer a simple "3-D" test for differentiating legitimate criticism of Israel from antisemitism. This "3-D" test applies the same criteria to the new antisemitism that for centuries identified different manifestations of classical antisemitism.

The first "D" is the test of demonization — as noted in the State Department report. Jews have been demonized for centuries as the embodiment of evil, whether in the theological form of a collective accusation of deicide or in the generalized depiction of Jews as money-grubbing Shylocks. Today we must take note when the Jewish state or its leaders are being demonized, with their actions being blown out of all rational proportion.

For example, the comparisons of Israelis to Nazis and of the Palestinian refugee camps to Auschwitz — comparisons heard frequently throughout Europe and on North American university campuses — are clearly antisemitic. Those who draw such analogies either are deliberately ignorant regarding Nazi Germany or, more commonly, are deliberately depicting modern-day Israel as the embodiment of evil.

The second "D" is the test of double standards. From discriminatory laws many nations enacted against Jews to the tendency to judge their behavior by a different yardstick, this differential treatment of Jews was always a clear sign of antisemitism. Similarly, today we must ask whether criticism of Israel is being applied selectively. In other words, do similar policies pursued by other governments produce similar criticism?

It is antisemitic discrimination, for instance, when Israel is singled out for condemnation by the United Nations for perceived human rights abuses while proven obliterators of human rights on a massive scale — like China, Iran, Cuba, Saudi Arabia, Sudan and Syria, to name just a few — are not even mentioned. Likewise, it is antisemitism when Israel's Magen David Adom, alone among the world's ambulance services, is denied admission to the International Red Cross.

The third "D" is the test of delegitimization. Traditionally, antisemites denied the legitimacy of the Jewish religion, the Jewish people, or both. Today, they attempt to deny the legitimacy of the Jewish state, presenting it as, among other things, the prime remnant of imperialist colonialism.

While criticism of an Israeli policy may not be antisemitic, the denial of Israel's right to exist is always antisemitic. If other peoples, including 21 Arab Muslim States — and particularly the many states created in the postcolonial period following World War II — have the right to live securely in their homelands, then the Jewish people has that right as well, particularly given the sanction of the United Nations in setting up and recognizing the country at its founding. Questioning that legitimacy is pure antisemitism.

Zionism

Zionism is the national self-determination movement of the Jewish people with the aim of re-establishing a state in the Jewish national homeland, known by Jews as Eretz Yisrael (Land of Israel). It is not predicated on any particular set of borders or on the displacement of non-Jewish communities.

With the Jewish state re-established in 1948, Zionism supports the continuing existence of the State of Israel. The word 'Zion', from Mount Zion in the heart of Jerusalem, derives from the Hebrew Bible and is a symbolic reference to Jerusalem as a whole, the capital of previous Jewish states in the land. Although Zionism is seen as a modern idea, it is actually ancient; the modern Zionist movement is simply the modern practical manifestation of the Jewish people's millennia-old organised political presence in the land.

The noble idea of Zionism, for a small, vulnerable and persecuted people to reconstitute a state in their national homeland, has been twisted and turned back against Jews. Even the word "Zionism" has been transformed by antisemites from referring to the national self-determination movement of the Jewish people to meaning an evil international plot by Jews to control the world. The fact that Jews only want to control their own lives in their own tiny state is irrelevant to the antisemites.

Comparing Israel to Nazi Germany, or Zionism to Nazism, or the Jewish Star of David to the Nazi swastika, is almost universally recognized as antisemitic by its cruel attempt to transfer the odium of Nazism to the Nazis' principal victims, namely the Jewish people. This false analogy demonizes Jews, and minimizes the evil of the deliberate and planned mass extermination of six million Jews by the Nazis. It also implies a retrospective justification of the Holocaust against the Jewish people.

Insights into Antisemitism and Anti-Zionism

Dan Diker, president of the Jerusalem Center for Public Affairs, former secretary general of the World Jewish Congress (WJC), 3 Sep. 2023:
"Durban [conference in 2001] gave rise to the global Boycott Divestment and Sanctions (BDS) movement against Israel that took root with particular intensity in the West's progressive agenda and activities.[38] BDS mimics the Nazi boycott of Jewish businesses,[39] as noted in 2019 by the German Bundestag.[40] More insidious, BDS officially preaches non-violent forms of protest, while its founders have clearly stated that they oppose Jewish self-determination in any form.[41]

"BDS's masking of its "politicidal" intentions toward the Jewish and democratic state has appropriated the Nazi regime's genocide of the Jewish people with a more politically correct, camouflaged call to "Free Palestine, from the (Jordan) River to the (Mediterranean) Sea." BDS couches its end goal in more publicly palatable social justice themes, sidestepping a discussion of the consequences of dismantling the Jewish State, which would likely entail not only the mass displacement of Jews but would result in their physical destruction.[42] BDS' campus arm, Students for Justice in Palestine, harasses Jewish students, regardless of their affinity for Israel or lack thereof, while BDS-supporting academics demand denouncements of Israel.[43]

"The Durban-BDS strategy has managed to call into question the validity of a Jewish state by convincing the West that Israel is a racist, colonialist "apartheid" project that represents the antithesis of a liberal democracy anchored by a commitment to human rights. Palestinian activists pushing identity politics, backed and directed by the PA in Ramallah, have shoe-horned their struggle into the popular Western social justice discourse by "racializing" the Palestinian-Israeli conflict. In this postmodern "woke" political reality, Palestinians are depicted as racially marginalized victims, the "brown" "indigenous" people of the Levant, while Israelis have been cast as "white settler-colonialists." This narrative, depicting Jews as racist oppressors and colonialist aliens to their indigenous homeland negating Jewish identity and self-determination, is a form of collective Jew-hatred."

"Questions about attachment to Israel produced very high levels of positive response: 90% agree that it is important that the Australian Jewish community maintains close ties with Israel, 88% feel a high level of personal connectedness with Israel, 86% agree that the existence of Israel is essential for the future of the Jewish people, 83% keep up with current events involving Israel and 80% indicate a high level of concern for Israel's safety."

Elliott Abrams, former Assistant Secretary of State for Human Rights and Humanitarian Affairs, 9 May 2023:
"The effort to prevent formation of the Jewish State, and then to eliminate it, has taken many forms over the years and continues even as Israel celebrates its 75th anniversary. Sometimes the effort takes the form of war, as in 1948 or most recently 1973, or terrorism, as in the intifadas. Sometimes the form is diplomacy, such as the Arab League's "Three Nos" of 1967 ("No peace with Israel, no negotiation with Israel, no recognition of Israel") and the UN's 1975 resolution that "Zionism is a form of racism and racial discrimination." All have in common the belief that one Jewish State, one Jewish homeland, is one too many and cannot be tolerated."

You can criticize Israel without: -Claiming that Jews are happy to kill children -Blood libels -Conspiracy theories -Claiming Jews control the media -Saying Jews bribe politicians -Denying Jewish history -Saying Jews have no culture -Whitewashing violence against Jews. You can criticize Israel without being antisemitic.

As I've said before, you can tell when someone who claims to care deeply about the Palestinians is really just anti-Israel, from whether they express concern for the Palestinians when Israel is not involved, like in both stories below.

Roz Rothstein@RozRothstein · Aug 13, 2023 · [Founder and CEO of StandWithUs]:
"For most Jews around the world, Zionism and Israel form an integral part of Jewish identity. Israel is the birthplace of Jewish ethnic identity, language, culture, and religion, and Jews have maintained a constant presence there for over 3,000 years. Zionism represents the Jewish people's unbreakable bond and age-old desire to be free in their ancestral home. On a political level, Zionism is a liberation movement supporting Jewish self-determination in the land of Israel. Jews endured over 1,900 years of oppression and violence across Europe and the Middle East and still live in a world plagued by antisemitism. In this context, Israel's existence and wellbeing is vital to the Jewish people's safety, survival, and human rights. Here in the U.S., numerous polls show that for the overwhelming majority of Jews, their connection to Israel is central to their Jewish identity."

@rogerwaters told Haaretz that he will continue to boycott Israel as long as it remains "the State of the Jews." This is exactly why the BDS movement is antisemitic; It sees the est. of a Jewish State as a problem. According to the IHRA definition, this is pure antisemtism

Boycott, Divestment, Sanctions (BDS) campaign

A small number of Australian groups and their supporters, some of whom are referred to in this chapter, support and promote the BDS campaign against Israel. Some supporters openly call for the elimination of Israel as a Jewish state; while others are less open about the final outcome they envisage. Many BDS supporters deny that BDS is antisemitic, claiming to be 'only' anti-Zionist and/or anti-Israel. This claim does not stand up to scrutiny. BDS aims at eliminating the State of Israel and replacing it with another Arab state. Links to a comprehensive analysis of BDS, and three relevant articles appear below.

Antisemitism in Anti-Israel Groups

Across Australia, there are several groups which express support for the Palestinian cause. Of itself this is unexceptional. However, much of this support is expressed as trenchantly negative polemical commentary not merely about Israeli government policies and actions, but about Israel's very existence, and right to exist, as an expression of the Jewish people's right to national self-determination. The members of these groups are sometimes an uneasy alliance of people of mainly Western background from secular far-Left groups such as Socialist Alternative and Socialist Alliance, and those of Arab and/or Muslim background with purportedly religious and conservative views, as well as some coming from a purportedly Christian perspective. Some groups have websites, most have social media pages, particularly Facebook and Twitter. Some universities have a Students for Palestine group, with varying levels of activism. There are also other individuals with social media pages which are dedicated to opposition to Israel.

Among the following posts and comments on sites that are ostensibly critical of Israel are generalised accusations that Jews/Zionists/Israelis are affected by bloodlust, target children, control governments and the media, have inordinate power and influence, are intrinsically evil and satanic, behave the same as or worse than the Nazis, are 'Christ-killers', poison water, harvest body organs, present a mortal threat to the whole of humanity and cause antisemitism. The posts and comments express other canards which have been classically applied to Jews collectively but are now applied to Israeli Jews and to diaspora Jews merely for supporting the right of Israel to exist.

Some of the main themes and generic claims made in anti-Israel discourse include:

- Inordinate power of the "Jewish lobby" or "Zionist lobby" or "Israel lobby" to influence, bribe, cajole, and intimidate politicians and governments to support Israel
- Jewish or "Zionist" control of the media, thus ensuring only the Israeli narrative is heard
- Jews are "settler colonialists" - which attempts to erase more than 3000 years of continuous Jewish history in the territory of Israel, and denies the Jewish people the right to self-determine their own collective identity.
- Israel is a Nazi state, and Israel is committing genocide against Palestinian Arabs
- Holocaust denial, and Jews learnt nothing from their suffering during the Holocaust
- Jews collectively, both Israeli and in the diaspora, are evil
- Israel, conceived as a Jewish collectivity, must be destroyed, for the sake of humanity and for world peace.

Of course Jews are welcome to sign up, as long as they are the kind of Jews who want to ethnically cleanse six million of their fellow Jews from their ancestral homeland!

Targeting Israeli restaurant in Brisbane

The case of Yababa demonstrates how anti-Israel sentiment can result not just in targeting Israelis living in the diaspora, but targeting Israelis by using an old anti-Jewish trope, the Blood Libel.

Yababa is an Israeli-owned restaurant in Brisbane serving "Middle Eastern Street Food". In February 2021, Yababa was targeted with anti-Israel and antisemitic graffiti outside the restaurant. The graffiti read "Stolen Palestinian Food. Zionists Fuck off".

Yababa was again targeted, this time online, on Instagram on 7 October 2022. Words were superimposed over a photo of the main Yababa sign: under the sign's words "Yababa Food the Israeli Way" were the words: "What. Stolen and soaked in Blood? Sounds tempting. (There is no such thing as Israeli Food)" and further down "@Yababa Israeli Food is Stolen Palestinian Culture. You bury Palestinians then sell their food off as your own. You are not Welcome".

This wording referenced the Blood Libel, a false claim that Jews drink the blood of gentiles. Jason Steinberg, President of Queensland Jewish Board of Deputies, responded "The vicious, defamatory attack on a Brisbane business owner solely based on his nationality and the cuisine he serves is nothing short of disgraceful. The reference to the blood libel is one of the sickest antisemitic tropes and a disgusting display of Jew hatred."

Yababa responded on its Facebook page on October 7, 2022: "This is the second time that Yababa at Paddington, is experiencing written motives of unnecessary hatred, false and incorrect messages. Those are not going to change the fact that Yababa is, and will be providing it customers with an amazing Israeli cuisine "The Israeli way"."

Palestine Action Group Sydney (PAG)

The Palestine Action Group Sydney (PAG) Facebook page has a cover picture with a placard at a protest in Sydney, reading: "Fighting for freedom since 1948 # Free Palestine ... Long Live Palestine" and a Palestinian flag in the corner. This demonstrates that PAG supports the destruction of the State of Israel, which was re-established in 1948. Although the Arabs of Palestine were also offered a state in 1947-48, their leaders rejected the offer, and went to war against their Jewish neighbours in order to prevent two States, an Arab State and a Jewish State, from being established in accordance with UN General Assembly Resolution 181.

APAN - Australia Palestine Advocacy Network
https://www.facebook.com/AustraliaPalestineAdvocacyNetwork
The Australia Palestine Advocacy Network (APAN) was formed in 2011 ostensibly as a pro-Palestinian lobby group. APAN describes itself as: "involved in a range of activities and campaigns that seek to influence Australia's public policy in regard to Palestine and Israel." APAN regularly undertakes "lobbying trips to Canberra" and organises "study tours to Palestine." In 2015, APAN finally declared its support as an organisation for BDS, having previously prevaricated on that issue. Since then, there has been an increasing tolerance of anti-Jewish posted comments on the APAN Facebook page, even if the posts by APAN itself were not antisemitic.

A selection of these follow. In each case, for the sake of completeness and to provide necessary context, we have reproduced both the APAN post and the comments it elicited. In our view, those comments fall within one or more of the following examples listed in the IHRA Working Definition of Antisemitism, including:

> Drawing comparisons of contemporary Israeli policy to that of the Nazis.
> Holding Jews collectively responsible for actions of the state of Israel.
> Accusing Jews as a people of being responsible for real or imagined wrongdoing committed by a single Jewish person or group, or even for acts committed by non-Jews.
> Making mendacious, dehumanizing, demonizing, or stereotypical allegations about Jews as such or the power of Jews as collective — such as, especially but not exclusively, the myth about a world Jewish conspiracy or of Jews controlling the media, economy, government or other societal institutions
> Accusing Jewish citizens of being more loyal to Israel, or to the alleged priorities of Jews worldwide, than to the interests of their own nations.

8. RESPONSES to ANTISEMITISM

"Fighting antisemitism is a responsibility for the society at large and must not be left to the Jewish community. Antisemitism needs to be fought on all levels and by all possible actors."
- Katharina von Schnurbein, EU Coordinator on Combating Antisemitism (10 Feb. 2016)

Introduction
Major counters to antisemitism are public condemnations of it by those in positions of leadership within society, including politicians, academics, clergy, editors and journalists, businesspeople, trade unionists, and other community leaders.

In addition, government policies and legislation which discourage or restrict antisemitism and other forms of racism, and protect Jews and other targeted groups, play a major role in countering antisemitism. In addition to providing individuals and groups who are the targets of racism with the legal means to defend themselves, legislation plays an educative role by setting a community standard that conveys a strong message that public manifestations of racism are unacceptable.

This section includes a summary of public counters to antisemitism that continued to operate and achieve prominence in Australia during the year in review, including legal and quasi-legal measures, government responses, political leadership, educational responses, and expressions of solidarity by other communities.

"Extremist ideologies may take aim at local Jewish communities and other minorities, but undermine democracy and harm all of society."

Dr Kathrin Meyer, Secretary General of IHRA, 16 June 2023

LEGAL and Quasi-LEGAL MEASURES

- Anti-vilification Laws: Commonwealth and state, civil and criminal

The following table is composed primarily of racial vilification laws, although some of these laws also prohibit vilification that is based on attributes other than race. Most states have both civil and criminal vilification laws, while two states (Tasmania and Western Australia) have only one form each.

Of note, under Australian law, Jews are categorised as a 'race' due to Jews having "a common ethnic origin", as Jewish identity encompasses both national and religious aspects.

New bills and laws against Nazi symbols and gestures were also introduced during the year.

What is Vilification?

What is vilification?

Vilification is often called 'hate speech'.

Vilification is an act that encourages hatred, serious contempt, revulsion or severe ridicule towards a person or group of people. It can include threats of physical violence.

Examples include:

- posting a racist comment online that could make other people hate someone because of their race.
- saying something at a public meeting that could encourage contempt of people because of their race or religion.
- writing graffiti that encourages hatred of people because of their race or religion.

Vilification is different to discrimination … Discrimination is treating a person badly or unfairly because of a personal characteristic protected by the law (for example, their age, disability or gender identity).

GOVERNMENTAL RESPONSES

During the period in review, the Commonwealth and several states proposed laws prohibiting the public display of Nazi symbols eg the Nazi swastika. So far, only NSW and Victoria (in 2022) and the ACT, Queensland and Tasmania (in 2023) have passed such laws. Only Tasmania expressly proscribes the public performance of Nazi gestures. Other states are considering strengthening their anti-vilification laws.

- Federal Parliament: proposed bills banning Nazi symbols

On 23 March 2023, Liberal Senator Michaelia Cash, introduced a bill to the Senate to ban the public display of Nazi symbols – 'Criminal Code Amendment (Prohibition of Nazi Symbols) Bill 2023'. This bill was introduced to the House of Representatives by Liberal MP Julian Leeser MP on 22 May 2023. The bill included not just the Nazi swastika, but also other symbols used by neo-Nazis in Australia as named, directly acknowledging and quoting the source and the symbols from the ECAJ Report on Antisemitism 2022, in the Explanatory Memorandum to Parliament by Cash and Leeser. However, this Liberal sponsored bill was not passed in parliament.

Extract from the Explanatory Memorandum read out in each house of Parliament:

"The term 'Nazi symbol' is not a defined term in the Bill, and is instead given its ordinary meaning. This is intended to ensure that the full range of symbols associated with Nazi ideology and the Nazi party are captured by the prohibition in section 81.1, and would include, for example, symbols routinely identified in publications like the annual reports on Antisemitism in Australia published by the Executive Council of Australian Jewry.
Examples of symbols included in the scope of term in the Bill include:

- the Hakenkreuz - the Nazi swastika or hooked cross;
- the Double Sig rune (SS lightning bolt) that were used by the SchutzStaffel (SS), who primarily perpetrated the mass killings of Jews;
- the Totenkopf (Death's head) used by the Nazi SS from 1934 to 1945;
- the Sonnenrad (Black sun/wheel);
- the Broken Sun Cross, or Sun Cross Swastika;
- the unstylised Celtic Cross;
- the Algiz rune;
- the Tyr rune; and
- the Othala/Odal rune."

In June 2023, the Federal Labor government introduced a new bill that sought to ban the public display of only two Nazi symbols, the Nazi swastika and the SS lightning bolts. It also sought to bans the ISIS flag symbol, and to ban the display of and trade in items featuring those symbols - Counter-Terrorism Legislation Amendment (Prohibited Hate Symbols and Other Measures) Bill 2023.

The Bill was the subject of a parliamentary committee Inquiry, whose report is pending. The Bill has not thus far been enacted. Some of its provisions appear below.

- Australian Capital Territory (ACT): prohibiting public display of Nazi swastika

On 29 August 2023, the ACT parliament passed legislation prohibiting the public display of Nazi symbols, in the Crimes Legislation Amendment Bill 2022.

Shane Rattenbury, ACT Attorney-General, stated:

> "Following the passage of the Crimes Legislation Amendment Bill 2022 by the Assembly, the maximum penalty for the public display of Nazi symbols is a $19,200 fine or 12 months in prison, or both. The new offence also applies to people in the ACT who broadcast a Nazi symbol to a public audience beyond Canberra's borders, such as on social media. People will still be able to publicly display swastikas for legitimate reasons, such as people of Jain, Buddhist and Hindu faiths, teachers, artists and protesters."

- NSW: legislation banning religious vilification

On 3 August 2023, the NSW Parliament passed the Anti-Discrimination Amendment (Religious Vilification) Act 2023, banning religious vilification.

Michael Daley, NSW Attorney General, stated:

> "The amendment to the NSW Anti-Discrimination Act 1977 makes it unlawful to, "by a public act, incite hatred towards, serious contempt for, or severe ridicule of, a person or group of persons, because of their religious belief, affiliation or activity". A "public act" includes any form of communication to the public, verbal and non-verbal. The legislation mirrors existing provisions in the Anti-Discrimination Act that make vilification unlawful on the grounds of race, homosexuality, transgender status and HIV/AIDS status. People who do not have a religious belief or affiliation or do not engage in religious activity are also protected under the new law, which recognises that these are also positions in relation to religion which should be respected."

- Queensland: legislation to amend vilification laws and ban Nazi symbols

Shannon Fentiman, the Qld Attorney-General, on 23 January 2023, announced that:

> "The Palaszczuk Government will introduce new laws early this year to increase penalties for hate crimes and serious vilification offences. … legislation would soon be introduced to Parliament to amend existing offences in Queensland. … We will also amend the existing offence of serious racial, religious, sexuality or gender identity vilification in the Anti-Discrimination Act 1991 by removing the existing requirement that a proceeding for this offence may not be commenced without the written consent of either the myself or the Director of Public Prosecutions, relocating it to the Criminal Code and increasing the maximum penalty to three years imprisonment."
> https://statements.qld.gov.au/statements/96998

Annastacia Palaszczuk, Qld Premier, and Shannon Fentiman, the Qld Attorney-General, on 29 March 2023, announced that:

> "New legislation has been introduced to ban the display of hate symbols, such as those representative of Nazi ideology, and increase penalties for offences that are motivated by hatred or serious contempt and the existing offence of serious vilification. The Criminal Code (Serious Vilification and Hate Crimes) and Other Legislation Amendment Bill 2023 … to strengthen Queensland's hate crime laws. A new 'Prohibited symbols' offence will be introduced to protect the community from … the display of hate symbols. Under the new offence, public display, public distribution, or publication of prohibited symbols … are prohibited… The offence is intended to capture a broad range of circumstances, including the public display of tattoos and the public distribution or publication of prohibited symbols online.
> The reforms also amend existing offences to provide for a new circumstance of aggravation for offences, including common assault, going armed so as to cause fear, threatening violence, assault occasioning bodily harm, wilful damage, trespass and public nuisance. Criminals who commit these offences while motivated, wholly or partly, by hatred or serious contempt based on race, religion, sexuality, sex characteristics or gender identity will face increased penalties including longer custodial sentences."

Yvette D'Ath, Queensland Attorney-General, announced on 12 October 2023 that the:

> "Queensland Parliament has passed legislation to increase penalties for hate crimes and serious vilification. The legislation bans the public display, distribution or publication of prohibited hate symbols without reasonable excuse. The public display, distribution or publication of prohibited hate symbols will become a criminal offence in Queensland, significantly strengthening the state's response to hate crimes. …

the display of symbols that are representative of an ideology of extreme prejudice against a particular religious, ethnic, gender, or other relevant group. Displaying, publishing or distributing prohibited symbols in a way that might reasonably be expected to cause someone to feel menaced, harassed or offended will be a criminal offence with a maximum penalty of six months' imprisonment. The offence … including the public display of tattoos and the public distribution or publication of prohibited symbols online. The new legislation will enable hate symbols to be identified in a regulation. …

The legislation has provision for reasonable excuses to the new offence, such as public display for genuine artistic, religious, educational, historical, legal, or law enforcement purposes. Criminals who commit offences while motivated by hatred or serious contempt against a particular person or group's characteristics are liable to receive tougher penalties including custodial sentences. These offences include going armed as to cause fear, threatening violence, assault occasioning bodily harm, wilful damage, stalking, harassment, and public nuisance."

- Tasmania: legislation prohibiting Nazi symbols and gestures

The new sections 6C and 6D of the Police Offences Act which were enacted in August 2023 are set out below. Of note, Tasmania became the first jurisdiction in Australia to ban Nazi gestures, and the first outside of Europe.

Insight into the Tasmanian law

Peter Wertheim, co-CEO of The Executive Council of Australian Jewry, commented:

> "This legislation is a great credit to the Tasmanian government and parliament. It was a privilege for the ECAJ to work with our Tasmanian constituent, the Hobart Hebrew Congregation, in meetings with the Attorney General's office, to help achieve this outcome.
> Any banning legislation that is introduced needs to proscribe the symbols and emblems that are presently and most frequently being used by neo-Nazi groups in Australia, both for the promotion of hatred and violence and for recruitment, in addition to the traditional Nazi symbols. The legislation also needs to be flexible enough to accommodate the constant evolution of new hate symbols by neo-Nazi groups.
> In our view, the optimum approach to defining a Nazi symbol is that which has been adopted in the Tasmanian Bill, because it provides both a reasonable certainty of meaning, and the flexibility to allow the courts to determine the relevant facts in any given case, and to apply the offences to symbols associated with Nazi ideology and any new symbols that neo-Nazi groups might develop.
> Nazi gestures also need to be proscribed. Above all, this needs to be backed up with effective police powers and penalties. The new Tasmanian legislation achieves all of this, and sets an example for other jurisdictions.
> We remain concerned by the sunset provision in the new law, but feel confident that the Tasmanian government will renew the legislation until the scourge of neo-Nazi activity is eradicated."

- Victoria: Nazi Symbol Prohibition legislation

In Victoria, the Summary Offences Amendment (Nazi Symbol Prohibition) Bill 2022 came into effect on 29 December 2022. This law makes it a criminal offence for a person to intentionally display the Nazi symbol (the Hakenkreuz, often referred to as the Nazi swastika) in public. Anyone who intentionally displays the Nazi symbol in public will face penalties of up to $22,000, 12 months imprisonment or both. This law is available at:
http://classic.austlii.edu.au/au/legis/vic/num_act/soaspa202229o2022565/s3.html

- Victoria: Nazi Salute Prohibition Bill

After neo-Nazis from the National Socialist Network performed the Nazi salute (also known as the Heil Hitler or Sieg Heil salute) on the steps of the Victorian Parliament on 18 March 2023, the Victorian government resolved to ban the salute.

On 29 August 2023, the Victorian Government introduced a bill to ban the Nazi salute, the Summary Offences Amendment (Nazi Salute Prohibition) Bill 2023. The bill states that "any individual who intentionally displays or performs a Nazi symbol or gesture in public will face penalties of more than $23,000, 12 months imprisonment or both".

The Legislative Assembly (lower house) passed the Nazi Salute Prohibition bill on 10 October 2023; it now requires the upper house to pass the bill.

Victorian Hansard list of incidents of Nazi salutes in public:

Summary Offences Amendment (Nazi Salute Prohibition) Bill 2023

Anthony CARBINES (Ivanhoe – Minister for Police, Minister for Crime Prevention, Minister for Racing) …

The public display or performance of Nazi gestures, particularly the Nazi salute, and other Nazi symbols impinges this right by undermining the dignity and self-worth of groups that have been historically persecuted by the Nazi Party and targeted by neo-Nazi groups, including the Jewish Community, LGBTIQ+ people, people with disability, Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander people, and other racial and religious groups. …

Government is deeply concerned and distressed by the use of the Nazi salute occurring in Victoria following last year's ban of the display of the Nazi symbol, the Hakenkreuz. …

There have been several abhorrent incidents that have occurred since that law commenced on 29 December 2022 including:

• In mid-January 2023, a group of 25 males gathered at Elwood's Ormond Point lookout and performed the Nazi salute.

• On 26 January 2023, a group of people performed the Nazi salute at a Merri-bek First Nations mourning ceremony.

• On 18 March 2023, a group of about 30 people marched along Spring Street, repeatedly performing the Nazi salute after an event held by a controversial UK gender and anti-trans activist.

• On 10 April 2023, a group of six men performed the salute outside the Melbourne Knights soccer club.

• On 20 April 2023, a group of people performed the Nazi salute and posed for photographs at a Bavarian restaurant in the Knox City Shopping Centre to commemorate Adolf Hitler's birthday.

• On 13 May 2023, a group of about 25 people gathered outside parliament to stage an anti-immigration rally, repeatedly performing the Nazi salute.

• On 4 June 2023, two people performed the Nazi salute in front of police outside the State Library during a protest.

• On 15 July 2023, eight men stood at the steps of Geelong's City Hall holding up a white supremist banner and performed the Nazi salute; and

• On 29 July 2023, a group of people held a ''white powerlifting competition'' at a boxing gym in Sunshine West and performed the Nazi salute in response to anti-fascist protestors.

John Quigley, the WA Attorney General, on 18 January 2023, announced that:

> "The McGowan Government will progress legislation to criminalise the display and possession of Nazi symbols in certain circumstances. The prohibition will extend to the display of tattoos of Nazi symbols. … The reforms, once passed, will prohibit the display and possession of Nazi symbols in certain circumstances, and will provide penalties (including imprisonment) for any person who contravenes the law. The Government recognises that there are legitimate purposes for which somebody may display or possess a Nazi symbol, such as for genuine academic or educational purposes, buying or selling bona fide World War II memorabilia, or publishing fair and accurate media reports of matters of public interest. Certain display or possession in those circumstances will remain lawful."

POLITICAL LEADERSHIP

- Anthony Albanese, Prime Minister, Labor, 27 Jan. 2023:

"We must never soften the truth of what the Holocaust was: the purposeful execution of more than 6 million Jews. ... Antisemitism is on the rise, but it will not find a home here. Australia will always denounce it and reject it utterly, just as we do all forms of racism and prejudice. We owe it to our country, we owe it to our Jewish community, and we owe it to our survivors. They deserve nothing less."

- Anthony Albanese, Prime Minister, Labor, April 2023 (letter to Jewish community):

"I want to reiterate my unshakeable belief that extremism and hatred have no place in Australian society. I unequivocally condemn the shocking and distressing public displays of antisemitism, intolerance and neo-Nazi ideology we saw recently in Victoria."

- Peter Dutton MP, Leader of The Opposition, Liberal, April 2023, (letter to Jewish community):

"On behalf of the Coalition … we also condemn the repugnant rise of antisemitism around the world, including in Australia."

- Peter Dutton MP, Leader of The Opposition, Liberal, 8 June 2023:

"we have a position as a Party … we have absolutely zero tolerance for antisemitism and for that sort of racist behaviour and we don't tolerate that sort of Nazi element within our country."

- Josh Burns, federal Labor MP, speech in parliament, 6 March 2023:

"Unfortunately, antisemitism is on the rise again, occurring far too frequently and increasing in hostility. It's why the International Holocaust Remembrance Alliance came up with a definition of antisemitism."

- Matt Burnell, federal Labor MP, speech in parliament, 6 March 2023:

"Antisemitism has existed throughout the centuries in varying forms, though with many common similarities and themes. Antisemitism is something that exists right here in Australia, and its prevalence is increasing in a number of ways. Speaking against antisemitism in a place like this is important. It is important that the community sees its leaders, its elected representatives, condemn discrimination and hatred. … Sadly, antisemitism is not something of the past. It is not something happening in a faraway place. It is something that happens every day. It happens in our backyards, in our communities and on our doorsteps. With the prevalence of antisemitism rising at home, it beggars belief that we should be importing it from abroad."

- Andrew Wallace, federal Liberal MP, speech in parliament, 6 March 2023:

"In reaffirming our commitment to the IHRA working definition of 'antisemitism', we reiterate that antisemitism has no place in Australia or in the global rules based order. But we must do more than define and delineate. We must act to counter antisemitism."

- Monique Ryan, federal independent MP for Kooyong, 3 Aug. 2023:

"… a horrifying example of what the Jewish community endures too often. We have to remain vigilant against antisemitism."

- Zoe Daniel, federal independent MP for Goldstein, 3 Aug. 2023:

"I'm appalled that our Jewish community continues to endure such grotesque, defamatory and antisemitic attacks close to a century after the Holocaust. … I remain committed to doing my utmost to ensure the safety and wellbeing of our Jewish community..."

- Scott Farlow, NSW Liberal MP, NSW parliament Hansard, 19 Oct. 2022:

"I move: (3) That this House reaffirms that: (a) the Parliament is united against disgraceful and disturbing acts of antisemitism and racism within the community…"

- Walt Secord, NSW Labor MP, NSW parliament Hansard, 19 Oct. 2022:

"The work of the [NSW Jewish Board of Deputies] board has become even more important in current times, especially with the rise of antisemitism and far right activity in the State. … Australia is not exempt from the growing international phenomenon of antisemitism."

- Jing Lee, SA Liberal MP, Deputy Leader of the Opposition, 19 Oct. 2022:

"In light of such dreadful incidents and a seeming rise in antisemitism in our state, we as legislators have the responsibility to look into what discrimination is being faced by Jewish South Australians and other groups within the community who are targeted by Neo-Nazi and other ideologically motivated extremist groups. The South Australian community is calling for such symbols and activities to be banned, as has occurred in other states."

- Simon Millman, WA Labor MP, 18 Jan. 2023:

"The swastika is widely associated with antisemitism, genocide and racial hatred."

- Federal Parliamentary Friends of IHRA

A Federal Parliamentary Friends of the International Holocaust Remembrance Alliance (IHRA) was officially launched on 27 October 2022 in Parliament House. It is co-chaired by Josh Burns MP (Labor), Julian Leeser MP (Liberal), and Allegra Spender MP (independent).

"It is intended that this Group will provide a non-partisan forum for parliamentarians to meet and interact with Holocaust commemorative organisations, survivors, and their families on matters relating to the strengthening and promotion of Holocaust education and remembrance and combating antisemitism."
https://www.aph.gov.au/about_parliament/parliamentary_friendship

- Australian Young Labor: adoption of IHRA

Australian Young Labor (AYL), the youth organisation of the Australian Labor Party, adopted the International Holocaust Remembrance Alliance (IHRA) working definition of antisemitism at its national conference in Canberra on 15-16 April 2023. Although AYL's Left faction abstained from voting on the resolution, it passed with unanimous support from the Right faction.

The preamble noted that:
"Too often, people mistakenly assume that antisemitism is merely historical. Shockingly, the opposite is true. … The systematic Holocaust denial campaign which saw the distribution of leaflets across nearly every campus in Australia in 2017 is but one example … horrible statements and accusations have been made against Jewish students in university dorms, and Jewish students are routinely heckled with inflammatory and discriminatory remarks … As a result of these incidents, Jewish youth do not feel comfortable joining new spaces, and are often apprehensive about disclosing that they are Jewish."

Jeremy Leibler, president of the Zionist Federation of Australia, said, "With antisemitism rising on both the extreme right and extreme left, it is of great comfort to the Jewish community that Labor's next generation endorsed this internationally accepted definition of antisemitism."

EDUCATIONAL RESPONSES

During the period in review, two universities made public declarations against antisemitism and adopted the IHRA working definition of antisemitism - the University of Melbourne and Monash University. In addition, the Wollongong Undergraduate Students Association (WUSA) publicly condemned antisemitism. Melbourne University was the first university to publicly proclaim its adoption of the IHRA definition.

Overall, universities which have adopted the IHRA working definition of antisemitism include: Sunshine Coast University (in March 2022), University of Wollongong (in April 2022), Macquarie University (understood to be in May 2022), University of Melbourne (in January 2023), and Monash University (in March 2023); and in addition, La Trobe [University] Student Union (in June 2022).

University of Melbourne: adopts IHRA definition

> "The University of Melbourne … recognises that Muslim and Jewish members of our community can experience particular forms of prejudice or hate that constrain their freedom to live, work, study, worship, and identify as Muslim or Jewish in Australian society. To support the safety and inclusion of these members of our community within the University, the University will adopt a definition of Islamophobia, following consultation with Muslim students and staff, and adopts the International Holocaust Remembrance Alliance 'working definition of antisemitism'. Adopting these definitions does not change the University's policies on academic freedom and freedom of speech. However, the definitions provide an important educative tool for all University members to understand what constitutes Islamophobia or antisemitism, and thus support their prevention. The definitions will also help inform the development of the University's first Anti-Racism Action Plan."

Response by AUJS · January 24, 2023

> "In order to ensure that antisemitism and all forms of discrimination have no place on our campuses, we must be able to define it by amplifying the voices of those who experience it. Thank you to the University of Melbourne for doing that with their Jewish students and staff. We are really looking forward to working with the University of Melbourne throughout the implementation process. Thank you to the University of Melbourne for taking the lead."

Monash University: adopts IHRA definition

Monash University adopted the IHRA working definition of antisemitism in March 2023. Monash University's Anti-Racism Statement states:

> "Anti-racism involves actively working to break down and combat racist policies, practices, culture and ideas. Anti-racism … involves deliberate action to challenge prejudice and race-based discrimination experienced by individuals as well as racism institutionally within organisations, communities and society. … Monash is striving to ensure our communities are free from racism, which we understand broadly to encompass all forms of discrimination based on race, ethnicity, nationality, culture and religion. Monash rejects all forms of racism including racial discrimination, harassment and vilification.

University of Wollongong: adopts IHRA definition

The University of Wollongong, located in NSW, adopted the IHRA working definition of antisemitism in April 2022, but had not publicly acknowledged it until after the University of Melbourne adopted the IHRA definition. The University of Wollongong stated that "it would have no impact on "academic freedom and freedom of speech". Statement by the University of Wollongong:

> "The Council of the University of Wollongong adopts this Statement on the IHRA non-legally binding working definition of antisemitism in furtherance of its commitment to ensuring that UOW is a safe and respectful community. Our University Code of Conduct, together with our 2020-2025 Strategic Plan, Respect for Diversity Policy, Student Conduct Rules, and Campus Access and Order Rules and Statement on Academic Freedom provide the right for all members of our university community to experience a safe environment free from unfair treatment, discrimination, harassment, victimisation, vilification or bullying, including whilst exercising academic freedom and freedom of expression.

The interwoven religious, racial, cultural and national characteristics of Jewish collective identity complicate the conceptualisation and understanding of antisemitism. The Council therefore adopts the authoritative IHRA definition to aid clarity and to provide guidance in the interpretation and application of our governing legislation, rules, standards, codes, policies and guidelines with regard to ensuring a safe environment for Jewish members of our community. … Approved 8 April 2022."

Wollongong Undergraduate Students' Association (WUSA): Condemns antisemitism
The University of Wollongong Undergraduate Student Association (WUSA) unanimously passed a motion at a meeting in late October 2022 condemning antisemitism.

The "Statement: WUSA Condemns the Rise of Antisemitism" included the text of:

"Yet, antisemitism has risen globally over the past few decades – especially in the last 10 years. … WUSA recognises that Jewish students at UOW deserve to feel supported by their student union, and be confident that WUSA council members will condemn any form of antisemitism or discrimination. … WUSA condemns antisemitism in all its forms unequivocally. We commit to always standing up and calling out microaggressions and antisemitism – not just when it's politically and ideologically convenient.

"WUSA recognises that:
1. Antisemitism can present itself in discrimination, microaggressions, harassment, and violence – including life-ending violence. …
3 Antisemitism has negatively affected the lives of Jewish people for thousands of years. Antisemitism didn't start and end with the Holocaust and the defeat of the nazi Party – it has continued to this day.

"WUSA commits to:
1. Opening further, ongoing dialogue between WUSA and Jewish students on campus to discuss how WUSA can assist in combatting antisemitism at UOW.
2. Actively working with Jewish students at UOW and AUJS with issues relating to antisemitism … amplifying their voices.
3. To the ongoing fight against antisemitism in all its forms. The world has seen what happens when antisemitism reaches its worst. It must never happen again, and we must always call it out."

AUJS Vice President Alissa Foster said:

"This year in particular we have seen antisemitism constantly dismissed and denied on our University campuses. It really means a lot to Jewish students at the University of Wollongong but also around the country to see that there are people who recognise our experiences and are committed to working alongside us to educate others and call hatred out. The fact that this motion passed unanimously is particularly important. Antisemitism does not exist solely on either side of the political spectrum, and it should never be framed as a partisan issue. We thank every single WUSA councillor for recognising this and for standing in support of your Jewish peers. This will go a long way in ensuring Jewish students feel welcome in all political spaces on campus."

INTERFAITH: CATHOLIC RESPONSES

- Jewish-Catholic goodwill reaffirmed: Walking Together

Jewish-Catholic goodwill reaffirmed
By Marilyn Rodrigues, March 24, 2023

The Australian Catholic Bishops Conference has released a new statement on Catholic-Jewish relations, to address the resurgence in antisemitic attitudes and reinforce the significant steps forward between the faiths since the Second Vatican Council. In the document, Walking Together: Catholics with Jews in the Australian Context, the ACBC says that a deep appreciation of Jesus Christ's Jewish tradition is the starting point for mutual respect.

"We wish to encourage all people of goodwill, and especially Australia's Catholics, to deepen their understanding of the Church's relationship to Judaism by better appreciating the Jewishness of Jesus and of the first generation of Jesus' disciples," the document says.

Bishop Michael McKenna, chair of the bishops commission for Christian unity and inter-religious dialogue, launched the document at Mary MacKillop Place in North Sydney on 21 March … Bishop Michael McKenna … said Walking Together "aims to help Catholics understand more deeply the uniqueness of our relationship with Judaism, our elder sisters and brothers in faith."

Jillian Segal, president of the Executive Council of Australian Jewry, said Walking Together … affirms "the essential Jewishness of Jesus and the fact that he prayed and worshipped as a Jew; the ongoing, irrevocable nature of the covenant between G-d and the Jewish people; and the fact that Jesus and the Pharisees were in alignment, not in opposition, to one another."

Walking Together succeeds a document published by the commission in 1992, in order to reflect new developments within the church and world, including Pope Francis' 2013 apostolic exhortation Evangelii Gaudium, … Walking Together offers guidelines about how Catholics can enhance their relationships with their Jewish sisters and brothers, which it says is necessary for them to work together for the flourishing of society and bring about God's reign.

It also calls Catholics to reject racism and antisemitism. "Although today's Jews in Australia live in relative peace and safety compared to other parts of the world, they have not escaped the impact of antisemitic attitudes and actions," the document said. "Antisemitism within Australia has been exacerbated by political tensions in other parts of the world. "We are further concerned about increasing levels of ignorance and even denial of the Holocaust." …

In reflecting on enhancing Jewish-Catholic relations Walking Together also reaffirms important principals from Vatican II's declaration Nostra Aetate: the unique and permanent bond the church has with the Jews; the irrevocable nature of the convent between God and the people Israel; and the church's condemnation of antisemitism.

- Catholic Religious Australia: educating about antisemitism

Catholic Religious Australia (CRA) "is the peak body for Leaders of Catholic Religious Institutes and Societies of Apostolic Life who are resident in Australia." CRA self-describes as "effecting change within the Church and society in a diverse range of areas, some of which are justice, professional standards, education, stewardship and governance."
https://www.catholicreligious.org.au/

In 2023, CRA designed a project, in partnership with the ECAJ, to produce a digital educative resource for Catholic school principals to share with their executive, teachers and staff on the subject of antisemitic bullying. Catholic educator Prof. David Hall FMS (Australian Catholic University) engaged with Jewish community leaders, Peter Wertheim (co-CEO ECAJ) and Vic Alhadeff (former CEO of NSW Jewish Board of Deputies), to produce a videoed conversation accompanied by discussion tools. In addition, Julie Nathan (Research Director at ECAJ) gave an interview and provided data and images from the annual ECAJ antisemitism reports; and Alissa Foster (President of AUJS) also provided input via an interview; the interviews were aimed at providing information and further stimulus for discussion.

The resource, titled "Addressing Antisemitic Bullying: A Resource for Catholic Leadership & Formation" will be freely distributed to CRA Members and their educational ministries, especially Catholic schools, by December 2023.

INTERNATIONAL RESPONSES

- J7 Global Task Force on Fighting Antisemitism

A new global Jewish organisation, composed of seven countries, was launched on 24 July 2023 to combat antisemitism. The following press release explains the new group.

Top Jewish Advocacy Organizations in Seven Countries Form J7 Global Task Force on Fighting Antisemitism

New initiative will bring together leaders of seven large Diaspora Jewish communities to discuss common challenges, develop coordinated strategies and share best practices

In response to increasing rates of antisemitism around the world, major Jewish organizations in the United States, Canada, the United Kingdom, Germany, France, Argentina and Australia announced today the formation of the J7, the Large Communities' Task Force Against Antisemitism.

The task force will consist of the following member organizations and nations represented:

- The United States: ADL (the Anti-Defamation League) and the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations
- The United Kingdom: Board of Deputies of British Jews
- France: Conseil Représentatif des Institutions Juives de France (CRIF)
- Germany: Central Council of Jews in Germany
- Canada: Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA)
- Argentina: Delegación de Asociaciones Israelitas Argentinas (DAIA)
- Australia: Executive Council of Australian Jewry (ECAJ)

In addition to top-level consultations, the J7 will organize a number of working groups comprised of subject matter experts from each community to develop strategies and action plans within areas such as policy and advocacy, tech policy, security, extremism, and education against antisemitism.

The formation of the J7 Global Task Force comes at a time when data from around the world indicates a rise in antisemitic incidents and attitudes, and growing concern within our Jewish communities who are confronting this rise.

Leaders of these seven communities shared their perspectives of the importance of this collaboration:

Argentina – Jorge Knoblovits, President, DAIA: "To be part of J7, represents for the DAIA a great responsibility as one of the world's largest Jewish communities and the only one in Latin America. J7 will allow us to have a greater understanding of the challenges faced by world Jewry in the areas of antisemitism, Holocaust remembrance and other hate-related topics. To be part of J7, led by ADL, ensures that the perspective of Latin American Jews will have a global reach."

Australia – Peter Wertheim, Co-CEO, Executive Council of Australian Jewry: "Antisemitism is a disease of the human spirit that eats away at the foundations of civilisation everywhere. It is not limited by geographical borders, ideology or creed. It is a global phenomenon that requires a global response. As the elected peak representative body of the Australian Jewish community, we are pleased to join our colleagues from organisations representing other major Jewish communities in the diaspora to co-ordinate our efforts to combat antisemitism and maximise our impact."

Canada – Shimon Fogel, President and CEO, CIJA: "What starts with the Jews, never ends with the Jews. There is a global imperative to confront antisemitism and drawing on the expertise and strength of the J7 coalition is an important catalyst for universal action."

France – Robert J. Ejnes, Executive Director, CRIF: "If antisemitism exists everywhere in the world, it is in Europe that it has been brought to its climax. Together with the J7 task force, we will look at the resurgence of antisemitism in all its forms, whether Islamist, conspiratorial, hatred of Israel or Holocaust denial, from wherever it originates. Together, we will monitor the expressions of hate and fight for a better tomorrow."

Germany – Dr. Josef Schuster, President, Central Council of Jews in Germany: "The internet, as a means of fast and easy communication, increasingly blurs national borders. Similarly, antisemitic networks, tactics and developments don't stop at national borders either. We endorse this additional opportunity for exchange in the J7 format, which will facilitate interaction between representatives of Jewish communities at this level. Together we will approach globally operating institutions or companies and unite our efforts in combatting antisemitism."

UK – Marie van der Zyl OBE, President, Board of Deputies of British Jews: "Antisemitism knows no geographic boundaries. The Board of Deputies looks forward to being part of this international coalition of leading Jewish organisations, each at the forefront of the fight against the challenges posed by the rise of this global hatred. By working together, we strengthen our ability to tackle antisemitism wherever it emerges."

U.S. - William C. Daroff, CEO, Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations: "Antisemitism, which is the world's oldest hatred, no longer looks or spreads the way it did in the past. The vitriol once felt for individual Jews or Jewish practice, has metastasized into blaming the Jewish people and the Jewish state for the ills of the world. Social media enables antisemitic hate to cross borders, where it spreads faster than ever before. It is therefore imperative for the largest diaspora Jewish communities to engage in regular conversation to develop strategies to combat the pernicious spread of antisemitism. Including our Conference of Presidents member organizations that are engaged in combatting antisemitism will bring great synergies to this effort. What impacts one community, impacts us all."

U.S. -- Jonathan A. Greenblatt, ADL CEO: "Antisemitism is rising around the world, especially in countries where there are large Jewish populations. And threats to our communities are not contained by continents and borders. We needed to meet these challenges through coordinated action. This new coalition of major organizations representing seven large Jewish Diaspora communities in liberal democracies will provide a formal framework for coordination, consultation and formulating global responses to antisemitic threats against the Jewish people."

The J7 leadership will meet periodically virtually and in-person, including at ADL's 2024 Never is Now Summit on March 4-7, 2024.

9. ARTICLES on ANTISEMITISM

The ECAJ has been active in exposing antisemitism. It has produced articles which have been published in the Australian and international media during the period in review. Some of the articles by the ECAJ, and by others, are reproduced here.

Perrottet's shame presents a teachable moment for us all: A Catholic's perspective

Teresa Pirola 23 January 2023
https://www.abc.net.au/religion/perrottet-shame-is-teachable-moment-for-us-all/101882610

How many of us look back — with horror — at some of the foolish or questionable choices we made when we were young? I'll confess that I have a good deal of sympathy for the New South Wales Premier, Dominic Perrottet, as he walks the path of shame following his disclosure that he wore a Nazi uniform as fancy dress to his twenty-first birthday party in 2003.

The Premier was right to step up and take full responsibility for his mistake, without dilution or excuse. As a young adult, he willingly donned a garment identified with one of the most murderous regimes of the twentieth century, a killing machine that destroyed the lives of six million Jews — including 1.5 million Jewish children — for a costume party. This is deeply distressing for Holocaust survivors, and to every Jew who carries the intergenerational trauma of these terrible events. It is also highly offensive to Australian ex-service people, among many others, and violates the values that gird Australian society: compassion, mutual respect, tolerance, and the dignity of all individuals.

As a Catholic who belongs to the same faith community as the Premier, I would also add that this act runs contrary to the values that committed Christians hold as disciples of Jesus and members of a Church whose roots are anchored in Jewish history, and in sacred texts that uphold the inviolable dignity of all human beings. The awareness of this history, of these roots, is something that the Catholic community as a whole needs continually to renew.

In the way they've handling the matter, both the Premier and representatives of the Jewish community have acted with grace and dignity. They have moved from a mutually respectful and frank exchange to a constructive focus on a common commitment to education against prejudice and to combat antisemitism. I am drawn to the thought that this unfortunate incident represents a "teachable moment" for my own Catholic community and for all Australian Christians — an opportunity to deepen our collective understanding of the Holocaust. We can pause to reflect on ways of ensuring that our religious commitments contribute to a society where no person is tempted to flirt with such evil, whether through ignorance, misplaced humour, immature bravado, or ill intent.

Telling the truth about Christianity and antisemitism

What, exactly, could Christians communicate to their children, students, parishioners, colleagues, and others within their sphere of influence? What key lessons are at stake when it comes to Holocaust education, and what could a Christian perspective offer to wider society?

While there were Christians who heroically resisted the evil unleashed by Nazism, there were many more Christians implicated in its rise and progress, whether through acts of commission or omission. We could therefore express our admiration for those who acted morally and with courage, regardless of their religious background, condemn Christian support for Nazi policies, and critique the inaction of bystanders in the face of Nazi atrocities. We could ponder together the sobering question, "What would I have done?" A visit to the Sydney Jewish Museum would help to illuminate such a conversation about the consequences of our moral choices.

We might further point out, in age-appropriate ways, that Nazi propaganda skilfully manipulated anti-Jewish sentiment and tropes that pervaded Christian culture for centuries: lies that portrayed Jews as sub-human beings, as the killers of Christ, enemies of the Church, and "cursed" for their so called "blindness" for not accepting Jesus as the Messiah. Terrible lies like these were repeatedly employed. They were never formally adopted as Church teaching, but certain toxic distortions of the Christian message crept into discourse in the early centuries of the Church's development and proceeded to fester. They are found in the writings of the early Church fathers; they intensify in artworks of the Middle Ages; and they appear as late as the 1930s in well-regarded Catholic publications in Europe. As German Cardinal Walter Kasper — who headed the Pontifical Council for Promoting Christian Unity from 2001 to 2010 — soberly wrote:

between the end of the nineteenth century and the first decades of the twentieth, even very authoritative Catholic journals published articles in an anti-Semitic vein, and "more generally fanned anti-Jewish prejudices; they stemmed from the Medieval 'teaching of contempt,' that was a source of stereotypes and popular hatred" … so that it can be said, in this regard, that such an attitude offered a favourable context for the spread of modern anti-Semitism.

We ought to point out that poisonous words often lead to violent actions.

In Christian societies over many centuries prior to the Second World War, Jews had faced all kinds of persecution: demeaning public falsehoods about their traditions, restricted rights, confinement to the ghetto, being required to wear a distinguishing mark on their clothing, the burning of their books, forced conversion, torture and violent death. To be sure, there were also periods when Jewish communities lived in relative peace, with certain protections given by church authorities. However, these times did not last, and the "teaching of contempt" referred to by Cardinal Kasper continued to spread and mutate.

Thus, we can — and should — ponder the link between antisemitism in Christian cultures, and the ways in which distortions of the Christian message contributed to Auschwitz. Whatever the intention of individual Christians, the anti-Jewish sentiment infecting Christian thought, speech, and activity provided ammunition and even implicit permission for those who perpetrated the Holocaust. A visit to the vast online education resources of Yad Vashem, the World Holocaust Remembrance Centre, would help to fill out the picture.

The responsibility to continue to combat antisemitism

It is undoubtedly painful for Christians to hear this part of their history. One of the great achievements of the Second Vatican Council (1962–1965) was the decisive repudiation of antisemitism by the magisterium of the Catholic Church — which included dismantling the unjust accusation that held Jews of every time and place collectively responsible for the crucifixion of Jesus. An appropriate Catholic response would be to reflect upon paragraph four of the conciliar Declaration on the Relation of the Church to Non-Christian Religions, Nostra Aetate, and the many post-conciliar statements of popes, bishops conferences, and church commissions that have sought to implement the teaching of the Council by promoting a "teaching of respect" for Jews and Judaism.

We can also educate ourselves in the history leading up to this historic shift of gears in Catholic thinking that produced Nostra Aetate. Historian John Connelly's From Enemy to Brother: The Revolution in Catholic Teaching on the Jews, 1933–1965 is an excellent place to start.

Catholics can also be encouraged by the fact that other mainstream Christian churches have undergone their own revolutions when it comes to recognising and rejecting antisemitism, and forging positive relations with Jewish communities. The reception of these official church reforms takes time — after all, the reforms are barely 60 years old and Christians have been influenced by anti-Jewish messaging for two millennia.

Antisemitism in Christian circles has been powerfully addressed by many church leaders and institutions around the world, and yet it is not eradicated from the ecclesial psyche. It continues in subtle, unintended biases; it is expressed from pulpits and in classrooms, through simplistic statements about the "legalistic Pharisees", "Jewish conspirators", and the so-called "wrathful" God of the Old Testament who is then pitted against Jesus's teachings on "love". Far less forthcoming from Christian teachers and preachers are statements about the tender, compassionate, liberating God of the Old Testament, about how Christian ethics and values find their grounding in the Hebrew Bible, about God's irrevocable love for, and fidelity to, the "children of Israel" which is at the heart of Scripture, and about the enduring vitality of Jewish covenantal life.

Meanwhile, education about all forms of contemporary antisemitism is as necessary as ever, as hateful propaganda flourishes on social media and new generations display an alarmingly high level of ignorance of the Holocaust. Furthermore, we can alert our children, students, parishioners, and colleagues to anti-Jewish tropes historically embedded in Christianity, which continue to feed extremist groups on both sides of the political divide. To be sure, these extremists are not sincere Christians, but sometimes identify as if they were, using the raw material of what Christian communities have left behind and enlisting its emotive power for ever-changing sinister guises. The Christian responsibility to combat antisemitism thus grows.

Why education and empathy matter

It is sometimes claimed by political operatives that we should never waste a crisis. In that spirit, if we can rise above the politics of the moment, there is an opportunity for the Premier's apology to galvanise a common effort for effective anti-prejudice education in New South Wales.

The quality of that education will be critical. Was it simply youthful foolishness that led a 21-year-old Dominic Perrottet to don a Nazi uniform for a costume party? He was an adult, and twenty years ago the New South Wales state curriculum taught about the lethal criminality of the Nazi regime. Perrottet must have known about the horrific details of the Nazi genocide against the Jewish people, the Roma and other groups, and about the high price paid by Australian service men and women in North Africa, Syria and elsewhere, to prevent Nazi tyranny from dominating the world. At some level, he must have understood that the freedoms we enjoy today would not be possible without such service and sacrifice.

Yet looking back, one can see that the knowledge of facts is not enough. Equally essential is empathy. Undoubtedly, maturity and experience have taught him — as it teaches many of us — not only to understand the perspectives of people who might appear unlike ourselves, but also to have empathy for what they have experienced, and how their lives continue to be affected by it. Programs such as Together for Humanity and Interfaith Encounters can assist schools and community groups in this regard.

Along with Opposition Leader Chris Minns, I believe that the Premier's apology was sincere. I also believe that, twenty years later, the Premier is a more sensitive, empathetic, wiser person. The journey he has undertaken presents a "teachable moment" for the common good. It is certainly a call to me, to my Catholic community, and to all Christians, to examine our consciences and attitudes towards the Jewish people, and to make a robust contribution in our personal and professional lives to redress past wrongs.

Current trends in antisemitism in Australia

Julie Nathan 2 February 2023
https://www.australianjewishnews.com/current-trends-in-antisemitism-in-australia/
https://blogs.timesofisrael.com/current-trends-in-antisemitism-in-australia/

The Executive Council of Australian Jewry (ECAJ) has just released its annual Report on Antisemitism in Australia. There were 478 antisemitic incidents logged across Australia in the 12 months to September 30, 2022.

This is an increase of more than 40 per cent over the last two years, made up of a 6.9 per cent increase during the year ending September 30, 2022 following the 35 per cent increase reported during the previous year in 2021.

Most of the incidents in 2022 comprised verbal abuse, graffiti and propaganda material (e.g. posters, stickers), with the latter category seeing a 70 per cent increase over the previous year.

Two questions arise: What is driving the current spate of antisemitism? And what can be done about it?

A major source of antisemitism is the burgeoning neo-Nazi movement which is active across Australia. It began, in its contemporary manifestation, in late 2016 as a small but dedicated group named Antipodean Resistance, which then morphed into several other groups, most notably the National Socialist Network (NSN) and its partner, the European Australian Movement (EAM), together with other affiliated groups, often geographically based.

These neo-Nazis espouse genocidal hatred of Jews and look to Adolf Hitler as their inspiration and role model. They have adopted National Socialist (Nazi) ideology, imbued with its conspiracy theories about Jews. They often dress up their Nazi beliefs as white nationalism, with slogans such as "White Revolution" and "Australia for the White Man", in order to dupe unsuspecting young males of European background into joining their cause.

In the streets, neo-Nazi groups actively propagate their ideology, mainly by placing stickers on poles and leaflets in letterboxes. In one brazen act, NSN/EAM members stood outside the Holocaust Museum in Adelaide and performed Nazi salutes. This act was photographed and posted online, where mainstream media found it and publicised it.

On encrypted internet sites, neo-Nazis and their fellow travellers (a mix of white supremacists, Christian nationalists, conspiracy theorists and other antisemites) exchange their views, distribute propaganda material, post about their latest acts of hatred, and dream of an Australia devoid of Jews, Africans, Asians and LGBT people.

It would be wrong to dismiss them as a tiny lunatic fringe of racists. They are growing in numbers, and are led by more politically savvy people. They are not the head-thumping, romper stomper goons of the past. Their long-term goal is to seize political power and take over the Australian government by force, as the vanguard of their so-called "white revolution" to "save" Australia from non-European races. Intrinsic to their ideology is the intention, sometimes stated openly, to commit "a Holocaust" against Australia's Jewish population.

For now, these neo-Nazis are promoting their racist ideology, producing hate propaganda material, recruiting new members, and engaging in legal activities aimed at bonding and planning, and solidifying the efficacy of their organisations.

State governments and police have recognised that neo-Nazis are a growing threat and may instigate violence in the foreseeable future. Police closely monitor many of them, and new laws have been introduced banning the public display of Nazi hate symbols. Although the ban will not stop neo-Nazis, it sends a message to everyone that racist hate will not be tolerated.

At the other end of the political spectrum, a different threat has emerged, not one engaged in overtly anti-Jewish incidents, but one which is more insidious.

Ostensibly left-leaning, progressive groups, including so-called "anti-racism activists", are mainstreaming antisemitism and/or actively undermining the fight against antisemitism. They do this in multiple ways, either intentionally or inadvertently.

Many wrongly see antisemitism as existing only in far-right circles, and ignore antisemitism emanating from other sources. Others falsely perceive Jews as wealthy and powerful, and therefore excuse any attacks on Jews as "punching-up", and not as racism. Some ignore anti-Israel discourse which crosses the line into hateful conceptualisations of Jews.

An example is the campaign by anti-Israel activists to oppose the International Holocaust Remembrance Alliance (IHRA) Working Definition of Antisemitism from being adopted by parliaments, universities and community organisations.

This campaign has falsely claimed that the IHRA definition prohibits free speech and any criticism of Israel, despite the fact that the definition states explicitly that "criticism of Israel similar to that levelled against any other country cannot be regarded as antisemitic."

The IHRA definition has been widely accepted by governments, the UN and other bodies, and Jewish communities throughout the world, as a non-legally binding standard definition and educational tool to identify and combat antisemitism in all its forms.

The opposition to the IHRA definition is often expressed in a way that downplays the extent and severity of antisemitism, or suggests that the concerns of the Jewish community about antisemitism should be dismissed or minimised, or implies that the broad Jewish community organisational support for the IHRA definition is disingenuous, or part of a conspiracy.

Antisemitism cannot be eradicated – it is too ingrained in the psyche of European and Middle Eastern cultures. But it can be mitigated and thwarted.

Effective counter-action against antisemitism takes three main forms.

- First, we need the right messaging from political leaders, academics, journalists, faith and community leaders, and others in positions of power or influence. They need to vigorously condemn antisemitism whenever and wherever it raises its ugly head.

- Second, we need federal, state and territory legislation that is comprehensive and effective against vilification and advocacy of violence. These laws should be complemented by the establishment of a national database of hate-motivated crime.

- Third, education is required to inform people about the particularities of antisemitism itself, its history and the various ways in which it manifests, so people can recognise it and act against it when they see it.

The 478 incidents documented in the 2022 ECAJ Report on Antisemitism are only a fraction of incidents occurring in Australia. It is crucial that all incidents of antisemitism are reported to the ECAJ, or the state Jewish representative body, or to local CSGs.

This is essential to equip the Jewish community with the most comprehensive and accurate information about incidents to take to police, legislators, educators and others. Such information helps us to develop better protective measures for the Jewish community, and to assist in implementing government and community strategies to fight antisemitism.

Comprehensive study of hate incidents in Australia – updated

Julie Nathan 21 June 2023
https://blogs.timesofisrael.com/comprehensive-study-of-hate-incidents-in-australia-updated/https://www.jwire.com.au/comprehensive-study-of-hate-incidents-in-australia-updated/

A comprehensive study conducted in 2022 revealed a clear picture of the state of reported hate incidents in Australia from 2014 to 2021. This article updates the 2022 study so as to incorporate data from a recent report of hate incidents which was released in 2023.

The 2022 study was based on the reports of three targeted communities – Jewish, Muslim and Asian – the only communities who have a reporting and documentation system, and which produce reports on hate incidents against their community.

The three sets of publications used in the 2022 study and in the updated assessment in this article are: the Executive Council of Australian Jewry's (ECAJ) 'Report on Antisemitism in Australia' (produced annually since 1990); the Islamophobia Register Australia's (IRA) 'Islamophobia in Australia' (four reports produced, in 2017, 2019, 2022, and 2023); and the Asian Australian Alliance's (AAA) 'COVID-19 Coronavirus Racism Incident Report' (two reports produced, in 2020 and in 2021).

Two new reports have been produced since the 2022 study: the ECAJ report for 2022 with 478 anti-Jewish incidents; and the IRA report for 2020-2021, with 90 anti-Muslim incidents. There has been no subsequent report from the AAA. However, the updated study in this article includes only data for incidents up to the end of 2021. This includes the IRA data for 2020-2021, which was previously unavailable and was only released in 2023. It is now possible to analyse the data for all three communities for the period of 2020-2021.

It is important to note that the reports by each of these organisations vary in four distinct ways: 1. different or unknown criteria for inclusion/exclusion as a hate incident, 2. different data categories of hate incidents (notably, two reports include online discourse as incidents while one report excludes online), 3. different transparency levels of incidents (eg one report lists all incidents, two reports provide some examples of incidents), and 4. different time frames of reporting periods. This means that making accurate comparisons between the incident data in the different reports is complicated, yet attainable.

Despite these differences, by looking at the reports produced by each organisation a clearer and more comprehensive picture of hate incidents in Australia emerges from the data, at least within these three targeted communities.

Summary of incidents

An updated analysis shows that there were 3,612 reported hate incidents in the seven-year four-month (88 month) period between 17 September 2014 and 31 December 2021. That amounts to an average of 492 incidents per year, and over nine incidents per week.

These incidents were composed of: 2,142 anti-Jewish incidents (in the 84 months from 1 October 2014 to 30 September 2021); 929 anti-Muslim incidents (in the 88 months from 17 September 2014 to 31 December 2021); and 541 anti-Asian incidents (in the 15 months from 2 April 2020 to 28 June 2021).

The frequency of hate incidents experienced by each community varies significantly. To provide some context, the Australian population is composed of 25 million people. According to the Australian Bureau of Statistics in 2016, in Australia there were 100,000 Jews, 604,000 Muslims, and 2.4 million people of east and southeast Asian ancestry. This means that proportionally, for every 100,000 people in each community, there were 306 anti-Jewish incidents, 20 anti-Muslim incidents, and 18 anti-east/southeast Asian incidents, on average annually.

The three communities face similar types of hate incidents, but in strikingly varying proportions. Using data from the reports by ECAJ (in 2021), IRA (2018-2019) and AAA (2021-2021), the top two categories with the highest percentage of incidents for each community are: verbal abuse (33%) and graffiti (24%) against the Jewish community; online content (44%) and hate speech (25%) against the Muslim community; and, direct racial slur/name calling (35%) and online harassment (25%) against the Asian community.

Anti-Jewish incidents

The Executive Council of Australian Jewry (ECAJ) was formed in 1944 and is the peak national body representing the Australian Jewish community. It has produced an annual Report on Antisemitism each year since 1990. These reports were inaugurated after a spate of arson attacks on synagogues and a kindergarten in 1990 and 1991. Each Antisemitism Report covers the 12-month period to 30 September each year.

There was a total of 2,142 anti-Jewish incidents reported for the seven years from 1 October 2014 to 30 September 2021; averaging 306 incidents annually. The annual number of anti-Jewish incidents ranged from 190 incidents in 2015 to 447 incidents in 2021.

Anti-Jewish incidents, documented in the 2021 ECAJ report, as a percentage of the total number of incidents, in descending order, comprised: verbal abuse (33%); graffiti (24%); email, postal, phone (23%); placards, posters, stickers (16%); physical assault (2%); and vandalism (2%).

Of note, the ECAJ, unlike other organisations, does not include in its tally of incidents general expressions of hate against Jews that appear online, as these are too numerous and ubiquitous to measure from year to year in any meaningful way. However, general expressions of hate against Jews that appear online are recorded in the discourse section of each report.

Anti-Muslim incidents

The Islamophobia Register Australia (IRA) was established "in response to increasing harassment and attacks" against Muslims after police raids in Sydney and Brisbane in September 2014.

There was a total of 929 anti-Muslim incidents reported between 17 September 2014 and 31 December 2021, an 88-month period, of which 417 (45%) were online posts/comments. (Some adjustments in offline/online figures, in this study, have been made in accordance with the IRA report of 2023.) The average number of anti-Muslim incidents annually for the seven years between 2015 and 2021 was 118.

The four reports by IRA documented 243 incidents in 2014 and 2015 (16 months), 349 in 2016 and 2017 (24 months), 247 in 2018 and 2019 (24 months), and 90 in 2020 and 2021 (24 months). Of these incidents, 45%, 42%, 44%, and 55% respectively, were online content. Of note, these reports are released up to two years after the period they cover.

IRA's 2020-2021 report, which focused on and analysed "930 verified incidents (515 offline and 415 online)" from 2014 to 2021, noted that of the 515 "offline incidents" which account for 55% of all incidents, in descending order, comprised: verbal intimidation (45%); graffiti and vandalism (12%); discrimination by authorities in official buildings, workplaces, schools (10%); written material (9%); physical assault (8%); multiple incident types (8%), non-verbal intimidation (6%); and other (2%). Of the 415 incidents online, which account for 45% of incidents, during 2014-2021, 75% occurred on Facebook.

Anti-Asian incidents

The Asian Australian Alliance (AAA) report was motivated by the racism against Asians in Australia arising from the COVID-19 pandemic. The first report covered the 2-month period from 2 April 2020 to 2 June 2020 and recorded 377 incidents. The second report covered the 13-month period from 3 June 2020 to 28 June 2021, and recorded 164 incidents. This is a total of 541 anti-Asian incidents over a 15-month period, and an average of 432 incidents for a 12-month period. No further reports have been issued covering the period from June 2021.

In the second AAA report, incidents, in descending order, comprised: direct racial slur/name calling (35%); online harassment (25%); making it out as a joke (13%); verbal threats (8%); getting spat/sneezed/coughed on (7%); physical intimidation/harassment (7%); shunning (6%); workplace discrimination (2%); and other categories of discrimination under 2%.

Countering hate incidents

These 3,612 hate incidents comprise only a proportion of hate incidents occurring in Australia. Many other anti-Jewish, anti-Muslim and anti-Asian incidents are unreported. In addition, incidents against other targeted communities – on the basis of race, ethnic/national origin, religion, gender, sexuality, disability, and other attributes – go unreported due to the lack of an organisation which logs reports for these communities.

Hate incidents detrimentally affect individuals, communities and the society as a whole. It is therefore crucial to counter and reduce the number of hate incidents, and the prevailing prejudices that drive them. This requires information and resolve.

The hate incident data by these three targeted communities can be used by governments, human rights bodies, police, and others, to formulate policies and practices towards countering hate incidents. This data is an invaluable resource providing evidence for the state of hate incidents in Australia within these three communities.

Slaying the Mythical Jew

Alex Ryvchin 30 June 2023
https://www.realclearpolitics.com/articles/2023/06/30/slaying_the_mythical_jew_149426.html

The trial of Robert Bowers for the murder of eleven worshippers in a Pittsburgh synagogue in October 2018 has brought into focus the nature of racial hatred and the power of conspiracy theories. Bowers entered a synagogue with an arsenal of advanced weapons and proceeded to murder eleven mostly elderly people quietly gathered for Saturday morning prayers. The youngest victim, David Rosenthal, was 54 years old. He had learning difficulties and was shot beside his older brother. The oldest victim was Rose Mallinger, age 97.

Bowers didn't see retired accountants, grandparents, and a pioneering doctor who treated AIDS patients, holding the hands of those once deemed untouchable. Bowers, a prolific poster in far-right online forums, believed the Jews to be "the children of Satan" who were conspiring to eliminate the white race by flooding the United States with refugees from Syria and elsewhere in the Middle East and Africa. Bowers saw demons he was determined to slay. "The Jews are killing our children," he told a police officer after surrendering at the scene of his carnage.

Bowers' ideology is typical of antisemitism throughout history. He perceived a rapidly changing world. He clung to a nostalgia for what he thought was a better, purer bygone age. Unable to rationalize the world around him, he devolved into racial hatred for Arabs and Africans and into conspiracy theories that the Jew controlled them and were plotting the downfall of humanity.

Bowers had swallowed a myth, or more precisely, a collection of them. He believed the Jews to have a thirst for blood, particularly that of children. He believed the Jews to be conspiring to seize control of the levers of global power – media, government, finance. He believed the Jews to be killers of Christ and therefore irredeemably evil.

He believed in a mythological Jew, a creature conjured to lay all the ills of modernity upon some living breathing thing. The "doppelganger," as the novelist Philip Roth once observed, that entered the consciousness of the enlightened West in place of the real, flesh and blood Jew. Bowers could not distinguish between the two. He thought he was destroying the incarnation of total evil, the consort of the devil. In reality, he murdered pensioners and faithful community volunteers.

This is the nature of antisemitism, the manner of its expression and the sum of its misery. It is a condition more than it is a form of racial hatred. It has the unique quality of shifting from a prejudice to a quest, one that only ever ends in the blood of the innocent. It is also a problem that does not only affect its primary target. Once an individual, movement, or society is captive to conspiracy theories and can longer distinguish myth from reality, the ability to reason and function effectively is lost.

The solution is two-fold: education and engagement. The nature of mythology is that it cannot coexist with reality. The mythological Jew, cloaked in centuries of absurdity and disinformation ceases to exist when one is also presented with the actual Jew, in all its diversity, complexity, and humanity. The more opportunities that can be created for Jews and non-Jews to sit together, learn together, work together, the lesser the temptation to slide into paranoia and fear.

Napoleon said that without education "there is no present and there is no future." By becoming educated on the origins of these myths, who started them, for what sinister purpose, and what these myths look like today, the mind is inoculated against these absurdities.

A striking example of the power of rationalism took place in Damascus in 1840, after several prominent members of the city's ancient Jewish community were accused of murdering a monk to use his blood to bake the unleavened bread Jews eat during the festival of Passover.

The Sultan Abdul Mejid ordered an investigation of the accusations and issued a searing denunciation:

An ancient prejudice prevailed against the Jews. The ignorant believed that the Jews were accustomed to sacrifice a human being, to make use of his blood at their feast of Passover … The religious books of the Hebrews have been examined by learned men, well versed in their religious literature, the result of which examination is that it is found that Jews are strongly prohibited not only from using human blood but even that of animals. It therefore follows that the charges made against them and their religion are nothing but pure calumnies … we cannot permit the Jewish nation whose innocence of the crime alleged against them is evident to be vexed and tormented upon accusations which have not the least foundation in truth.

As the Sultan demonstrated, even the oldest myths crumble in the face of truth. In this spirit, a new movement of tolerance founded on education and engagement beckons.

Submission to the Senate Inquiry into Antisemitism at Australian Universities

Submitted by: Michael Gencher, Executive Director, StandWithUs Australia
Date: 21/08/2024

Introduction

Antisemitism at Australian universities has long been a persistent issue. It is not only my belief, but it is documented that antisemitism was a significant problem on campuses even before the tragic events of October 7. Since then, this scourge has grown exponentially. As the Executive Director of StandWithUs Australia and in my previous roles as Head of Community and Acting CEO of the New South Wales Jewish Board of Deputies, I have been directly responsible for gathering and analysing data related to antisemitic incidents within our community. The data I have encountered, alongside numerous firsthand reports, paint a deeply troubling picture of the pervasive and growing nature of antisemitism across the entire education sector.

1. The Exponential Growth of Antisemitism on Campus

Before October 7, antisemitism on Australian university campuses was already a matter of grave concern. Research and reporting by various organisations, including the Executive Council of Australian Jewry (ECAJ), had documented numerous incidents involving antisemitic harassment, intimidation, and even violence against Jewish students. According to the ECAJ's annual report on antisemitism, there was a significant increase in antisemitic incidents in 2023, with universities being identified as hotspots for such behaviour.

The events of October 7 have acted as a catalyst, exacerbating an already dangerous environment. Jewish students have reported an alarming surge in antisemitic rhetoric, including the glorification of violence against Jews and the open celebration of terrorist acts. This increase has not been limited to online platforms but has manifested physically on campuses, where Jewish students have been confronted with hate symbols, aggressive chants, and hostile atmospheres that compromise their safety and ability to participate fully in academic life.

In my role at StandWithUs Australia, I have personally received and documented reports from Jewish students across multiple universities, detailing incidents where they have been targeted solely because of their identity. These reports reflect a disturbing reality that the university sector as a whole is struggling—or perhaps unwilling—to address effectively.

2. Antisemitism Across the Entire Education Sector

The problem of antisemitism is not confined to one or two universities; it is a systemic issue that afflicts the entire education sector. My experience includes direct involvement with multiple universities, including the University of Sydney, the University of New South Wales, and Monash University, among others. In each of these institutions, Jewish students have faced significant hostility, often under the guise of political expression related to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

For instance, at the University of Sydney, Jewish students have been targeted during public events, lectures, and even in their daily interactions. The university's inability or unwillingness to take firm action against those who perpetuate such hate has only emboldened the aggressors. Similar patterns have been observed at other universities, where the lack of consistent and robust responses from university administrations has contributed to a climate in which antisemitism is allowed to thrive.

It is critical to recognise that this issue extends beyond individual incidents—it is a cultural problem embedded within the structures and practices of these institutions. This is evident in the tolerance for antisemitic discourse within academic settings and the reluctance of university leadership to confront the problem head-on.

3. The Need for a Judicial Inquiry

Given the gravity of the situation, it is clear that existing mechanisms within the university sector are insufficient to address the problem. The current strategies, which rely on internal reviews and administrative processes, have proven ineffective. What is required is a judicial inquiry with the power to compel witnesses, seize documents, provide immunities, and take evidence in camera. Such an inquiry would allow witnesses, particularly students and staff, to come forward without fear of reprisals and provide a comprehensive and unfiltered account of the realities faced by Jewish students on Australian campuses.

A judicial inquiry is the only mechanism robust enough to achieve the cultural change necessary to address the status quo. It would also ensure that universities are held accountable for their failure to protect students from hate and discrimination and that appropriate measures are implemented to prevent such incidents from occurring in the future.

Conclusion

The issue of antisemitism at Australian universities is not new, but it has reached a critical point that demands immediate and decisive action. As someone deeply involved in this issue, both through StandWithUs Australia and my previous work with the New South Wales Jewish Board of Deputies, I urge the Senate to consider the severity of the situation and the need for a judicial inquiry. Only through such a process can we hope to root out the systemic antisemitism that has taken hold within our education sector and create a safer, more inclusive environment for all students.

Thank you for your consideration.

Dear Committee Secretary

Inquiry into the Commission of Inquiry into Antisemitism at Australian Universities Bill 2024 (No 2)

1. Introduction

Thank you for the opportunity to make a submission to your inquiry into the above Bill to establish a judicial inquiry into antisemitism at universities. This inquiry is a crucial first step for the Australian Jewish community in seeking accountability for the rise in antisemitic incidents and discourse on Australian university campuses, and the culture of Jew-hatred that is becoming normalised in academic settings.

The Executive Council of Australian Jewry (the ECAJ) is the peak, elected, representative body of the Australian Jewish community. It was established for that purpose in 1944 by Australian Jewish organisations and their elected leaders. The ECAJ's constituent organisations are the roof bodies of the Jewish community in each State and the ACT.[1] Other Jewish organisations which operate nationally are Affiliates of the ECAJ, and these include the Australasian Union of Jewish Students (AUJS).[2] We also have a close working relationship with the 5A group, a recently-formed organisation representing Jewish and non-Jewish academics nationally.

1 Namely, the NSW Jewish Board of Deputies, the Jewish Community Council of Victoria Inc, the Jewish Community Council of Western Australia Inc, the Queensland Jewish Board of Deputies, the Jewish Community Council of South Australia, the Hobart Hebrew Congregation and the ACT Jewish Community Inc.

2 The other national affiliates are the Union for Progressive Judaism, Australian Federation of WIZO, Maccabi Australia Inc, National Council of Jewish Women of Australia, B'nai B'rith District 21 of Australia and New Zealand, Jewish National Fund of Australia Inc, Joint Distribution Committee Australia.

Over the years, and especially in the last 12 months, the ECAJ has also been in regular dialogue with the leadership of universities across Australia in order to advocate for an educational environment that is free of racial and religious discrimination and offers all Jewish and Israeli students and academics the same opportunities to learn and to teach respectively that are offered to all other students and academics.

2. Universities: Ground Zero for Antisemitism[3]

Small activist groups operating on Australian campuses have had a long history of promoting anti-Israel discourse and behaviour which has at times escalated into hostile behaviour towards Jewish students and academic staff. Even before the events of 7 October 2023, published reports provided powerful anecdotal evidence that the level and intensity of antisemitic discourse and incidents at Australian universities has been disproportionately high compared to manifestations of racism against other communities on campus.[4] However, the intensity and frequency of reported anti-Israel and anti-Jewish incidents on campus has increased significantly since Hamas and other terrorist groups attacked Israel on 7 October 2023, videoed the atrocities they carried out against Israeli and other civilians and disseminated the videos online.

In October and November 2023 there was a 738% increase in the number of reported antisemitic incidents in Australia compared to the same two months one year earlier,[5] and dramatically elevated levels of antisemitism show every sign of continuing. It is in this context that Jewish students and academic staff at Australia's elite universities have reported that the conditions under which they work and study have become unbearable as a result of the hostility they have experienced from some of their peers, solely because they are Jews who support Israel's right to exist, or even Jews who define themselves as non-Zionists.

A study published in July 2024 found that since the appearance of the anti-Israel encampments at universities many parents and caregivers of university students reported that this cohort were frequently avoiding university campuses, opting for online classes, and spending more time with Jewish friends and youth groups while dropping some friendships with non-Jews on account of the increasingly fraught social environment.[6]

Antisemitic discourse tends to be expressed through antisemitic tropes, which are phrases or images that sometimes subtly bring to life longstanding antisemitic ideas. Such tropes include, but are not limited to:

- the Blood Libel trope, which in the modern era translates into associating the Jewish identity of a person or group with the disappearance or murder of children and other forms of 'barbarism';
- the Global domination/power trope: Jews as collective — such as, especially but not exclusively, the myth about a world Jewish conspiracy or of Jews controlling the media, economy, government or other societal institutions. This is a myth that has been propagated in many notorious antisemitic publications such as the fabricated document known as the "Protocols of the Learned Elders of Zion" and Hitler's "Mein Kampf";
- the Great Replacement Theory: the idea that Jews are working to increase the number of non-white people in society;
- the wealth/greed trope: the notion that Jews are rich and obsessed with gaining more wealth;
- the disease/filth trope: the false accusation that Jews are both diseased and spreaders of disease;
- the Holocaust denial/distortion trope; and
- the dual loyalty trope: an implied or direct accusation that Jews in the diaspora (Jews who live outside of Israel) are ultimately more loyal to Israel or a secret Jewish cabal than the country in which they have citizenship.[7]

These tropes are prevalent in the antisemitic posters, stickers and paraphernalia that have come to dominate physical spaces in campuses as well as in the discourse being propounded in lectures, tutorials, encampments, faculties and professional services buildings on university campuses. We have included some examples in Appendix 1.

It is also important to note that for the overwhelming majority of Jews, including in Australia, and for many other people, the Jewish people have an inalienable right of self-determination in their historic homeland, Israel, where the Jewish people have had an enduring spiritual, religious and physical connection for more than 3,000 years, including more than 1,000 years of national self-government. This is what most Jewish people mean by "Zionism" and this is why they support it. This right has been recognised in resolutions of the United Nations and its predecessor the League of Nations, and is grounded in the right of self-determination of peoples enshrined in the UN Charter, the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights and the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights.[8] In Australia, Israel's right to exist as the national home of the Jewish people and to defend itself against armed attack is supported by Labor and the Coalition and by Independent MPs.

To underline the centrality of Israel to Jewish identity, a significant population study of Australian Jewry[9] found that:

[8] 'Right to Self-determination', Australian Human Rights Commission, available at: Right to self determination | Australian Human Rights Commission.

[9] Gen17 Survey of the Australian Jewish community, Monash University, 2018: Graham-Markus-2018-Gen17-Initial-Findings-report-ONLINE-copy.pdf (jca.org.au)

- 92% of Australian Jews have visited Israel, more than 60% three or more times. One in five has lived in Israel for one year or longer. The majority indicate that they have relatives or close friends who live in Israel.
- 88% feel a personal 'sense of responsibility to ensure that the state of Israel continues to exist.'
- 95% feel "more concerned" when Israel is in danger than when any other country is in danger, or some higher level of alarm.

Consequently, for the vast majority of Australian Jews, denial of the basic, universal right of national self-determination to the Jewish people is self-evidently discriminatory against, and dehumanising of, Jews and is therefore a form of antisemitism.

This is not to suggest that it is antisemitic to criticise Israeli government policies or practices or the statements and conduct of Israeli political figures, in the same way that criticisms are levelled against other governments and political figures. Nor is it antisemitic to hold particular views about the borders of Israel, settlements, refugees, the legal status of Jerusalem or the viability of a two-State outcome to the Israel-Palestinian conflict. Among Israelis, the Jewish people and others who support Israel there is a wide range of views about these issues. However, the discourse about Israel on many university campuses in recent years, and especially since the Hamas atrocities on 7 October 2023, has gone well beyond discourse of this nature. As the examples detailed in this submission will demonstrate, the discourse has included:

- demonisation of Jews and Israelis and denial of their fundamental rights;
- refusals to condemn, or expressions of outright support for, atrocities that have been committed against Jews, and the perpetrators of those atrocities; and
- verbal abuse, harassment and intimidation of Jewish students and staff who refuse to accept an anti-Israel narrative, or who dare to criticise the policies and practices of Palestinian leaders and organisations.

The Director-General of ASIO, Mike Burgess, recently emphasised how dangerous inflamed language can be, especially with regard to impressionable young people who can be triggered into engaging in violent extremism. In discussing anti-Israel comments in particular, he said:

> "We all need to watch our language because there is a direct connection between inflamed language, inflamed tension and violence…Sadly we are seeing that play out in our society."[10]

In addition to allowing the development of an environment of hostile discourse, universities have at times enabled or tolerated discriminatory treatment of students and staff who identify as Jewish or Israeli. A striking example of what some Jewish students have been experiencing at one University, and the supine passivity of university administrators, was recently published online.[11]

These experiences are best related to the Committee directly by the students and staff themselves, although a number of them have told us they are unwilling to come forward in public because of a fear of reprisals against them, including students who fear hostility and public humiliation from fellow students and their teachers, and lower grades, or staff who fear that speaking out will lead to termination of their employment,[12] or imperil their prospects for career advancement, if not their physical safety. For the same reasons, Jewish students and staff have reported to us and their representative bodies that they are unwilling to report incidents of antisemitism to their respective universities, and that they lack confidence in the capacity of university administrators to understand what contemporary antisemitism is, and to act effectively against it.

There have been only rare exceptions to this backdrop of weak leadership across many Australian university campuses, which has been characterised by a failure of several universities to take a public and meaningful stand against specific manifestations of antisemitism or to hold those responsible to account. At times, some university administrations have appeared to be passively complicit in the rise of antisemitism on campus. Consequently, many Jewish students and academics have reported that they feel marginalised and dehumanised, and, in some instances, verbally abused, harassed or intimidated on campus.

Some incidents involving antisemitism at Australian universities have become so notorious that they have been publicly reported. The following are some examples.

- On 8 August 2024, at the Student General Meeting of the Student Representative Council at the University of Sydney, a near-unanimous majority of those in attendance defeated a motion to condemn the atrocities perpetrated by Hamas in Israel on 7 October 2023, and instead passed motions inter alia: supporting Hamas in its "armed resistance", in which it openly targets Israeli civilians (including Palestinian and other Arab citizens of Israel), and openly treats Palestinian civilians as expendable human shields; calling for the replacement of Israel by a so called democratic secular state; blaming Israel for all the violence in Palestine and Israel; and giving a free pass to antisemitism by resolving that resistance to Israel and opposition to Zionism, is not antisemitism.[13] Australia has designated Hamas in its entirety as a terrorist organisation under the Criminal Code. The University administration issued a statement asserting that "we do not tolerate any pro-terrorist statements or commentary, including support for Hamas".[14] However, the University had advance notice of the motions yet took no action to issue a warning or caution concerning the content of the motions ahead of the meeting. To all outward appearances, the University did indeed tolerate what it only subsequently said it would not tolerate.[15]

- On 30 July 2024, Labor MP Josh Burns' lecture on human rights at the University of Melbourne was relegated to a smaller venue but allowed to proceed despite a concerted campaign from anti-Israel students to cancel the event. The Alan Missen oration focused on the need for a national human rights act and had nothing to do with the Israel-Gaza war, but this did not stop protesters from targeting Josh Burns MP on account of his Jewish identity,[16] forcing a shrinking of the in-person event on the basis of 'security concerns'. Instead of safeguarding the security of the Jewish students and staff so that such events can take place, the university sought to adopt a path of least resistance as has been the case in many campuses across the country.

[12] This fear is not without basis as Jewish staff who have reported antisemitic incidents or discourse have, in some instances, been unlawfully punished for their reporting, but have chosen not to publicise their cases.

- In 2024 a Macquarie University academic publicly declared on social media: "If you are a Zionist you have no claim or right to cultural safety"… "And it is my duty…to deny you a safe space to espouse your [views]". The posts were reported in the media[17] and would have been accessible to Macquarie University students and staff, before the posts were deleted.

  A month earlier, it had been reported that the same academic had been a "collaborator" in disseminating an Instagram post to a large following with a link to documents that doxed Jewish creatives[18] by sharing their personal data.

- In late April 2024, the same academic appeared at the University of Sydney's "pro-Palestine" encampment as a speaker at a "kids excursion" organised by the activist group Parents for Palestine where primary school-aged children led each other in chants, including "Israel is haram"[19], "intifada, intifada" and "from the river to the sea, Palestine will be free", a phrase widely accepted as calling for the elimination of the State of Israel and therefore antisemitic.[20] The University did nothing to intervene.[21] Despite the fact that the Palestinian intifadas in the late 1980s and early 2000s involved widespread violence and acts of terrorism which cost thousands of lives, a document from the Office of the Deputy Vice-Chancellor's Student Affairs unit, revealed that the university had deemed the word 'intifada' to be "an expression of a political stance in connection with 19 In Arabic, "haram" means forbidden by Islamic law.

20 The slogan is considered to be antisemitic by most Jews, not because of its call for "freedom", but because it redefines the entire territory of Israel as "Palestine", and is thus a coded call for Israel to be "obliterated", to use the explicit language in the opening section of the Hamas Covenant: The Avalon Project : Hamas Covenant 1988 (yale.edu). Former Defence Department Secretary Dennis Richardson called the slogan "a very violent statement" which could "easily flow into actions of violence against communities in our own country". This view was recently endorsed by the Australian Senate: Senate Hansard, 16 May 2024, p.40: https://parlinfo.aph.gov.au/parlInfo/download/chamber/hansards/27625/toc_pdf/Senate_2024_05_16.pdf;fileType=application%2Fpdf

There is no place for hate in our universities or anywhere else and it's never okay to involve kids in things like this. I have made it clear to all university vice chancellors that there is nothing more important than the safety of students and staff on campus*".[24]

- In May 2024, Sydney University sociology professor Sujatha Fernandes told a lecture hall of first year students that the October 7 rape atrocities committed by Hamas in southern Israel were a "hoax" and "fake news".[25] As of 20 August 2024, a complaint made by the ECAJ to Workplace Relations at the University of Sydney on 30 May 2024 with regard to this incident had yet to be properly concluded, and we are advised that a "preliminary investigation" remains underway despite the incident having been recorded.

- A counter-protest to the "pro-Palestine" encampment at ANU on 29 April 2024 which involved the singing of the Australian and Israeli anthems was met with statements that included "death to the Jews", "Heil Hitler" and "Jewish rats" from the encampment. The encampment crafted painted posters that included slogans such as "Intifada, Intifada"[26].

- On 6 February 2024, when new students were arriving at ANU for the first time, ANU's student union ANUSA disseminated welcome packages including anti-Israel material for first-year students, which included a call to join the protest starting on 29 February 2024. ANUSA also promoted offensive slogans such as "from the river to the sea Palestine will be free[27]" during Market Day. The University's failure to address parents' concerns and the Jewish community's pleas for safety highlighted a lack of support and recognition of the severity of antisemitism on campus.

The resolution endorsed a statement made by the Prime Minister that "it is a slogan that calls for opposition to a two-state solution", and that "those people chanting, they're saying that one state should be Palestine": https://www.aph.gov.au/Parliamentary_Business/Hansard/Hansard_Display?bid=chamber/hansards/27625/&sid=0000

- In the Australian Senate on 13 August 2024, Senator Jonathon Duniam raised the matter of a lecturer in food science from the University of Tasmania having participated on 26 June 2024 in an event in Hobart in which the lecturer presented a slideshow to 'educators for Palestine' and 'educators for peace' that claimed, among other things, that there were various 'misconceptions' about Israel, including that Israel has the right to exist, and that Hamas is a terrorist organisation. The University of Tasmania has defended the academic on the basis that he was exercising free speech, without acknowledging that his speech included support for a proscribed terrorist organisation, denial of the Jewish people to the right of collective self-determination and other forms of hate speech.[28]

- Australian campuses have been covered in stickers and posters from the various 'free Palestine' movements, with many of these materials coming from Free Palestine Printing (examples appear in Appendix 1). The posters and stickers have included slogans that are a call to violence against Jewish or Israeli students such as 'by any means necessary' and 'if I don't steal it' which borrows on a common antisemitic trope.[29] With some exceptions, these stickers and posters are not removed by campus staff unless there are repeated complaints by Jewish staff.

- After months of occupation of university grounds, which limited freedom of movement and impinged on the wellbeing of Jewish and Israeli students and academics, the University of Sydney capitulated to the Sydney University Muslim Student Association (SUMSA) by endorsing their political demands. The University entered into an agreement with a group acting in concert with the extremist Hizb ut-Tahrir organisation to participate in a working group to review the University's investments and defence and security-related research activities. No other university in Australia, or to our knowledge overseas, has gone this far.[30] This was despite a journalistic investigation having uncovered the link between SUMSA, Stand 4 Palestine and Hizb ut-Tahrir – an organisation that is banned from operating in the United Kingdom, Germany, Russia, most of the Middle East, central Asia and parts of South Asia because of its terrorist designation.[31] Jewish leaders had advised Vice Chancellor Mark Scott as early as May that the group had infiltrated the pro-Palestinian encampment.[32]

Underlying these incidents is a University culture that has developed over a much longer period, and is characterised by:

- the holding of events on campus to discuss the Israel-Gaza conflict which have rigidly excluded the views of the majority of Jewish students and staff;[33] and
- the promotion of anti-Israel speakers from the political far fringes of the Jewish community in order to create a false impression of prevailing Jewish opposition to Israel and Zionism, and to overcome accusations of antisemitism stemming from the denial of a voice to the majority of Jewish students and staff.

Instances of the above are too numerous to list but some examples that have occurred since 7 October 2023 are as follows:

- The University of Adelaide hosted the Edward Said Memorial Lecture on 11 November 2023 which was promoted by the Australian Friends of Palestine Association (APAN) and which featured (the notoriously anti-Israel) UN Special Rapporteur on the Situation of Human Rights in the Palestinian Territories, Francesca Albanese. In a later Instagram post by APAN President Nasser Mashni published on 8 August 2024 Mr Mashni clearly advocated for the annihilation of Israel, stating "we need to stop talking about the peace process and a two-state solution and start talking about the decolonization process".[34]

- UNSW hosted UN Special Rapporteur Albanese for an event on 13 November titled 'A multi-layered architecture of confinement: Human rights, carcerality and Palestinian children'.[35] Dr. Noam Peleg was the academic in discussion with Ms Albanese, presenting the event as though it was a balanced and open-minded discussion (given Dr Peleg is Israeli). The discussion comprised numerous unsubstantiated allegations and Israel was accused of committing genocide despite the International Court of Justice not having reached any determination or even commenced its trial.[36] Ms. Albanese's visit to Australia has been referred for investigation to the High Commissioner from the Office of Internal Oversight Services[37] on the basis that it is unclear who paid for the visit and why.[38]

[33] Both these events and the encampments have adopted a deliberate strategy of non-engagement and refusal to debate Jews, Israelis or others who support the right of the State of Israel to exist, which is antithetical to the values of free speech and debate. Yet often it is the university management and staff who defend such events, the expressions of protesters in the encampments, and antisemitic paraphernalia around campuses, claiming that it is on the basis of free speech and academic freedom. Similarly, there have been numerous instances of professors and lecturers making biased and/or antisemitic or anti-Israel assertions but refusing to engage with any student challenging these in class.

- Gaza and International Law, Law and Society Association of Australia and New Zealand (LSAANZ)), hosted by the University of Technology Sydney (UTS) on 6 December 2023, included a panel discussion at which Dr. Noam Peleg was again featured, this time alongside [redacted] Palestinian activist and Lecturer in Development at the School of Social Sciences, Lana Tatour, and Scientia Associate Professor of Philosophy with a cross-appointment to the Faculty of Law, Jessica Whyte. In this instance the panel appeared to attendees to be 'balanced' because it comprised an Israeli academic, a Palestinian academic, and a 'neutral' academic, when in fact all three panellists were well known to each other and have previously alleged that Israel is deliberately targeting civilians and that it is committing genocide.[39]

- The UN Special Rapporteur on the Right to Food: The food crisis and starvation in Gaza, held at UNSW Sydney on 10 April 2024[40]. This event took the form of a discussion between Professor Michael Fakhri, UN Special Rapporteur on the Right to Food and Dr. Noam Peleg, Senior Lecturer and Director – Equity, Diversity and Inclusion at the Faculty of Law and Justice. The event made assertions about Israel deliberately starving Gazans that was not borne out by the data available on the UNWRA website for Gaza Supplies and Dispatch Tracking[41] or the Integrated Food Security Phase Classification Famine Review Committee, with the latter stating in its June 2024 report 'In this context, the available evidence does not indicate that Famine is currently occurring'.[42]

- 'Cultivating an anti-racist campus culture', was an event hosted by UTS on 12th August 2024, which featured Giridharan Sivaraman, Australia's Race Discrimination Commissioner, as the lead speaker on a panel. There was no Jewish speaker but the panel featured a Palestinian speaker Salma Elmubasher who, despite her verbal efforts in her address to promote cultural safety on campus, was pictured in promotional material wearing a "River to the Sea" necklace of a map of "Palestine" shown as subsuming the whole of Israel,[43] which impliedly called for its eradication regardless of the consequences for its majority Jewish population. This panel event omitted any mention of the significant increase in reported antisemitic incidents since the October 7 atrocities. The panel defined structural racism solely as a legacy of colonialism and in terms of "white power", with only Black, Asian and minority ethnic (BAME) victims. This understanding of racism is outdated and discredited,[44] and it precludes the classification of most traditional and contemporary forms of antisemitism as racism. This deficiency was highlighted in the first question put to the panellists which consisted of little more than a "Gish gallop" of crude polemics about alleged Israeli "apartheid, occupation, genocide and land theft". The event organisers had the opportunity to review the questions beforehand and elected to begin with a question that was inflammatory and dehumanising. The Race Discrimination Commissioner responded without challenging or even commenting upon the premise of the question. Any Jewish Israeli students or academics in the audience were thus branded as perpetrators of racism, regardless of their individual views and actions.

- 'Silence in the Library: Talking censorship and prejudice in our institutions', hosted by RMIT on Tuesday 13th August, featuring anti-Israel speakers some of whom have engaged in antisemitic discourse and/or have been involved in the doxing of Jewish creatives. One of the speakers is an Executive Member of APAN. The President has called for the annihilation of the State of Israel.[45]

The obsessive and constant polemicisation against Israel stands in stark contrast to the much lower profile of awareness-raising events on campuses for other alleged human rights abuses taking place globally. The singling out of the world's only majority Jewish state for demonisation, and of its people and supporters for dehumanisation, is a recurring theme of antisemitic discourse.[46] Since October 2023, it appears that none of the major Australian universities has hosted a single awareness-raising event about, for example, the far larger scale of alleged human rights abuses taking place in Sudan, even though the violence in Sudan has been the subject of numerous public statements by the United Nations Special Adviser on the Prevention of Genocide, Alice Wairimu Nderitu. The size of the Sudanese community in Australia was estimated to be 17,000 in 2016,[47] while the Palestinian community in Australia was estimated to number about 20,000 by some Palestinian advocacy groups,[48] and was recorded as 2,959 in the 2021 census, with approximately 13,000 people being of Palestinian ancestry.[49] Since the October 7 atrocities, the number of events held at the major Australian university campuses on all other international conflicts combined, pales by comparison to the number of events focused on the Israel-Gaza conflict or connected topics.[50] The disparity is stark between the focus on Israel and Gaza in events on campuses across the country compared to events examining other wars and events that have major humanitarian ramifications. While the loss of human life in Israel and Gaza is a catastrophe, it is notable that other conflicts with larger civilian death tolls[51] have evoked nothing like the same scale of responses on Australian university campuses.

These and many other developments across Australian university campuses have created a culture of normalisation of antisemitic discourse and incidents, and an environment that is threatening, abusive and dehumanising for Jewish and Israeli students and academics. As a result, many have reported that they have concealed any expressions or outward indications of their identity; significant absences from their courses on account of concerns about antisemitic threats or encounters on campus; a decline in their mental health resulting in the need for medical intervention; the adoption of self-censorship measures in their coursework or in their online interactions associated with the university; the observance of antisemitic social media posts by lecturers or fellow students; behaviours that include antisemitic slurs, vandalising of the entrance to dorm rooms or buildings, Nazi salutes and spitting from others on campus on account of their Jewish or Israeli identity; and being on the receiving end of less favourable treatment than other students on account of their identity.

3. The Australian Human Rights Commission (AHRC) study of racism as an alternative to a judicial inquiry

The government has announced that the Race Discrimination Commissioner, Giridharan Sivaraman, will conduct a study into, and prepare a Report on, the prevalence and impact of antisemitism, Islamophobia, the experience of First Nations peoples and racism at universities. This is in accordance with a recommendation of the Universities Accord.

Whilst the ECAJ appreciates the government's acknowledgement of the seriousness of the problem of racism at universities, including antisemitism, we strongly disagree that the AHRC is the appropriate body at the present time to conduct a study into antisemitism at universities. We say this with great sadness having regard to the historically strong relationship which the ECAJ has had with the AHRC.

The reasons for our concerns in summary are fourfold.

(i) The terms of the government's announcement and the AHRC's public statement, indicate that antisemitism will not be a strong focus of the AHRC study.
(ii) The AHRC's record of public statements and action in the face of the unprecedented surge of antisemitism that has occurred in Australia, especially since 7 October 2023, has been conspicuously deficient.
(iii) Particular personnel engaged or promoted by the AHRC have themselves been involved in antisemitic conduct.
(iv) The AHRC as an A-status national human rights institution is required to meet certain international accreditation requirements and its recent retention of its A-status was dependent on the assessment of a group chaired by a representative of 'Palestine'.

We are concerned that these factors are likely to have created a perception of actual or apprehended bias that will discourage members of the Jewish community who have been impacted by antisemitism from coming forward or participating in the study, and may skew the study's perceptions, analysis, findings and recommendations. Such factors may also lead the AHRC to select a Reference Group that fails to reflect and articulate the concerns and lived experiences of the mainstream Jewish community. We elaborate below on each of these four reasons.

[51] See for example: Ukraine: civilian casualty update 24 September 2023 | OHCHR; Presentation of the report on civilian deaths in the Syrian Arab Republic | OHCHR;

(i) The terms of the government's announcement and the AHRC's public statement

The original subject of the proposed study and Report, as shaped by the Universities Accord (Recommendation 33), was 'Conduct a survey into the prevalence and impact of racism across the tertiary education system': Australian Universities Accord Final Report – Summary Report - Department of Education, Australian Government. A specific study of antisemitism at universities was not originally contemplated, but in a letter from Minister Jason Clare to the ECAJ on 17 May 2024 he noted that 'concerns raised by Jewish students and staff at universities over recent weeks and months' was the catalyst for expanding the study's focus. The study of campus antisemitism was thus not contemplated in the original design of the study, but added only as an after-thought.

Indeed, the Race Discrimination Commissioner was quoted in the AHRC's public statement on 15 May 2024, as follows:

> "Our research will be centred on people's lived experiences, with a strong focus on First Nations students and staff."[52]

We fully understand the AHRC's prioritisation of First Nations concerns. It recognises the reality that the nature of racism and racism-related issues differ markedly between the different communities which are affected. This makes it all the more necessary to address the specific forms of racism faced by each community individually, and to devise a bespoke strategy in each case. It is not possible to address one form of racism by tacking it onto a study which is designed to have a strong focus on another. The racism that affects First Nations communities is fundamentally different in many ways to the contemporary forms of antisemitism being experienced by the Australian Jewish community. Both are of the utmost seriousness, but for completely different reasons. First Nations communities and the Jewish community each deserve to have their own dedicated study of the respective forms of racism they are currently experiencing, including at Australian universities.

As noted earlier in this submission, the number of reports of antisemitic activity and incidents at universities has reached an unprecedentedly high level. This makes it inappropriate in our view to subsume the issue of campus antisemitism within a generic study of racism at universities.

(ii) The AHRC's record of public statements and action concerning antisemitism

The AHRC has in recent times downplayed the seriousness of antisemitism as a source of racism in Australia, or ignored it altogether. A prime example of this can be found in the Concept Paper for the development of a National Anti-Racism Framework published by the AHRC in 2021.[53] Parts of the Concept Paper noted that racism in Australia is directed specifically at First Nations

Australians, Australians of Asian background, Australians of Muslim background and Australians of Sudanese background,[54] but failed altogether to acknowledge or even mention the prevalence of antisemitism. This was despite the fact that the Annual Report on Antisemitism in Australia has been published by the Executive Council of Australian Jewry each year since 1989. It is widely referenced and reported on in the media. A copy has been supplied to the AHRC each year, and it is freely accessible online.

Even in the wake of the massive surge in reported antisemitic incidents that followed the events of 7 October 2023, the AHRC has had little to say about the phenomenon. In the rare statements from the AHRC which have mentioned antisemitism, it is not referred to as a form of racism with its own unique particularities, but is instead grouped together in a formulaic way with other forms of racism such as Islamophobia and anti-Palestinian racism.[55] At no stage has the AHRC acknowledged that there has been a disproportionate rise in antisemitic incidents and discourse in recent years (both in quantum and ferocity), compared with data for other types of racist incidents and discourse.[56]

In our view it is a serious error to treat 'racism' as a generic problem, and to fail to address specific forms of racism directed at specific communities in Australia. Studies that focus on understanding and combatting racism generally, and building social cohesion as a general aim, are unlikely to be successful in addressing and counteracting the stark variety of causes of specific forms of racism that target particular communities.

There are other examples of the inadequacy of the AHRC's approach to understanding antisemitism. The AHRC website fails altogether to define the term antisemitism.[57] As Australia's national human rights institution (NHRI) which is tasked with investigating complaints about discrimination and vilification, this is a glaring omission, particularly given that the Australian government adopted the International Holocaust Remembrance Alliance (IHRA) Working Definition of Antisemitism in 2021,[58] as did the then Labor opposition.[59] The position taken by some that the adoption of IHRA Working Definition of Antisemitism may discourage 58 The internationally-accepted definition of antisemitism is set out by the International Holocaust Remembrance Alliance at: https://holocaustremembrance.com/resources/working-definition-antisemitism. This is the only definition of antisemitism for which there is widespread international consensus from Jewish communities. This definition has also been accepted by the Australian Government and therefore ought to be reflected in any AHRC publications.

59 See statement by then Opposition leader Anthony Albanese to Executive Council of Australian Jewry on 14 July 2021: » ECAJ hosts meeting between Federal Opposition leader Anthony Albanese and national Jewish community leadership and statement of the shadow Minister for Foreign Affairs Senator Penny Wong at Zionist Federation of Australia conference, 22 November 2020: https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=exaC2wvaZCQ, people from reporting racism is unsubstantiated. The IHRA Definition recognises that "denying the Jewish people their right to self-determination, e.g., by claiming that the existence of a State of Israel is a racist endeavor" can, "taking into account the overall context", amount to antisemitism. It should be obvious that this formulation does not automatically characterise as antisemitic any criticism of Israeli laws and policies, whether on the grounds of alleged racism or otherwise. Under the IHRA Definition, criticism of Israel can only be characterised as antisemitic if the criticism amounts to a denial of the collective right of the Jewish people to self-determination, which is a basic right of all peoples. As previously noted, this denial is anathema to virtually all Jews, in Australia and globally, because it is discriminatory and dehumanising. The effect of propagating this fallacy concerning the IHRA Definition, is to give social license to precisely this form of antisemitism, and thereby to lend legitimacy to groups which are opposed to Israel's very existence on any terms as the national home of the Jewish people.

A related example is the AHRC's 'Racism. It Stops With Me' campaign[60] which has a web-page that provides links to definitions of racism and directs website users to an extensive set of resources or 'Resource Hub'.[61] The Resource Hub features prominently an 'Anti-Palestine Racism in Schools Register' (with no equivalent antisemitism register) which links to the Australia Palestine Advocacy Network (APAN),[62] an openly anti-Israel group, which promotes a view of antisemitism that is transparently aimed at serving extraneous political purposes at the expense of a good faith analysis of the phenomenon. One of the tabs on the APAN website is misleadingly labelled 'antisemitism', and purports to define the term[63] in a manner that is completely at odds with the views and lived experiences of the overwhelming majority of people in the Jewish community.[64] It is the equivalent of referencing a definition of Islamophobia devised by a group opposed in principle to Palestinian statehood or the very idea of Palestinian peoplehood. It is also contrary to the approach that the AHRC takes with respect to giving a voice to other protected groups in self-determining what constitutes racism against them.

The Resource Hub on the AHRC's 'Racism. It Stops With Me' campaign, also has had links to two organisations which hold themselves out as providing anti-racism training: Hue Consulting Pty Ltd; and Democracy in Colour. A search for resources on antisemitism on the website of Hue Consulting leads to the Facebook page of 'Jews Against Fascism', which propagates an antisemitic narrative of Jews.[65] Democracy in Colour promotes the 'Free Palestine' campaign through its

The fact that the AHRC has included a 'disclaimer' stating that 'the hub aims to reflect a diversity of views and approaches, tailored for diverse audiences, and is not an exhaustive list' is inadequate because it is channelling the public to these resources, which present a distorted perspective on antisemitism.

65 As an example of Jews Against Fascism's perspective, the organisation's Facebook post for Yom Hashoah states that 'for 'Israeli' settlers on occupied Palestinian land, and their zionist supporters, Holocaust remembrance day is disturbingly contorted into a vile narrative that attempts to justify the ethnic cleansing of Palestinians by wrongly social media in a way that is exclusionary and makes no mention of the rise in antisemitism.[66] A key spokesperson for the 'Racism. It Stops With Me' campaign is footballer Craig Foster, who recently advocated for the suspension of the Israel Football Association from FIFA on the basis of his own uninformed and totally erroneous rendering of a recent judgment of the International Court of Justice.[67]

In short, the AHRC's website further promotes division and exacerbates antisemitism by directing users to fringe sites and other places that cultivate false and negative perceptions of Jews. The AHRC website provides no resources or links concerning antisemitism that have broad-based credibility within the Jewish community, or among academics with widely recognised expertise on the subject.[68]

The AHRC's record in recent times also points to an organisation that has lost control of its messaging on racism. An email circular[69] disseminated under the AHRC's 'Racism. It Stops With Me' campaign on 17 November 2023 in the aftermath of the October 7 atrocity crimes carried out by Hamas terrorists in Israel, fails to acknowledge Jews in the community, the trauma they are suffering or the rise in antisemitic incidents. It instead refers to 'genocide' in Gaza, despite the International Court of Justice not having made any determination (then or since) that genocide has occurred.[70] The single resource provided in the email circular that could even ostensibly be of any specific relevance to Jews is described as 'anti-Zionist' – which for most Jews is itself a descent into polemics and demonisation and adds to the trauma they are experiencing in the wake of the Hamas massacre last year. The list of support services linked to in the email circular[71] included a list of specialist organisations to which one can register or report racism, including Islamophobia and First Nations racism, but it said nothing about how to report antisemitic incidents. We understand that the circular was issued without the authority of the AHRC President, who responded to 66 Democracy in Colour's X-feed: (20) Democracy in Colour (@democracycolour) / X also includes re-postings of tweets by an AHRC legal and research officer who promotes a narrative that the Jewish community views as antisemitic. The feed includes pictures of a pro-Palestine rally at the Opera House on 9 October – some days prior to Israel commencing military action in Gaza – in which protestors burnt the Israeli flag and chanted "F*ck the Jews", and other disputed wording which the NSW Police have determined was "where's the Jews?" . This rally was traumatising to Australia's Jewish community, and the AHRC should not be promoting organisations in the anti-racism space that endorse such events.

the ECAJ's concerns about it by taking down the circular and all related social media posts from the AHRC website. However, despite follow-up correspondence from the ECAJ to the AHRC on 17, 20 and 21 November 2023, the circular remains accessible at its original URL[72]. The AHRC issued an apology in a subsequent communication to its database. However, the apology did not address the specific issues raised by the ECAJ in the correspondence, and instead obliquely stated "some community members felt harmed by the fact that we did not explicitly point out alarming increases in antisemitism and Islamophobia."[73] The fact that the email circular of 17 November was issued in the first place and its URL is still functioning indicate a mindset among the AHRC staff who were responsible for preparing and disseminating the circular, which is utterly lacking in sensitivity towards and any awareness of the contemporary reality of antisemitism. We expect that the AHRC's record of public statements and action concerning antisemitism will necessarily mean that those impacted by antisemitism at universities will not feel comfortable to participate in an AHRC led study.

Finally, the appearance of the Race Discrimination Commissioner at the 'Cultivating an anti-racist campus culture' event, hosted by the UTS on 12 August 2024, as referred to earlier in this submission, raises a further concern that there is a preconception within the AHRC that antisemitism is not properly understood and is a less significant form of racism, if it can be considered racism at all.

(iii) Concerns relating to particular persons engaged by the AHRC

In addition to the mindset among some AHRC staff referred to in the previous section, the AHRC also engages or has engaged particular individuals who have exacerbated the poor handling of these issues and in some instances engaged in racial vilification.

- A Legal and Research Officer to the President of the AHRC[74] has posted racist and inflammatory statements on social media.[75] For instance, that individual has publicly endorsed Hamas and in April 2024 they asked a rhetorical question on social media about what would be left of Jews as a people without "their violence, their toxicity, their racism?"[76] They have also sought to justify atrocities committed by Hamas and other terrorists as "legitimate" "resistance".[77] The individual was formerly an employee of the Australia Palestine Advocacy Network – which itself has expressed antisemitic views and endorsed Hamas[78] - and has also made the false and inflammatory claim — among other things — that "Israel is connected to the oppression of Indigenous people worldwide".[79] In posted comments on social media this individual has also expressed their hatred of Australia, claiming it is a "settler colonial project".[80] They put forward this perspective while occupying a senior legal role at Australia's NHRI. This individual's actions have contributed to a sense of distrust within the Jewish community towards the AHRC.

- The AHRC engaged 'Hue: Colour the Conversation', as a contractor for the "Racism: It stops with me" campaign.[81] (see section (ii) above). There has been a reported link between personnel at Hue and the leaking of personal details of Jewish creatives from a WhatsApp group, which had led to Prime Minister Albanese moving to ban this online form of harassment (known as 'doxing').[82] We raised this link to doxing in our correspondence with the AHRC on 18 March 2024. It was only during Senate Estimates hearings on 31 May 2024 that the Commission made public the fact that it had varied Hue's contract to bring forward its end date.[83]

- There is also the case of an individual who received an Order of Australia Medal for advocating against violence towards women, but who posted a tweet in late 2023 (subsequently deleted), in which they appear to have dismissed widespread reports that Jewish women in Israel were raped by Hamas terrorists during and after the October 7 attacks. We have obtained screenshots of past racist content posted by that individual which are now no longer publicly accessible beyond their social networks. This individual was featured prominently by the AHRC as a 'Racism. It Stops With Me' Ambassador, and was only asked to temporarily step back from duties following an outcry by various members of the Jewish community.[84] As far as the ECAJ is aware they have not been dismissed and an investigation is still pending.

- Finally, a brief search of the social media activity (that remains on view to the public), of certain senior AHRC staff[85]/[87] shows that they have used their status within the AHRC to promote a selectively distorted and disproportionate representation of the Israel Gaza conflict, which exacerbates untruths such as the assertion that Israel is committing "plausible genocide".[86] We submit that such conduct is entirely inappropriate, and contradicts the principle put forward by the AHRC President at the Senate Estimates hearing on 31 May 2024 that the AHRC's focus is domestic: "The commission's approach has been to acknowledge the crisis that has arisen, to speak about the mandate that we have within Australia which is to focus upon the impacts of that crisis on our people here, the rise in antisemitism, the rise in anti-Palestinian and anti-Arab attacks, Islamophobia, our mandate under the Race Discrimination Act in particular is focussed very clearly on Australian communities."[87]

The AHRC's engagement of people with a virulent public record of hostility towards Israel and the very concept of Jewish statehood is bound to impact adversely on the working environment of Jewish and other staff at the AHRC, who may have a contrary viewpoint, and have a chilling effect on their freedom to express their views at work. It will necessarily undermine the confidence of potential Jewish witnesses in the fairness and integrity of the AHRC Study, and in maintaining the effectiveness of its systems for protecting confidentiality so as to ensure that the identity of Jewish witnesses is not publicly disclosed when non-disclosure is requested.

(iv) Concerns relating to international accreditation requirements

The AHRC recently underwent an international peer review process in which it had to satisfy the Global Alliance of National Human Rights Institutions (GANHRI) that it was compliant with internationally recognised standards set out in the UN Principles on National Institutions (commonly known as the Paris Principles).[88] This process ran for 18 months until late October 2023. The continuation of the 'A-status' of the AHRC with GANHRI was at stake.[89] GANHRI's Sub-Committee on Accreditation (SCA) was responsible for determining whether the AHRC had complied with the Paris Principles. The SCA comprises one national human rights institution (NHRI) from each of the four regional groupings. During the period in question the SCA comprised the NHRIs from "Palestine" for Asia-Pacific (Chair), South Africa for Africa, Greece as the acting member for Europe, and Honduras for the Americas.[90] The AHRC also depended on the backing of the Asia Pacific Forum (APF), the regional body representing a grouping of 26 national human rights institutions, which also comprised the Independent Commission for Human Rights (Palestine) (ICHRP).

90 GANHRI Sub-Committee on Accreditation Report – September & October 2023, SCA-Report-Second-Session-2023-EN.pdf (ganhri.org)

The Hamas massacre took place prior to the SCA's announcement that it would be renewing the AHRC's accreditation. In this period the AHRC was surprisingly silent with respect to the massacre and the rise in antisemitism in Australia. When it finally issued a statement on 13th October, the AHRC made no mention of the massacre or the hostages taken by the proscribed terrorist organisation Hamas. It referred obliquely to "the devastating conflict in Israel and Gaza" – even though Israel's military operation only commenced on the day of the statement and most likely after the statement was released (given the time difference) - and stated that "racist statements from anyone are unacceptable".[91] The AHRC was at least disingenuous in portraying the issue as one of general racism, and in completely ignoring the terror and suffering unleashed in Israel and the implications for the Australian Jewish community.

It is entirely conceivable that the AHRC did not wish to alienate either the NHRIs for Palestine or South Africa[92] by making a statement that acknowledged the brutality of the massacre and the domestic repercussions for Jews. The same can be said regarding the AHRC's need to keep the APF on side, especially given the prolific and skewed anti-Israel social media postings of some of its core staff.[93] One cannot underestimate the subtle and not-so-subtle creeping effect on the AHRC's culture as a result of it knowing its A-status ultimately turned on it persuading the SCA, chaired by the Independent Commission for Human Rights (Palestine) (ICHRP), of its compliance. The ICHRP can hardly be said to be a balanced and independent NHRI. Its 2022 Summary on the Status of Human Rights in Palestine[94] mentions Hamas just once, and most of the content on its website is focused on 'Israeli occupation'. Although the advent of war in Gaza meant that the ICHRP was unable to be present at the SCA meeting which ultimately decided to renew the AHRC's A-status, it is reasonable to infer that as a key decision-maker in this process over an extended time, there may have been pressures on the AHRC to win the confidence of the ICHRP, with flow-on implications as to how the AHRC has addressed the Israel-Gaza conflict and antisemitism.

We maintain that a judicial inquiry into antisemitism on university campuses in Australia is the only effective way to establish the truth about the nature and extent of antisemitic incidents and discourse at universities across Australia while preserving the confidentiality of Jewish students', academics' and professional staff's personal data and protecting their security.

A judicial inquiry would have far stronger powers than the AHRC. Its powers would be virtually identical to those of a Royal Commission under the Royal Commissions Act 1902, including powers to:

- compel witnesses to appear and give evidence under oath or affirmation, even if the evidence is self-incriminating.
- compel documents to be produced.
- take sworn rather than anecdotal evidence.
- control hostile witnesses who try to grandstand for political purposes in the same way as in a courtroom.
- guarantee anonymity and confidentiality to witnesses if they seek it.

The ECAJ believes that a judicial inquiry would be a crucial first step in addressing what has become a systemic issue at many universities in Australia, and which has and will continue to have significant deleterious impacts upon Jewish students and academics if left unchecked, as well as for democracy, freedom of speech, freedom of religion, freedom from discrimination and the fostering of an academic environment that is conducive to critical, innovative and independent thinking, rather than a stultifying uniformity and group-think.

Each of the concerns we have detailed in this submission, separately or cumulatively support our position favouring a judicial inquiry and our complete lack of confidence in the AHRC as the appropriate body at the present time to conduct a study into antisemitism at universities.

We would also be happy to discuss the contents of this submission and provide further supporting information should this be of assistance.

Yours sincerely

Dear Senators,

Subject: Commission of Inquiry into Antisemitism at Australian Universities Bill

I write in my capacity as President of the ACT Jewish Community. We are a diverse and vibrant community based in Canberra, with a strong Jewish identity. Our community includes Holocaust survivors and descendants of Holocaust survivors who have made their home in Australia. It also includes many students and academics at universities in Canberra.

Our community has been deeply affected by the events of 7 October and by the explosion of antisemitism in Australia in the aftermath. As President, I have noticed that Jewish students and academics have been particularly distressed as a result of the ongoing antisemitism on university campuses, most notably ANU.

Jewish students and staff have described many distressing incidents of antisemitism at ANU. This includes antisemitic incidents associated with pro-Palestinian protests and the pro-Palestinian encampment at ANU. Many were deeply distressed by a member of the encampment declaring 'Hamas deserves our unconditional support' during a radio interview on the ABC, for example.

Staff and students have also expressed great distress at the constant display of antisemitic posters/banners/stickers on campus at ANU, displaying comments such as 'From the River to the Sea, Palestine will be free' (a call for the destruction of Israel, the world's only Jewish state), 'Zionism is terrorism' (Zionism being the movement for the self-determination of Jewish People), stickers associating Judaism with stealing and stickers with a big red cancel symbol through the Star of David, the symbol of Judaism. Staff and students have reported regular 'pro-Palestinian' protests at ANU, at which there have been calls for 'intifada' (violent uprising targeting Israeli and Jewish civilians), October 7 denial, and October 7 conspiracy theories. As I have personally witnessed, pro-Palestinian demonstrations have taken place in the centre of campus, using loudspeakers and chants, and Jewish staff and students have been unable to avoid exposure to these events.

JCA today tomorrow forever
The ACT Jewish Community is a member of the JCA family of organisations.

Staff and students have also reported their distress at ANU's initial lack of response to antisemitism on campus. Students from the Australian Union of Jewish Students were unable to get a meeting with ANU's Vice Chancellor for months, despite repeated requests to meet with her to discuss the proliferation of antisemitism on campus. Even when they did eventually get a meeting, their request for a public statement from the ANU Executive condemning antisemitism was denied. This is distressing in the middle of an explosion of antisemitism on campus. Furthermore, students who expressed their distress at antisemitism on campus have been referred to ANUSA (ANU Student Association) for support. Given ANUSA's participation in the encampment and its promotion, including from the ANUSA President, this has caused further distress and disenchantment. Any toleration of hate speech on campus and failure to robustly condemn antisemitism is a failure of a University's duty of care to Jewish and Israeli students and staff. That said, I want to acknowledge that, over the last few months, the Deputy Vice Chancellor at ANU has met with Jewish students and Jewish academics. I believe this is expected to continue so that the staff and students can share their ongoing experiences with the DVC.

As President of the ACT Jewish Community, I wish to conclude by expressing my strong support for a Judicial Inquiry into antisemitism at Australian universities. There is no place for toleration of antisemitism at Australian universities. A judicial inquiry offers a vital opportunity to investigate this issue and ensure a better path going forward.

Yours sincerely,

Athol Morris

Zionist Federation of Australia submission to the Senate Standing Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs' review of the Commission of Inquiry into Antisemitism at Australian Universities Bill 2024 (No. 2)

Jeremy Leibler, President, Zionist Federation of Australia
Alon Cassuto, CEO, Zionist Federation of Australia

Summary of recommendations

1. Passage of the Bill: The ZFA recommends that the Senate Committee endorse the bill to establish a commission of inquiry into antisemitism at Australian universities.
2. Powers: The commission of inquiry must have the authority to compel witnesses to appear and testify under oath to ensure comprehensive and honest testimonies, such as in a judicial inquiry.
3. Adoption of a suite of 'best practice' measures: The Commission of Inquiry can determine and provide a suite of "best practice measures" all universities should be encouraged to adopt.

1. Introduction

The Zionist Federation of Australia (ZFA) welcomes the opportunity to make a submission to the Senate's Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee regarding the establishment of a commission of inquiry into antisemitism on Australian university campuses. The ZFA is an elected, representative roof body of the Australian Jewish community.

In our view, a commission of inquiry into antisemitism is necessary.

There has been a worrying increase in on-campus antisemitism over the last few years. This was brought to the attention of universities. However, the policy response by universities before 7 October was inadequate. Universities typically relied on the existence of supposedly strong anti-racism policies and denied that significant levels of antisemitism existed on their campuses.

The situation has considerably worsened following 7 October, with activism against Israel or its policies often expressing itself in discrimination against or the vilification of Jews. In the face of flagrant intimidation of Jews, many universities did not act, pointing to arguments of 'free speech' or 'academic freedom' that are not acceptable in respect to the vilification of any racial, religious, national, gender or sexual minority group. There has been no meaningful policy pivot implemented by universities in the face of this intimidation. Indeed, some universities have adopted policies designed to appease the groups that are vilifying and intimidating Jewish students.

An important part of the solution must be bringing to light these issues so that there can be an appropriate policy response. This requires an inquiry with the authority to compel witnesses, and the ability to interrogate university policy.

The Australian Human Rights Commission is conducting a study into racism at universities. The Jewish community is not relying on this study to generate solutions because its terms of reference are too broad, the AHRC doesn't have the power to compel witnesses, and the study does not reflect the urgency of the situation.

Modern antisemitism is misunderstood in large parts of the university community. While antisemitism that arises on racial or religious grounds is widely recognisable and condemned, antisemitism that arises in connection with anti-Zionism (that is, discrimination against Jews in connection with a person's perspectives of Israel or the Jewish people's movement for self-determination) is frequently dismissed. Claims of antisemitism are often perniciously labelled as part of a conspiracy theory that is designed to prevent criticism of Israel, with the vilification of Jews—and acts of aggression against Jews—justified because of the aggressor's views of Israel.

As we will discuss below, vigorous criticism of or activism against Israel and its policies, in and of itself, is not antisemitic, and is by no means our concern in writing this submission.

The study into racism that is proposed for the AHRC, in our view, will miss the mark. That is, in particular, because while many universities pride themselves on their strong policies against racial discrimination, the vilification and intimidation of Jews on university campuses has risen unabated in recent years. We set out our discussions with university administrations about these matters below.

Despite all of these challenges, one of the reasons that it is critical that there be an inquiry into antisemitism with the power to compel witnesses, is because, as a general statement, there are many examples of university administrators following 7 October that have egregiously failed to deal with antisemitism manifesting on their campus. There is no doubt that some university administrators are better than others. For example, Monash University, which demonstrated leadership by declaring that it will take action against those who repeat the slogan "Zionists are not welcome," declaring that it is harassment and/or vilification. At the other end of the spectrum, Sydney University has disgraced itself with its vice chancellor, Professor Mark Scott, publicly and blatantly misrepresenting what actually took place on his campus, and his appeasement of those who intimidated Jewish students in order to avoid further intimidation (thereby sending the clear message that such intimidation works.)

We note that before the 2017 Royal Commission into Misconduct in the Banking, Superannuation and Financial Services Industry was ultimately established, many participants in the banking industry protested that it would be unnecessary and unhelpful. Often, it was said that existent banking regulatory frameworks were sufficient to address misconduct, and that a royal commission would be a distraction. We likewise expect that there will also be many people loathe to see an inquiry into antisemitism on campus, but we urge the Committee to remember that no matter how contentious the Royal Commission into Banking was before its launch, when it got to work, it was vindicated.

We strongly support the proposed bill, in addition to the call for a judicial inquiry into antisemitism, and believe that the increasing severity and prevalence of antisemitism at universities necessitates an inquiry with royal commission-like powers.

2. The situation on campus before 7 October

Australian university campuses have seen a spike in antisemitism since the events of 7 October. Unfortunately, the antisemitism that we have seen in the last 11 months did not come from a low base—antisemitism was prevalent on campuses across Australia before the Hamas attack on Israel and the subsequent war.

We have an accurate understanding of the situation on campus before 7 October due to the Australian Jewish University Student Experience Survey, which was a survey of Australian Jewish university students that the ZFA commissioned, in cooperation with the Australasian Union of Jewish Students (AUJS), the elected representative body for Jewish students. The ZFA partnered with the Social Research Centre to carry out the survey, which used the AUJS database of current and recent students as well as social media, newsletters and other means of spreading awareness.

The survey questions, shaped by consultations with Prof Andrew Markus, the Scanlon Foundation and the Social Research Centre, generated academically rigorous and independently sourced results.

2a. Reasons for commissioning the survey

Over a number of years, ZFA leadership became anecdotally aware, through conversations with AUJS, Jewish students and others, of the steadily increasing antisemitism on Australian campuses. Leaders of AUJS had received death threats and AUJS events had been cancelled for fear of violence against attendees. Jewish students had been excluded from otherwise unrelated university societies because of their views on Israel, singled out in class with demands to defend allegations of Israeli wrongdoing, and abused when walking past pro-Palestine rallies because they were identifiably Jewish.[1] Some were avoiding campus altogether.[2] Students were increasingly reporting no longer feeling safe on campus. AUJS had even considered offering training in personal security for Jewish students.[3]

Against this background, the ZFA's meetings with senior administrators from numerous universities revealed that those administrators did not believe antisemitism was a problem on their campuses.

This gap between the experiences of Jewish students and the perceptions of university administrators was the key reason we commissioned the survey; we wanted to understand whether the anecdotes we were hearing matched rigorously sourced data.

While some incidents of antisemitism against Jewish students were reported in the media, in large part the lived experience of Jews subject to discrimination on campus remained and remains unreported. This is especially the case when that lived experience takes the form of behaviour modification to avoid antisemitism, such as students not wearing clothing that identifies them as Jewish whilst on campus, not complaining about tutors' and lecturers' aggressive anti-Israel bias for fear their marks will be affected, or not submitting complaints about antisemitism to the university because of a lack of understanding within universities as to how antisemitism manifests itself on campus.

Universities have strong anti-racism policies, and typically deny that antisemitism is a problem on their campuses. The disconnect occurs because most people outside the Jewish community incorrectly view antisemitism as being limited to discrimination against Jews because of religious or racial reasons. That is, universities do not realise that Jews are also often discriminated against as part of activism against Israel.

The ZFA came to understand that Jewish students were facing the third type of antisemitism on campus, bereft of meaningful university efforts to prevent it.

2b. Survey results

The survey was the first dedicated study of the extent (or impact) of the 'everyday', unreported antisemitism faced by Jewish students across the country.

The survey was rolled out for three weeks in late March and early April 2023. There were 563 valid responses from right across Australia. One in every 14 current Jewish university students filled in the survey.[4]

A key strength of the survey was asking students about their experiences, rather than relying on reported incidents, which is the typical methodology of other reports about antisemitism. Students were also asked whether and how they had modified their behaviour to avoid antisemitism, whether they had made complaints to universities after experiencing antisemitism and, if not, why not.

The full survey results can be found on the ZFA website: www.zfa.com.au/survey.

2c. Experiencing antisemitism

The survey found that 64 per cent of Jewish university students had experienced antisemitism on campus. Among universities with over 25 respondents, this key result ranged from 48 per cent (Deakin) to 84 per cent (ANU).

> "Almost every day I attend university, I see/hear/witness one or more antisemitic groups or antisemitic incidents. These come from staff, students, materials shown in class… These range from comments like 'Nazis were good people', which was made by an arts faculty chief examiner … to being told that I would not be welcome in a mainstream progressive club because I am a Zionist."
> - Survey respondent

The types of antisemitism experienced include tropes about Jewish money, power or influence, antisemitism based on religion or race and being singled out or excluded over Israel.

[4] The 2021 census counted 6200 Jewish tertiary students. Of the 563 survey responses, 429 responses were by current university students, which represents approximately 7 per cent of the Jewish student body, or one in 14 students.

Students that reported experiencing antisemitism were asked to nominate which kind of antisemitism they experienced. Twenty-five percent of all students (i.e. including those that reported experiencing no antisemitism) reported having been involuntarily singled out or excluded over issues relating to Israel.

This figure is starker among those who, through their clothing or jewellery, are visibly Jewish. A total of 31 per cent of visibly Jewish students had been involuntarily singled out or excluded over Israel, compared to a total of 20 per cent of Jewish students who aren't visibly Jewish. This is important, because if criticism of Israel is unrelated to antisemitism, as some commentators claim, then there wouldn't be a difference between visibly Jewish and other Jewish students in this regard.

Regardless of where one draws the line between activism against Israel and activism that is discriminatory of Jews, if a Jewish student is involuntarily singled out or excluded for any reason—including someone else's hatred of Israel—that's antisemitism.

> "The anti-Israel narrative is so overwhelmingly strong on my university campus that I always hide this part of my Jewish identity… I would be nervous about being present at a Jewish society event if an Israeli flag was displayed."
> - Survey respondent

2d. Hiding their Jewishness

The survey revealed that students were modifying their behaviour to avoid antisemitism.

Fifty-seven per cent of students had hidden their Jewish identity to avoid antisemitism at university. This rose to 67 per cent of those students who had experienced antisemitism already. This shows that experiencing discrimination on campus has long-term impacts.

> "I feel uncomfortable about being openly Jewish with other students (other than my close friends). Whenever I would mention it, it always feels a bit like coming out, where you don't exactly know how people will respond, if they will judge you negatively or change their behaviour because of it."
> - Survey respondent

Similarly, 19 per cent of Jewish students had stayed away from campus to avoid antisemitism. This figure rose to 24 per cent among female respondents. Among those who had experienced antisemitism on campus, 27 per cent—over a quarter—had stayed away from campus, again showing that experiencing discrimination on campus has long-term impacts.

> "A person in my class heiled Hitler to me and not a single professor/ tutor or student did anything. The uni needs to step up."
> - Survey respondent

2e. Lack of confidence in the complaints system

The survey revealed that few Jewish students had confidence in their university's complaints processes. Of those that had experienced antisemitism in the last 12 months, 85 per cent did not submit a complaint after the most impactful incident in that 12-month period.

> "A lot of universities ... don't take antisemitic complaints/issues as seriously as others (e.g. homophobic, Islamophobic, and so on)."
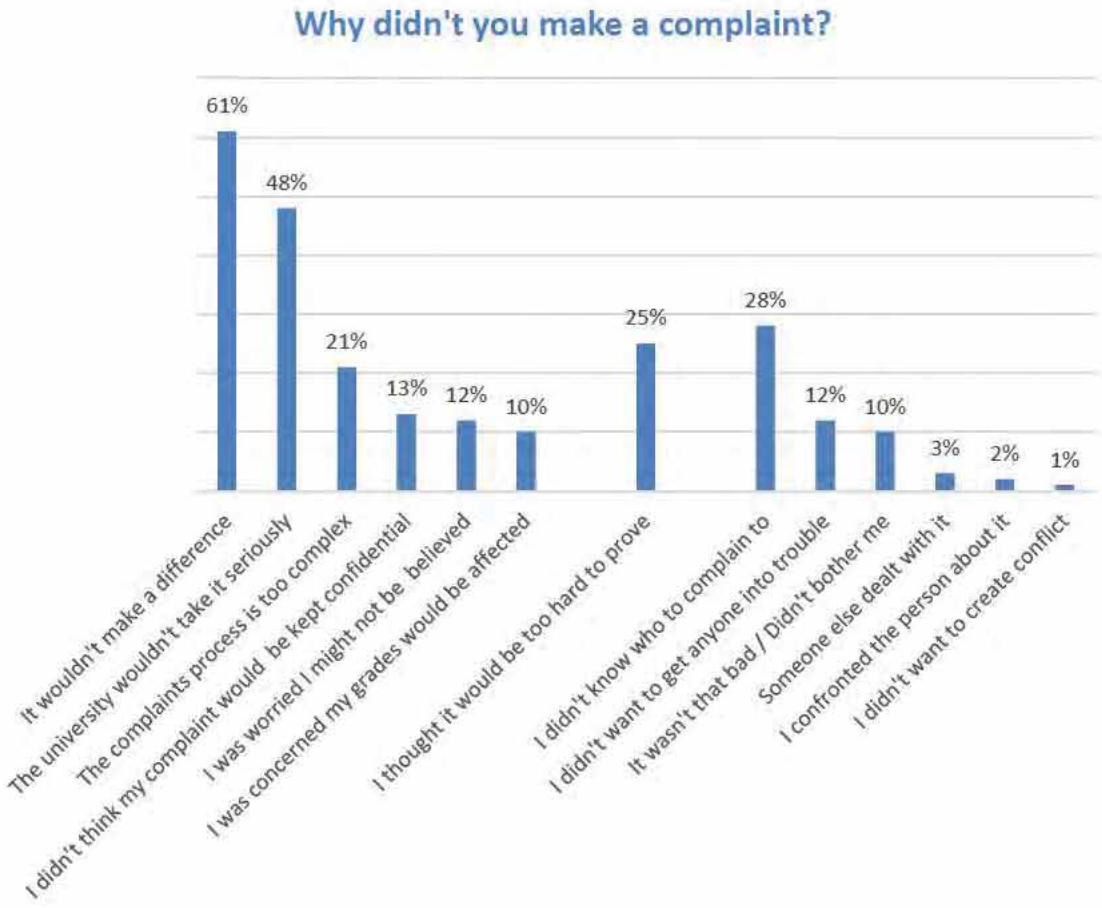
> - Survey respondent

Asked why they didn't, over half said they didn't think it would make a difference, and just under half said their university wouldn't take the complaint seriously.



We asked all students whether they had confidence in the complaints process. Only 37 per cent said yes. However, over three-quarters of students said they would be more confident making a complaint if their university adopted a definition of antisemitism. This figure rises still further—to 84 per cent—among those who are currently not confident about making a complaint.

> "Not only do we need universities to adopt definitions but provide students and staff with an explanation of the definition they are adopting and why it is important. The IHRA definition is great but people need to understand it if we want to make a difference. It's not just about getting people 'in trouble' for being antisemitic, it's about explaining to them what is antisemitic and why. The universities are also responsible for this."
> - Survey respondent

2f. Conclusions of survey results

The survey results definitively showed:

- Antisemitism was a significant problem on Australian university campuses well before the events of 7 October 2023
- There was already a permissive environment for students to be discriminated against because of Israel
- There are long-term impacts on individuals as a result of experiencing antisemitism on campus, affecting their academic and professional development
- Students were not submitting complaints because they did not have confidence in the university complaints process (and since universities primarily assessed student discrimination levels through complaints statistics, university administrations were unaware of the levels of antisemitism on campus)

Reason for a commission of inquiry

Every Australian university was made aware of these issues in August 2023, when the ZFA provided them the results of the survey.

A commission of inquiry is needed to understand what measures universities took to mitigate these problems on their campuses (and which of these were effective), or why they took none.

Those universities that have not taken action must be compelled to explain why this is still the case one year after the release of the survey, which put them on notice as to the permissive culture of antisemitism on their campuses well before the explosion of antisemitism as a result of the 7 October attacks and their aftermath. As we set out below, the AHRC study will have no power to compel universities to answer any specific questions; we expect the AHRC study will leave the Jewish community wanting.

Of those universities that did take action as a consequence of the survey findings, a commission of inquiry will be able to determine which of the measures were effective, and why, and thus provide a suite of 'best practice' measures it could encourage all universities to adopt.

Since 7 October, antisemitism on campuses has been acute, and measures have had to be (or should have been) taken in order to stop it. However, the survey results show that even when there was no immediate round of Israeli–Palestinian conflict, Jewish students on campus still suffered antisemitic discrimination.

3. Israel, activism and antisemitism

One confusion is in relation to how criticism of or activism against Israel can express itself in antisemitism. Finding a common understanding of where this line lies is a critically important step in reducing and preventing antisemitic discrimination.

A key outcome of a commission of inquiry would be exploring the line between legitimate political debate and unacceptable racial discrimination and, in so doing, providing guidance for universities.

Obviously, criticism of or activism against Israel is not, in and of itself, antisemitic. People must be free to criticise the governments, policies and actions of any country. The line between legitimate criticism of or activism against Israel and antisemitism often depends on context. Australia and 42 other countries[5] use the internationally accepted IHRA working definition of antisemitism as a guide. Across the world, dozens of universities have likewise adopted the definition. In Australia, the University of Melbourne[6], Monash University[7], the University of Wollongong[8] and the University of the Sunshine Coast[9] have adopted it.[10]

The definition notes that criticism of Israeli policy is not necessarily antisemitism.

According to its website, the International Holocaust Remembrance Alliance (IHRA) "is the only intergovernmental organisation with a mandate focused on addressing contemporary challenges related to the Holocaust and genocide of the Roma. We foster education, remembrance, and research about what happened in the past, to build a world without genocide in the future."[11]

In May 2016, IHRA adopted a working definition of antisemitism, based on a previous EU document. The definition is: "Antisemitism is a certain perception of Jews, which may be expressed as hatred toward Jews. Rhetorical and physical manifestations of antisemitism are directed toward Jewish or non-Jewish individuals and/or their property, toward Jewish community institutions and religious facilities."[12]

The definition is accompanied by 11 examples that provide context to help a user understand what might constitute antisemitism. These examples are claimed by some, including the Australian Greens,[13] as conflating criticism of or activism against Israel with antisemitism. We do not believe this is the case, as a simple reading of the examples proves.

We are elaborating this for two reasons; because the IHRA working definition of antisemitism has been adopted by the Australian Jewish community as the best representation of modern antisemitism, and because it is so quickly and unfairly dismissed by the Australian Greens and others.

[9] https://www.usc.edu.au/about/policies-and-procedures/student-conduct-governing-policy
[10] In addition, La Trobe University and Macquarie University have adopted part of the IHRA working definition of antisemitism (i.e. without the attendant examples). We understand that Deakin University has not officially adopted the definition, but does use it as a guide to assess allegations of antisemitism.
[11] https://holocaustremembrance.com/
[12] https://holocaustremembrance.com/resources/working-definition-antisemitism
[13] https://greens.org.au/sites/default/files/2023-06/AG%20Pal%20resolution.pdf

Of the 11 examples, seven mention or refer to Israel. These are:

- Accusing the Jews as a people, or Israel as a state, of inventing or exaggerating the Holocaust.
- Accusing Jewish citizens of being more loyal to Israel, or to the alleged priorities of Jews worldwide, than to the interests of their own nations.
- Denying the Jewish people their right to self-determination, e.g., by claiming that the existence of a State of Israel is a racist endeavour.
- Applying double standards by requiring of it [i.e. Israel] a behaviour not expected or demanded of any other democratic nation.
- Using the symbols and images associated with classic antisemitism (e.g., claims of Jews killing Jesus or blood libel) to characterise Israel or Israelis.
- Drawing comparisons of contemporary Israeli policy to that of the Nazis.
- Holding Jews collectively responsible for actions of the state of Israel.

We do not believe any of these examples preclude criticism of or activism against Israel. Those who reject the IHRA definition must make clear what it is they want to say that is considered antisemitic under this definition. Indeed, unfair and unfounded criticisms of Israel is often made in the media or by political or community leaders without those remarks crossing the line into antisemitism, as defined by the IHRA working definition of antisemitism and its attendant definitions.

We believe that anyone who claims that the IHRA working definition of antisemitism conflates antisemitism with simple criticism of Israel is being wilfully ignorant.

4. Engagement with universities and the Universities Accord Panel

Both before and after the survey, and before and after the 7 October attacks, the ZFA made numerous attempts to make universities adequately aware of their situation of antisemitism on their campuses, to encourage them to take meaningful action to protect Jewish students, and to urge them to put in place measures to help prevent antisemitism from arising in the first place. While there have been limited successes, antisemitism on campus remains a significant problem. The universities' inaction in the face of the 'encampments' and attendant intimidation of Jewish students reveal that university administrators have still to internalise the problem.

Reason for a commission of inquiry

This section describes some of the engagement that the ZFA has had with the higher education sector. It shows that, short of a commission of inquiry with the power to compel witnesses, the higher education sector will continue to be able to deny there is a problem and/or avoid taking meaningful action to resolve it.

4a. Meeting universities before the survey

The ZFA has long felt that a widespread adoption of the IHRA working definition of antisemitism by universities—and its deployment as an educational tool—is vitally important.

The ZFA held discussions with numerous universities in 2022 to encourage them to adopt the working definition. What emerged from these meetings was the realisation that what the ZFA was hearing from students—that there was significant levels of antisemitism on campuses around Australia—was very different from the experiences of university administrators, which understood there to be very little antisemitism on campus, attested by the fact that their universities had strong anti-racism policies, and very few students were submitting formal complaints about antisemitism.

This realisation was the key reason that the ZFA commissioned the survey of Jewish university students in 2023.

4b. Meeting universities after the survey

As above, the survey found that two-thirds of Jewish tertiary students had experienced antisemitism on campus. A quarter had been involuntarily singled out or excluded over issues relating to Israel. Students were not making complaints about incidents, because they didn't trust university complaints mechanisms. As a result, many universities were ignorant of the prevalence of antisemitism on campus, an ignorance made worse by a basic lack of understanding of how modern antisemitism manifests.

These results partly explained the disparity between university administrations' perceptions and students' experiences.

We sent the survey results to university administrators, and requested meetings with them to discuss the results. We subsequently held meetings with six universities (Deakin, La Trobe, Macquarie, Queensland, Sydney, UTS).[14] Numerous other universities responded to our letter.

The tenor of most of the meetings was shock at the level of antisemitism experienced by their students, a desire to explain their anti-racism policies, a genuine desire to discuss the situation—including the survey statistics specific to their university—and a willingness to hear suggestions as to how things might improve, including successful tactics employed by other universities.

Because the survey explained the gap between experiences of Jewish students and perceptions of university administrations, subsequent to its release, universities had no excuse to be surprised by the existence of antisemitism on campus. The spike in antisemitism after 7 October was, in part, because there was already a willing environment on campus—which, because of the survey's results, universities already knew about.

4c. Meeting the Australian Universities Accord Panel

This section highlights another avenue that the ZFA has taken to have universities take antisemitism on their campuses seriously. As the below shows, this avenue was unsuccessful, and provides another reason why a commission of inquiry into campus antisemitism is necessary.

On 1 September 2023, the ZFA made a submission to the Universities Accord Panel. We met with the Panel in December 2023.

The Australian Universities Accord Panel was, according to the Department of Education website, commissioned to "devise recommendations and performance targets to improve the quality, accessibility, affordability and sustainability of higher education, in order to achieve long term security and prosperity for the sector and the nation."[15]

The Panel's Interim Report was released in July 2023 and the Panel called for feedback and insights in the form of submissions. It was in this context that we provided a submission to the Panel.

[14] The series of meetings was interrupted by the Hamas–Israel war, which began on 7 October. For instance, there had been a meeting scheduled with the ANU for mid-October, which was cancelled at the ZFA's request.

During our December 2023 meeting with the Panel, we noted:

- Rolling the fight against antisemitism into the fight against all other discriminations is very unlikely to prove effective.
- Universities already have strong anti-discrimination policies but antisemitism on campus remained unchecked.
- Part of the problem is that universities have an incomplete understanding of how antisemitism manifests
- The key finding of the AUJS-ZFA survey was that universities weren't aware of the unacceptable levels of antisemitism on campus because they relied on complaints data, but students aren't making complaints because they have little trust in the process. To fix this, student confidence in universities' complaints processes needed to be improved; and universities needed to find additional or alternate ways to become aware of antisemitism on campus.

To increase the confidence of students in university complaints mechanisms, we made the following suggestions:

- Universities should adopt the IHRA working definition of antisemitism. The elected representative Jewish community organisations (being ZFA and the Executive Council of Australian Jewry (ECAJ)) endorse the IHRA working definition of antisemitism as the most accurate guide to understanding how antisemitism manifests today. The IHRA working definition, plus other relevant educational resources supported by the elected representative Jewish community organistions, should be on university websites, and be provided to officials who assess complaints about antisemitism.
- Universities should meet with elected representative Jewish organisations to discuss their antisemitism policies. Some universities have adequate policies, but Jewish students don't know about them. Speaking with AUJS and other representative Jewish groups will help disseminate this information.
- University security teams should hold regular meetings with AUJS to discuss the situation on campus. This helps the security team understand the current situation, and find workarounds (e.g. if there is a protest planned outside a library, security can pre-plan another safe location where Jewish students can study). We noted that UTS had implemented this idea, and we thought it was a practice worth emulating.
- Any time a university wants to make policy decisions about antisemitism or other issues that would reasonably be expected to disproportionately impact Jewish students (or where Jewish students are obvious stakeholders), the university should consult with AUJS, the ZFA and the ECAJ.

To help universities find alternate ways to become aware of antisemitism on campus, we made the following suggestion:

- Universities should seek and accept third-party reports from AUJS and the Community Security Group about antisemitic incidents on campus. Frequently, Jewish students do not want to submit complaints. While action against individuals will generally not be able to be taken unless a formal complaint by an individual student is made, by having AUJS or CSG make a report about an incident will help inform universities about antisemitism on campus. Being aware of any patterns of incidents, even if students aren't making formal complaints, will help inform university policies.

The Universities Accord Final Report was published in February 2024.

Relevant to the issue of antisemitism and racism, there were certain aspects of the Universities Accord Final Report we welcomed, including its recommendation for a national student charter and a National Student Ombudsman. The report also recommended that a National Tertiary Education Commission be established and, once it is (and alongside its many other duties), it conducts a 'National Tertiary Education Racism Study'.

However, in our view, the report does not appropriately grapple with racial discrimination and the distinct challenges Jewish students face at university, especially following the dramatic rise in antisemitism that we have experienced in Australia since 7 October last year.

First, the report does not mention antisemitism. While we welcomed the recommendation for a Racism Study, the discussion on racism constitutes only four paragraphs in a 408-page report. We are very concerned that, on the formation of the Commission, matters of racial discrimination will not register on its crowded agenda.

Secondly, grouping antisemitism together with all other forms of racial discrimination is in our view doomed to fail. As we have discussed, antisemitism requires a robust and targeted policy framework.

Third, the challenges facing Jewish students are urgent. The conditions of antisemitism in Australia have significantly deteriorated since the Hamas–Israel war commenced on 7 October last year. The measures recommended in the Universities Accord Final Report will take many months—if not years—to bear fruit. We note that the National Tertiary Education Commission is only scheduled to be established in July 2025, meaning the Racism Study won't even be commissioned until some time after that.

The ZFA (and AUJS) were not listed as participants in the Panel's consultations, which we found surprising.

Reason for a commission of inquiry

Notwithstanding the substantial terms of reference of the Universities Accord Panel, we find the inadequate response the Panel had to racism generally, and antisemitism specifically, provides another argument for a commission of inquiry. A commission that can compel witnesses to appear and respond will uncover the situation on campus both before and after October 2023. Allowing parties to merely supply statements without those statements being adequately interrogated will create the conditions for incomplete understanding of the situation.

5. The situation after 7 October and university responses

The situation on campus has dramatically worsened since the Hamas invasion of Israel on 7 October last year, and the war that invasion sparked.

The situation on many campuses has become highly intimidatory for many Jewish students. Some of this intimidation has clearly crossed the line into antisemitism.

Below is a limited list of incidents that have taken place on campuses across the country since 7 October that, in our view, are antisemitic. It is by no means an exhaustive list. It is not intended to detail many behaviours that intimidate Jews, are offensive, or have a real risk of flowing into violence (such as displaying a terrorist organisation's banner, displaying the upside red triangle symbol that apes how Hamas displays its targeting of Israeli civilians, offering 'unconditionally' to support Hamas' campaign against Israel 'by any means necessary', or echoing genocidal slogans chanted by terrorist organisations—all of which happened on campus since October last year).

- Macquarie University academic Randa Abdel-Fattah posted on social media that Zionists 'have no right to cultural safety' and encouraged all to deny safe spaces to Zionists.[16]
- Sheikh Ibrahim Dadoun, who is a supporter of Hezb ut-Tahrir, encouraged students participating in the University of Sydney encampment to chant often and loudly the slogan "from the river to the sea, Palestine will be free," because, in his words, "this is what makes the Zionists tremble in the knees."[17]
- Jewish students at Sydney University are being 'filmed, followed, intimidated' and are afraid of attending class.[18]
- Protesters wrote 'Zionists = Nazis' on a whiteboard at the University of Sydney encampment.[19]
- A man wearing a Palestinian keffiyeh at Deakin University swore at a kippah-wearing Jew, 'fuck you Zionist'.[20]
- Jewish students on multiple campuses reported being pressured to declare their political stances.[21]
- At Melbourne University, pro-Palestinian activists occupied a university building, expressed support for Hamas, and called for Jews to be barred from campus.[22]
- Jewish students were abused and sworn at Monash University (while university security staff looked on).[23]
- At multiple universities, protesters disrupt classes, demanding that people show their hands or otherwise demonstrate their position on the Hamas-Israel war. Photos were taken of students in this context. La Trobe University instructed its staff to let these protesters be, and did not attempt to stop them.[24]
- A Deakin University Jewish employee holding a sign encouraging dialogue was attacked by pro-Palestinian protests. He was pushed to the ground and ended up bleeding.[25]
- Social media posts advertising a protest declare 'Zionists are not welcome' at Monash University.[26]
- Former Greens mayoral candidate Jonathan Sriranganathan hosted an open mic event at the University of Queensland encampment where he stated, 'all welcome (except Zionists)'.[27]

[27] https://thejewishindependent.com.au/camp-shalom-a-response-to-pro-palestinian-encampments

- The Deakin University launch rally for the encampment had numerous anti-Israel chants such as "fuck the Zionists", "Zionists off campus" and "fuck you Zionist dogs".[28]
- A female Jewish student at Curtin University overhead someone saying there should be no Jews on campus.[29]
- At Sydney University, Jewish students faced harassment during protests; a Jewish student was told he was "not welcome" and having his photo posted on social media, where he was labelled a "Zio."[30]
- A visibly Jewish male student at Melbourne University was approached by members of the encampment, who started yelling at him and photographing him.[31]
- A female Jewish student at Melbourne University was followed for 300m by two men yelling at her that she was a supporter of genocide and supported the murder of babies.[32]
- Sydney University's Student Representative Council passed a motion endorsing 'violent resistance'. Jewish students were prevented from speaking, and a non-Jewish student who spoke in support of Israel was jeered at.[33]

In the weeks and months since this explosion of antisemitism began, the ZFA has held meetings with the students and parents of students being impacted. We have provided considerable support to AUJS, which has been thrust into a role they've never had to hold before. We have written to the education minister, and held meetings with his chief of staff, as well as the shadow education minister. We've issued statements about the most egregious activities on campus, and we have written to multiple university administrators calling out specific and highly problematic incidents on their campuses, and encouraged them to take actions to ensure the physical and emotional well-being of Jewish staff and students.

University responses to the ZFA have typically been the same as their responses to media; that they have strong anti-racism policies and that they ensure free speech on campus. They deny that they have an antisemitism problem on campus.

Reason for a commission of inquiry

As above, universities knew about the levels of antisemitism on their campuses before 7 October, care of the Australian Jewish University Student Experience survey. Knowing that students typically don't make complaints about experiences of antisemitism, universities didn't change their policies before or after 7 October. That is, the complacency with which the ZFA was met before 7 October continues. The many worrying antisemitic incidents on campus, plus the extreme level of intimidation of Jewish staff and students, by and large have not been enough to change university positions.

We would imagine that university responses to the Australian Human Rights Commission study (see below) would be very similar to its responses to media and the Australian Jewish community. This is why only a commission of inquiry that has the power to compel witnesses will be able to ask—and receive answers—about their specific decisions in the face of the explosion of antisemitism we have been witness to since 7 October.

6. The Australian Human Rights Commission study isn't adequate

The Australian Human Rights Commission (AHRC) has been commissioned to prepare a study into antisemitism, Islamophobia, racism and the experiences of First Nations people on university campuses. This study will be led by the Race Discrimination Commissioner Giridharan Sivaraman. The study is scheduled to provide an interim report by 31 December 2024, with a final report due by 30 June 2025. It aims to examine the prevalence and impact of racism in universities and will involve consultations with students, stakeholders, and education providers.

In our view, the AHRC study lacks the necessary focus to address the specific issues faced by Jewish students on university campuses. While the AHRC study aims to address broader racism concerns, it does not sufficiently concentrate on the unique and pervasive nature of antisemitism in academic environments. This lack of focus dilutes the effectiveness of the study in identifying and tackling the specific manifestations of antisemitism that Jewish students experience.

Additionally, the AHRC study does not convey the urgency required to address the escalating antisemitism on campuses. The situation is unprecedented and deeply troubling, with Jewish students being targeted and intimidated to the point where many are staying away from campus. The urgency and seriousness of the situation demand immediate and decisive action, which the current AHRC study fails to provide.

Furthermore, the AHRC study lacks the power to compel witnesses to provide testimony and answer questions. This significant limitation will undermine ultimately the depth and accuracy of its findings.

Reason for a commission of inquiry

These deficiencies underscore the necessity of the commission of inquiry envisioned by this bill. Unlike the AHRC study, this commission will have a focused mandate on antisemitism, an urgent timeline to address the crisis, and the power to compel testimony and documentation. This is essential to uncovering the full extent of antisemitism on campuses and developing effective strategies to combat it.

7. Recommendations

What has become clear over the last few years is that a commission of inquiry or judicial inquiry with royal commission-like powers is the only reliable way that the extent of campus antisemitism, and universities' action or inaction in the face of it, can be uncovered.

In an effort to convince universities that they've got an antisemitism problem and that they should do something about it, the ZFA has, over many years, met with various university and education administrators. In all meetings, we get sympathy, but rarely does it result in action. Meanwhile, Jewish students and academics on campus continue to face discrimination and intimidation.

Many universities have in fact obfuscated, or justified in the name of 'academic freedom', reprehensible conduct. University administrations must be compelled to answer what they have known about antisemitism on their campuses, and what they've done about it. If they haven't done anything, this should be exposed.

And they must be given clear guidance as to how to insulate their campuses against antisemitism and manage it when it arises—and be held accountable.

In August 2023—before the explosion of antisemitism on campus that Australia witnessed as a result of the 7 October Hamas invasion of Israel—the ZFA revealed that two-thirds of Australian Jewish university students had experienced antisemitism on campus. This included one-quarter of all Jewish students having been involuntarily singled out or excluded because of issues relating to Israel. When people on campus want to take their hatred of Israel out on individual Jews in Australia, that' s antisemitism. It needs to end.

In light of the above, these are the ZFA recommendations to the Senate Committee:

1. Passage of the Bill: The ZFA recommends that the Senate Committee endorse the bill to establish a commission of inquiry into antisemitism at Australian universities.
2. Powers: The commission of inquiry must have the authority to compel witnesses to appear and testify under oath to ensure comprehensive and honest testimonies, such as in a judicial inquiry.
3. Adoption of a suite of 'best practice' measures: The Commission of Inquiry can determine and provide a suite of "best practice measures" all universities should be encouraged to adopt. This could include, but is not limited to:

    - How universities should seek out or otherwise understand student experiences and concerns about discrimination, given that students are not making official complaints;
    - A thorough examination of university complaints procedures to determine how to improve confidence in making complaints among students;
    - Whether a national model should be created to standardise how complaints about discrimination are handled;
    - Establishing an oversight body, such as an ombudsman, to whom students unsatisfied with the way their university handled a complaint can turn;
    - Including education about modern antisemitism at universities and, in particular, for complaints handling officials, in any national student charter the Panel ultimately recommends;
    - Recommending that all universities adopt the IHRA working definition of antisemitism; and
    - Universities should be required to enforce policies or take action under existing policies. In many instances, university administrators had the ability to take action under existing policies but failed to do so. This could be either because they refused to acknowledge the problem, or because they were intimidated by protestors.

The Australasian Union of Jewish Students (AUJS)

The Australasian Union of Jewish Students (AUJS) is the peak representative body for Jewish university students across Australia and New Zealand. Our mission is to provide meaningful experiences to Jewish students to develop and strengthen their sense of Jewish identity and Jewish leadership. AUJS has affiliate clubs on 18 university campuses across Australia. We focus on providing social, educational and professional development experiences for Jewish students to foster their Jewish identity both on and off campus.

AUJS welcomes the opportunity to submit our perspective to the Commission of Inquiry into Antisemitism at Australian Universities Bill 2024 (No. 2). This inquiry offers a vital platform for amplifying the lived experiences of Jewish students who have faced antisemitism. It also provides a crucial chance to advocate for meaningful changes within the tertiary education sector to combat antisemitism on campuses effectively.

Preface

If universities cease to function as places to gather people together across race, class, and creed — united by a shared commitment to learning and scholarship — it undermines their role as public institutions.

At the same time, ensuring that campuses remain a place of diverse views and robust discussion is critical to their functioning as public institutions; anything that may intrude on freedom of speech and expression should not be considered lightly.

We recognise there is a significant, central, and unwieldy tension that places of higher learning must navigate here. Notwithstanding the difficulty of striking a balance, it is crucial that universities do not abandon the other in their pursuit of one ideal.

Right now, many Jewish students are feeling abandoned.

We do not seek that our participation in public life comes at the cost of anyone else's. Rather, we can navigate the usual trials and tribulations of student life —tutorials, exams, and endless procrastination— free from prejudice, bigotry, harassment and hate, just as every student is entitled to.

As a direct consequence of some universities' failure to meaningfully address these concerns, Jewish students are changing their behaviour to adapt to what has become a new reality. No student should be forced to choose between their education and their own safety.

A recurring motif in many student testimonies we have received is that many students who used to dream of going to university now dread it.

It need not be reiterated, but the current situation is untenable. We are in a crisis, but we have been in crisis for far too long.

Australasian Union of Jewish Students

Executive Summary

AUJS is deeply concerned about the rise of antisemitic incidents on campus. The rise in antisemitism across Australia did not start on October 7th; rather, there has been a sustained increase in antisemitism across Australia for many decades. Troublingly, universities have been at the forefront of this escalating trend. Prior to October 7th, research conducted by the Social Research Centre in March 2023 revealed that a majority (64%) of Jewish university students had experienced antisemitism on campus, with over half of Jewish students (57%) concealing their Jewish identity on campus to avoid antisemitism and 20% of Jewish students avoiding campus for the same reason.[1]

Since Hamas' attack in Israel on October 7, 2023, and the subsequent war in Gaza, the situation on campus for Jewish students has severely deteriorated. Universities have become a focal point for antisemitic activity. Jewish students face an unprecedented increase in fear, intimidation, and harassment from both members of the university community and non-student external actors entering campus. As a result, many Jewish students have decided to avoid their university campuses altogether.

In this submission, we consider the varied manifestations of antisemitism on campus and its impact on Jewish students. We will also examine the adequacy and effectiveness of different universities' responses to antisemitic and extremist incidents, highlighting best practices and deficient responses. We recommend the need for the tertiary sector to adopt best practice policy to combat antisemitism and establish a judicial inquiry into antisemitism to properly analyse the scope of antisemitism on campus and the inadequate responses of some universities.

Defining Antisemitism

AUJS, along with the mainstream Jewish community, use the International Holocaust Remembrance Alliance (IHRA) Working Definition of Antisemitism to guide our understanding of antisemitism. The IHRA is an international and intergovernmental body promoting Holocaust education, remembrance and research and countering antisemitism, racism and anti-Roma and Sinti prejudice. Australia has been a full member of the IHRA since 2019[2], and the IHRA definition of antisemitism has bipartisan support. It was formally adopted by the Morrison government in 2021[3] and endorsed by Federal Labor as early as 2016[4]. It is also the most widely accepted definition of antisemitism by Western governments.

The IHRA Working Definition of Antisemitism states:
'Antisemitism is a certain perception of Jews, which may be expressed as hatred toward Jews. Rhetorical and physical manifestations of antisemitism are directed toward Jewish or non-Jewish individuals and/or their property, toward Jewish community institutions and religious facilities.'

The definition is accompanied by examples to illustrate the various forms antisemitism can take. Some of these include:

- Calling for, aiding, or justifying the killing or harming of Jews in the name of a radical ideology or an extremist view of religion.
- Making mendacious, dehumanising, demonising, or stereotypical allegations about Jews as such or the power of Jews as a collective.
- Accusing Jews as a people of being responsible for real or imagined wrongdoing committed by a single Jewish person or group or even for acts committed by non-Jews.
- Denying the fact, scope, mechanisms (e.g., gas chambers), or intentionality of the genocide of the Jewish people at the hands of National Socialist Germany and its supporters and accomplices during World War II (the Holocaust).
- Accusing the Jews as a people or Israel as a state of inventing or exaggerating the Holocaust.

4 https://www.australianjewishnews.com/penny-wong-puts-spotlight-on-antisemitism/

- Accusing Jewish citizens of being more loyal to Israel or to the alleged priorities of Jews worldwide than to the interests of their own nations.

These examples, with the requirement of additional context per the situation in question, can help to clarify what constitutes antisemitism and underscore the need for a comprehensive approach to addressing it.

Antisemitism and Zionism

The Jewish people have been subject to persecution throughout their history. Given the scope and depth of different Jewish diasporas, this persecution has taken on many forms across many cultures.

As indicated above, the IHRA definition characteristics often ascribed some degree of malevolence and an intent by 'the Jew' to illegitimately subvert, mislead, or control institutions, laws, values, or subsets of populations at the expense of the majority. These various tropes, assumptions, and stereotypes remain salient in Jewish memory and history.

When criticisms about Israel, Israelis, or Zionists draw upon these tropes, assumptions, and stereotypes to make their point, it often reminds Jewish people about the discourse that precipitated a time of violence one's relatives survived — or serves as a grave reminder of a time that they or their communities did not. Consequently, these types of criticisms are experienced by Jewish people as a contemporary manifestation of historical antisemitism. For many, it also evokes significant generational trauma.

Furthermore, it is important to acknowledge that the tropes, assumptions, and stereotypes historically used to vilify Jewish people have proved extremely conducive to subsequently inciting or justifying widespread discrimination, hatred, and/or violence towards Jewish people and their communities. By ascribing to Jewish people the motive, nature, and capacity to be responsible for a broad range of individual and social ills, the targeting of Jewish people, property, and institutions can be framed as a righteous response to those ills; by targeting those perceived responsible for a given injustice, violent conduct and rhetoric becomes a legitimate avenue for bringing about justice.

Whilst some may contend that the IHRA definition conflates legitimate criticism of Israel with antisemitism, it only does so when otherwise legitimate criticism is levied through the use of antisemitic tropes, assumptions, and stereotypes. Insofar as otherwise legitimate criticism can be reformulated to avoid vilifying its target in the same manner as Jewish people, practices, and communities have been historically vilified, it cannot be caught within the IHRA definition. In circumstances where legitimate criticism of Israel, Israelis and/or Zionism cannot be reformulated to avoid vilification in this manner, it can signal that criticism may be less legitimate than originally intended – reinforcing the utility of the IHRA framework in identifying it as such.

Of particular concern is the language used by some pro-Palestinian demonstrators on campuses, which explicitly calls for discrimination against, vilification of, or threats of violence against 'Zionists'.

We recognise that not all Jewish people identify as Zionists. However, a comprehensive study — Crosssroads23 — undertaken by Monash University Emeritus Professor Andrew Markus in June 2023[5] found that 77% of Jewish Australians identify as Zionist. While definitions of 'Zionism' may vary, the most commonly held amongst Jewish communities is the belief that Jewish people have the right to self-determination in their ancestral homeland of Israel and that the State of Israel has the right to exist as a Jewish state.

Furthermore, the same survey further demonstrated a strong connection between Jewish Australians and Israel, with 88% feeling a high level of personal connectedness with Israel and 90% believing it important that the Australian Jewish community maintain close ties with Israel.

Therefore, we contend it is vital to understand, address and respond to antisemitism fully cognisant of the close ties between the vast majority of Jewish Australians and Israel and the more than three-quarters who identify as Zionist. It is simply not credible to purport that prejudice, discrimination or even threats against more than three-quarters of Jewish Australians can be dismissed as not antisemitic.

Moreover, the Jewish connection to Israel is multifaceted and nuanced, encompassing spiritual, historical or familial connections. Jewish students, in particular, have a diverse and, at times, challenging relationship with Israel. For some, it is inextricably linked to their practice and experience of Judaism. Because of the discourse around Zionism on campus, Jewish students who may not identify as Zionist but may still have an undeniable connection to Israel are still often made to feel responsible for the actions of the Israeli government and punished by their peers, regardless of their personal positions.

As we are witnessing an uptick in reports of Jewish students being verbally and physically harassed, intimidated, and excluded on campus, the IHRA definition is particularly well-suited for use in the university context through its ability to differentiate between legitimate discourse about the State of Israel and that which crosses into antisemitism.

Examples of antisemitism

The following examples are representative of the varied manifestations of antisemitism on campus. These incidents have been sourced from direct complaints to AUJS, Jewish community security organisations, and other Jewish community groups.

While we acknowledge that those committing harmful acts of antisemitism are a small minority of the campus population, the impact of their actions is profound, causing immense harm to the well-being, success, and academic experience of Jewish students and others.

Example 1, Student at the University of Melbourne:

In a lecture, before the lecturer began speaking, two students entered and filmed the class while forcing students to vote by raising their hands for or against the 'genocidal Zionist regime.' This created an environment where students felt judged by their peers for not participating in an intentionally divisive vote, leading to significant distress.

Example 2, Student at Monash University, Clayton:

In a tutorial, a student stated that Holocaust survivors should not have been allowed into mandate Palestine because they are ‘inherently genocidal’.The tutor did not respond to this comment. Furthermore, the student and their friends refused to use the elevator with a Jewish peer.

Example 3, Student at Monash University, Caulfield:

A lecturer supported a group presenting on a social cause in a sociology class, suggesting the 'pro-Palestinian movement' as their topic. The lecturer reportedly guided the group before and during their presentation and mentioned that his friend organises pro-Palestinian rallies in the city on Sundays and that he supports 'Free Palestine.' This created an unsafe and discriminatory environment for a Jewish student due to the overt preferential treatment given to the group presenting the pro-Palestinian topic.

Example 4, Student at the University of Queensland:

Pro-Palestinian protesters at the University of Queensland’s encampment have flown the flag of the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine (PFLP). The PFLP is deemed a terrorist organisation in the United States, the European Union, and Canada, refuses to recognise the state of Israel and supports the elimination of the only majority Jewish state (home to the majority of Jews globally), thus revealing its genocidal intent. The Australian government has subjected the group to financial sanctions.

Example 5, Student at Monash University:

A student faced repeated instances of antisemitism at their university, ranging from conversations with peers to being publicly shouted at near the encampment. In this instance, protesters had called students names such as ‘Zionist pigs,’ ‘genocide supporting freaks,’ ‘Nazis with blood on your hands,’ and ‘kapos’.[6] These incidents occurred between chants for a ‘global intifada’ and a ‘Palestine from the river to the sea,’ viewed as antisemitic calls for violence and genocide against Jews and the Jewish state. Protesters also chanted ‘Jews out of Palestine’.

Example 6, Student at the University of Western Australia:

An identifiably Jewish male student walking through campus past a pro-Palestinian stall was approached by an unknown person who asked, 'Do you support the murdering of babies and the genocide in the Middle East?'. Inferring support for the murdering of children based on an individual visibly identifying as Jewish is a contemporary example of the blood libel.

Example 7, Student at the University of Sydney:

An event was held on campus titled 'Who are Hamas’ (promoted with photos of the October 7th attacks), which sought to rationalise and legitimise Hamas, a recognised terrorist organisation. The university administration was informed prior to the event, but the Vice Chancellor chose not to intervene on the grounds of freedom of expression. During this event, at multiple points, support was expressed for Hamas, its methodology, and the October 7th attacks.

Example 8, Student at the Australian National University:

On ABC radio, student representatives of the Australian National University Student Union (ANUSA) openly supported Hamas, raising serious concerns about the promotion of extremist views. Asked by the radio host, ‘surely if you're going to protest against that, you've also got to send a message to Hamas to release the hostages, don't you?’ the student representative replied, ‘well I actually say that Hamas deserve our unconditional support' and 'I do not condemn [Hamas]’.

[6] Kapo definition: From Italian Capo, meaning: head, chief. An inmate (male or female) in a position of authority in Nazi concentration camps. The Kapo was in charge of a group of inmates and carried out the instructions of SS supervisors. They made sure that prisoners performed their tasks and met the quotas. The Kapo was the Nazis’ instrument to humiliate and brutalise the prisoners. https://www.museumoftolerance.com/education/teacher-resources/holocaust-resources/glossary-of-terms-places-personalities.html#KAPO

Example 9, Student at Deakin University (Burwood Campus):

The launch rally for the encampment included numerous anti-Israel chants such as 'fuck the Zionists,' 'Zionists off of campus,' and 'fuck you Zionist dogs.' Following the rally, a group of pro-Israel supporters near the encampment received verbal abuse, including being called 'fucking Zionists, genocidal creeps.'

Example 10, Student at the University of Technology Sydney:

A study room adjacent to a designated safe space for Jewish students was vandalised with swastikas and a drawing praising terrorists who orchestrated October 7. The use or display of Nazi symbols breaches both NSW and Commonwealth law.

Example 11, Student at the University of Sydney:

A Jewish student was pushed from a bike and told ‘Heil Hitler’ while walking to their car. The university refused to act because the incident happened two metres from campus, even though the perpetrator had biked from campus and was a student.

Example 12, Student at the University of Melbourne:

A student was followed 300 meters to their lecture by two men who yelled that the student was a 'genocide supporter' and that they 'support the murder of babies.' The student reported the incident to the university but received no response.

Example 13, Student at the University of Melbourne:

A student was called a 'genocide supporter' and a 'psychopath' when two people saw a Star of David on their necklace and followed them to their lecture. Another student, while laying Tefillin[7], was harassed and photographed by protesters who refused to stop when asked. A circle had to be formed around him to protect him.

[7] Tefillin definition: They are two black leather boxes (singular: 'tefillah') with straps which are put on by adult Jews for weekday morning prayers, and are worn on the forehead and upper arm.They are also called prayer boxes or phylacteries. https://jewishmuseum.org.uk/schools/asset/tefillin/#:~:text='Tefillin'%20is%20the%20name%20given,the%20skin%20of%20kosher%20animals.

Encampments and External Actors

In response to the Israel-Hamas War, various encampments were established across Australian universities. While we respect and acknowledge the importance of freedom of speech and assembly as foundational, many antisemitic incidents emanated from the encampments.

A report from the Community Service Group Victoria (CSG VIC), the security arm of the Jewish community in Victoria, found that:[8]

- The establishment of the first pro-Palestinian encampment in Victoria at the University of Melbourne on April 25th, 2024, led to a marked increase in reported incidents. The CSG received an average of more than 50 reports per week following the start of the encampments, compared to only 11 incidents reported in all of 2023.
- Since the start of 2024, the CSG has recorded 91 incidents on university campuses until May 31st, with 84 classified as hostile or hateful rhetoric and the rest as suspicious activities. The majority of these incidents occurred after the encampments began.
- The analysis suggests that the longer the encampments exist, the more violent they are likely to become. Initial reports often involved graffiti and symbols, escalating to verbal abuse, threats, and eventually physical assault.

While this report only encompassed campuses in Victoria, based on incident reporting, we suggest that these findings apply broadly to the other encampments that were erected throughout Australia and are not isolated to the Victorian campus context.

Effect on Jewish Students

The antisemitic incidents reported on university campuses have had a profound and detrimental impact on Jewish students, ranging from feelings of being unwelcome to avoiding university altogether.

Jewish students have reported feeling unsafe, ostracised, and targeted for their identity. The pervasive nature of these incidents, including verbal abuse, hostile rhetoric, physical threats, and discriminatory actions, has led to a significant decline in their sense of belonging and safety on campus. Many students have expressed a loss of motivation to attend classes, participate in university activities, or even openly express their Jewish identity. The constant exposure to antisemitism both on campus and in the wider world has created an environment where Jewish students feel marginalised and fearful.

The impact statements highlight the emotional distress and anxiety experienced by Jewish students, with some reporting deteriorating mental health, academic performance, and overall university experience. University administrations' inaction and inadequate response have exacerbated these feelings, leading students to distrust reporting systems and feel disempowered to seek help.

As a result, many students have chosen to hide their Jewish identity, avoid certain areas of campus, or refrain from attending university altogether to protect themselves from further harm.

Australasian Union of Jewish Students

Reporting of Antisemitic Incidents

There is significant under-reporting of antisemitic incidents on university campuses, as many Jewish students feel disempowered or fear retaliation.

The Jewish Student Experience Survey revealed a profound distrust in university reporting systems, highlighting a lack of transparency and a perception that university institutions are not adequately addressing antisemitism on campus.[9] This distrust is underscored by the fact that 85% of Jewish students did not report their most impactful incident of antisemitism, with 61% believing that reporting would not make a difference and 47% feeling that the university would not take it seriously.

Additionally, 61% of those reporting incidents were dissatisfied with the outcome. There is an urgent need for cultural and structural change within universities to ensure that campuses are inclusive environments where all students, regardless of faith, ethnicity or cultural background, feel safe and welcome.

In line with existing empirical data and community sentiment, many students are unlikely to feel comfortable providing evidence to the Australian Human Rights Commission (AHRC) at present, given the poor response of the AHRC to the rise of antisemitism on Australian campuses. The need for a judicial inquiry is thereby underscored, particularly insofar as it affords students the opportunity to provide evidence on a confidential basis without concern that their personal data will be leaked or misused.

Student Testimonials

The following testimonials highlight the significant disruptions, including missed classes, that Jewish students face as a result of antisemitism on campus.

Student Testimonial at the University of Sydney

'I am Jewish and from a Hebrew-speaking home. The environment at the USYD makes me feel immensely unsafe and targeted. The university's complacency in this matter truly erodes its reputation as an honourable educational institution, and frankly, if I were the university board, I would be unequivocally ashamed and embarrassed. The ignorance of the USYD as a place of teaching is deeply ironic.'

Student Testimonial at Deakin University

'I am grappling with the fact that I didn't spend the last three weeks [of my diploma] celebrating or having fun with my friends, instead, I have been fighting for my right to exist safely on campus.'

Student Testimonial at the University of Melbourne

'I've almost lost all motivation to continue my studies here, as both the students and institution clearly cares more about their public reputation than protecting the lives and safety of their Jewish students. I feel abandoned and discarded by the university, left exposed to the antisemitic mob that is slowly taking over. I have never felt more alone.'

Student Testimonial at La Trobe University

'A series of graphic, violent, and antisemitic posters ... have made me feel unsafe and caused me to become anxious, unsafe, and intimidated while on campus. This all affected me to a point that I was unable to complete and subsequently fail a subject in semester 2 of 2023... I feel unsafe, unwelcome, and intimidated as a Jewish student at La Trobe University.'

Student Testimonial at Monash University

'I've felt a lot of anxiety about attending my classes. I have skipped tutorials because of [the encampments], which exist at the expense of Jewish students' right to feel unintimidated on campus.'

Student Testimonial at Monash University

'My involvement in campus life has been drastically impacted. This has manifested in several ways – I am significantly more avoidant of campus and have avoided speaking about my ethnicity and place of birth. Revealing my cultural identity [could] place my social and even academic life at risk, contributing to the social isolation I have felt since October.'

Student Testimonial at Deakin University

'I have felt compelled to conceal the most fundamental part of my very being. I have hidden my Magen David necklace under my jumper, fearing that other students would attack me. I have felt stifled and surrounded by hatred... I am a proud Jewish student with a passion for learning, and I do not feel safe at university.'

Student Testimonial at the University of Sydney

'The encampment and the hateful rhetoric surrounding Jews by the Student Representative Council (SRC), with a lack of action from management [have] meant that I have lost most of my friends. The amount of social isolation because the SRC's actions are right and [the] lack of support from management to do anything to stop this has been ridiculous. I have never been so unhappy. This place was once my dream, and now I can't wait to get out of here.'

Student Testimonial at the University of Sydney

'The actions of the disruptive faction within the university community not only defy the principles of 'leadership for good' but also pose a tangible threat to the safety and well-being of students. Their penchant for disruptive behaviour, including banging on windows during meetings and causing disturbances in lectures, is antithetical to the values of unity and inclusivity that should define our academic institution. I was too anxious one week that I couldn't even physically attend University.'

Student Testimonial at the University of Adelaide

'Since the beginning of my university experience, the protests run by the Socialist Alternative have heavily affected my mental health and ruined my intended university experience. The biggest thing is the lack of support from the university, which 'passively' provides support but doesn't 'actively support us. We want the university to acknowledge the pain and suffering Jewish students have faced since October 7th and, building on this, support Jewish students on campus by allowing us, as paying students, to enjoy the same experiences as other paying students, equally.'

Reflections on University Responses

Best Practice Examples

Best practice examples tend to reflect a proactive approach by the universities mentioned below with regard to ensuring that the physical security of Jewish students, academics and staff is safeguarded. However, even in best practice examples, we note that there is nevertheless a normalisation of antisemitic discourse in such settings. While these universities have a far better record than many others in Australia, there remains room for improvement. We note that in the case of all universities, there is a failure to properly identify the boundaries of academic freedom and freedom of speech or to give appropriate berth to the fundamental right of freedom from discrimination.

Deakin University:

Deakin University demonstrated proactive engagement by organising a pre-emptive meeting with AUJS representatives to explain their position and support from a security perspective. The University also took prompt action by positioning campus patrol units near Jewish events and verbally telling protestors to leave before any other university did. Additionally, the SafeZone app was an effective incident-reporting tool that gave Jewish students a reliable resource for reporting incidents.

It does bear noting that we also understand that some members of the community have lodged complaints through the Safer Communities Act regarding serious incidents and discourse, including the spitting on Jewish students by prominent individuals associated with the encampment and anti-Israel protests. To our knowledge, these complaints have not been responded to or addressed. We also understand that some of these complaints have been made directly to the Chancellor and senior management, who have not responded substantively but have instead referred complainants to Safer Communities, meaning there is a gap in terms of addressing reports of antisemitism.

University of New South Wales (UNSW):

UNSW's collaboration with AUJS has been notably effective, particularly in managing protests and ensuring Jewish students' safety during these events. The University's commitment to preventing encampments and maintaining a strong security presence during protests has reassured Jewish students. While there have been some reported incidents of antisemitism as well as some incidents that remain confidential, the UNSW administration has generally been proactive and has considered its responses.

However, we note that while the physical wellbeing of students, academics and professional staff has been well-attended to at UNSW, there is nevertheless an issue regarding psychosocial safety in some settings, and the ongoing and disproportionate platforming of particular speakers who have, on occasion, employed antisemitic tropes.

Various prominent academics have publicly aligned themselves with campaign initiatives and fringe organisations that produce content exacerbating antisemitism, and there is not enough awareness at some levels regarding what constitutes antisemitism. Nonetheless, UNSW has also fostered a supportive environment through structured communication channels with AUJS representatives, ensuring their concerns are heard and addressed promptly in many instances. UNSW should also be commended for proactively responding to the current climate by attempting to foster cultural dialogue between students and designing initiatives that bring students from different backgrounds together to strengthen social cohesion.

The Australian National University (ANU):

In response to a student representative's public statement supporting Hamas, ANU issued a public statement distancing itself from the remarks. The University reiterated its commitment to not tolerating antisemitic behaviour or messaging, emphasising that such conduct does not align with its policies or values. ANU took immediate and appropriate disciplinary action, which included expelling the student involved.

We note, however, that some Jewish students have been personally targeted and physically threatened, and there has not been appropriate involvement of police in such instances. We also note that there has been a proliferation of antisemitic propaganda around the campus and a failure to remove such materials or to make formal complaints to the police about the vilification of Jews through the use of materials by organisations that are present on campus.

Western Sydney University (WSU):

We Commend Professor Jennifer Westacott AO, the Chancellor of Western Sydney University, who publicly stated that the 'hate speech and antisemitism occurring on our campuses is a direct assault on Australia's multiculturalism and its principles'. We believe that more university representatives must follow in the footsteps of Chancellor Westacott AO and publicly draw red lines of acceptable conduct and recognise the prevalence of antisemitism on campus.[10]

Australasian Union of Jewish Students

Managing external actors that engage in university protests - Monash University, the University of Melbourne, and Deakin University:

In response to the Israel-Hamas War, various encampments were established across Australian universities. AUJS, through public statements and meetings with university administrators, brought to their attention that many antisemitic incidents emanating from these encampments were primarily instigated and committed by individuals not affiliated with the universities.

To address this issue, several universities, including Monash University, the University of Melbourne, and Deakin University, implemented measures to safeguard their campuses. These universities erected signage to clarify that external actors were not permitted to engage in protest activities on campus, with violations potentially leading to further consequences. Measures such as checking for university identification were introduced to ensure compliance.

This example highlights how constructive dialogue between AUJS and university administrators can result in practical policies that effectively de-escalate tensions on campus and protect the entire university community.

Monash University

Before October 7th, Monash University effectively engaged with Jewish students through open communication with AUJS' campus affiliate, the Monash University Jewish Students' Society (MonJSS), the Vice-Chancellor, university administrators, the Australian Centre for Jewish Civilisation (ACJC) and campus security.

These consultations with MonJSS have resulted in the university administration understanding the Jewish student experience, which has been pivotal in addressing concerns about rising antisemitism on campuses.

Through proactive relations with MonJSS, the ACJC assisted Monash University in formulating its commitment to support an action-based research program to investigate antisemitism, Islamophobia, and related prejudices, developing initiatives to enhance social cohesion, and making rolling recommendations to the University.

Additionally, Monash has committed to facilitating dialogues between students to foster understanding and peacebuilding between Jewish and Arab students.

Inadequate Responses Examples

University of Sydney (USYD):

The University of Sydney's handling of antisemitic incidents has been marked by a lack of decisive action and an overemphasis on freedom of speech at the expense of student safety. Despite assurances, the University's reluctance to remove offensive posters without explicit approval from the Vice Chancellor's office has hindered swift action against antisemitic propaganda. Much of this inadequacy stems from a failure to enforce standards and policies previously set by the University and Vice Chancellor – including "we will not tolerate any pro-terrorist statements or commentary, including support for Hamas's recent terrorist attacks" (Mark Scott, 26/10/23). This has precipitated a widespread loss of faith in the University of Sydney's internal reporting procedures amongst Jewish students. The inadequate penalties imposed on perpetrators of antisemitic conduct and the bureaucratic hurdles faced by students in reporting incidents have further exacerbated the lack of trust. For example, after an AUJS stall was vandalised and a flag was stolen, the complaints process was protracted and inefficient. Initially, the University claimed there was no CCTV footage of the incident. Only after AUJS filed a GIPA request did they acknowledge identifying footage, taking six months to close the case. This inconsistency and perceived reluctance to enforce policy has left Jewish students feeling unsafe and unsupported.

Furthermore, the University of Sydney's administration has regularly misdirected Jewish community stakeholders who have engaged with the Vice Chancellor, with senior university staff having to apologise for the Vice Chancellor's behaviour towards communal leaders on multiple occasions. Additionally, the University of Sydney has engaged with student groups with reported links to internationally recognised extremist organisations[11] to participate in a working group review of university investments and defence-related research, further undermining the safety and trust of Jewish students.

The University of Melbourne:

The University of Melbourne's responses to antisemitic incidents, while empathetic, have often lacked practical, proactive solutions. Immediately after the October 7th attacks, Jewish student representatives at the University of Melbourne warned the university administration that a failure to intervene early with protests that crossed the line — including calls for an 'intifada' — would lead to the escalation of protest activities. The consequence of the university administration not dealing with a rise in hostility on campus led to the occupation of the Arts West building on campus. We believe proactive measures, such as early

[11] https://www.theage.com.au/national/hate-comes-to-university-campus-but-hides-its-face-20240613-p5jlif intervention in protests that crossed red lines, could have prevented the situation from escalating to the point it ultimately did.

Recommendations

AUJS recommends:

1. Best practice examples of combating antisemitism should be adopted across the tertiary sector.
2. The establishment of a Judicial Inquiry into Antisemitism on Australian University Campuses.

This inquiry should possess authoritative powers to ensure a comprehensive and effective investigation, including the ability to:

- Compel witnesses to appear and produce relevant documents, ensuring a thorough investigation,
- Take sworn evidence, thereby providing a more reliable and factual basis for understanding the extent of antisemitism compared to anecdotal accounts,
- Control hostile witnesses who might attempt to use the platform for political grandstanding, ensuring that the inquiry remains focused on the issue at hand,
- Guarantee anonymity to witnesses who seek it, encouraging more individuals to come forward without fear of retaliation or exposure.

By establishing a Judicial Inquiry with these powers, there can be steps towards effectively addressing and combating antisemitism on university campuses. This inquiry will help uncover the scale of antisemitism on campus and provide a clear and authoritative basis for implementing meaningful and lasting solutions.

Conclusion

AUJS thanks the committee for thoughtfully considering this critical issue and for reviewing our submission. We strongly believe that addressing antisemitism on university campuses is essential for ensuring a safe and inclusive environment for all students. AUJS stands ready to contribute further to this important discussion and would welcome the opportunity to appear at a hearing, should one be scheduled.

AIJAC's Submission to the Senate Legal and Constitutional Affairs Legislation Committee's Inquiry regarding the Commission of Inquiry into Antisemitism at Australian Universities Bill 2024

23 August 2024

The Australia/Israel & Jewish Affairs Council (AIJAC) appreciates the opportunity to make a submission to the Senate Standing Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs inquiry established on July 4, 2024, regarding the Commission of Inquiry into Antisemitism at Australian Universities Bill 2024.

AIJAC is the premier independent public affairs organisation for the Australian Jewish community and conveys the interests of the Australian Jewish community to government, media and other community organisations.

AIJAC is shocked by the strident manifestations of antisemitism that have pervaded many Australian university campuses since the Hamas terror attack on Israel on October 7, 2023. This phenomenon subverts Australian multiculturalism, threatens the security of Jewish students and their ability to participate freely in academic life and undermines academic freedom, not least by demonstrating the inability or unwillingness of many universities to enforce their own codes of conduct.

AIJAC therefore strongly supports the judicial inquiry proposed in the Commission of Inquiry into Antisemitism at Australian Universities Bill 2024 and indeed, any and all well-considered efforts to combat antisemitism on Australian university campuses – a phenomenon which frankly has become something of a national crisis over the past 10 months. An inquiry that has the authority of judicial process, power to subpoena witnesses and take evidence in camera, expertise in legal interpretation and independence from political influence is needed. The currently available alternative processes for conducting such an investigation are inadequate.

Antisemitism on Australian University Campuses

Antisemitism is growing at an alarming rate across the tertiary sector in Australia. Furthermore, beyond its intrinsically repugnant nature and the threats that it poses to student safety and wellbeing, we are concerned that antisemitism on campus is also acting to curtail academic freedom.

A few Australian universities, particularly the Universities of Melbourne and of Sydney, have arguably put their institutions' reputations and funding at risk due to apparent breaches of their statutory duties to ensure academic freedoms for their staff and students in research and education. One of the main difficulties in tackling the problem of antisemitism on Australian campuses is the permissive attitude of Australian university senior executive bodies, especially in certain universities, including, in particular, the University of Sydney.

Sydney University is known as Australia's "first" university, the country's oldest, wealthiest and most prestigious. It has therefore provided a prime target for subversion. It was the first university in Australia where a pro-Palestinian encampment was established, emulating New York City's Columbia University's encampment prototype.[1]

Antisemitic activities at the University of Sydney have resulted in restrictions on academic freedom, disruption of classes, display of hate symbols, restriction on freedom of movement, intimidation and abuse, vilification and incitement, and racial discrimination. This has acted as a model for similar situations at numerous other universities, but Sydney's situation has arguably been the most egregious, and therefore is used as the primary example in this submission.

Disruption of Classes

In the first week of semester, an email was sent out to all staff in the University of Sydney's Faculty of Arts and Social Sciences warning them "that there may be attempted disruption of classes in the next few weeks. Although online classes have been specifically mentioned, physical classes may also be targeted," and alerting staff to keep the phone number of protective services handy.

Protesters did interrupt lectures throughout the semester, making announcements about the situation in Gaza. They asked students to raise their hands if they agreed that Israel was committing genocide and filmed them in intimidating fashion either doing so or not.

In an article published on May 16 in the Australian, Sydney University's Director of European Studies Peter Morgan described feeling "shaken" after his lecture theatre was "hijacked" by "several masked pro-Palestinian protesters" who refused to leave when asked to.[2] He said, "The speaker then shouted me down, accusing me of political cowardice and of supporting genocide. He was verging on physical menace. I again insisted, now extremely angry, that they get out of the lecture hall immediately, at which they began to move away, chanting 'for shame'." Professor Morgan told Vice-Chancellor Mark Scott in a complaint letter that the "university has effectively encouraged this behaviour."

In the same article, revealing that the above incident was not an isolated one, the Australian also reported that a Jewish psychology lecturer had repeatedly asked a group of protesters to leave, "with the male demonstrator and the female lecturer standing very close to each other and exchanging tense words," with the lecturer subsequently offered security for her ongoing lectures.

Display of Hate Symbols

In late 2023, posters and stickers with pro-Palestinian messaging were ubiquitous across university campuses, in both permitted and non-permitted spaces, stuck up by eco-socialist groups in solidarity with Muslim student groups.

The rhetoric on these posters was violent and called for intifada, a reference to the violent Palestinian riots and terrorism campaign from late 1987-1993 and 2000-2005, as well as weekly rallies, meetings on campus, and protests. Campus authorities were slow to remove the posters in unauthorised spaces, even after having been alerted to their existence by distressed Jewish students and staff, for whom it became a matter of personal safety should they be seen removing the posters themselves.

Sydney University's famed "graffiti tunnel" is today almost entirely coated in the colours of red, black and green, with graphics such as watermelons (the colours of the Palestinian flag) spraypainted all over the walls, surrounded by text including "free Palestine", "Palestinian martyrs", "divest", "Israel does not have the right to exist", "intifada", "occupied tunnel – free Palestine" amongst many others, including the word "Hamas" written in Arabic followed by a heart symbol. The images remained for indeterminate periods of time despite reports made to the University about their presence and assurances by the University they would be removed.

A sign that included a picture of the Israeli flag with the Star of David crossed out in red, was prominently hung in the student encampment before it was taken down. Islamist flags representing the Taliban and Hizb ut-Tahrir, the latter a proscribed terrorist group in a number of countries, have also been seen in several university encampments, and non-student activists affiliated with this openly antisemitic group have been alleged to have played a major role in many of the campus protests.[3]

Encampments Restricting Freedom of Movement

Occupants of an encampment at the University of Sydney engaged in intimidation of and incitement against Jewish students and staff.

The Gaza Solidarity encampment was set up on the front lawn of Sydney University's Camperdown campus on April 23 in front of the historic sandstone main quadrangle building. The encampment eventually grew to cover almost the entire expanse of the front lawn and featured makeshift tents with their occupants' towels and washing hung out to dry. It was an eyesore and inappropriate.

Those at the pro-Palestine and anti-Israel encampment escalated to attacks on Zionists on campus, who are mainly Jewish (sometimes referred to as "Zios"). Approximately 95% of Australian Jews support the existence and security of the State of Israel, where approximately half the world's Jewish population lives and where many Australian Jews have family and friends (often with close academic ties).

Monash University protest camps also reportedly featured "Zionists not welcome" signs, which would effectively have sought to bar most Jewish students from campus, though the University did eventually order them removed.[4] Notable in this context are statements in the judicial order issue following a recent US Court case directly against similar behaviour by protesters at UCLA, in which Judge Mark Scarsi was utterly scathing of the University's failings, describing that as "so unimaginable and so abhorrent to our constitutional guarantee of religious freedom."[5] While the Australian legal environment is of course different, the moral and democratic force of Judge Scarsi's comments should also be applicable in Australia.

Racial Vilification and Incitement

Chilling chants were heard emanating from university encampments, including "there is only one solution, intifada, revolution," as well as the ubiquitous "from the river to sea, Palestine will be free."

These chants recall the violent and bloody Palestinian terror campaigns of the late-1980s and early 2000s which saw the murder of well over 1,000 Israelis in suicide bombings, shootings, knifings, car rammings and other methods with the intention of terrorising and slaughtering Jewish civilians.

It is notable that both sides of Australian politics agree that the "River to the Sea" chant is extreme and inappropriate, with Prime Minister Antony Albanese agreeing it can be characterised as very violent, and having no place in our community.[6]

These slogans, inappropriate on university campuses, were tolerated by University Adminstrators, including University of Sydney Vice-Chancellor Mark Scott.

Meanwhile, according to a report in the Australian, Sydney University sociology professor Sujatha Fernandes told a class of first year students in April that reports of Hamas' mass rapes on October 7 were "fake news" and a "hoax" and that the media was "distorting" the conflict.[7] The Australian also reported the University's response that it would "look into the matter as a priority". It is not known what action has been taken.

Macquarie University academic Dr Randa Abdel-Fattah and the group "Families for Palestine" organised an excursion for schoolchildren to the University of Sydney to support the encampment, during which she encouraged the children to lead chants of “intifada, intifada”, as the Australian Jewish News reported[8]. The article also quoted a Sydney University spokesperson who said that the gathering was “in no way an official University of Sydney event, and was led by a speaker who was not from the university,” but failed to condemn the involvement of children in the campus protests. “We have always welcomed the public, including families and their children, onto our iconic campus but parents or carers are responsible for decisions relating to their children and all visitors must abide by the law and our campus access rule” was all the paper quoted the spokesperson stating.

Academic Freedom Restrictions

On March 19, 2024, student protests resulted in a lockdown of the building hosting a student educational exchange fair at the University of Sydney.[9] Students were prevented from learning about educational opportunities at Tel Aviv University and at other universities and were denied choices of academic courses and offerings there, in clear breach of Sydney University’s statutory obligations relating to academic freedom.

On May 22, while visiting Australia on a speaking tour, Colonel Richard Kemp attempted to engage in civil discourse with students at the University of Sydney encampment but was asked by security to leave the campus.

At the University of Melbourne, on April 11, 2024, protesters shut down a lecture to be delivered by an Israeli professor of aeronautics.[10] A similar cancellation of a guest lecture by an engineer from Amazon occurred due to that company’s supposed collaboration with Israel. University of Melbourne engineering staff and students were prevented from engaging in intellectual inquiry about or discussing research in world class aeronautics and information technology research, in clear breach of the University’s legal obligations.

Racial Discrimination

On May 3, the Daily Telegraph reported Vice-Chancellor Mark Scott’s statement that Jewish students would have to deal with feeling “uncomfortable” with the rhetoric heard on campus and which was represented visually in the anti-Israel encampment that was awash with placards highlighting the latest incarnation of the age-old blood-libel; namely, that Israel is committing genocide in Gaza.[11]

It is difficult to imagine another minority group that the University would urge to simply get used to being made to feel "uncomfortable" in the face of what is conveniently described as "free speech". This is also despite the appeals made by representative Jewish communal bodies for the University to recognise that such rhetoric is considered "hate speech" by the overwhelming majority of the Jewish community.

Anecdotes from Australian Campuses

The Australian reported in March that "A broad section of students and staff at the University of Sydney – many of whom wished to remain anonymous for fear of retribution – say they are hiding their faith as the anti-Israel climate gets hotter." This included not wearing identifying symbols like the kippah, or skullcap. One student alleged in an official complaint that fruit had been thrown at him after the October 7 attack.[12]

An anonymous non-Jewish University of Sydney professor, writing in the Australian Jewish News in May, spoke about the atmosphere on campus and said, "I can only imagine how it feels to be a Jewish student on campus. I am not even Jewish and I feel the hostility and threat. I honestly do not think Sydney University is a safe place for Jewish students anymore." The reason they had to sign the article anonymously was "due to the threats from the toxic culture on campus."[13]

Zac Morris, vice-president of the Australasian Union of Jewish Students (AUJS), said in May that "Students are afraid to go to class, they're missing lectures and tutorials. They're being filmed, followed, intimidated." Morris said he was disappointed by the University of Sydney's response after multiple meetings, and criticised rhetoric and posters to "globalise the intifada" and even explicit support for Hamas itself by some far-left groups. "Chanting for intifada is traumatic for us, however it is intended. Jewish students [on] campus have loved ones who were victims of the suicide bombings of the second intifada [in the 2000s]," he said.[14]

When University of Sydney students passed a motion supporting "armed resistance" (i.e. terrorism) in August, while rejecting a motion to condemn the actions of Hamas on October 7, Morris said, "Expressing support for the brutal terrorism of October 7 as 'resistance' is an explicit endorsement of violence. For Jewish students who study and live on campus, that is absolutely terrifying."[15]

Lack of Disciplinary Action

On March 28, 2024, a complaint was made to the University of Sydney's Vice-Chancellor's Chief of Staff Darren Goodsir by members of the Australian Academic Alliance Against Antisemitism (5A) at the University of Sydney. The complaint concerned the harmful campus situation. Key issues in the complaint included:

- Encampment activities that are hateful and intimidating
- Hateful posters on campus
- Hate speech on internal electronic discussion boards and all-staff distribution emails
- External professional agitators on campus
- Threats to the safety of Jews on-campus

It was treated as a complaint about student conduct and was passed to the Student Affairs Unit (SAU) under the Student Complaints Procedure. The SAU decided that there was no evidence that the conduct of any specific student breached University policies. The SAU dismissed elements of the complaint made by the University of Sydney 5A staff.

In its outcome letter concerning a complaint about protests during which students chanted the word "intifada", the University acknowledged that use of the word "intifada" has an inherent link to violence in terrorist acts, and that at times violence and terrorism occurring across the Middle East has been a feature of events that were characterised as intifada, but declined to accept this interpretation in the cultural context of current pro-Palestine protests. It ludicrously asserted that use of the word is more appropriately viewed as an expression of a political stance in connection with pro-Palestinian activism as opposed to being a statement in support of terrorist acts.

Appeasement of Extremism

Sydney University also attempted to negotiate with anti-Israel students from the camp in a move to have the encampment disband. In a shocking display of appeasement and almost total capitulation to extremism, in an email to the University community on May 28, Vice-Chancellor Scott proposed, amongst other things, that the University would:

> establish a working group to undertake a comprehensive independent review of our research partnerships," and "The review would include, but not be restricted to: Analysis of existing University of Sydney institutional defence research ties with a view to maximising transparency of our research contracts, research grant arrangements, and the parties who support our research projects.

The working group would be comprised of representatives from the University's student, staff and alumni communities, University leadership and independent members, with student representatives of the encampment group being "invited to put forward names of individuals for membership in the working group." No similar involvement was offered to Jewish student groups – thus giving the protest encampment activists an acknowledged and privileged role in permanently shaping university policies.

Yet this offer was categorically and immediately rejected by the encampment, and it did not disband. In fact, the Students Against War Instagram page stated in its rejection that "Next semester we will step up the fight. This means every classroom, every lecture hall and auditorium, every exam, every free space of the university's walls, poles and cafes, must be filled with our demands: disclose, divest and cut ties now." This suggests the problems – and abuse of Jewish students – at Sydney are likely to recur.

On June 5, Scott sent an email announcement to all students and staff that reiterated his appeasement offer. Like the offer on May 28, the renewed offer included the University's "commitment to reviewing our investment and divestment policies," and the establishment of a working group that would include a representation of the University's student, staff and alumni communities, University leadership and independent members, again with student representatives of the encampment group being invited to put forward names of individuals for membership in the working group.

The offer also included a commitment, to disclose, subject "to relevant laws and regulations, including but not limited to confidentiality obligations, national security requirements, and the privacy, health and safety of our staff and students" all "defence- and security-related research activities including research contracts, research grants" and "our investments in defence- and security-related industries."

Lip Service to Academic Freedom

Correspondence from Vice-Chancellor Scott to staff and students on June 5 defensively claimed that the University of Sydney maintains academic freedom:

> We have been steadfast in our commitment to the principles of academic freedom and free speech. The University will therefore continue to support the right of our academics and students to do research, partner with industry and collaborate with people from around the world. Like other Group of Eight universities, we have been clear that we will not meet demands to restrict student exchanges, academic partnerships or institutional relationships.

Nevertheless, the University has not remedied its shutting down of access to information concerning academic exchanges with Tel Aviv University and other universities that were obstructed on March 19. There have since been no presentations by Israeli academics facilitated at the University of Sydney.

What has transpired at the University of Sydney illustrates the general climate of threats to academic freedom and safety and welfare at all Australian universities – which in turn threatens the ability of Jewish students of fully participate freely in Australian campus life.

The Regulatory Environment of Australian Universities

Australian universities operate within a highly complex regulatory environment. Federal and state laws apply to them, some legislated specifically to regulate their academic activities, others applicable generally to them as employers, workplaces, public spaces, speech platforms and community actors.

Federal laws legislated specifically to regulate the academic activities of tertiary education providers include the Higher Education Support Act (HES Act) and Tertiary Education Quality and Standards Agency Act (TEQSA Act). Federal laws applicable generally to universities as workplaces include the Racial Discrimination Act 1975 and Australia's Criminal Code.

Under the federal TEQSA Act (Section 58), Threshold Standards can be adopted by the Minister to set out requirements that a higher education provider must meet. Among the Threshold Standards are obligations to ensure a 'safe environment is promoted and fostered' (section 2.3.4) and 'an institutional environment in which freedom of speech and academic freedom are upheld and protected' (section 6.4.1). Under the federal HES Act, quality and accountability requirements include that academic freedom requirements be met (section 19.15) and that the higher education provider comply with TEQSA standards.

Under the federal Criminal Code, it is prohibited to urge violence against groups (section 80.2A), advocate terrorism (section 80.2C), to display proscribed hate symbols (section 80.2E), or to harass, threaten or distribute violent extremist material via a carriage service (section 474). Cyber-bullying is prohibited under the federal Online Safety Act (section 46). Racial vilification is sought to be restrained under civil law provisions in the federal Racial Discrimination Act 1975, where vilification is defined as an act that is reasonably likely to "offend, insult, humiliate or intimidate" someone because of their race or ethnicity.

Australian universities are usually constituted under state laws, other than those universities located within Australian federal territories. Generally, a dedicated constitutive law, such as the University of Sydney Act enacted by the NSW Parliament, establishes the University and its fundamental structure. Other state laws are generally applicable to universities, including legislation on racial discrimination, racial vilification and equal opportunity, as well as criminal laws.

Under their constitutive legislation, Australian parliaments have delegated sufficient powers to university administrations to enable them to adopt regulatory and policy frameworks to implement each university's academic mission.

University chancellors and councils have statutory and fiduciary duties to oversee key performance indicators and put in place strategies to remedy failures to meet them.

In AIJAC's view, this framework has failed in the wake of the wave of the antisemitism crisis which has impacted universities since October 7, 2023. It is incumbent upon our political representatives to create mechanisms to identify the extent and nature of this failure, discover why it occurred, and consider remedies which would prevent a continuation or repetition of the antisemitism crisis currently afflicting the Australian tertiary sector.

Governance Failures by Australian University Administrations

It is the contention of AIJAC that several other prominent Australian universities are also non-compliant with TEQSA standards requiring the promotion of a safe environment on campus and to ensure academic freedom. They have declined to take action using the powers available to meet their legal obligations to restrain racial vilification, threats of violence against groups, or distribution of violent, extremist or racist material. They have also failed to fulfil their statutory obligations to ensure a safe environment in which to learn and teach and have failed to protect academic freedom. They have failed to utilise the powers available to them to combat antisemitism.

University administrators might claim that they were forced to choose between campus safety and academic freedom and freedom of expression. However, in many cases, the respective vice-chancellors failed to design, adopt or implement appropriate policies. They failed to acknowledge or to condemn the breaches of academic freedom and campus safety. In each case, they failed to implement existing student and staff codes of conduct by means of disciplinary proceedings and failed to follow up with remedial action.

Most Australian universities have declined to adopt the working definition of antisemitism formulated by the International Holocaust Remembrance Alliance (IHRA) – while others that have adopted it appear to have failed to recognise when examples of antisemitism as set out in the definition have been occurring on their campuses, or take action accordingly.

Even though this definition makes it quite clear that legitimate criticism of Israel is not antisemitic, many academics have unjustifiably argued that the definition restricts free speech, and prevents criticism of Israeli policies toward the Palestinians.

AIJAC has been made aware of multiple occasions on which both students and staff have found that the grievance procedures at most universities proved inadequate. As mentioned above, students are frightened to make formal reports where they must include their names for fear that they will be penalised by their lecturers or targeted by fellow students. When students have reported a grievance, they have found the whole procedure difficult and time consuming. Where action was taken by the university administration, it was often felt that the outcome was unsatisfactory, and did not act as a disincentive for students to engage in antisemitic conduct or public speech.

Why a Judicial Inquiry is Needed

Given the above, AIJAC believes there are no satisfactory alternatives to a judicial inquiry focussed on antisemitism, able to provide a comprehensive picture of the state of antisemitism on University campuses, the responses of university administrations to date, and whether these response fulfill the legal and moral obligations of such administrations, the regulatory framework for universities in this respect, and whether changes to that framework are needed.

The Australian Human Rights Commission inquiry (AHRC) into racism at universities established by the Federal Government earlier this year is inadequate for the reasons explained below, and cannot substitute for an actual judicial inquiry focused exclusively on the antisemitism crisis.

Why an Australian Human Rights Commission Inquiry is Inadequate

The inquiry will comprise a $2.5 million study into racism at universities. It will address all forms of racism, including antisemitism, Islamophobia and anti-Arab racism, and systemic racist practices against indigenous students and staff. It will investigate "systemic racist practices that limit people's right to education and progression in employment." It is due to report in 2026.

This is a broad-brush approach without a specific focus on antisemitism, which will, in all likelihood, fail to address the unique aspects of antisemitism. AHRC has announced it will have "a strong focus on First Nations students and staff" – antisemitism is thus likely to be at best a secondary issue or, at worst, an afterthought.[16] It will be also conducted under the leadership of Race Discrimination Commissioner Giridharan Sivaraman, who has no record on combatting antisemitism and indeed, the AHRC has been widely criticised in the Jewish community for saying next to nothing about the explosive rise in antisemitism in Australia since October 7, 2023.

Another concern is that the Australian Human Rights Commission has no powers to compel vice-chancellors or other administrators to provide evidence.

Advantages of Holding a Judicial Inquiry

There are a number of substantive reasons for holding a judicial inquiry into antisemitism. The Commission of Inquiry into Antisemitism at Australian Universities Bill 2024 specifies that the Royal Commissions Act 1902 would apply to the proposed inquiry as if the latter were a Royal Commission. These include the advantages of judicial authority and independence, powers to compel evidence and to take evidence in camera and immunity from defamation suits.

This means that the inquiry would be able to:

- compel evidence as testimony or documents
- call vice chancellors and management to account, and
- hold interviews in camera for staff who fear adverse consequences such as losing jobs.

Furthermore, any evidence provided to the inquiry is privileged, which means that it is immune to threats of defamation proceedings. Nor would the inquiry be restricted in the way that it deals with agencies or employees of the Crown.

[16] "Commission to lead historic anti-racism study into universities", Australian Human Rights Commission website, 15 May, 2024 - https://humanrights.gov.au/about/news/commission-lead-historic-anti-racism-study-universities.

The chair of a commission of inquiry would be an independent federal judge with relevant experience. Preferably this would mean specialist experience in adjudicating matters concerning racism and/or university affairs. He or she would be able to seek assistance from individuals with professional or academic expertise specifically on identifying the varieties, forms and drivers of antisemitism – which all serious experts agree has quite distinct characteristics compared to other forms of racism and ethnic prejudice.

Given all the above, AIJAC believes there are no satisfactory alternatives to a judicial inquiry focussed on antisemitism on Australian campuses if there is to be any serious attempt to tackle this clear and present crisis. As noted above, we believe the goals of such an inquiry should be:

1. To provide a comprehensive picture of the state of antisemitism on university campuses.
2. To assess both the effectiveness of the responses of university administrations to date, and whether these responses fulfill the legal and moral obligations on such administrations.
3. And to review the regulatory framework for universities with respect to antisemitism and other forms of intolerance on university campuses, and whether changes to that framework are required to fulfill the obligations identified in goal #2 above.

AIJAC strongly urges the Committee to recommend the Commission of Inquiry into Antisemitism at Australian Universities Bill 2024 be passed as essential to dealing with the ongoing antisemitism crisis in this country, and to Australia's ability, as a multicultural democracy, to protect a minority group currently under threat and also maintain the integrity of our vitally important higher education system.

Dear Commissioners

As the largest Jewish Day School in Australia, Moriah College takes immense pride in fostering a strong sense of Jewish identity and Zionism among our students. Our educational philosophy encourages them to embrace their Jewish heritage with confidence and to carry that pride into the wider world.

Recognising that antisemitism has long been prevalent on university campuses, we have proactively developed programs to equip our students with the tools and knowledge necessary to advocate for Israel and to stand proudly in their Jewish identity.

Since October 7, 2023, however our alumni have reported that the situation has significantly worsened. Many students are now questioning whether they will have an emotionally and physically safe experience at an Australian university. They do not feel that they will be protected by the institutions meant to safeguard their wellbeing, and they fear for their physical and emotional safety.

Our alumni are sharing troubling accounts of encountering antisemitism in different forms across campus environments.

These include:

- Encampments and public speeches: Alumni have witnessed and been affected by organised encampments and speeches in public areas that promote antisemitic rhetoric and hostile attitudes toward Jewish students.
- Stickers, placards, and leaflets: In open spaces such as university outdoor spaces, libraries and student recreation areas, our alumni have reported seeing antisemitic stickers, placards, and leaflets. These materials often contain harmful stereotypes, offensive imagery, and messages that perpetuate discrimination and hatred.
- Classroom discussions: Worryingly, antisemitic sentiments have also surfaced in academic settings. Some alumni have recounted instances where lectures and tutorials included discussions or comments that were either explicitly or implicitly antisemitic, leaving Jewish students feeling isolated and targeted.

- Lecturer and Tutor remarks: Alumni have also reported that some lecturers and tutors express antisemitic and anti-Israel remarks during class. When students attempt to question these views, they are often shouted down, leaving no room for open discussion. Furthermore, alumni have observed that facts are sometimes distorted in class by revisionists who promote anti-Zionist and antisemitic rhetoric based on false information.

This anxiety has only intensified with the perception that antisemitism on campus has become endemic. Alumni fear that universities have become places where those harbouring antisemitic views will refuse to engage in any meaningful dialogue aimed at mutual understanding. Instead, Jewish students feel they will be met with nothing but hatred and hostility.

Given the gravity of these concerns, we assert that only a judicial inquiry with the power to compel witnesses, seize documents, provide immunities, and take evidence in camera—ensuring witnesses are free from reprisals—will be sufficient to achieve the cultural change necessary within the university sector to properly deal with antisemitism.

Establishing a judicial inquiry that considers the direct experiences of those already on campus and the profound impact this environment is having on prospective students is of the utmost importance. The future of higher education should be one of inclusion, safety, and respect for all students, regardless of their background.

Submission to the Australian Senate on Antisemitism in Australian Universities

Date: August 21, 2024

Subject: Addressing Antisemitism in Australian Universities

Introduction

I write as the CEO and co-founder of “Never Again Is Now Ltd”, Australia’s largest grassroots, non-Jewish, movement founded to combat antisemitism in Australia. Since Oct 7th 2023 we have organised rallies against antisemitism in Sydney, Adelaide, Brisbane, and Melbourne, with 25,000 people attending. In this role I have travelled the country listening to the Jewish experience and mobilising everyday Australians to stand against this ancient hatred.

The issue of antisemitism in Australian universities has escalated to a point where it not only affects the educational environment but also poses significant safety and psychological threats to Jewish students and faculty. In my role as CEO of “Never Again Is Now” I have visited the universities of Sydney, Melbourne, Monash, and the University of Queensland. My experience speaking to Christians and Jewish groups on these campuses confirms that antisemitism poses a substantial risk to both the Jewish and Christian communities of students and staff.This submission aims to highlight the current state of antisemitism on university campuses, its implications, and recommendations for legislative and institutional actions.

Current Scenario:

- Incidents of Antisemitism: There is a disturbing trend in Australia where Jewish students are being denied access to education, subjected to verbal abuse, and even physical threats. Instances include Nazi salutes during student union meetings, open calls for the support of terror groups such as Hamas, calls to ‘globalise the intifada’, and calls for the destruction of the Jewish state of Israel. There have also been direct confrontations denying Jewish students' right to be on campus, and the disruption of academic activities with anti-Israel and anti-Jewish protests.

- Institutional Response: The institutional response of the Universities has, in the main, failed to take seriously the threat that resurgent antisemitism brings to the safety of students and staff, to the cohesion of the campus, to the educational outcomes for Jewish students, and for the academic freedom of staff and students.
- Outside influence: There is evidence that these antisemitic activities on campus are funded and staffed by external groups, with a fundamentalist, jihadist agenda, such as Hiz TuHabir
- Obfuscation and deception: many on campus argue that calls for the destruction of Israel are not antisemitic. That being ‘anti-zionist’ is not the same as being ‘anti-semitic’. This is in clear defiance of the lived experience of Jewish staff and students, and most Christian students, for whom the right of the State of Israel to exist, and to defend itself, as a homeland and refuge for the Jewish people, the original inhabitants of the land, is a central tenet both of their religious texts and their personal religious experience.

Implications:

- Educational Impact: The hostile environment directly affects the academic performance and mental health of Jewish students and staff, leading some to consider leaving their studies or the country.
- Community Cohesion: Such incidents foster a divisive atmosphere, undermining the principles of diversity and inclusion that universities should uphold. In the longer term, the toleration of these incidents on our campus pose a serious threat to the long term social cohesion of Australia.
- Global Perception: Australia's reputation as an inclusive and safe educational destination is at risk, potentially affecting international student enrollment.

Recommendations for Action:

1. Legislative Measures:
    - Establish a Commission of Inquiry: As per the Commission of Inquiry into Antisemitism at Australian Universities Bill 2024, this commission should investigate the extent of antisemitism, its sources, and recommend legal frameworks to combat it.
    - Legislation Against Hate Speech: Enhance laws to explicitly cover antisemitic hate speech, ensuring that universities can legally act against such behavior.
    - Legislation Against Sedition: Calls to 'globalise the intifada' are calls to use violence to overthrow the elected government of Australia. So too are calls to establish an Islamic Caliphate. There must be leglislation that responds to this threat appropriately.
2. University Policies:
    - Mandatory Training: Implement mandatory training for all students and staff on antisemitism, in particular its religious history in Christianity and Islam, and its current manifestations in Jihadist Islam and radical left ideologies.
    - Safety of all students: A zero tolerance policy of threats and intimidation of Jewish staff and students, including the tearing down of Israeli flags and shouting down of pro-Israel students.
    - Incident Reporting: Develop a streamlined, confidential reporting system for antisemitic incidents, ensuring swift and appropriate responses.
3. Cultural and Educational Initiatives:
    - Awareness Campaigns: Universities should run campaigns to educate the broader student body about Jewish culture, history, and the realities of antisemitism. In particular this must include the history of antisemitism in Islam and the Christian Church over the past 1,400 years.
    - Interfaith Dialogues: Promote interfaith activities to foster understanding and reduce prejudice.
4. Monitoring and Accountability:

- Regular Audits: Universities should undergo regular audits regarding their handling of antisemitism, with results made public to ensure transparency.
- Accountability: Hold university administrations accountable for their response to antisemitic incidents, with sanctions for non-compliance.

Conclusion:

The prevalence of antisemitism in Australian universities is not just a matter of individual incidents but reflects a systemic issue that requires immediate and comprehensive action. By addressing this problem through legislation, policy changes, and educational initiatives, Australia can reaffirm its commitment to equality, safety, and educational integrity for all its citizens and international students. This submission urges the Senate to consider these recommendations seriously to ensure that Australian universities remain places of learning, tolerance, and respect for all.

Dear Committee Secretary,

Thank you for the opportunity to make a submission to your inquiry into the above Bill to establish a judicial inquiry into antisemitism at universities. This inquiry is a crucial first step for the Australian Jewish community in seeking accountability for the rise in antisemitic incidents and discourse on Australian university campuses, and the culture of Jew-hatred that is becoming normalised in academic settings.

The Australian Association of Jewish Holocaust Survivors and Descendants was established in 1983 to support and act as a spokesperson for the survivors and their families as well as to liaise with other Jewish and community organisations. The aims of the Association are to represent Holocaust survivors and their descendants; to perpetuate the memory of the martyrs and heroes of the Shoah; to cooperate with and support other organisations both Jewish and in the non-Jewish community; the organisation of and encouragement of Holocaust education; combatting Holocaust denial and antisemitism; to take part in and organise Holocaust commemorations; and the establishment of a Holocaust Museum in Sydney. Most of these aims have been achieved over the years particularly the establishment of the Sydney Jewish Museum in which the Association played a major role.

Despite the success of these aims recent events have seen a precipitous and dangerous rise in antisemitism particularly on our university campuses. The public expression of antisemitism often in the guise of anti-Zionism with the exclusion of people of the Jewish faith from social and community activities, the vilification of Jewish individuals for no other reason than that they are Jewish and the open attacks, sometimes physical upon Jews, has resulted in a considerable and frightening rise in anxiety in Holocaust survivors. It is a stark reminder of their horrific experiences during the Holocaust when their very lives were at extreme risk. Being the child of two survivors and knowing that members of my family and my wife's family were murdered in the gas chambers of Auschwitz, I, myself, was extremely distressed by the shouts of "gas the Jews" and "where are the Jews" on the Opera House steps.

Only recently the Students Union of Sydney University passed a resolution to abolish the state of Israel which, for survivors, reads as yet another call for the extermination of the Jewish people at least those living in Israel if not worldwide. The continued expressions of hostility to the Jews particularly on university campuses coupled with the lack of action by university authorities and academic staff only exacerbates the feelings of anxiety and despair of survivors. My granddaughter, Alissa Foster, who was the President of the Australasian Union of Jewish Students in 2023, has experienced the extent of antisemitism in Australian universities. She spent many hours combatting prejudice with little assistance from faculty and university staff. Despite this, she made a significant impact until the appalling events of 7 October 2023 following which there was a vast flood of antisemitism which was far more difficult to deal with.

It appears that the Australian Human Rights Commission has done little, if anything to combat antisemitism in particular sine the atrocities of 7 October 2023. Despite having been notified of antisemitic acts and the massive surge of antisemitism over the past ten months, the Commission has made few, if any public statement upon this issue nor proposed any effective strategy to combat it in the public sphere. This applies as much to the issue faced on university campuses by Jewish students. Therefore, it is the position of the Association that a judicial inquiry into antisemitism on university campuses in Australia is the only effective way to establish the truth about the nature and extent of antisemitic incidents and discourse at universities across Australia while preserving the confidentiality of Jewish students', academics and professional staff's personal data and protecting their security.

We fully support the submissions to the Inquiry by the Executive Council of Australian Jewry (sub97) and Youth HEAR (sub111) which outline in more detail the arguments in favour of the establishment of a Judicial Inquiry into Antisemitism at Australian Universities. The Association believes that the establishment of such an inquiry is only the first step in examining the nature and extent of what has become systemic antisemitism on university campuses Australia wide. Given the role and aims of the Association, we would also recommend the inclusion of Holocaust denial and minimisation in the Bill as well as the inclusion of the International Holocaust Remembrance Alliance definition of antisemitism as these would significantly enhance the role of the Inquiry.

I would also be happy to discuss the contents of this submission.

Yours sincerely,

Dr George Foster OAM
President

It's important to note that being Jewish and being Zionist are inextricably linked. It is a fundamental part of our Jewish identity, despite what some protestors may assert. Zionism is not a political ideology, but the deep seeded, ancestral and spiritual connection that we, the Jewish people, have with our homeland based on our historic connection and indigeneity to the land. The overwhelming majority of Jewish Australians and Jews around the world identify as Zionists. It is impossible to separate our Jewish, cultural identity with our belief in Israel's right to exist. This is why protestors calling for Israel to cease to exist, denying Israel's right to defend itself, hurling slurs with the word "Zionist", and calling Israel a genocidal state (and thereby all its people) are inherently racist.

As a parent, I have witnessed firsthand the impact of blatant antisemitism and anti Zionist activity on my daughter, who studies at Deakin University. My daughter and her peers must walk around campus knowing there are students and non-student actors publicly calling for the destruction of Israel, the only Jewish state in the world. I was born in Israel, as was my husband and our parents. We are directly connected to Israel not only through family, but as a global tribe of people who are indigenous to the land and have been thousands of years. But none of that matters when you are a Jewish person, especially on campus. Not to protestors, not to bystanders, and seemingly, not to the University administration.

My daughter has had Pro Palestinian activists come into lectures before classes wearing keffiyahs, a symbol of Palestinian resistance. This has caused her to feel unsafe and shocked, and unable to concentrate for some of her classes. One activist came in and talked about the upcoming encampment at Deakin which he described as 'amazing movements" from the US. (In America, Jewish students were physically and verbally assaulted by members of the encampments, barred from moving through campus and openly harassed. Very amazing.)

As the PP activists grew louder and bolder, my daughter and her peers started avoiding certain parts of campus to minimise exposure to offensive posters and activists handing out flyers, not always possible when you have to move around the grounds. University became (and is still) a place of dread. My daughter began to feel culturally unsafe – she would conceal her ethnic background, or that she'd spent a gap year in Israel.

But the worst event was the Pro Palestinian rally in May 2024, which I attended with her. I suspected that the environment and conduct would breach ethical and university codes, and to my disgust, these fears were confirmed. My daughter and I stood quietly on the side of the rally and observed. We were heckled, harassed, verbally abused, photographed and endured the crowd and speakers chanting belittling racial slurs, in broad daylight, in front of police, University security and staff.

We were called "Zionists" as if we were sub-human. I watched two big, tattooed men (not students) openly harass and follow a student with an Israeli and Australian flag for an hour (no one did anything). One of the organisers physically harassed a flag waver by coming up and blaring a siren in their face.

The slurs we heard that day included:

“Fuck off Zionist scum”

“Fuck off Zionists”

“The university has come under attack by far-right creeps like the people over there gathered”

“Shame Zionists shame”

“There are people here today who will wave a flag of a genocidal regime who have conducted an historic, fascist, bloodthirsty, blood curdling genocide. And those people want to talk to us about dialogue and peace. If that was me, I’d be running for the hills. If that was me, I’d be hiding under my bed.”

“From the River to the Sea” – calling for the destruction of Israel

Social media from the Palestinian Students for Deakin University that day included a post saying “Deakin University under Zionists Attack”.

No one stopped this event, which ran for an hour or so. Complaints to the university are submitted with no further information or updates, they disappear into a black hole. Perhaps the university thinks we will forget about them if they drag the complaints out? How can any Jewish student feel safe again when this conduct is tolerated? Or when suspended students reappear on campus to take part in student activism?

We felt and still feel isolated, unsupported, shocked, angry, and vilified. We have little faith in the university. No one returns calls as they will not discuss anything in person. We keep being referred to their codes, policies and safety lines. This is highly insensitive and impersonal. Where is the leadership? Where is the accountability? Why won’t anyone in leadership have a face-to-face conversation with my daughter about this? There is no indication for any Jewish student that this racial vilification will not happen again (and again).

Imagine you swapped any of the slurs above from Zionist to any other minority group? Would this be allowed by any university? If students opposed gay marriage, could they get up and chant “shame gays, shame” or “fuck off gays”. If students were protesting the Voice, could they be allowed to chant “Fuck off” to that group, or any other?

I am outraged this has been allowed in broad daylight at Deakin. I am angry this has taken away from my daughter’s university experience, which is meant to be fun, formative, stimulating and a growth opportunity. Instead, my daughter and her peers (who already endured Covid in their final years of high school) will keep these memories as core to their uni experience – when activists, in the name of “free speech” were allowed to hurl racist slurs at them in public with no consequences.

Many Jewish students I know of now use their own coping mechanisms, as the universities have failed to support them and keep them safe. So some learn online, change their routes on campus, minimise their time at university, conceal their cultural identity, stop engaging with others they don't know, don't complain about lecturers because of fear of being penalised, don't complain to universities because they have no faith in any change, changed universities or have even deferred to have a break from the stress.

It is a disgrace and evident of the weakness of university leadership, of pandering to the angry mob in an attempt to diffuse them. But the problem with bullies (and toddlers!) is that if you don't hold your boundaries firm, they will go farther each time, testing you each time, with worse and worse behaviour.

There are graver examples you will no doubt hear from other submissions. Jewish students evicted from their share houses because they are Jewish. Students asked to clarify if they are Zionists or not in class. Complicity from academic staff in teaching and spreading antisemitic content and positions. Jewish academics told they can attend a PP event unless they are a Zionist (since when is it acceptable to ask staff and students for a position on a topic?).

Racist slurs that include "Zionists" must be banned from campus or any public place as should "from the river to the sea". Consequences of breaching codes should be serious and swift. Transparent and fast communication is required, particularly in light of the distress suffered by Jewish students.

Campus should be safe for all students. It is a colossal failing that this inquiry even had to occur. Had the University leadership around Australia had some conviction, antisemitism on campus would have been stamped out. Instead, it's festered and grown. Let's get it right and keep university campuses safe for all our students, before it's too late. This enquiry is important, but the outcomes even more. All this behaviour is on the record already. The question is, what will change to make universities safe for all students, including Jewish ones?

Submission regarding The Commission of Inquiry into Antisemitism at Australian Universities Bill 2024 (No. 2).

To whom it may concern,

My name is Dror Liraz and I am an Israeli-born Australian Jew with great pride for both of my nations and a second-year University of Sydney veterinary student.

I worked incredibly hard to get to where I am today – my degree is a difficult one and my career will be no different – but when I started my degree at the beginning of 2023, I was excited for all the challenges that lay ahead.

Now, almost one year on from the atrocities of the 7th of October, I am on the brink of leaving.

Antisemitism at the university is at an all-time high and the social exclusion is unbearable. Just last week, a group of protesters disrupted my lecture for a ten-minute rant on the evils of Israel and Zionism and the need to eliminate the state of Israel and support armed resistance.

I have suffered the encampment, calls for intifada (by students, professors, and politicians on campus), harrowing graffiti, and daily harassment from those trying to spread anti-Jewish sentiment. But my experience is comparatively an untroubled one. I have heard stories of students stalked to class, doxed, threatened in exams, and yelled at by an auditorium full of antisemites.

Although there has always been an antisemitic sentiment at the university (which is already reason enough for an inquiry), the war has created a hostile environment which is left to fester by an ignorant and racist university leadership and, at its head, Vice-Chancellor Mark Scott.

Despite numerous emails and meetings with Mark Scott initiated by me, other students, and student and community organisations, the VC has done nothing for Jewish students in their hour of greatest pain and months of ensuing hate.

The VC would have you think that antisemitism is not a major problem at the university. Indeed, he equates antisemitism with Islamophobia and homophobia in every university-wide email he sends to students regarding the conflict. A few months ago, he sent an email to those who had regularly complained to him about antisemitism under the guise that it was a personal letter from him – instead, we realised it was a generic email attempting to silence and patronise us.

Mark Scott's submission to this inquiry claims that a judicial inquiry into antisemitism at universities would be POLARISING and DIVISIVE. This is a ludicrous claim. How would addressing a form of hate (one of the oldest forms of hate) be divisive?

Mark Scott allows students and professors to chant for intifada claiming it is a contextual slogan, he allows them to fly the flags of terrorists claiming they are Muslim calligraphy, he allows big red crosses to be drawn over Stars of David (not the Israeli flag, but Stars of David), and he allows the Student Representative Council to vote for a motion supporting armed resistance against Israel and Israelis.

The VC's pathetic claim that an inquiry would be polarising is merely an attempt to mask his unwillingness to act against antisemitism since its dramatic rise in October last year.

I have spoken to Jewish students in year 12 from varying schools and backgrounds who have told me they will base their decision of tertiary institution not on the merits of that institution but on the chances that they will experience antisemitism. This is unacceptable. We are allowing a generation of young Australian Jews to segregate themselves from quality higher education based on appalling precedents set by unqualified, racist university leaders.

I applaud those who put forward this inquiry.

Thank you,

Dror Liraz

Submissions in support of

Commission of Inquiry into Antisemitism at Australian Universities Bill 2024 (No. 2)

INTRODUCTION

1. These submissions are filed in support of the Commission of Inquiry into Antisemitism at Australian Universities Bill 2024 (No. 2) (the Bill).

2. As a result of the barbaric Hamas atrocities of 7 October 2023, there has been a pernicious surge in antisemitism that has infected all areas of Australian society including, in particular, Australian Universities.

3. However, not only have many of Australia's leading universities tolerated this antisemitism - some have in effect incited and fanned the flames of such Jew-hatred by permitting – under the guise of freedom of speech - prominent academics in their employ to publish antisemitic vilification and hate-speech. Such vilification is perceived to constitute intimidation, bullying, and harassment. More seriously, it is liable to create a new generation of antisemites.

4. Universities have thus become the new breeding grounds for antisemitism – and this situation, already dire, is liable to become considerably worse.

5. History has demonstrated that antisemitism is not simply a Jewish problem. When the virus of antisemitism infects a society, it is the society as a whole that suffers.

6. It is, therefore, manifestly in the public interest that a Judicial Commission of Inquiry into Antisemitism at Australian Universities be established as a matter of extreme urgency.

7. These submissions will address

a. my qualifications to make these submissions;

b. the cause of the surge in antisemitism at universities – and why it must not be ignored;

c. the definition of antisemitism, focusing on

   i. the IHRA definition of antisemitism and

   ii. the three Ds - Double standards, demonisation and delegitimization; and

   iii. the false assertion that one can be anti-Zionist while not being antisemitic: Zionism is an inherent aspect of Judaism;

d. examples of antisemitic vilification published by academic staff of UNSW and Macquarie University;

e. double-standards adopted by universities in relation to protection of Jewish students and Jewish members of Staff;

f. the need for a judicial commission of enquiry is essential; an AHRC enquiry will be entirely inappropriate and counter-productive in the circumstances;

g. 'straw men' often raised to obfuscate the serious issue of antisemitism –

   i. claims of antisemitism are deployed to prevent mere criticism of Israeli policies, and

   ii. the false assertion that Jews and/or Israelis and/or descendants of Holocaust survivors cannot be antisemitic.

BASIS OF QUALIFICATION TO MAKE SUBMISSION

8. I am in a position to make submissions in relation to the Bill because

   a. I am a practising barrister, and am a member of the NSW Bar and am also a religiously observant, practising, Jew. I have witnessed antisemitism at university in both my personal and professional capacities;

   b. I have had substantial professional experience in dealing with antisemitism at Australian Universities since late 2022;

c. I have over the period of my adult life held various positions of leadership in the Jewish Community, and have had substantial experience in dealing with Jewish youth, including youth of University age. I arrived in Australia in June 1989 to serve as the Activities and Youth Director at the Central Synagogue in Sydney, which is the largest synagogue in the Southern hemisphere, and which has the largest Jewish congregation in Australasia.[1] Over the past few decades, I have conducted (and still do conduct) a Young Adult Service (which includes University students) over the Jewish High Holidays. I have been a Director of Moriah College, and am, inter alia, a Director of Kehillat Kadimah, a prominent Synagogue in Sydney, and am on the Board of the Australian Jewish Association. (These submissions, however, are made in my personal capacity.)

Cause of surge in antisemitism at universities must not be ignored: a judicial commission of enquiry is essential

9. Antisemitism has been described as the "world's oldest hatred."[2] It did not begin on 7 October 2023.

10. I acted professionally in late 2022 early 2023 for an extremely talented student at the UTS – in the penultimate year of his MA degree - whose very life was almost entirely destroyed as a result of what he, justifiably, perceived (and perceives) to be insidious antisemitism at a very senior level in a major department of the University.[3]

3 It is not proposed to deal with that case in any detail in this submission. In brief, the student, a religiously observant Jew who had an outstanding academic record, applied for special consideration as he had to miss three lectures in the second half of 2021 because those lectures fell on three major Jewish Festival when, in accordance with Jewish law, a Jew is not permitted to do any 'work' such as writing, or driving, etc. As a MA student who had been in this position in all previous years at university – as has every observant Orthodox Jew - he had no reason even to suspect his application would be rejected. However, after those three lectures were held, he received an email advising that his application for special consideration had been turned down on the grounds that he had failed to file "a letter from a Rabbi" with his application – notwithstanding the fact that he insisted he had indeed filed such a letter, and notwithstanding the fact that the relevant lecturer had actually lectured to him in the period between the submission of the special consideration application and the lectures in question, and could easily have asked him for the letter (despite the fact that it was obvious that he was religiously observant – as he wore a Jewish head covering (a Kippah), and despite the fact that any good diary would have demonstrated that the days in question were Jewish holidays). The lecturer then said to him that because he missed the three lectures which were compulsory he would have to fail the entire year (despite him being a distinction student in his penultimate year of a MA degree) because the course in issue was a compulsory course for a MA student but that, as a courtesy, the UTS would pass him if he would provide a 1,000 word summary to his lecturer of each lecture he missed. He sought a meeting to ascertain exactly what was required. He was told by his lecturer and another member of the

11. However, there was a frightening surge in antisemitism (which is getting worse) caused by the savage and sadistic massacre perpetrated by Hamas in Israel on 7 October 2023.

12. In other words, the surge in antisemitism was precipitated by the ghastly and intentional spilling of blood in Israel by Hamas in circumstances of unprecedented cruelty and barbarism: the torturing to death of children in front of their parents; the torturing to death of parents in front of their children; the burning alive of babies and the elderly; the raping to death of women in front of their families. In addition to torturing, raping, mutilating, and murdering 1,200 Israelis, Hamas terrorists kidnapped 251 Israelis, aged from 8 months to 82 years.[4]

13. Any suggestion that the upsurge in antisemitism was caused by Israel's response to the massacre is demonstrably false: on the very night that the news of the massacres emerged, prior to any Israeli response, there were department that the summary was not for marks or for assessment in any way – they simply wanted something on file in case they were audited, so they could demonstrate that he had caught up the work he missed. The student said that he had already caught up the work by summarizing the lecture slides and notes, and he was told simply to provide his summaries – which he did. He then received a formal email from the Department that it appeared that he had committed serious academic misconduct by plagiarizing the lecturer's slides and one of his own essays! He was called to a formal meeting with the lecturer and the other staff member to explain himself. At the meeting he reminded the lecturer and the member of the Department that he was specifically told that the summary was not in any way for marks or assessment, but was simply to show that he had caught up the work, in case the University was audited, and that he said he had already done so - and had summarized the slides and notes – and it was agreed that he would submit those summaries, which he did. He said he would be happy to do further work if they wished him to do so. Notwithstanding that, in a formal finding they held him guilty of plagiarism – and said that the plagiarism was particularly egregious as he attempted to justify it and showed no remorse. Therefore they held that it was appropriate to fail him in the course – which meant he would fail the entire year – and they told him the fail would be a permanent memorial on his academic record. He would have to repeat the entire year. I acted for him in the appeal in which every single one of his grounds of appeal was upheld. Significantly, on discovery it was found that the application for special consideration did include a letter from a Rabbi – the very foundation for refusing special consideration was entirely false. It was also clear from discovery that the lecturer and other member of the department disliked the student – they considered him annoyingly polite. It was also discovered that the department had been advised that his summaries clearly did not constitute plagiarism – as the student was manifestly not seeking to obtain an unfair benefit by holding out as his own work the work of another person: the summary was provided the lecturer herself; she obviously knew what the slides contained. It was also discovered that the excuse of an audit was entirely bogus. As a result of the appeal, the results that the student obtained in that course were disclosed: he obtained a distinction. Ultimately, he also obtained a distinction in his MA as a whole. This case was outrageous: if the student did not happen to know a barrister that was willing to handle his case pro bono, his professional life – if not his life itself, would have been ruined. In my opinion, the student's belief that this outrageous conduct was actuated by antisemitism is justified.

[4] See 'Will the Mainstream Media Keep Mum on Israeli Report Documenting Condition of Released Hamas Captives?' by Hugh Fitgerald, FrontPage Magazine, https://unitedwithisrael.org/will-the-mainstream-media-keep-mum-on-israeli-report-documenting-condition-of-released-hamas-captives/.

celebrations with fireworks in areas of Sydney; and on the Monday, 9 October, and before Israel had responded in any significant way, there was a pro Hamas protest at the Opera House which included the infamous chants of "Fuck the Jews" and either "Gas the Jews" or "where the Jews" (whatever the chants, they were antisemitic).

14. I understand[5] that certain prominent anti-Zionist University lecturers were present at the 9 October Opera House hate-fest. This will be a matter to be investigated by a judicial commission.

15. There is clear evidence of what, in my opinion, are vile antisemitic posts published by certain prominent University academics at or around (and from) the date of the 7 October massacre. Such posts will be referred to below.

16. It will be for a judicial commission to determine whether (as I submit to be the case) those posts are in fact antisemitic, and whether those lecturers are engaging in a pernicious campaign of antisemitic vilification, and whether they are inciting, or seeking to incite, hatred of Israel – the one and only nation State of the Jewish people – and whether they are inculcating, or seeking to inculcate, a vicious form of antisemitism and bigotry into their students.

17. It is imperative, in the public interest, that such a judicial commission be established as a matter of urgency. The urgency is illustrated by the terrifyingly irrational and perverse fact that since the Hamas barbarism of 7 October – and notwithstanding the fact that a very substantial number of civilian hostages, including children, are still being held in the most appallingly inhuman conditions in Gaza, and despite the fact that Hamas is still firing rockets into civilian areas in Israel – and despite the evidence of the most barbaric atrocities including rapes and beheadings perpetrated by Hamas against civilians – the popularity of Hamas has dramatically increased as has antisemitism – particularly on university campuses, which have now become the hotbeds for extreme Jew hatred.[6]

18. This is not simply a Jewish problem. When there is a surge of antisemitism in a society, it is that society as a whole that suffers. As was succinctly said by former Chief Rabbi of the United Kingdom, Rabbi Lord Jonathan Sacks:[7]

> ""The hate that begins with Jews never ends with Jews. Antisemitism is the world's most reliable early warning sign of a > major threat to freedom, humanity and the dignity of difference. It matters to all of us. Which is why we must fight it together." [Emphasis added.]

19. The danger – the risks - for society as a whole posed by the spread of antisemitism cannot be overstated. It must not be ignored.

20. When considering what, in my opinion, is vicious antisemitic vilification by certain prominent University academics, the Judicial Commission may consider it appropriate to reflect on the fact that the Holocaust itself began with words. As noted in Holocaust Encyclopedia[8]

> "… the Holocaust began with words and ideas: stereotypes, sinister cartoons, and the gradual spread of hate."

DEFINITION OF ANTISEMITISM

The IHRA definition of antisemitism and the three Ds - Double standards, demonisation and delegitimisation

21. In order to demonstrate that the vilification to which I refer below is antisemitic hate-speech, it is necessary to have regard to the following considerations.

22. The International Holocaust Remembrance Alliance working definition of Antisemitism (the IHRA) which has been duly adopted by Australia provides examples of antisemitism which, inter alia, include the following:

    a. Denying the Jewish people their right to self-determination, e.g., by claiming that the existence of a State of Israel is a racist endeavour;

    b. Applying double standards by requiring of it [Israel] a behaviour not expected or demanded of any other democratic nation;

    c. Using the symbols and images associated with classic antisemitism (e.g., claims of Jews killing Jesus or blood libel) to characterize Israel or Israelis;

    d. Drawing comparisons of contemporary Israeli policy to that of the Nazis;

    e. Holding Jews collectively responsible for actions of the state of Israel.

[8] https://encyclopedia.ushmm.org/content/en/article/antisemitism-in-history-from-the-early-church-to-1400 accessed 22 August 2024

23. Thus, it is antisemitic to subject Israel to a double standard; to demonise and delegitimise Israel; to falsely accuse Israel — the only fully functioning democracy in the Middle East with a free press and independent judiciary — of the five cardinal sins against human rights: racism, apartheid, crimes against humanity, ethnic cleansing and attempted genocide.[9]

24. Targeting the State of Israel is a form of anti-Semitism when such targeting deploys one of what former Canadian Justice Minister, Prof Irwin Cotler, characterised as "the three Ds: demonization of Israel, a double standard around Israel, and a delegitimization of the State of Israel."[10].

25. It is antisemitic when Israel is singled out for condemnation in a way that no other country is; when, for e.g., it is subjected to enmity and criticism of the worst kind despite the reality that its human rights record is far better than that of any other country in the region, and at least as good as – if not substantially better than – any other country that has faced comparable dangers. As noted by Dershowitz:.

> "… no other nation, including those with the most abysmal of human rights records, face as much enmity. Most significantly, the intensity of the enmity directed against the Mideast's only democracy is unexplainable on any rational basis."[11]

26. It is antisemitic to

    a. deny the right of Jews to exist collectively as Jews in their country with the same rights as everyone else; to

    b. adopt a double standard when dealing with Jews, or the Nation State of the Jewish people; to

    c. subject Jews or Israel to obloquy and abuse of a kind that would not be applied to any other people or country; to

    d. single out Jewish national aspirations (Zionism) as an illegitimate and racist endeavour, and to

    e. "propose actions that would result in the death of millions of Jews."[12]

False assertion that one can be anti-Zionist while not being antisemitic: Zionism is an inherent aspect of Judaism

27. These submissions incorporate by reference the entire perspicacious speech made by the former Chief Rabbi of the UK, Lord Jonathan Sacks, to the European Parliament, on 27 September 2016, entitled 'The Mutating Virus: Understanding Antisemitism.'[13]
28. In that speech, the Chief Rabbi analysed the resurgence of antisemitism after the Holocaust, and asked how it came about that > "… when your children go to university, they are insulted and intimidated because of what is happening in some other part of the world? Where, when they present their own view of the situation they are howled down and silenced?

> How did this happen? It happened the way viruses always defeat the human immune system, namely, by mutating. The new antisemitism is different from the old antisemitism, in three ways. … Once Jews were hated because of their religion. Then they were hated because of their race. Now they are hated because of their nation state. The second difference is that the epicentre of the old antisemitism was Europe. Today it's the Middle East and it is communicated globally by the new electronic media.
> The third is particularly disturbing. ... It is easy to hate, but difficult publicly to justify hate. Throughout history, when people have sought to justify antisemitism, they have done so by recourse to the highest source of authority available within the culture. In the Middle Ages, it was religion. So we had religious anti-Judaism. In post-Enlightenment Europe it was science. So we had the twin foundations of Nazi ideology, Social Darwinism and the so-called Scientific Study of Race. Today the highest source of authority worldwide is human rights. That is why Israel—the only fully functioning democracy in the Middle East with a free press and independent judiciary—is regularly accused of the five cardinal sins against human rights: racism, apartheid, crimes against humanity, ethnic cleansing and attempted genocide.
> The new antisemitism has mutated so that any practitioner of it can deny that he or she is an antisemite. After all, they'll say, I'm not a racist. I have no problem with Jews or Judaism. I only have a problem with the State of Israel. But in a world of 56 Muslim nations and 103 Christian ones, there is only one Jewish state, Israel, which constitutes one-quarter of one per cent of the land mass of the Middle East. Israel is the only one of the 193 member nations of the

29. Zionism is an inherent aspect of Judaism. To instance but a few non-exhaustive examples:

a. pursuant to Jewish law, for thousands of years, the observant Jew faces towards Israel, and in Israel he/she faces towards Jerusalem – the City of Zion - when saying his/her daily prayers;

b. he/she prays for the return to Zion in each and every one of the daily prayer services, and every time he/she says grace after meals, and has done so for thousands of years;

c. Psalm 137 appears in every Orthodox Jewish prayer book (Siddur) before the Grace after Meals to be said on weekdays and references the Babylonian exile of the Jews in around 586 BCE and expresses the Jew's yearning to return to Jerusalem: "*By the rivers of Babylon, there we sat, sat and wept, as we remembered Zion … How can we sing a song of the LORD on alien soil? If I forget you, O Jerusalem, let my right-hand wither; let my tongue stick to my palate if I cease to think of you, if I do not keep Jerusalem in memory even at my happiest hour."

d. in every Siddur Psalm 126 - which joyously deals with the Jew's return to Zion - appears before the Grace after Meals to be recited before Grace on Sabbath and Festivals: 'When the LORD restores the fortunes of Zion —we see it as in a dream our mouths shall be filled with laughter, our tongues, with songs of joy.'

e. at every Jewish wedding performed in accordance with Jewish law a glass is broken under the wedding canopy to remember Zion.

f. Certain Jewish commandments (Mitzvot) can only be performed in Israel.

g. The major Jewish Festivals all relate to Israel; they are known as the Pilgrim Festivals – as Jews in Israel were obligated to go up to Jerusalem for the Festivals.

h. After the annual Passover Seder the Jew invokes the prayer "Ieshana Haba birushalayim" – "Next year in Jerusalem." [14]

[14] See also paragraph [106 I] below.

i. Those words - "Next year in Jerusalem" - are traditionally recited at the end of the services on the Day of Atonement, Yom Kippur.[15]

30. The above are but a few examples. They demonstrate beyond any doubt that Judaism and Zionism are – and always have been – inextricably linked – they are inseparable.[16]

31. With the above in mind, it is appropriate to consider the antisemitic vilification referred to below.

EXAMPLES OF WHAT ARE SUBMITTED TO BE ANTISEMITIC VILIFICATION BY ACADEMICS

32. Because the current submission only deals with the question whether there should be a judicial commission of enquiry into antisemitism at Australian universities, it is not intended to provide any exhaustive list or analysis of which is submitted to be antisemitic vilification and incitement emanating from academics employed in various Australian universities. That analysis will, of course, be done once a judicial commission has been formed.

33. In the meantime, these submissions will simply provide some examples of such vilification primarily from academics associated with the UNSW (as that has been my focus).

34. I will also draw attention to statements from a prominent lecturer associated with Macquarie University.

UNSW

35. The type of statements that have recently been made by UNSW academics that give rise to false and defamatory antisemitic imputations that vilify the State of Israel and, by implication, Jews who support Israel, include, inter alia, statements conveying imputations that

a. Israel indiscriminately and intentionally murders babies and children;[17]

15 Prager and Telushkin, Why the Jews, Simon & Schuster, Inc. 1983 at 171

16 Should it be necessary, I will be happy to provide detailed elaboration.

17 At the UNSW Centre for Crime, Law and Justice Seminar held on 13 November 2023 (the Seminar), Noam Peleg (NP) said "a staggering number of children [are] losing lives in the West Bank and Gaza" (thereby imputing that Israel is wantonly murdering children in the West Bank) and that "the rights of Palestinian children … have been violated [by Israel] for decades"; during the 70 minutes of the CCLJ seminar "7 more children have been killed. The Carpet bombings continue, babies die lying dead under the rubble, dead from bombing." See also the comments made by Francesca Albanese (FA) at the Seminar, none of which were controverted in any way whatsoever by NP, clearly imputing, in my opinion, that he agreed and adopted those assertions.

b. Israel intentionally engages in monumental violations of human rights including against children;[18]

c. Israel disgracefully permits Jewish Israeli Settlers to steal land belonging to Palestinians;[19]

d. Israel permits Jewish Israeli Settlers to kill, maim and injure Palestinians with impunity;[20]

e. Israel intentionally commits war crimes and crimes against humanity with impunity;[21]

f. Israel is committing genocide of the Palestinians;[22]

g. Israel is a colonial occupying country;[23]

h. Israel is an apartheid State.[24]

i. Jews who support Israel thereby support

i. The indiscriminate and wanton murders of babies and children;

ii. The monumental violations of human rights including against children;

iii. Jewish Israeli Settlers who steal land belonging to Palestinians;

iv. The killing, maiming and injuring of Palestinians with impunity;

18 FA said, inter alia, the following at the Seminar: Israel "is committing "Monumental violations of human rights … humiliation of Palestinians and human rights violations against children … and it's getting incrementally worse" and that "the Palestinians are the ones whose rights are violated [by Israel] between the River and the Sea" (meaning that Israel has no right to exist) and that "Israeli settlers [are entitled to] take the land of parents [of Palestinian children] and … are entitled to kill, maim and injure with impunity." "Israel can't invoke the right of self-defence" against Hamas in Gaza (presumably it is required to commit national suicide); Israel is committing "war crimes and crimes against humanity" and "genocide"; and that Israel is a colonial occupation as well as an apartheid state

19 Ibid ("Israeli settlers [are entitled to] take the land of parents [of Palestinian children] and … are entitled to kill, maim and injure with impunity")

20 Ibid.

21 Ibid ("Israel is committing "war crimes and crimes against humanity).

22 Ibid ("Israel is committing "war crimes and crimes against humanity" and "genocide") ")

23 Ibid (Israel is a colonial occupation").

24 Ibid ("Israel is a colonial occupation as well as an apartheid state").

v. The commission by Israel with impunity of war crimes and crimes against humanity;

vi. The commission of genocide by Israel against the Palestinians;

vii. Apartheid.

36. The above imputations were, in my opinion, conveyed at a UNSW seminar on 13 November 2023.

37. An online Webinar on 10 April 2024 presented by Dr Noam Peleg with Professor Michael Fakhri, the UN Special Rapporteur on the Right to Food, on the topic "The food crisis and starvation in Gaza" (the Webinar), gave rise to demonstrably false, and seriously defamatory, imputations to the effect,[25] inter alia, that Israel is

a. a criminal, apartheid, settler colony and an illegal occupying entity;

b. deliberately and illegally using starvation as a weapon of war and has expressly been doing so since 8 October 2023, in a deliberate attempt to kill everyone in Gaza by starvation, and Israel has thus created the biggest man-made famine in the history of the world, and that Israel, since 1967, has been intentionally destroying the food system in Gaza by destroying agricultural land, greenhouses, fishing ports and fishing vessels, and is purposely starving the Gazans, and is purposely denying civilians access to food, fuel, water, and medicine;

c. deliberately and callously causing children, pregnant women and breastfeeding mothers to suffer from severe malnutrition, and death;

d. intentionally committing genocide and other heinous crimes against humanity, and has no concern or respect for international law;

e. so evil that it is not only perpetrating genocide – it is also 'taking pride in [its] actions' in so doing by filming itself committing genocide;

f. so fraudulent and deceptive that, in order to divert attention away from its crimes which are being dealt with at the ICJ in the Haig, it has made false and entirely unfounded allegations against UNRWA, knowing that such allegations will prevent UNRWA from giving essential, life-saving, services to Palestinians all over the Middle East;

[25] It is not intended in this letter to be exhaustive, or to frame the imputations with precision at this stage

g. so immoral that Israel tortured an UNRWA employee in order to induce him to make false and groundless allegations against UNRWA;

h. so evil that

i. its evil conduct affects everybody in the world and no one wants to live in a world in which Israel commits such horrific crimes of genocide, starvation, and occupation;

ii. it ought to be boycotted militarily and in every other way as well.

Macquarie

38. It is sufficient to instance the example of is a prominent lecturer at Macquarie University who is now also an ARC Future Fellow.[26]

39. This particular lecturer has published online posts that include the following:

a. On the actual day of the massacre, October 7: "The coloniser cries victim";

b. On the actual day of the massacre, October 7 she apparently captioned a video of Nova festival goers running for their lives, mocking terrorised youths with the grossly insensitive "What passport should I use today?"

c. On 12 October 2024 she posted the Soviet-era antisemitic slogan, "Zionism=racism"

d. On 4 November 2023 she published that the frankly genocidal "Israel is finished"

e. On 6 November 2023 she ridiculed Australian Jews facing antisemitism "Cry me a river to the sea"

f. On 13 November 2023 she imputed that that the ABC is controlled by Zionists.

g. On 14 January 2024, RAF published a dishonest article in the Institute for Palestinian Studies in which she wrote in the second paragraph that

[26] https://www.arc.gov.au

> "Israeli government claims of systematic sexual violence perpetrated against Israeli women by Hamas and The New York Times article have been thoroughly and compellingly discredited and debunked by both independent investigative journalists and MENA human rights and feminist organizations and initiatives. At this point, anybody who still insists on believing the mass rape claims and/or amplifies The New York Times report is doing so against a growing body of evidence that has called into question the credibility of the claims." [Emphasis added.]

40. This particular lecturer has posted:

> "If you are Zionist you have no claim or right to cultural safety.
> And it is my duty as somebody who fights all forms of oppression and violence to deny you a safe space to espouse your Zionist racist ideology.
> It is the duty of those who oppose racism, misogyny, homophobia and all forms of oppressive harm to ensure that every space Zionists enter is culturally unsafe for them.
> And institutions and festivals that continue to defer to the fragile feelings and tears of Zionists are as abhorrent as those who would defer to the feelings of misogynists, white supremacists, neo-Nazis."

41. In my opinion, in my opinion, each of the above posts constitutes vile, vicious and vituperative vilification of the Jewish people.

42. In my opinion it is likely that, if appointed, a judicial commission will share my opinion that the above posts constitute vituperative vilifications, and that they are highly antisemitic and intimidatory, and that it is wholly inappropriate for an Australian university to employ a lecturer who publishes, what in my opinion are grossly antisemitic calumnies.

43. In my opinion it is not possible to apprehend how any practising Jew could possibly feel safe in any class given by this lecturer.

DOUBLE STANDARDS IN RELATION TO PROTECTION OF JEWISH STUDENTS AND STAFF

44. I have not had any discussions or communications with Macquarie University.

45. I have, however, sent detailed correspondence to the UNSW in which I have demonstrated that the factual statements made by UNSW lecturers – referred to above – constituted demonstrably false vilification.

46. To my deep dismay, however, and to the dismay of the alumni and staff who has seen the decision, on 24 June 2024 the UNSW advised that it had decided that the matters about which I had complained (referred to above) were - not unlawful;

    - not in breach of the Academic Freedom and Freedom of Speech Code of Conduct;
    - not in breach of the Enterprise Agreement for Academic Staff;
    - not actions that constitute intimidation, bullying, or harassment of students and staff who hold different views

47. The consequence of that decision (the decision), while it stands, is that UNSW academic staff have been given the green light to engage in the vilest antisemitic vilification against Jews – without any adverse consequence. By letter dated 22 August 2024 the UNSW was put on notice that the decision is considered to be wrong in both fact and law[27] and it was noted that

    a. the decision asserts that UNSW community members are "entitled to share their lawful opinions on controversial topics in the political arena." However, the UNSW academics about whom complaint was made did not purport to share their opinions. Rather, their assertions purported to be statements of fact;

    b. the "facts" asserted by the UNSW lecturer were, in my opinion, demonstrably false,[28] and were particularly deceptive because they were categorically conveyed as "facts" by a senior UNSW academic who is held out as an expert in the Middle East conflict. The seminars sought to indoctrinate – rather than to educate. This was all the more pernicious as many of the assertions appeared to emanate from a listed terrorist organisation;

    c. the vituperative hate speech manifestly constituted "intimidation, bullying, or harassment of Jewish students and staff members."

    d. However, despite the fact that Jewish students and staff were, as a matter of practical reality, intimidated, bullied and harassed by the hate speech, the Conduct & Integrity Unit decided that the hate [27] A copy of that letter can be provided to the committee, as can a copy of the voluminous correspondence that I sent to the UNSW.

[28] The falsity was demonstrated in our letters of 21 November 2023, 17 January and 30 May 2024.

speech did not "constitute intimidation, bullying, or harassment of students and staff who hold different views" thereby fortifying the contention that had been made in an earlier letter sent to the UNSW that that Universities consider that Jews are not entitled to the same protections and support as other communities when they are under attack; in a recent article entitled 'A Different Standard for Jews'[29] Dan Schnur notes that 'Antisemitic double standards are pervasive, much more than we would have wanted to believe back on 6 October.' Since then Jews have learned, inter alia, that > "We avoid language that might cause offense, even if that was not our intention. ... But when we hear threats like "from the river to the sea" or "globalize the intifada," or when we hear Israel's defenders accused of genocide, we now understand that Jews are not entitled to that same sort of consideration.

> Imagine if a young woman were told that wolf whistles, catcalls and scatological references were not intended to be offensive, or if it were explained to a member of an underrepresented minority community that a racial slur carried a different meaning to the person who uttered it and therefore there was no reason to be upset by their use of a pejorative term. Such feeble rationalizations would be quickly rejected and those who offered them would face severe legal, social or cultural penalties. But those who call for the elimination of the state of Israel and the extermination of the Jewish people, and who pretend that their efforts at intimidation are merely appeals for Palestinian independence and empowerment, are excused."

e. Since 7 October 2023, the irony has often been noted - that Universities

> "… go out of their way to find safe spaces for microaggressions against minority groups but can't seem to find those safe spaces when Jews are faced with *macro*aggressions."[30] [Emphasis added.]

f. the publications were humiliating and dehumanising for Jewish students and staff. (It is obviously humiliating and dehumanising for Jewish students and staff to be aggressively berated as "Baby Killers" or supporters of genocide just because they are known to be practising Jews. Apart from the fact that Israel is the one and only

[29] Dan Schnur, JEWISH JOURNAL, December 13, 2023: https://jewishjournal.com/commentary/columnist/366285/a-different-standard-for-jews/

[30] David Suissa, 2 January 2024, Jewish Journal, 'Harvard President's Resignation is the Tip of the DEI Iceberg.'

Nation State of the Jewish people, Judaism and Zionism are inextricably linked.) Like in defamation law, the knowledge of the falsity of the imputation aggravates the harm and damage.

g. publication as fact of the entirely one-sided and false assertions compromises the academic integrity of the University, and the safety of Jewish students and staff, and is likely to bring the University into disrepute, and prejudice the respect and value of its degrees.

h. the reliance in the decision on the Academic Freedom and Freedom of Speech Code of Conduct was misconceived. Academic freedom and freedom of speech does not permit a University lecturer to publish patent falsehoods. To the contrary, the Full Federal Court recently emphasised in University of Sydney v National Tertiary Education Industry Union[31] that one cannot talk of academic freedom, or freedom of speech, without also having regard to academic responsibility, and the requirement of an academic to engage in responsible, academic, honest, speech; intellectual freedom is cut from the same cloth as the notions of academic responsibility.

i. The vilification about which complaint was made did not constitute a "responsible" exercise of any academic freedom or freedom of speech; it involved

    i. no debate,

    ii. no learning,

    iii. no scholarship,

    iv. no evidence-based analysis applying the scientific method;

    v. there was no reference to contrary evidence; there was no balance.

j. Rather, there were

    i. bald, one-sided, inflammatory assertions; there was

    ii. vilification and incitement;

    iii. false and defamatory statements.

[31] [2024] FCAFC 57, especially at [12]-[14], [18], [21], [49]-[[52] and [54].

k. This was not the upholding of the principle and practice of intellectual freedom in accordance with the highest ethical, professional and legal standards.

l. The making of false, defamatory, intimidatory, one-sided, unscholarly, antisemitic statements of the kind about which complaint was made was inconsistent with, and inimical to, the upholding of the principle and practice of intellectual freedom.

48. It is submitted that, as a matter of law, it is not acceptable for a University to permit its academic employees - in the course and scope of their employment – to seek to indoctrinate students by making demonstrably false statements – such as demonstrably false statements that Israel is committing genocide (the crime of crimes), that it is intentionally murdering babies, that it is purposely not allowing any food whatsoever into Gaza in order to starve the Gazans to death, that it is an illegal colonial apartheid entity that ought to be shunned and boycotted, that it is a murderous rogue entity, that it ought to be destroyed.

NEED FOR JUDICIAL COMMISSION; AHRC ENQUIRY WOULD BE COUNTER-PRODUCTIVE

49. It is in the context of an extraordinary surge in antisemitism, particularly on university campuses, that it is essential, in the public interest, that a judicial commission of enquiry into antisemitism at university ought to be formed. It is necessary for such a judicial commission to consider

    a. whether what, in my opinion, is manifestly antisemitic vilification emanating from several staff members of certain prominent universities is in fact antisemitic vilification; and, if so, whether such vilification

        i. is dehumanising, humiliating, alienating and intimidating to Jewish students and staff; and

        ii. is demonstrably false, deceptive and misleading;

        iii. is unscholarly and immoral; and

        iv. incites antisemitism and creates a clear and serious danger to Jewish (and other) students and staff; and

        v. constitutes ‘serious misconduct’ under the various Enterprise Agreements and Policies of the various universities, and under common and statutory law in Australia; and

b. whether universities have – and are exercising – a duty of care to their Jewish students and staff to regulate such conduct clearly and effectively; and

c. whether it is necessary and/or appropriate for universities to enforce their regulations to do so; and

d. whether the respective universities, in the interests of Australia as a whole, and in the interests of academic standards, ought to take additional steps to deal with lecturers who engage in vilification and hate-speech;

e. whether proposals ought to be made in relation to the establishment and enforcement of effective and enduring measures to guarantee a safe, supportive and tolerant educational setting for all students, irrespective of their race, religion, or ethnicity.

50. Since 7 October, the Jewish community has been living in fear of the ever-increasing rise in antisemitism. It is no longer uncommon to hear the comment "This is what it must have felt like to live in Germany in the 1930s".

51. For, inter alia, the reasons to which the ECAJ referred in its submission, it would be wholly inappropriate – and indeed counter-productive - for the AHRC to be tasked with the investigation of Antisemitism at Australian Universities. There is a real and justified apprehension of actual bias on the part of the AHRC. That emerges from what it has said and published[32] – as well as from what it has not said and not published.

52. To instance but one example: in the light of the fact that the tsunami of antisemitism at Australian universities has been so notorious since mid-October 2023, the article published on 23 May 2024 by Giridharan Sivaraman, Australia's race discrimination commissioner, was – at best – tone-deaf, if not immoral, as it imputed, in my opinion, an equivalence between "the horrific October 7 attacks in Israel, and the devastating military response in Gaza." It is a real concern that it would appear that Australia's race discrimination commissioner does not distinguish between the vicious and barbaric massacre and atrocities perpetrated by Hamas, a listed terrorist organization whose stated aim is the annihilation of Israel, on the one hand, and Israel's legitimate self-defence – and attempt to rescue hostages - on the other hand.

[32] See, for example, 23 May 2024, 'Racism at universities has been an issue for decades,' by Giridharan Sivaraman, The Mandarin. In the light of the fact that the tsunami of antisemitism at Australian universities has been so notorious since 7 October 2023, the article published on 23 May 2024 by Giridharan Sivaraman was – at best – tone-deaf, if not immoral, as it imputed, in my opinion, an equivalence between "the horrific October 7 attacks in Israel, and the devastating military response in Gaza." It is a real concern that it would appear that Australia's race discrimination commissioner does not distinguish between a massacre and atrocities perpetrated by a terrorist organization whose stated aim is the annihilation of Israel, on the one hand, and Israel's defence – and attempt to rescue hostages - on the other hand. The imputation that "antisemitism and anti-Palestinian sentiment on campus" is of a similar magnitude is simply wrong.

53. Moreover, the imputation in the article that the problem of "antisemitism and anti-Palestinian sentiment on campus" is of a similar magnitude is simply wrong.

54. At the very least, there is a reasonable apprehension of bias on the part of the AHRC.

55. Should the committee decide not to form a judicial commission with Royal Commission-like powers to enquire into antisemitism at Australian universities, that failure will, in my opinion, be perceived as worse than a mere slap in the face to the Jewish community; it will be perceived as support for those who, in the opinion of the Jewish community, are antisemitic.

STRAW MEN DESIGNED TO OBFUSCATE

56. These submissions will now briefly address certain straw men that are deployed (often as an antisemitic obfuscation) to cower universities into failing to take effective steps to prevent hate-speech of the kind referred to below, and/or to enable the person making the statement to play the "victim card." Those straw men are

    a. the canard – itself antisemitic – that "Jews or Zionists" seek to prevent criticism of Israel by labelling all criticism antisemitic (it is not – and no responsible person asserts otherwise). Israel can of course be criticised in the same way that any other country can be criticised; but just as one does not call for the annihilation of any other country, to call for the annihilation of Israel is antisemitic; and

    b. the false assertion that Jews, and/or Israelis, and/or children or grandchildren of Holocaust survivors, cannot be antisemitic;[33] and

    c. the false assertion that anti-Zionism of the kind one commonly hears from university academics and students is not antisemitism; it is – antisemitism has simply donned the cloak of anti-Zionism. (This has already been addressed above.)

Accusation that claims of antisemitism are deployed to prevent mere criticism of Israeli policies

[33] See, for e.g., Alan Dershowitz, The Case Against Israel's Enemies, John Wiley & Sons, Inc. 2008, at 99-126; Douglas Murray Israel-Hamas War: Douglas Murray Responds to Norman Finkelstein Calling Gaza a "Concentration Camp" https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=u8KNhzD1xDE;

57. The assertion that "Jews or Zionists" use the antisemitism accusation to prevent mere criticism of Israeli policies by labelling all criticism antisemitic[34] is false.

58. Obviously, Israel or Israeli policies, can be criticised – just like any other country or its policies may be criticised.[35] Despite the ubiquitous accusation that Jews use antisemitism to prevent criticism of Israeli policies, I am not aware of any documented case in which any responsible person has contended that mere criticism of Israel is antisemitic. Such a contention would be absurd.

59. Prof Alan Dershowitz has publicly challenged anyone who asserts that Jews seek to prevent criticism of Israel by labelling all criticism antisemitic to "document that serious charge by providing actual quotations, in context, with the sources of the statement identified. No one has responded to [his] challenge."[36].

False assertion that Jews and/or Israelis and/or descendants of Holocaust survivors cannot be antisemitic

60. Equally false is the assertion that Jews and/or Israelis and/or descendants of Holocaust survivors cannot be antisemitic.[37]

61. Regretfully, throughout history there have been prominent Jews – who have also been classic and blatant antisemites (Karl Marx is a case in point; as noted by Dershowitz, his stereotyping of Jews and his rabid hatred of all things Jewish "are hard to distinguish from the beliefs of Adolf Hitler"[38])

62. In his book, The Case Against Israel's Enemies, Professor Alan Dershowitz has noted that in contemporary society, there are some Jewish academics of the radical left for whom

> "… dissociating from Zionism … has become a litmus test for acceptability by the hard left. Unlike Marx, however, some of them emphasise their Jewishness while rejecting Jewish nationalism. They point to their Jewish identity to discredit accusations that that their ideas are antisemitic (claiming that as Jews, they cannot be antisemites), to establish their special right to criticise Israel and give added stress to the evils of Zionism > (claiming that if we, as Jews, are troubled by Zionism, then it must be really bad). Few of these Israel-haters are Jewish in any real sense, other than their parentage. They are Jewish on their 'parents' side' … Yet they accentuate their Jewish heritage (their names and connections to the Holocaust) to gain credibility for their Israel bashing. By rejecting Zionism, they prove their commitment to the values of the hard left, as well as their lack of dual loyalty."[39] [Emphasis added.]

CONCLUSION

63. Antisemitic vilification, incitement, intimidation and hate speech – particularly by prominent lecturers of a respected university – may lead to the most serious, real-life, consequences for Jewish and Israeli students and staff (and indeed others); it poses real risks – including risks of serious physical violence.

64. It is ironic – and irrational – that the most lethal outbreak of antisemitism since the Holocaust broke out in response to the biggest single atrocity against Jews since the Holocaust. That antisemitism has donned the cloak of anti-Zionism.

65. The ever-increasing antisemitism is an ever-deepening nightmare - exacerbated by the fact that, as noted by Melanie Phillips, > "… universities, the supposed crucible of reason, have incubated murderous and brazen antisemitism …. the intellectual élites of the "civilised" west — its brain, if you will, and thus the source of its supposedly civilising ideas — have absorbed and are regurgitating [murderous lies in the cause of wiping out Israel and the Jews]." [40].

66. However, one sided, demonstrably false, malevolent, antisemitic, propagandistic hate-speech by a university lecturer is inimical to, and inconsistent with, the duties and requirements of institutions of higher learning, and is expressly or impliedly inconsistent with the objects of the Higher Education legislation (including the Standards, Codes, and Guidelines) including, for example, 'the creation and advancement of knowledge' (HES Act s2-1(b)(ii)) and the provision of higher education. Freedom of speech does not permit false hate-speech, incitement and vilification.

67. It is in the public interest that a Judicial Commission of Inquiry into Antisemitism at Australian Universities be established as a matter of extreme urgency.

M A Friedgut
26 August 2024

To Whom it May Concern,

My name is Marc Light, I am the Principal of The King David School a Jewish School with over 700 enrolments from Early Learning through to Year 12.

I am well aware that some of my graduates have experienced what they perceive to be antisemitism on and around university campuses in Australia since the onset of the Hamas-Israel war. I have met with university leadership from a number of universities who have been generally very responsive to the issue and I have no doubt that they care for the wellbeing of their students.

Nonetheless, I believe that the campuses have become places of intimidation where Jewish students must self-censor as they are too afraid to express key aspects of their identity, particularly if they identify as supporters of Israel or Zionism.

Some of the situations that have been reported to me include:

- A student in a University of Melbourne lecture, whose lecturer encouraged students to participate in the “die in” for Gaza. Her frustration with how this was dealt with by the university administration ultimately led to her leaving the university.

- Another student at the University of Melbourne was challenged within a tutorial when a classmate heard that she had been in Israel, the classmate said, “But you’re not a Zionist, right?” The student felt that she could not safely express this aspect of her identity. She did not report this as she was on friendly terms otherwise and anecdotally it is this casual undermining of identity that is so insidious.

- A former staff member who is now a student at RMIT was told by his lecturer that “It’s a nice day, let’s take the class outside and join the Palestinian encampment.” When the student challenged the lecturer, the lecturer claimed to have been joking.

- Two staff members who are also students at Monash University were hassled and intimidated by Palestinian protestors and were called “baby killers”. They felt unsafe and reported to university security who were dismissive of the issue.

- A graduate who attend the University of Melbourne was kicked out of her share house because her housemates did not want to live with a Zionist.

I believe that the situation is dire and that current and future university students are afraid and feel that they must suppress their individuality. This should not be tolerated.

Yours faithfully,

Marc Light

Dear Committee Secretary

Submission to the Senate Inquiry about the Commission of Inquiry into *Antisemitism at Australian Universities Bill 2024 (No 2) (Senate Inquiry)

Thank you for the opportunity to respond to the Senate Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee (Senate Committee) inquiry as to whether to establish a Commission of Inquiry or Judicial Inquiry (Judicial Inquiry) into Antisemitism at Australian Universities. Given the fact that my role as Special Envoy to combat antisemitism (Special Envoy) was only established on July 9, I appreciate that you might consider this September 6 submission.

Summary

In preparing this submission to the Senate Inquiry I thought it would be helpful if I obtained some first-hand testimonies from university students, academics and professional staff to understand the gravity of the situation. My office has interviewed more than 65 Jewish students, academics and staff at universities (those wanting to give testimony continue to contact my office and once my full complement of staff is in place I will continue to meet them). Their testimonies, and the data[1] from other surveys demonstrates a truly alarming increase in antisemitic incidents and discourse at Australian universities in the lead-up to, and particularly since, the October 7 massacre by Hamas in Israel. As you can read from a summary and extracts from their testimonies (Appendix 3 – Testimonies) the situation is very grave and indeed much more serious and alarming than I expected.

Antisemitic behaviour is not only present on many campuses but is an embedded part of the culture. Universities have not taken appropriate action to denounce and suppress it: it has become systemic. The Jewish students are traumatised and feel isolated and unsafe. They are not participating as they should in university life. They have been told by their university administration to stay home for their own safety. This normalised antisemitism is incredibly dangerous to our society as it is an attitude and behaviour that eats away at the fabric of the mission of the tertiary sector. To date university leadership is either in denial about how serious and normalized antisemitism has become on their campuses or has not received information as to the seriousness of the situation (bad news does not travel upwards) or has failed to truly understand what constitutes antisemitism and has responded by placating activist forces. This contrasts with the growing realization of universities overseas that strong measures must be taken (See Appendix 4 - Efforts aimed at accountability at foreign universities for antisemitic discourse and incidents). As US universities open for the new academic year I expect more US universities will adopt the policies and stances of NYU, Columbia and California.

The situation on Australian university campuses must change. The sector needs to respond to the seriousness of the situation. As I have heard from Jewish students, academics and staff, they will only speak of their experiences to trusted advocates like my office or to a forum like a Judicial Inquiry that can take evidence in private and maintain confidentiality. They have no confidence currently in other institutions like the Australia Human Rights Commission (AHRC) to approach their evidence with impartiality and appropriate respect. This calls into question the ultimate efficacy of the Government's referral to the AHRC to study racism at universities including antisemitism.

Another issue that has been raised with me is concern that foreign funding seeking to skew the mission, values and roles of universities may be operating in Australia as has been the case in other Western countries. Universities have been very opaque in their answers regarding this issue.

These four concerns in particular are all reasons for this Senate Committee to call for a Judicial Inquiry:

1. Universities are in denial about the seriousness of the situation and have failed to recognise the embedded culture of antisemitism causing Jewish students to be traumatised, feel unsafe, stay away from campus and not partake equally in educational opportunities and failed to act appropriately;
2. The need to take testimonies in private;
3. The need to thoroughly investigate any foreign funding designed to undermine the universities' mission and values based on upholding truth, democratic and equal opportunity; and
4. The almost universal view expressed by Jewish community representative bodies that a Judicial Inquiry would help the situation by at least listening to community concerns and recommending change.

I do believe that Judicial enquiries or Royal Commissions can bring about important societal change, particularly when the culture in important institutions has caused the institutions to deviate from their purposes and not serve society. This was seen to be the case with the banking sector and although the process was painful the recommendations of the Royal Commission into Misconduct in the Banking, Superannuation and Financial Services Industry resulted in important and meaningful change.

In this case universities, important institutions responsible for the development and maturation of Australian values in our next generation, appear to have an embedded culture of antisemitism and their leadership (with a few notable exceptions) seem not to appreciate this reality. This will impact not just the future of the Jewish community, but as the proverbial canary in the coal mine, also our future as a democratic and free and open society.

Embedded hatred cannot be allowed to foster. It must be called out so that Australian values and our cherished way of life may triumph and it will be important that any Judicial Inquiry be conducted in a manner which respects privacy of testimony and controls extremist outbursts.

In calling for a Judicial Inquiry I am conscious that any such enquiry (should the Senate Committee make a positive recommendation) and implementation of any recommendations will take some time. The situation on campuses is far too serious just to wait for this. From the testimonies I am really concerned about the febrile situation on some campuses and the emotional and physical safety of Jewish students. I therefore detail in this submission a series of other measures that I believe should be recommended to be implemented IMMEDIATELY. Some will require the support of government which I implore consider them urgently.

I therefore commend to the Senate Committee a range of other more immediate measures that should be recommended as well (See Section 2 – Recommendations for more immediate action and Appendix 5 - Recommendations). These are all measures that universities could take immediately.

Introduction

(a) The role of universities

Tertiary education, when provided in a safe environment conducive to learning, thoughtful and thought-provoking debate, and rigorous, evidence-informed scholarship, develops individual potential and whole of society potential.[2] As the former Deputy Chancellor of the University of New South Wales from 2010 to 2019, I have personally seen how the proper delivery of education in a premier tertiary setting can enhance individual and societal outcomes. Racism is inimical to the culture that tertiary settings must foster if they are to produce world leading and diverse scholars and change-makers and our democracy is to be sustained and thrive.

(b) The role of the Special Envoy to Combat Antisemitism

The office of the Special Envoy to Combat Antisemitism (the Special Envoy) was announced on 9 July 2024 in order to address antisemitism in the domestic Australian context, and assists and advises the Government by:

- Providing advice to the Prime Minister and to the Minister for Immigration, Citizenship and Multicultural Affairs to inform policy development, legislation, campaigns (in accordance with the Australian Government Guidelines on Information and Advertising Campaigns by non-corporate Commonwealth entities) and programs that will go to effectively combatting Antisemitism and social cohesion factors that drive the behaviour across online and social media, traditional media, and within education, arts, culture and industry sectors
- Promoting public awareness and understanding of the impacts of Antisemitism by highlighting diverse Jewish Australian identities, the ongoing contributions of

[2] What you need to know about higher education | UNESCO

Jewish Australians to the building and progress of Australia, and combatting stereotypes and misinformation in communication channels
- Engaging with public and private sector stakeholders across whole of society and utilising research and data to identify the drivers of Antisemitic behaviour
- Supporting efforts to address systemic and interpersonal racism (including Antisemitism), hate speech, discrimination and divisive language through public education and awareness, through engaging in media opportunities, facilitating roundtables and participating in public discussion with the support of the Department of Home Affairs
- Identifying ways to strengthen broad social cohesion, including fostering inter-faith dialogue, for all Australians
- Undertaking other related tasks that may be necessary from time to time. [4]

The role of the Special Envoy is informed by the Global Guidelines for Countering Antisemitism (please see Appendix 1A & 1B – Summary and Global Guidelines).

The educational sector is identified as a key area in the Special Envoy's Terms of Reference because education is the single most important means of combating antisemitism, but it also poses the single biggest challenge if education does not embody critical analysis and independent thinking. As demonstrated below, in the tertiary educational space, other efforts aimed at promoting accountability in some contexts have not addressed antisemitism, and therefore this submission advocates for a range of measures to be recommended and then urgently actioned by government and universities.

(c) The unique nature of antisemitism

As noted above, it is important that universities are a safe space for learning and exchange of ideas. Racism of any type is abhorrent and prevents universities from fulfilling their essential role. And yet, we know that not all types of racism are equally prevalent in Australian universities at present. Public manifestations of antisemitism have been disproportionately high compared to manifestations of racism against other communities on campus.[3]

Antisemitism is a unique type of racial hatred that is not broadly understood. It is an ancient hatred based on disinformation and misinformation, and its building blocks are antisemitic tropes[4] that can be subtle yet extremely pervasive. History has shown that in times of economic insecurity, antisemitism bubbles to the surface and becomes socially acceptable. Antisemitism has always been stubborn and shape-shifting, and it is not sufficiently responsive to policies instituted to deal with racism more broadly.[5] It is an insidious hatred that is currently being fanned by social media and if it is not countered at universities it could become so embedded as to never be able to be removed.

Some individuals and institutions may submit that any Judicial Inquiry would seek 'special measures directed at particular types of racism'[6], but in fact what is being sought is the same level of awareness and accountability with regard to antisemitic discourse and incidents in tertiary settings as exists with respect to manifestations of other types of racism[7].

1. Why a Judicial Inquiry

As set out in the 'Summary' section above, such an Inquiry would be able to:

- Compel witnesses to appear and documents to be produced.
- Take sworn evidence in private rather than anecdotal evidence.
- Control hostile witnesses who try to grandstand for political purposes in the same way as in a courtroom.
- Guarantee anonymity to witnesses if they seek it.

A Judicial Inquiry could examine the responses of Australian universities and the sector to the rise of antisemitism on Australian campuses, including whether:

- universities have adopted and implemented an appropriate definition of antisemitism for all purposes such as the International Holocaust Remembrance Alliance definition[8];
- universities have taken appropriate steps to recognise the specific and unique nature of antisemitism[9], to deal with it, and effectively convey their opposition to it, to record instances of it and to provide adequate support arrangements for staff and students experiencing it (both on and off campus);
- the actions taken by the bodies set out in the Bill to protect Jewish students, academics, staff and visitors on campus have been adequate;
- the actions taken by university regulators, leaders, student and staff representative bodies, student clubs and organisations, and other groups on campus to protect Jewish students, academics, staff and visitors on campus have been adequate;[10]

A Judicial Inquiry would also allow Jewish students and staff to have their concerns heard.

[9] When referring to the 'unique' nature of antisemitism in the Explanatory Memorandum on the Antisemitism at Australian Universities Bill, the meaning imputed is not that antisemitism is any more odious than other types of racism, but rather that all types of racism are unique in their manifestations and are built upon their own particular false narratives.

[10] Senator Henderson, Commission of Inquiry into Antisemitism at Australian Universities Bill 2024, Explanatory Memorandum: ParlInfo - Commission of Inquiry into Antisemitism at Australian Universities Bill 2024 (No. 2) (aph.gov.au)

The answers to the above questions are critically important if we are to achieve cultural change at universities. Recommendations for change and real action will be important. As a recent Columbia University report noted, 'there is an urgent need to reshape everyday social norms' on many campuses. This is cultural change. We need to respect the differences among different racial groups and understand what antisemitism is.[11]

A Judicial Inquiry would not be focused on an overhaul of the existing legislative protections under our domestic system for protection of people from incitement, vilification or discrimination on the basis of race, colour or national or ethnic origin, even if legal or policy reform may emerge as a necessary response to the scope of the problem. Rather, it would seek answers so that the endemic and systemic antisemitism at universities can be adequately addressed.

A Judicial Inquiry would afford a much deeper interrogation of the nature and scale of antisemitism at Australian universities than the proposed inquiry by the AHRC into racism on university campuses.[12] As outlined above, a one-size fits all approach to racism has not proven effective with regard to combatting antisemitism – if it had then the AHRC's 'Racism: it stops with me' campaign would have not coincided with a sharp rise in antisemitism; and distrust amongst the Jewish community - particularly students - towards the AHRC currently runs very deep due to the organisation's track record of not accepting a mainstream definition of antisemitism, not demonstrating an understanding of what antisemitism is, and not responding to antisemitism effectively.[13] I note that the mainstream Jewish organisations, including the Executive Council of Australian Jewry and the Australasian Union of Jewish Students, have declined to participate in the study, and have noted their concerns in their respective submissions to the Senate Inquiry. This is a very real concern and will impact the efficacy of the AHRC enquiry.

(a) Lack of transparency regarding responses to incidents

A key question for this Senate Inquiry must be how as a society we might arrive at the truth regarding the scale and manifestations of antisemitism on campuses and whether the universities have responded or can adequately without a Judicial Inquiry taking place.

To that end, I note how resource intensive and difficult it is to obtain such information at present. Several Jewish organisations and other stakeholders have utilised Freedom of Information (FOI) and Government Information Public Access (GIPA) regimes to seek documentation from universities about their engagement with and correspondence about antisemitism at their institutions. Time and again, it is alleged [12] The original subject of the proposed study and Report, as shaped by the Universities Accord (Recommendation 33), was 'Conduct a survey into the prevalence and impact of racism across the tertiary education system'. A specific study of antisemitism at universities was not originally contemplated in the original design of the study, but added afterwards.

[13] Please see the Executive Council of Australian Jewry's submission to the Senate Inquiry into Antisemitism at Australian Universities Bill, 2024 (No. 2), 22 August 2024: https://www.aph.gov.au/DocumentStore.ashx?id=27302e1f-21ca-4821-8faf-5c04d669452b&subId=762155 universities obfuscate answers and deliberately evade provision of the sought after information.[14]

In my office's interviews with university students, academics and professional staff, individuals routinely encouraged my office to utilise the FOI and GIPA regimes, with some even suggesting questions that could be raised in order to tease out information about antisemitic conduct that they had experienced or had knowledge of and which they had shared with my office. They did this because they felt that such conduct had not been adequately addressed by the universities that they studied at or worked at, but the academic or professional risks were too high for them to publicly raise these failures.

Alas, I believe we are unlikely to be able to obtain confirmatory information on these matters through the FOI and GIPA requests process. Such requests to universities tend to face very significant delays and are returned with swathes of sought-after information caveated, redacted or withheld. In some instances, different responses come from different parts of the university. The AHRC does not have the powers to delve into this issue or obtain the evidence that would be most informative.

The very significant labour and resource-intensive task of seeking to acquire meaningful information from universities about issues such as 'their consideration of IHRA, their engagement with antisemitism on their campuses, their expenditure on managing protests which exclude Jews on the basis of their religious beliefs or how they have engaged with requests from other government agencies'[15] is unlikely to be fruitful without a Judicial Inquiry to compel the release of such information.

(b) Foreign interference

It is a matter of national importance that as a society we determine what influences have contributed to building an embedded antisemitic culture at universities over the last couple of decades. A Judicial Inquiry would be able to subpoena the relevant documents and would require senior management at universities to give evidence on matters concerning any foreign funding and influence.

Some staff interviewed by the Special Envoy's office on condition of confidentiality have pointed to their universities' ability to replace funding from Australian Jewish benefactors – which in some instances has been withdrawn on account of reportedly antisemitic conduct - with foreign funding.

In addition, the vast majority of interviewees answered affirmatively when asked the following question:

> "Was there anything about the experience you had that might suggest it came from outside actors (i.e. not students, not staff or other employees of the university/school)?"

[14] Pinczewski, Jack, submission to the Senate Inquiry into Antisemitism at Australian Universities Bill, 2024 (No. 2), 23 August 2024: https://www.aph.gov.au/DocumentStore.ashx?id=92e5e063-02ca-4ca2-bb00-c7985282b8a9&subId=762289

Students, academics and professional staff at a leading university have pointed to obvious signs of outside involvement and interference in their university's encampment. A large-scale journalistic investigation reported that an organisation that is proscribed in several foreign countries including the United Kingdom and Germany has been active in that university's encampment.[16] This issue needs to be investigated further.

(c) Partial Reponses

Some universities have realised the severity of what is happening and have started to conduct their own inquiries. For instance, the University of Sydney is embarking on an external review of policies and processes (I have not yet seen the terms of reference for that review).[17] It is unclear whether or not this review will bring about cultural change. At the same time, the university has set up an Investment Policies Review Working Group chaired by Dr Simon Longstaff AO, as part of a settlement to end the encampment on campus[18].

2. Recommendations for urgent action

As noted in the above summary, Jewish students are feeling unsafe, are suffering mental health issues, have been told to stay away from campus. Urgent action is needed. I intend to work on the following measures with Australian universities immediately. However, strong recommendations from the Senate Inquiry in the areas outlined below and supportive action from government are needed to encourage universities to act now. The situation on campuses cannot just be left to the recommendations of a Judicial Inquiry, however necessary that might be.

(a) Best practice policies

Many universities' policies regarding student and staff conduct are a patchwork quilt of at times conflicting ideas which depart from domestic and international legal obligations or misstate the boundaries between academic freedom and hate speech. Some universities have strong policies in place in respect of conduct, including in the areas of freedom from discrimination and racial vilification – some of which were introduced post October 7 - while others do not. Please refer to Appendix 2 (University policies) for a summary of universities' responses to inquiries from my office regarding which policies they currently have in place relating to staff and student conduct.

It is important that universities adopt best practice and introduce policies that give them the ability to discipline people whose conduct is antisemitic. While many universities may think their policies reflect best practice – and they look to the US and UK for best practice - they may not be best practice. Universities may also be unaware of the extent to which many US universities have reformed their policies in light of greater public scrutiny of antisemitic conduct taking place on their campuses (Please see

[16] Juanola, Marta, Worthington, Anne, and McKenzie, Nick, 'Hate comes to university campus but hides its face', The Age, 16 June 2024: Israel Hamas: Hate comes to university camp but hides its face (theage.com.au)
[17] External review invitation to make a submission - The University of Sydney
[18] Joint statement on the University of Sydney (ecaj.org.au)

Appendix 4 - Efforts aimed at accountability at foreign universities for antisemitic discourse and incidents). Another point of difference is that Australian universities are funded by the federal government to a much larger extent than many private US universities[19], and it is therefore feasible and necessary that the Australian Government demands they put in place best practice policies.

I intend convening roundtables of universities to discuss best practice policies, but my office would welcome any commendation from the Senate Committee to the Australian Government in this area.

(b) The National Student Ombudsman

As can be seen in Appendix 3 - Testimonies, Jewish students and staff have experienced systemic antisemitism, and this has impacted their ability to have an equal education or even to be on campus. Students and staff are intimidated and unwilling to complain to universities because they lack trust that their university is taking complaints about antisemitism seriously or they fear retribution in some form. An Ombudsman should be established to handle complaints and address the issue of underreporting. I note that I have already made a recommendation to the Minister for Education, the Hon. Jason Clare MP, that any ombudsman's office set up to manage complaints of sexual violence and harassment on campus[20] either be given an expanded remit and qualified resources to manage complaints about antisemitism specifically or an independent Ombudsman for racism with expertise in addressing antisemitism be established. The response to my office has illustrated the fact that at present student, academic and staff complaints have not been appropriately responded to. Telling students, academics or staff to stay at home is unacceptable.

In recent years tertiary settings have been under the microscope for other unlawful conduct and human rights abuse such as sexual violence and harassment. The Australian Human Rights Commission's Change the Course report[21] found that women and other minority groups were more likely to experience incidents of sexual assault and harassment on university campuses. The report also identified patterns of behaviour by tertiary institutions with respect to reported incidents of sexual assault and harassment, namely, that institutions have frequently dismissed survivors' experiences, failed to take proper steps to respond to reports or have punished survivors for reporting.

Following the release of the Change the Course report, and the introduction of measures responsive to the problems identified in the report, the 2021 National Student Safety Survey[22] found that the Australian university sector continued to fail in reducing campus sexual violence or in holding university institutions to account. This led to the University Accord process being established, which gave rise to the introduction of the Action Plan Addressing Gender-based Violence in Higher Education in February 2024[23]. This plan proposes seven key actions including a National Student Ombudsman.

These same patterns of behaviour identified in the Change the Course report are exhibited with respect to the way that universities are handling reported incidents of antisemitism. Lessons to be learned and changes implemented should not be limited to incidents of sexual assault and harassment and may reasonably be extrapolated with respect to universities' management of antisemitism and other forms of racism.

(c) The Tertiary Education Quality and Standards Agency

The Tertiary Education Quality and Standards Agency (TEQSA) was established under the Tertiary Education Quality and Standards Agency Act 2011 (TEQSA Act) as the national regulator of tertiary education in Australia. The principles underpinning the regulation which guide TEQSA are regulatory necessity, reflecting risk and proportionate regulation.[24]

The Higher Education Standards Framework 2021 informs TEQSA's work by setting out the standards registered tertiary education providers must meet regarding student and staff safety and wellbeing, academic freedom and corporate governance. Registered tertiary education providers are responsible for managing their own risk but must demonstrate and take proper measures to ensure that they are legally compliant, including with respect to Commonwealth, state and territory laws relating to safety, anti-discrimination and anti-vilification.[25] Under the current regime, TEQSA is not empowered to make a legal determination about whether tertiary education providers are operating in accordance with the law, and it is limited to imposing administrative sanctions in the event of non-compliance.

While TEQSA established a regulatory response group following the "rapid escalation in protest activities and associated risks at Australian university campuses"[26], it has not been able to inquire beyond whether universities had appropriate response mechanisms in place.

As of 17 July 2024, 598 reports of complaints had been reported to TEQSA by tertiary education providers, with most complaints being concentrated in the major urban areas.[27] This does not mean that antisemitism is confined to universities located in urban areas. At universities located outside of urban areas, where there are few Jewish students, academics or staff, there are likely to be less reported antisemitic incidents because there are fewer impacted individuals to raise complaints, and complainants are more conspicuous. Interviews by my office with students at universities with significantly smaller Jewish populations seem to attest to how serious the problem of antisemitism is, irrespective of whether the staff or students have ever met a Jew. For instance, the testimony of a student from the University of Wollongong identified several unrecorded antisemitic incidents. The culture of intimidation and marginalisation appears to be such that students are not inclined to come forward and raise complaints.

The data TEQSA has published regarding the number of concerns received by TEQSA indicates that TEQSA is being drastically underutilised, which may stem from:

- its inability to impose anything other than administrative sanctions on universities;
- a lack of awareness of the existence of TEQSA or what actions it might be able to take in relation to complaints about universities; or
- Uncertainty about confidentiality or likelihood of action.

The Jewish community has not seen any positive action from TEQSA to improve the festering of antisemitism on university campuses despite a small number of complaints being made over the years.

As Special Envoy I intend working with TEQSA to see if more can be done by it to ensure Codes of Conduct are enforced or to examine whether their powers need to be enhanced. These are several recommendations noted in Appendix 5 that would be helpful if endorsed.

(d) The Universities Accord and Report by AHRC

The Universities Accord aims to devise recommendations and performance targets to improve the quality, accessibility, affordability and sustainability of higher education.[28] One of its five priority areas is "Work with State and Territory governments and universities to improve university governance. This measure will help improve the capacity of universities to strengthen responses to issues including industrial relations compliance, workforce management and student safety."[29] The Universities Accord gave rise to:

- the Action Plan Addressing Gender-based Violence in Higher Education in February 2024, and
- a Report on the prevalence and impact of antisemitism, Islamophobia, the experience of First Nations peoples and racism at universities,

As noted above, I have concerns regarding the efficacy of an investigation by the AHRC that explores the issue of antisemitism at Australian universities given the lack of trust in its processes by impacted Jewish students, academics and staff. I also have concerns about a general report on multiple forms of racism. I do however commend the Universities Accord's emphasis on recommendations and performance targets as a means of improving the problem of antisemitism in tertiary institutions.

(e) National database and hotline for racist incidents and discourse

Currently, in Australia there are only three communities which have a reporting and documentation system, and which produce reports on hate incidents against their community - Jewish, Muslim and east Asian. Each report collates a specific number of incidents which occurred over a particular time-period. However, the characteristics of the incidents included in these three reports vary to such an extent that it is extremely difficult to gauge the true level of hate incidents any particular minority community is facing.

The main three reports are: the Executive Council of Australian Jewry's Antisemitism Report (produced annually since 1990); the Islamophobia Register Australia's (IRA) Report 'Islamophobia in Australia' (four reports produced); and the Asian Australian Alliance's (AAA) 'Covid-19 Coronavirus Racism Incident Report' (first report).

Each of these reports brings its own characteristics in four distinct ways:

1. the criteria used to determine whether an incident is a hate incident or not
2. the categories used to classify different forms of hate incidents
3. the levels of transparency of the actual incidents, and
4. the time frames of the reporting period.

In addition, all the above-mentioned reports have different or unknown criteria for inclusion/exclusion as a hate incident, different data categories (notably, two reports include online discourse as incidents while one report excludes online discourse), different transparency levels of incidents, and different time frames of reporting periods. The reports also differ in their methodology for data collection, data analysis, and organisational support and authors.

Such differences and discrepancies in each of these three community reports mean that the overall situation regarding hate incidents impacting these groups cannot be accurately compared without very intensive analysis of points of commonality. If the Australian government and universities and other stakeholders are to be at all effective in combating antisemitism and other forms of racism, then there must be a repository for standardised and consistent reporting of hate incidents and hate crimes occurring in Australia.

The ECAJ and other peak state bodies in the Australian Jewish community have long advocated for a standard uniform national system across Australia. Uniformity in data collection – including criteria, categorisation, transparency, time frames - is best achieved through a national system.

This uniform national system could be operated by police or other government services, such as in the United Kingdom, United States and Canada, which have systems in place where hate incidents are reported, and the data compiled. An alternative to police or other government agencies is a system of third-party reporting (TPR), whereby a non-government organisation, usually with government funding, takes reports of hate incidents, often through an online portal, and compiles reports. Third-party reporting organisations include True Vision and Stop Hate UK, both in the

UK. These third-party bodies can act as a conduit to reporting incidents to police by forwarding the reports on.[30]

There are many parallel steps that must be undertaken in tandem with instituting a uniform national database, including formulating definitions of what constitutes hate incidents and hate crime, and embarking on fit for purpose training initiatives of stakeholders who are involved in the reporting and enforcement stages. I do recommend that a national and uniform database be established. In the interim, prior to the establishment of a national database, I recommend that a national hotline is instituted for university students and staff so that data about racist incidents at universities can be captured, as this will help give impetus to a national database and also provide a safe space for those impacted by racism, including antisemitism, to report such incidents. This hotline would need to be linked to the relevant state and federal policing bodies as well as community organisations who are appropriately qualified to provide support to those impacted. I understand that Jewish student organisations have sought such a hotline for some time.

(f) Definition of antisemitism

The office of the Special Envoy fully supports the IHRA Working Definition of Antisemitism (IHRA Working Definition), as do most democratic countries including Australia.[31] When I recently represented Australia as Special Envoy at a global meeting in Buenos Aires in July, I met with other envoys in jurisdictions including the USA, Argentina and Canada. There was a consistent view at that meeting that one cannot counter antisemitism without an understanding of what it means, and that the best definition is one that has been worked on over many years with sustained input from experts and Jewish communities around the world. The Global Guidelines referenced earlier, signed by Australia, also support the wide adoption of the IHRA definition.

The IHRA Working Definition has broad bipartisan support in Australia and is the only definition of antisemitism that has been officially endorsed by Labor, the Coalition and various Independent MPs, as well as by the national roof body, the Executive Council of Australian Jewry (ECAJ), Jewish State and Territory roof bodies and many other organisations that are representative of the mainstream Australian Jewish community.[32]

I endorse the position adopted by the ECAJ in its response to the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee during the inquiry into right-wing extremist movements in Australia[33], namely that the IHRA Working Definition recognises that

"denying the Jewish people their right to self-determination, e.g., by claiming that the existence of a State of Israel is a racist endeavor" can, "taking into account the overall context", amount to antisemitism. It should be obvious that this formulation does not automatically characterise as antisemitic any criticism of Israeli laws and policies, whether on the grounds of alleged racism or otherwise.[34]

Australian universities have generally not adopted the IHRA Working Definition due to strong pushback from academics, whereas it is much more widely adopted overseas. For example, in the United Kingdom, the IHRA Working Definition has been embraced by dozens of universities.

I note also that at least two of the most prominent Australian universities' Academic Boards have rejected the IHRA Working Definition on the basis of two qualifying statements proposed by the UK Home Affairs Select Committee without appreciating that both statements have subsequently been considered and rejected by the UK government. Furthermore, there are obvious shortcomings with having Academic Boards at universities make a determination about the adoption of the IHRA Working Definition insofar as such bodies do not have any student welfare consideration function.

Notwithstanding the above comments, I acknowledge that whatever the definition adopted, if the culture of a university is endemically antisemitic, a definition will not alone remedy that issue. Nevertheless, I would like to work with the universities in a good faith exploration of a useful definition of antisemitism, perhaps based on the IHRA Working Definition but Australianised. I note in this context the working definition of antisemitism adopted by Columbia University. It is important that a definition of antisemitism is agreed and adopted to provide a bright line for policies, disciplinary procedures, reporting of the database and action of the database. One cannot expect to reduce or combat antisemitism if it is not defined.

(g) Training

In order to bring about cultural change at Australian universities it is very important that training of staff, academics, officials and students take place. This is what has already happened on many campuses in relation to addressing the problem of sexual violence and sexual assault. Students have been trained to understand the importance of consent and staff have been trained to deal with reported incidents. Similar initiatives must be implemented to train students and staff about how to report and respond to racism, including antisemitism. Universities in the US have put training programs in place (see Appendix 4). I intend to work with universities to implement training modules, and request that the Committee recommend that universities consult with my office regarding the implementation of appropriate training in response to the surge in antisemitism.

Conclusion

I believe that for the reasons outlined above urgent action is needed by universities around Australia to deal with embedded antisemitism. Universities are important places where not only are life skills obtained, lifelong contacts made but the culture of a nation fostered. A culture that excludes one group, intimidates, traumatises and makes them feel unsafe is contrary to the mission of universities and contrary to the best interests of the nation.

Serious and meaningful action must be taken. The recommendations I have made in Section 2 for immediate action are all doable and can be encouraged by this Senate Committee.

I have also set out in Section 1 arguments as to why a Judicial Inquiry is also needed to deal with embedded antisemitism on campuses. Serious change is needed and I do not believe universities appreciate how serious the situation is. It is likely to deteriorate further unless material action is taken and universities draw important boundaries between acceptable free speech and behaviour and unacceptable Jew hatred. Judicial Enquiries or Royal Commissions have managed to bring about important institutional change and, if set up appropriately, I believe could do so in this grave situation.

Yours sincerely

APPENDIX 1: Global Guidelines for Countering Antisemitism

On 17 July, the Global Guidelines for Countering Antisemitism (Global Guidelines) were introduced by concerned states, special envoys, national coordinators and representatives tasked by their governments to counter antisemitism (the Global Guidelines are reproduced directly below).

The Global Guidelines are legally non-binding and include policies to monitor and combat antisemitism which are recommended for adoption across all societies, irrespective of whether they have Jewish populations or not.

The Global Guidelines emphasize the importance of clear and principled leadership to denounce antisemitism expeditiously and without politicization. They also clarify the central importance of identifying and defining antisemitism, highlighting the International Holocaust Remembrance Alliance (IHRA) Working Definition of Antisemitism used by over 40 United Nations Member States since its adoption in 2016.

All other aspects of the Global Guidelines are highly relevant to how universities should address the surge in antisemitism. They provide a lens through which a Judicial Inquiry should assess responses by key stakeholders to antisemitism on university campuses. For instance, the Global Guidelines recommend engaging social media in order to combat antisemitism, which is something that all universities could be doing more effectively, including promoting reporting and complaints mechanisms and condemning antisemitic incidents and discourse publicly.

The Global Guidelines have been deployed by other Governments and stakeholders to address the increased incidence and ferocity of antisemitic incidents and discourse on university campuses abroad, with some successful examples of interventions set out in Appendix 4 - Efforts aimed at accountability at foreign universities for antisemitic discourse and incidents.

GLOBAL GUIDELINES FOR COUNTERING ANTISEMITISM

Concerned states, special envoys, national coordinators, and representatives tasked by their governments to counter antisemitism, in cooperation with international bodies, offer the following best practices, which have proven to be effective guidelines in formulating public policy.

These legally non-binding guidelines, adopted in Buenos Aires, Argentina, include policies to monitor and combat antisemitism that can be implemented and adapted to a wide variety of national, regional, and cultural contexts.

We urge all states and international bodies, as well as civil society, to embrace and use these practices, many of which already form the basis of regional and country-based action plans. These guidelines can be applied everywhere, not only in societies with Jewish communities.

SPEAK OUT – Governments and political leaders should denounce antisemitism swiftly, clearly, and unequivocally, whenever and wherever it occurs. This applies to the domestic and international arenas, including regional and international organizations.

AVOID POLITICIZATION – Antisemitism can appear across the political spectrum and should be rejected without political bias and regardless of its origin.

ADOPT and IMPLEMENT – Governments and international bodies should adopt and implement strategies and action plans that engage all relevant ministries and public authorities at all levels of governance. This should be done in consultation with Jewish communities, civil society, field researchers, and other relevant stakeholders. Such policies should be assessed periodically and updated as needed.

APPOINT and EMPOWER – Governments and international bodies should consider appointing national coordinators, special envoys, or designated officials. Such officials can proactively address antisemitism as a cross-cutting public policy challenge and should be provided with the necessary authority, empowerment, and resources to be effective.

UNDERSTAND and DEFINE – In order to combat antisemitism, governments need tools to understand its various manifestations. The legally non-binding "International Holocaust Remembrance Alliance (IHRA) Working Definition of Antisemitism" is an important internationally recognized instrument used by over 40 U.N. member states since its adoption in 2016. In addition, hundreds of sub-national public authorities, universities, sports bodies, NGOs, and corporations rely on it.

PROTECT – There are few roles more central for governments than the security and welfare of their populations. Jewish communities are targets of physical threats and attacks from both foreign and domestic sources. Governments, working together with Jewish communities, should provide appropriate protection and security enhancements that safeguard and sustain Jewish communal life. Religious freedom and protection also encompass safeguarding unhindered religious practice.

COLLECT – Policies should be in place to support the uniform collection of data documenting incidents of antisemitism as well as the perceptions of antisemitism among Jewish communities and the broader public. Such information, drawn from community-based sources, when possible, allows for evidence-based understanding of trends and sources.

ENFORCE – Enforcement of hate crime and anti-discrimination laws is critical and should take place within legal frameworks that protect civil liberties and human rights, such as freedom of expression. Enforcement conveys the broader message that antisemitism is unacceptable, has consequences, and cannot be tolerated.

EDUCATE – Education is vital for identifying and countering antisemitism, including Holocaust remembrance and countering Holocaust denial and distortion, an especially pernicious form of antisemitism. It has also proven effective in sensitizing law enforcement. Education about Jewish culture and contributions to society demystifies Jews and Judaism. Many countries and intergovernmental organizations have linked their efforts against antisemitism to broadening appreciation of Jewish heritage and fostering Jewish life.

CULTIVATE A WHOLE-OF-SOCIETY COMMITMENT – Countering antisemitism requires a whole-of-society commitment that includes the active participation of civil society. Collaboration; bridge-building; nurturing trust among faith, civic, and cultural leaders; and fostering mutual understanding are essential, particularly since antisemitism is not solely a threat to Jews. It can endanger members of other minority groups, democratic values, and national security and stability.

ENGAGE SOCIAL MEDIA – Antisemitism, like other forms of group hatred and disinformation, is widespread and mutating online. It has real world consequences and can lead to radicalization to violence. Stakeholders should oppose antisemitism online, stay educated on evolving trends, increase transparency about antisemitic content, assess impacts on vulnerable communities, and find solutions, within the context of existing legal frameworks.

STRENGTHEN INTERNATIONAL COLLABORATION – Coalition-building and international cooperation are paramount to effectively monitor and counter antisemitism. In an interconnected world where hate respects no borders, transnational cooperation can identify threats, raise awareness, broaden the use of best practices, and more effectively and proactively coordinate responses.

Appendix 2: University policies

My office contacted all major Australian universities to ask which policies they currently have in place relating to staff and student conduct. Their responses are summarised below.

Of the 13 universities (36.1%) that had or were putting in place targeted policies relating to staff and student conduct:

- Two universities adopted a definition Antisemitism
  - In January 2023, one university adopted the International Holocaust Remembrance Alliance working definition of antisemitism. (University of Melbourne)
  - In June 2023, one university adopted a working definition of Antisemitism without its eleven examples and the Jerusalem Declaration on Antisemitism as guidelines. (La Trobe University)

- One university put in place a detailed 'Racial harassment' definition to include, but not limited to:
  a. the display of racist cartoons, posters and graffiti, use of hate symbols, or distribution of offensive racially-oriented material
  b. repeated jokes or derogatory comments that make reference to ethnicity or racial characteristics
  c. derogatory remarks about a person's accent, culture, customs or religious observances
  d. denial of historic harms or abuses
  e. racially oriented abuse or name-calling
  f. negative stereotyping of particular ethnic groups
  g. accusing an individual or group of being responsible for a real or imagined wrongdoing based on their racial, cultural or ethnic background
  h. repeated irrelevant reference to a person's racial, cultural or ethnic background
  i. practical jokes based on race or directed only at members of a non-majority ethnic group, or bullying, intimidation, exclusion or physical violence, on the basis of the cultural or ethnic background of the recipient. (Curtin University)

- One university classified graffiti as an example of race-based harassment and noted in its policy that 'active bystanders' can have an especially important role in combatting racism and religious vilification. (University of NSW)

Further notes:
- One university indicated that it had received complaints of alleged bias in relation to course materials associated with the Gaza conflict. (University of Melbourne)
- One university undertook additional engagement with the encampment representatives, which resulted in a Disclosure, Divestment and Ethical Investment Memorandum of Understanding with the student body in relation to the universities research activities. (This is sensitive as it relates to research relating to weapons).

Twelve universities (33.3%) had undertaken increased engagement with students and/or community.

Specific examples of engagement by universities included:

- Frequent meetings between the university leadership and the Student Guild, from the outset of the encampment.
- Meetings between the university leadership and the Presidents of the Guild, Palestinian Students' Association, Chief Rabbi and State President of the Jewish body as well as other concerned students/staff.
- Undertaking regular communication and offering support to staff and students during the encampment.
- Establishing dialogue with the students of the encampment over the three month period.
- Working closely with faith communities as part of the university's 'Spiritual Support and Inclusion Action Plan'. This included:
    - Writing to all students reminding them about support for staff through the University's EAP and Student Counselling.
    - Reaching out by the Wellbeing Team to specific groups to remind them of the support services available and how to access the support services.
    - Keeping the community aware of developments through a webpage regarding concerns on campuses, in relation to the ongoing conflict in the Middle East.
    - Remaining in close communication with representatives of groups affected by current events, including their Jewish students, to discuss their concerns.
- Working with the Jewish Students' Society (in the case of one university) to put in place:
    - Approval by the Academic Registrar for the use of a personalised letter from the Australasian Union of Jewish Students (AUJS) as evidence of eligibility for Special Consideration.
    - Dialogue about the conflict in Gaza which included representatives from the university's Jewish student community. The Rabbi of the synagogue, who is one of our University's longstanding chaplains, provides direct links to the community.
    - An email to all staff and representative student groups in July 2024 communicating updates and that encampments are not permitted.
- Working with representatives from Camp Shalom, Muslim Students for Palestine, Student Union and staff regarding the Anti-racism commitment (in the case of one university).
- Convening working groups to consider possible changes to policies covering use of flags, advertising, social media etc (in the case of one university).
- Other examples include meeting regularly with local communities to ensure messages of support, consultation with Office of General Counsel, the Senior Executive etc.

Seven universities (19.4%) had undertaken other initiatives which include:

- Significant new investments to directly address antisemitism, build social cohesion, strengthen dialogue, and help to reduce tensions on campus and in the broader community.
- Encouraging students to report concerning behaviour, all Jewish students and those impacted by the protest were provided with preapproved 'Special Consideration' to ensure they would not be disadvantaged in their studies, offered remission of debt and removal of the failure grade for Jewish students. The university also started an Anti-Racism taskforce to work on an over-arching Anti-Racism strategy including the development of Anti-Racism training modules for students and staff.
- Ensuring that the university's security undertake a higher level of vigilance on campus for racial violence incidents, and all staff working within the University's student accommodation residences are trained to understand cultural sensitivities and de-escalation practices. There was also a dedicated to develop and implement Respect Campaign, to raise awareness about the University's commitment to inclusivity, diversity and respectful behaviours.
- Instituting a number of initiatives including:
    - Shutting down the encampment - In August 2024, 20 students received disciplinary notices for contravention of the Student Conduct Policy and 4 staff have been subject to a range of actions arising from contraventions of the Appropriate Workplace Behaviours Policy as a result of the building occupation and in accordance with the University's usual performance and disciplinary procedures.
    - Committing to develop and deliver a suite of anti-racism and cultural competency education programs for students, staff and leaders.
    - Introducing a fast-track response for removing offensive posters, stickers and graffiti on campus.
    - For Jewish students - activation of revised eligibility for Special Consideration for students, activation of the Student Support Fund to directly support students affected by these events, with a one-off non-repayable grant of $1,000 (students may be eligible for further Financial Aid as the situation evolves), increased awareness of the supports and resources available through Counselling and Psychological Services and the University Health Service, and providing a room for members to use as a private safe space on campus, especially throughout SWOTVAC and the exam period.

APPENDIX 3: Analysis of interviews of university students, academics and professional staff

From 5 August 2024 until 6 September 2024, my office interviewed 65 university staff, students and academics from campuses across Australia, with most interviewees residing in Victoria (c.35%), NSW (c.51%), the ACT (c.9.2%), unspecified state (c.1.7%)*[1] and Queensland (c.3.1%). Approximately half of those interviewed are students.[2] Despite attending or working at different universities, in many respects there were similarities between:

- the experiences they described
- the type of antisemitic incidents and discourse they had experienced
- how their complaints were handled, minimised, ignored or rejected
- the impact on their psychosocial wellbeing and physical safety

My office intends to continue conducting interviews and gathering additional evidence to provide to the Senate Inquiry and any future Judicial Inquiry.

In my opinion these testimonies indicate that systemic antisemitism is occurring on Australian university campuses. This is causing Jewish students to feel isolated and unsafe and not be afforded the educational opportunities that they are entitled to. This experience of racism is amplified for those students and staff who are both Jewish and Israeli, and it is the case that Israeli staff and students are experiencing intersectional racism, which is directed at their national identity as well as their racial identity. Further, I believe that the universities themselves do not understand or appreciate the unique, embedded and normalised extent of this particular type of racism, and cultural change is needed.

I would like to thank every interviewee for their forthright recount of their experiences on campus. Your courage in coming forward will help achieve change.

(a) Methodology

The interviews were marketed as follows:

"Share your Experiences of Antisemitism with the new Antisemitism Envoy

Jillian Segal AO in her new position as Special Envoy to Combat Antisemitism would like to hear from students, academics and staff who have experienced antisemitism on university campuses to inform her work combatting antisemitism in Australia and to help formulate her submission to the Senate Inquiry into Antisemitism on University Campuses.

[1] This signifies that the data has been de-identified further than elsewhere due to sensitivities relating to the identity of the interviewee.
[2] Some interviewees were employed as staff at universities while also completing doctorate or masters programs.

If you would like to organise an interview with the office of Ms Segal, please click on the link below.

All interviews will be conducted confidentially. This is a vital opportunity to have your voice heard and contribute to the fight against antisemitism.

Interview Details:
Dates: now until 6th September (if you can't fit in an interview before the deadline for the Special Envoy's submission to the Committee please still book an interview as all testimony is valuable)
Locations: Zoom, or in person by request
Duration: Each interview slot is 30 minutes
[The link to book interviews was provided].

We are also happy to take testimony of non-Jewish students or staff at universities who have witnessed antisemitism.'

The interviews were advertised by word of mouth; on the social media or communications of the ECAJ; the social media or communications of some of the state peak Jewish bodies; and in a newsletter sent to constituents by the Federal Member of Parliament for Wentworth, Allegra Spender MP.

Every interviewee was allocated a 30-minute timeslot to talk with a representative of my office. The interviewer would briefly describe the purpose of the interview: to gather information about the experiences of Jewish students, academics and professional staff at universities across Australia who felt they had encountered antisemitism, in order to inform my office's work combatting antisemitism in Australia and to help formulate my submission to the Senate Inquiry.

Interviewees were told that their personal data would be de-identified, and that to the extent that any information such as their subject of study, faculty, physical location of work or study or other information made them identifiable, then it would be removed from their testimony unless they expressly requested that the information be publicly disclosed in my submission. To that end the interviewees were told to flag to the interviewer any information that made them identifiable which they were not comfortable having published in my submission. Interviewees were also told that if they wanted to ensure that particular information that they shared with their interviewer was not disclosed in my submission, then they should state "off the record" prior to providing that information to the interviewer.

Due to the very significant risks to interviewees' academic grades, professional standing, career opportunities, physical and emotional wellbeing, and their livelihoods, the majority of the information that emerged from interviews needed to be de-identified and treated as confidential, meaning that I am unable to publicise some of the most harrowing and confronting parts of many of the testimonies. It is my hope that I will have the opportunity to provide this information to a Judicial Inquiry if one is called in the future, subject to the consent of the interviewees. Any Judicial Inquiry should be empowered to hear evidence confidentially without witnesses needing to fear reprisals. Many interviewees indicated that they would be willing to give evidence before a Judicial Inquiry provided they could do so confidentially.

Interviewees were asked to 'tell their story' to the interviewer, with the interviewer listening. Upon completion of their recount of anything that they wished to tell the interviewer, each interviewee was given six standard questions to answer. The questions were as follows:

1. Where did the incident / discourse take place (online, in class, on campus etc) and were there any online manifestations of it?
2. Was the incident / discourse reported to the university and Community Security Group (or to anyone else), and, if not, why not? Did you feel there was a satisfactory response?
3. Were you offended, insulted, humiliated or intimidated by the act/s in question and do you believe that the act/s happened because you are Jewish / Israeli (please substantiate that belief)?
4. What was the emotional and/or physical impact of the antisemitic incident/discourse you experienced?
5. Was there anything about the experience you had that might suggest it came from outside actors (i.e. not students, not academics or other employees of the university/school)?
6. Were you treated less favourably, or not given the same opportunities, as others in a similar situation because you are Jewish/Israeli?

(b) Key findings

In collecting the testimonies I did not set out to conduct a broad survey. There are limitations to the information I gathered insofar as I have not yet been able to interview students and staff from all major universities, and nor can I say that their experiences are representative insofar as even within the same university a student's or employee's experience may differ considerably depending on their faculty or area of work. Other factors may influence the students', academics' or staff's experience, ranging from how socially active or involved in university clubs they are, to their age and background. However, clearly discernible trends emerged across the testimonies, and these trends highlight an overall picture that is concerning and requires urgent action.

Below is a summary of key findings from the interviews:

Location of incident / discourse and online manifestations

Every single interviewee, irrespective of their university, described the proliferation of posters and stickers on campus, many of which contained antisemitic content or anti-Israel content. They also noted the prevalence of similar graffiti and other signs that, to the overwhelming majority of interviewees, sent a message that Jews and Israelis were unwelcome. Two interviewees from the University of NSW, Sydney noted that their university was better at preventing and removing the posters or stickers than some other universities.

Eighty per cent of student interviewees experienced an antisemitic incident or discourse in a lecture or tutorial, and many of these individuals experienced such incidents or discourse in more than one lecture or tutorial and/or in other locations at the university. Nearly 70% of university staff, including academics, experienced an antisemitic incident or discourse in their immediate workplace – that is, with close colleagues - while all academics and staff interviewed said they witnessed manifestations of antisemitism on campus, which ranged from specific chants at encampments such as “F*ck off, Zionist scum” to antisemitic posters or stickers in their work environment.

Some interviewees were harassed or abused online, including through online petitions that named and targeted them. Of those whose classes had an online component, a common experience was that they felt isolated and ostracized because the online interactions amongst their cohort would invariably include antisemitic or anti-Israel discourse, or would lead to the formation of breakaway groups that focused on anti-Israel themes.

Reporting

Not a single interviewee who reported an incident or discourse to their university felt satisfied with how the reporting process was handled. Even when the outcome was that the offending lecturer, professor or student/s were subject to a disciplinary process, the interviewees felt that this was not conveyed to those who had been impacted by their dissemination of antisemitic or anti-Israel discourse or disinformation/misinformation. The interviewees also noted that when incidents or discourse were reported there was never any accountability demonstrated by the university or faculty, and the conduct was pinned on an individual even despite the interviewee feeling that such conduct had become normalised.

In some instances interviewees felt they had no option but to go to the police to seek assistance, and on occasions this proved effective but only because the university came under heavy pressure. Interviewees tended to have a view that their universities were focused on minimising negative publicity and neutralising legal risks, rather than proactively managing a situation to prevent racial vilification, discrimination or marginalisation.

Eighty-six per cent of interviewees felt that they had been racially vilified and in one instance an individual had brought legal action which had concluded in their favour. Some interviewees noted that they did not have a particular connection with Israel, but still felt offended, humiliated, insulted and intimidated by incidents or discourse that they experienced, highlighting that these incidents or discourse were therefore antisemitic even if the perpetrators claimed such incidents or discourse were 'anti-Zionist'.

Some of the types of racial vilification included being spat at by people in the encampment even when just approaching to have a calm conversation; being photographed or filmed without consent and finding that footage or the image appeared online with identifying information and/or threats; being abused online on account of the individual's Jewish identity or suspected Zionism; having the front of one's home vandalised with Nazi or Hamas symbols; being pushed out of accommodation by roommates on account of being Jewish and/or a Zionist; being humiliated in class for expressing a Jewish or Israeli perspective and many other examples.

Involvement of outside actors

The majority of interviewees noted that they had personally witnessed the presence of outside actors in the anti-Israel or antisemitic activity that they had observed. Some were able to point to correspondence or media coverage from their universities proving this. Interviewees all noted the proliferation of antisemitic and anti-Israel posters and stickers around campuses which come from outside organisations. In the case of the University of Sydney, many students and academics pointed to the investigation which had demonstrated the involvement of Hizb-ut Tahrir in the encampment[3], as well as their own personal experiences evidencing involvement of outside actors.

Discrimination

One interviewee successfully brought a case for discrimination against their university employer, and another interviewee was successful in a complaint to the university which resulted in it taking disciplinary action against the perpetrator of the conduct that formed the subject of the complaint. Several others identified less favourable treatment on the basis of what they perceived to be their racial or religious identity, but were reluctant to report it or did not receive a satisfactory or any outcome from reporting such conduct. Some complaints remain underway.

Many students reported self-censorship, stating that they adopted positions in their essays or assignments that they did not believe in because they believed if they had taken a position reflective of their views, however well-substantiated by evidence, they would have suffered a decline in their grades and hostility in their courses.

[3] Juanola, Marta, Worthington, Anne, and McKenzie, Nick, 'Hate comes to university campus but hides its face', The Age, 16 June 2024: Israel Hamas: Hate comes to university camp but hides its face (theage.com.au)

Several students reported being penalised for being Jewish or Israeli, either by:

- failing an assignment or course or performing well below their average grade because they refused to take the same position on an issue concerning Israel as their lecturer or tutor had publicly adopted, and their Jewish or Israeli identity was known to their lecturer or tutor;
- being refused special accommodations they had requested or being made to wait until the very last minute for notification as to whether they would receive special accommodations, when their requests were linked to:
    - their suffering as a result of October 7, including direct proximity to family members or friends who were murdered, raped or taken hostage,
    - their trauma as a result of an antisemitic experience, or
    - religious observance,

with such requests identifying them as a Jew.

Normalisation of antisemitic rhetoric, dehumanisation and marginalisation

Many students, academics and staff noted that once their colleagues or teachers learned they were Jewish or realised they had a Jewish or Hebrew name, they asked them what their views were on the current government of Israel, Israel's conduct in the war, and Israel's 'occupation/apartheid/genocide/ethnic cleansing'. Those who experienced this line of questioning all pointed to the questioner being in a position of relative power to them, either as the person grading their work, supervising their studies or being a senior colleague/manager. While this was subtle and those interviewed could not say definitively that their grades or career prospects would have suffered as a result of their answers, there was a threatening undercurrent to such questioning – particularly as in many cases the questioners had already made their anti-Israel or antisemitic views known on social media or in public settings such as staff meetings - and it made them feel uncomfortable particularly because it played on the 'dual loyalty' antisemitic trope.[4]

Other students reported sitting in lecture halls where the lecturer would demonise Israel and dehumanise Israelis and/or Jews and they would feel powerless to say anything and fearful of the consequences if they did.

All students interviewed reported that their social circles had shrunk and that they had greater difficulty befriending non-Jewish students once their Jewish identity was known to those students. Students who challenged academics' statements in lectures or tutorials reported being ostracised by classmates.

Students at ANU and University of Sydney in particular identified public messaging on materials that were widely disseminated which propagated antisemitic tropes such as the global domination/power trope.[5]

[4] Antisemitic tropes chart, Facing History and Ourselves, accessed on 31 August 2024: Antisemitic Tropes Chart (facinghistory.org)
[5] Ibid

Trauma and poor mental health

Several students and staff who were interviewed reported seeking medical assistance and being prescribed anti-depressants or anti-anxiety medication to manage their response to the rise in antisemitism in their university environment. Approximately half of those interviewed were visibly teary during their interview.

Being told that the solution to increased antisemitism was to work from home or attend courses remotely

Almost all Jewish students and academics interviewed reported being told to work from home or attend classes remotely as a 'solution' to the increasingly pervasive antisemitism they were encountering at their universities. Many of them highlighted that this was not a practical option for them because of the strong in-person component to their course or job, or their need for human interaction and feedback. They saw this as being detrimental to their grades or to their career potential and felt that their invisibility was a double punishment on top of feeling intimidated, offended, humiliated and insulted on campus. Many undergraduate students interviewed - particularly those based in Victoria - reflected that they had already spent much of their final high school years in lockdown and that further isolation was inimical to their personal and professional development and psychosocial wellbeing.

Being trolled online or having media identifying them posted by other students

Some students reported being filmed or photographed without their consent when they refused to take anti-Israel materials or when they refused to engage with the encampment, only to find that the footage or photographs had been posted online. These posts were often accompanied by hate speech, and, in some instances, the students were named and trolled.

Another student described being trolled online at a university-related event in which their peers and university moderators could see them being trolled and no one did anything to support them.

A staff member was on the receiving end of a hateful online campaign on the basis of their identity.

Students making the decision to drop classes or change courses because of pervasive antisemitism

Students reported changing university classes or courses because of how pervasive antisemitism was. One interviewee reached out following the interview to seek a pro bono psychological assessment and supporting documentation for a request to move classes on account of a teacher expressing antisemitic views.

(c) Notable incidents and discourse

Many antisemitic incidents and an array of antisemitic discourse were disclosed throughout the interview process.

Some of the most notable incidents included:

- Students performing Nazi salutes to Jewish academics
- Students defacing the properties of Jewish students with swastikas, inverted triangles and other symbols connoting Jew hatred and a desire to eliminate Jews
- Students posting on class social media circles prayers to kill Jews, glorification of Hamas, denial of October 7 atrocities, intending to reach fellow students who they know are Jewish
- Professors and lecturers failing or giving significantly lower grades to students who identified as Jewish or Israeli and: refused to adopt an anti-Israel stance in assignments or exams, challenged the professor's or lecturer's view on Jews/Israelis/Israel, or sought special consideration as a result of October 7-related trauma or religious observance
- Being threatened or harassed at Australasian Union of Jewish Students stalls at various orientation and other university events, with phrases like "gas the Jews" or the ripping or disposing of the Israeli flag
- Students placing posters glorifying Hamas and the October 7 atrocities in areas to coincide with the presence of Jewish students in those areas
- Students describing being trolled at online university events by other attendees who knew they were Jewish or Israeli
- Students being harassed in person and online for congregating to discuss Jewish issues, even when such groups were left-wing in their ideology and 'pro Palestine'
- Students being spat on or pushed when their Jewish identity became known to those at their university encampment
- Academics being abused online purely because they are Jewish and not on the basis of their opinions regarding the Israel Palestine conflict.
- Students being excluded from LGBTQI+ groups or other societies on the basis that they are Jewish or Israeli
- Academics experiencing antisemitic remarks directed at them at work meetings.

Some of the most notable discourse included:

- Denial of October 7 atrocities by lecturers and students in group and individual settings
- Constant comparisons between Israel and Nazi Germany or states that have committed the worst human rights atrocities, and false assertions of 'fact', such as that the International Court of Justice had found Israel guilty of genocide[6]

[6] 'Former head of ICJ explains ruling on genocide case against Israel brought by S Africa', BBC.com, 26 April 2024: https://www.bbc.com/news/av/world-middle-east-68906919

- Holocaust denial or minimisation
- Demonisation and dehumanisation of Jews and Israelis and denial of their fundamental rights
- Verbal abuse, harassment, and intimidation of Jewish students and staff
- Exceptionalism and singular focus with respect to Israel in subjects totally unrelated to the Israel Gaza war, such as architecture, Indigenous culture and history and medicine
- Invocation of the Blood Libel and other antisemitic tropes to allege that Jews and/or Israelis kill and enjoy killing non-Jewish babies, commit genocide and commit apartheid
- Students being publicly attacked for congregating to discuss Jewish issues or responses to rising antisemitism.

(d) Key quotes

Location of incident / discourse and online manifestations

- 'I can't switch off the all staff emails that come through the university official channels. For some reason, you have to receive them...They've now put something in place where things can be taken down or the chat can be closed. But that's not enough. It should be proactive. People who want to broadcast a message to all staff in the whole university. Surely it should have to be [that] you submit something, and then somebody approves it?' (University of Sydney employee)
- 'I found myself eating my lunch with that sign right there. And at one point I stood up and I said...that sign [effectively] says "no Jews allowed", so I can't eat my sandwich here.
  That means that I'm alienated from my colleagues. I can't sit and have lunch with the rest of my colleagues. I have to separate myself.' (De-identified employee of university)
- 'You name it, I have seen it. Lots of violent content, Holocaust inversion, misinformation and disinformation, Jew hatred masked as anti-Zionism or as political content and much more. I am only seeing a tiny fraction of it for one thing because I don't tend to follow the people who are likely to be putting this stuff out there, and, in some instances I have stopped following those that do make their true views known, as have my Jewish friends. But also, some people have blocked me or I can't see all of their content, and I know I am really just seeing the tiniest fraction of the antisemitic content coming from my cohort and the medical profession. There are so many students posting antisemitic content.' (Monash university student)
- 'I've been to campus, there's been posters, graffities, boycott Israel stickers... every single time so I go to work and the first thing that I do is pull down a bunch of posters and try and scrape off some stickers. And then I go to my office and people say how are you? And I have to say, I'm really good, even though I'm like, you know, crying on the inside." (Deakin university academic)

Reporting

- 'That was an incident [referring to antisemitic conduct in class], but what was more concerning has been UNSW College's reaction to it. So initially I complained to my immediate supervisors. I said, I'm aware that this is a criminal offense…What's the protocol? Do you report it? Or do I report it? I received very little kind of support or serious attention from it. They said, "I will give them a verbal warning". They said, "Oh, you know, once a student swore in my class and that's similar stuff to this". Anyway, I wasn't impressed, so I went to the police. (University of NSW employee)
- 'I've just stopped reporting, because USyd allows everything.' (University of Sydney employee)
- 'The Science Library had a poster up that said "come learn about Hamas". You would think that being a banned terrorist organization the university would not tolerate events about Hamas. So I made a complaint through the online complaint platform about this poster, which was purporting to be an "informational session" but clearly was actually promoting Hamas or spreading knowledge about its ideology. It was covered up as an information session by the uni and there was no positive response. They came back to me to say there was nothing problematic about the event.' (University of Sydney student)

University's management of increased antisemitism

- 'There's been zero effort for dialogue, for reining in false information…to me, that is a signal of complicity, that they're letting it just bubble away. And it gets worse and it gets more extreme. You could take the point of view that it's good that the students want to be change makers. Now, what's the university doing to help them be peace builders? Why let them point to some group of people as the villains, and just let it keep going like that. They've got a responsibility. They're a university.' (University of Sydney employee)
- 'I have to confess on a personal level, every day I had to walk past big signs saying "Israel is genocidal", right? And that's pretty upsetting to see that that sits on campus 24/7 and is unchallenged. So I suppose that from my perspective, the university has bent over backwards to accommodate the student protesters and has allowed them to occupy the university lawns and exclude everybody else, and on the other hand, when Josh [Burns] speaks it decides that he has to squirrel away in the room so as to avoid the protesters'. (University of Melbourne academic)
- 'I think people outside the university community joining is less worrisome than the pervasive hatred of Jews that has spread through university life from lecturers to students. There is no regard for academic rigor/evidence/reasoned analysis/critical thinking when referring to Israel/Zionism. [There is] an acceptance of expressing antisemitic views, usually presented as anti-Zionism to make it less seem less pungent, which works for everyone except Jewish people (e.g. 'Zionist free zone', 'no Zionists on campus', 'nut-free, gluten-free, zionist-free museli bars', calling Jews 'Zios' as a derogatory term).' (University of Sydney employee)

- ‘The posts are extremely antisemitic and there seems to be no repercussions for the students even though they are the future medics who will treat people.’ (University of Monash student)
- ‘If I refer to the ladies in the room rather than women, I get a slap on the wrist. [It’s the same] If I refer to disabled people instead of people with disabilities. So all those things are relatively subtle. [The person saying them is] not meaning any harm, but because those people say you're offending me [it’s taken seriously by the university]. But Jews aren't entitled to do that, so when they shout “from the river to the sea, Palestine will be free” and we say that's a call for genocide, because Hamas uses that as a call for genocide, we get, “I'm sorry that's not illegal”. (University of Melbourne academic)
- ‘At the moment I am doing Indigenous studies, and every place you look there'll be something related to Israel/Palestine and not Indigenous Studies. For history, you have to do an Australia unit and that’s why I am doing this, and also I am interested in it. And every time the lecturer speaks it’s about what is happening right now in Israel. And there is no way I could say that the comparison is meaningless even though it is.’ (University of Sydney student)
- ‘The vice chancellors have been called out for not doing enough about sexual harassment on campus, and have had to be proactive in dealing with it. [But when it comes to antisemitism] What Mark Scott said is, I have never done anything to encourage antisemitism on campus. I know you haven't done anything to [encourage antisemitism] but your job is to work against it, right? Your job is to create an environment in which people do not feel that they are frightened. You're supposed to be proactive at doing that.’ (University of Melbourne academic)
- ‘There were also various events such as the careers fair where people from Tel Aviv university were invited to attend and have a stall, and in the end they had to leave because they were intimidated and their security was at risk and the uni did nothing to help them stay secure or to challenge how they were being intimidated. It felt really wrong. These were just academics with no connection with the war in Gaza, and they were being targeted because they were Israeli or Jewish and for no other reason.’ (University of Sydney student)
- ‘They've got this romantic attitude towards their fond memories of the anti-Vietnam protest, so they remember those but the difference then is that it wasn't one student group against another, it was all the students acting together against authority, against the war. Jews were always welcome then.’ (University of Melbourne academic)
- ‘[Manager] said that he is there for us 100%…We don't have to come into work. We can work from home. I said to him, I haven't done anything wrong… It shouldn't be me having to work from home… There should not be messaging around my workplace insinuating that people from my culture or from my country or from my homeland, are not welcome or should f^^k off or should not exist.” (Deakin university academic)

Vilification

- 'I think this is the takeaway, if there's anything that I think I bring to this conversation, is that I never consider myself a Zionist. Yet I feel attacked by the anti-Zionist things. And if the only thing that's the same between me and the Zionist students is a Jewish identity, then it is the Jewish identity that they're attacking.' (ANU student)
- 'Never before has anyone attacked me in in this ad hominem way because of my Jewish background, and it was personally defamatory. It completely misrepresented my views on the Israeli Palestinian conflict. I'm very well known ...as a strong supporter of a two-state solution' (de-identified academic)
- 'I don't see criticism of Israel as a problem. But what we're seeing on campus is not criticism of Israel. It's a call for Israel to be annihilated, for it to completely not exist. At the moment, the campus is plastered with posters that say, "we don't want your two states. We want all of 48", so that's the message that's consistently there. To me that is antisemitic, because there is only one Jewish country. So facing calls for its destruction is terrifying, and having to face that on a daily basis, I definitely feel like it's not safe for people to know that I'm Jewish.' (University of Sydney employee)
- 'I've been told by a colleague all the usual stuff: "there's definitely no evidence of systemic rape. But even if it did happen, they deserved it", which to me is the same as saying you deserve it. Of course, I take that personally.' (University of Sydney employee)
- 'You're in a [*]. That's a place of truth and historical fact, and it's just extraordinary that your colleagues are pushing these views and are not open to anything that you have to say, and are in fact, vilifying you.' (University of Sydney employee)
- 'Yes, yes, getting told you support genocide and you're a baby murderer if you support Israel's right to exist would tick all of those boxes.' [i.e. employee feels insulted, intimidated, offended and humiliated]. (University of Sydney employee)
- 'I saw a [non-Palestinian] colleague, a staff member, wearing a Palestinian keffiyeh on the 10th of October into class. And I saw this in the walkway. This wasn't a student. This was an academic. If I was a student in that class, how kind of frightened would I be?' (University of NSW employee)
- 'It's a very hostile space, you know, and it's ironic that it's considered to be one of the better campuses at present, you know, the way that they measure that is by lack of acts of physical violence, which I would say is not really a very good threshold.' (University of NSW employee)
- 'I have seen many other posts from students [in my cohort] which say things like 'Zionism is Nazism', there is no difference between Jews and Nazis. (University of Monash student)
- 'I was working at the AUJS stall and someone came past, like, a couple of guys and said, "gas the Jews", and were laughing at us and stuff...And at that point, there was no free Palestine or anything, because no one even knew about that yet, because it was before October 7'. (University of Wollongong student)

- ‘I stopped speaking Hebrew on the phone to my mum when I was out of home, and I didn't mention where I was from in classes, or that I was Jewish’ (University of Sydney student)
- ‘Yes, I felt offended and intimidated once the encampment had been set up and there was constant chanting ‘from the river to the sea’ and ‘Intifada’ and that kind of thing because it’s obvious what the implication of these things is. It is calling for the end to Israel and the wiping out of the people there. And the university kept telling us that these things mean different things to different people but really it is clear what it means and it was all over the place and it still is. That is a threatening thing to see at university and it makes you wonder what these people support and how far they would go.’ (University of Sydney student)
- ‘I don’t think they said what they said because I am Jewish, but because they are anti-Zionists. But we know that anti-Zionism is antisemitism’. (University of Macquarie student)
- ‘I went to a meeting as a Jewish student with my Jewish peers to talk about Jewish issues, and it was called a plot. It was just participating in democracy.’ (ANU student)
- ‘The old, “are you or have you ever been a communist?” Is now, “are you or have you ever been a Zionist?”, which is being formulated as a political test for Jews only, and it then becomes a very expedient and disingenuous political strategy of excluding people from debates so that the people with the extreme views win the debate by default, because the only people that are around and challenge them have been excluded. And again, it was clearly threatening, because these groups have a track record of targeting people personally and clearly their political agenda is to exclude people with alternative views from public life.’ (de-identified academic)

Psychosocial impacts

Trauma, victimisation, depression, anxiety, stress, illness

- ‘There's a really, really strong sort of pull to say that it's nothing. It's not against you. Nobody knows you're Jewish, and it's not against you. There's no threat to you personally. It's against Israel. And I find that really weird that at one and the same time, there's a tolerance of a certain amount of hatred, because it's so awful what Israel is doing. And on the other hand, that hatred doesn't exist. It's not even there. And even if it is, it's okay. It's cognitive dissonance’. (University of Sydney employee)
- ‘So we're already at the point where Jewish students shouldn't choose the university based on the best course for what they want to study. They first need to check what's going to be safe for them. You know, in terms of psychosocial safety and even physical safety’. (University of Sydney employee)
- ‘You know, it's depressing. I don't have the words…it takes the wind out of my sails. I feel so depleted. I feel so exhausted. Instead of having the space to mourn and grieve over what's happening in Israel, I'm using every ounce of my energy just to survive at work.’ (University of Sydney employee)

- ‘There's an economic impact…loss of work, and then the stress that goes along with going through [the legal]* procedure and that kind of thing.’ (de-identified employee)
- ‘ I would say I am experiencing trauma. There has been disruption to my friendship groups and really anyone who is not Jewish is now less trusted by me and it is hard to know if they agree with what is being put out there. I am much more introverted now and I have chosen not to maintain some friendships. Then there are others who I will forever have a question mark against, and this is a big problem as they are my future colleagues.’ (University of Monash student)
- ‘Some weeks I didn't want to go to class because I had to walk through the protests, and they were often shouting and chanting and stuff happening outside my classroom while I was in class. So I was feeling pretty stressed out that whole time.’ (University of Sydney student)
- ‘Classes were close to the encampment and I did not go to uni much. Before the encampment started, the protestors were marching up and down, and that was very unpleasant hearing them on their loudspeakers shouting genocide and other false allegations, and it conjured up an underlying dread, and was clearly a case of double standards about Israel.’ (University of Sydney student)
- ‘After October 7 I hated going to campus and I felt fearful.’ (University of Sydney student)
- ‘I’m just disgusted and I feel so upset and it's impacting my everyday ability to do my work. And I feel really let down. I've worked so so hard to get to where I am. And I've gone above and beyond.’ (Deakin University academic)
- ‘ It's already doing stuff to me physically, like I'm getting sick more often. I've got like, my eyes this because I rubbed them so often, at this skin, like coming off like my mouth is like, I don't know what's happening to it. I need to go to a doctor. But it's insane. Like my physical health is just going downhill and my mental health is going downhill because of what people have said to me. It's terrible how people have made me feel.’ (Swinburne University student)

Isolation

- ‘This is how these things happen. Because, you know, it just takes good people doing nothing, and actually, they probably genuinely fear repercussions for their own careers by speaking out, especially in a public setting, which is, of course, no excuse for not speaking out, but it just goes to show how societies move in a particular direction very easily and it becomes normalized.’ (University of Sydney employee)
- ‘I've seen a lot of panels and reading groups that have sprung up, a lot of them being ‘anti colonial’ reading groups, right? And the only [former] colony they talk about is surprise, surprise…Israel…Jews can't participate in university life because I can't go to any of these reading groups…or probably, more accurately, these reading groups would be hostile to me if I was there.’ (University of NSW employee and student)
- ‘It has provoked anxiety. The physical impact has been huge. I am on edge all the time and it just means I don’t go out much anymore and I don’t go much to my classes because I feel so uncomfortable. It has also caused tension in my relationship because…he will say, “can’t we just put politics aside and have a nice time" when we are out with [anti-Israel] friends and I don't know what to say because for me it isn't politics, it's in my heart.' (University of Sydney student)

- 'I think I feel so desensitized at the moment, because I just [got] so used to it, I've become so blank, I'd rather not make new friends. I'd rather just stay in my own bubble, because I'm scared of what you're gonna say in a second, or that they'll find out who I am and where I'm from.' (University of Sydney student)
- 'And then I walked up to the queer tent, and they had seen us walk away from the [X] tent, and I'm queer, and I was very, very sternly told, "if you weren't with them, you can't align with us". And from then it's been a huge concept in my life that I think about and talk about, that if you sit in the left for whatever reason, if you're queer, if you're left leaning politically, you can't exist as a Zionist in those spaces. You have to choose a part of your identity, you can't negotiate it. It just exists as this.' (University of Sydney student)
- 'I'm now the kind of student who just goes to uni to do my work, not to socialize. I don't try to make friends anymore or to spend any extra time there'. (University of Macquarie student)

Concerns for physical safety

- ' I now question my safety, the safety of my family, and the safety of my community, whereas I didn't really do that before.' (University of Monash student)
- 'I definitely do feel an overwhelming sense of fear whenever I'm at uni.' (University of Sydney student)
- 'The encampment was really hard because you couldn't just walk past it. It wasn't just free Palestine. It was openly all the flags that you don't want to see of terrorist organizations in the Middle East hanging around, just a lot of really bad chants and people that openly supported Intifada and would walk around and cheer these chants 'Intifada' and 'from the river to the sea', and lecturers that were joining. Exchange week was really scary to see. The Tel Aviv University representatives got attacked and had to leave.' (University of Sydney student)
- 'I don't feel safe to speak Hebrew on campus, or anything that says that I'm Israeli or Jewish. That is a sign that I am not just intimidated, I think I'm genuinely scared what could happen, and also ashamed, which is hard to say and feel. (University of Sydney student)

Involvement of outside actors

- 'Yes in my experience there were people at the encampment who were not part of the university community. I spoke to a couple of people who said they do not study or work at the university but were concerned about the situation in Gaza and saw joining the encampment as a way to help. Anecdotally as well there were people at the encampment who were totally disconnected from university rhythms, e.g. not knowing when the semester ended and exams started, asking when the students would be back, etc…I was able to observe this day by day.' (University of Sydney employee)
- 'At the encampment there was strong evidence of outside interference. Older people were infiltrating and stealing students' identities. So much so that we got an email from Mark Scott telling us to carry our student ID on us and not share it with anyone because it was being used by people it did not belong to.' (University of Sydney student)

- 'One area of the encampment was left-wing students from SAW. Then there was an area for Muslims, who I guess felt they needed to show up. And then there was a corner, this hardcore radical Islam corner.' (University of Sydney student)
- 'There was also the children's gathering on campus which was awful, knowing that young children were chanting "from the river to the sea" and "Intifada" (University of Sydney student).
- 'I was kind of suspicious about why the tents [in] the encampment didn't smell, and why it was very quiet at night. It's because no one lives there. I gave up my freedom of movement to allow it, and I can't cross the lawn because there was a tent there. I gave up that freedom for them to have their freedom of expression. Things got prioritized, and I was okay with that, so long as they were there. But they weren't. They were just pretending to be good people.' (ANU student)
- 'What we really need to understand is why this issue, above all others in the international arena, has galvanized students to the extent that is has. Some of it is group think, but I think we really need to understand this as the result of years of patient Palestinian advocacy on campus (some of which has been supported by Qatar).' (University of Melbourne academic)

Discrimination

- 'I made a workplace complaint to the police about [X]* students [who performed Nazi salutes], and then suddenly, my contract wasn't renewed.' (de-identified university employee)
- 'I didn't get results back for that exam [one that the student applied for special consideration in light of documented mental health issues stemming from exposure to antisemitism on campus and trauma post October 7], but I did significantly worse in that subject than I did in all the other ones'. (University of Sydney student)
- 'For most Jews, anti-Zionism, opposing the right of Israel to exist, opposing the right of Jews to believe that they should have their own state, is in fact, quintessential antisemitism, no matter what it's covered up with. And that attitude is filtering into academia in deep ways. For example, the [X] union is a classic example of virulent antisemitism that's been going on for a long time. And the only explanation [for their] complete preoccupation with Israel - because they only pass motions against Israel [is antisemitism]. So what actually has been happening is the [X] union has been a very convenient platform for anti-Israel forces. They have a platform, they have a big, wide mail list, and they have money. And it's totally outrageous that they actually are effectively ejecting Jews from the union, Jews that want the protection of a union for the sake of their employment conditions, but they can't stand a union that basically declares that one of their heartfelt, hard held beliefs – the right to self-determination - constitutes genocide.' (University of Melbourne academic)
- 'My opportunities to diversify my work are limited because I've made it known, hey, I'm Jewish, hey, I'm Israeli, and people just shy away from me now because I have an opinion that is not the right opinion.' (de-identified university academic)

Normalised culture of antisemitism at universities

- 'It's pretty, pretty extraordinary that the only people that can't draw attention to antisemitism, specific racism directed towards Jews, are Jews.' (University of NSW affiliate)
- 'At the very same time that you have an ombudsman being appointed to investigate sexual violence on campuses, you also have motions being passed by bodies like the Student Representative Council at the University of Sydney, condoning violence, including violence against women in Israel, and promoting a culture that says that violence is legitimate as a form of so-called resistance, including in Australia, so that would not, you know, that could not happen against any other group. You know, if you try and imagine a motion that would condone violence against Indigenous Australians or trans people or gay people, at the very same time that a huge amount of government resources are being expended to curtail and report violence against those groups on campus is, to me, quite paradoxical and extraordinary.' (University of NSW affiliate)
- 'It's just a feeling of going on to a campus where you're just surrounded by posters. You know, you'd walk down the bridge that connects two sides of the campus on that city road, and it was always covered in posters about Palestine and 'genocide'. And everywhere you went, there were just posters, and you just didn't know who you would encounter that could say something antisemitic. It was like a fear of a potential negative interaction with someone. So as I said, it was a very intimidating environment.' (University of Sydney student)
- ' I feel unwelcome on campus because people are saying you're not welcome here, they're saying it very explicitly, right? It's just on the borderline of saying Jews out.' (University of Melbourne academic)
- 'The message is not that the university condemns these actions. The message is that the university kind of supports it, even if they're not supporting it [because they do not communicate any condemnation, and at most just remove antisemitic stickers and materials quietly out of hours].' (ANU student)
- 'Antisemitism is a cultural piece of Australia. If those people just fade away and you don't know that it's because of their actions, because they're not making an environment conducive to a positive educational environment. If you don't know that that is the reason why they left, then you feel just as under siege as you did before they left.' (ANU student)
- 'Universities are the Ground Zero today of the antisemitism, of the growth of antisemitism, and it's very fearful to think that the students that today are protesting and are getting increasingly radical are going to be the leaders sitting on the government benches in 20 years' time. That's terrifying, because they're actually developing a world view in which Israel and Jews are, in fact, the enemy. They're actually demonizing Israel as completely bad…and it's not very long before Jews are included in that dichotomy…and I think that's terribly, terribly dangerous.' (University of Melbourne academic).
- 'And university leadership has been, to a very large extent, hijacked by a trend that's been occurring over a long period of time, which is identity politics. Vice chancellors have also become not educators, but CEOs of organizations. And if you're the CEO of an organization, your most important role is to keep the business going and keep the peace, and that's what they've done, right? They've abrogated their responsibilities as educators and taken on the responsibility of managers of large corporations and they've really neglected their key responsibilities of fighting antisemitism [and other discriminatory conduct and discourse].' (University of Melbourne academic)

Lack of academic rigour and refusal to hear or debate other perspectives

- 'Someone suggested a debate, and the lecturer said, "yeah, yeah, of course, but obviously, there's some things that aren't open for debate", and he was obviously referring to [the Israel Gaza war].' (University of Macquarie student)
- 'If there's free speech for the students and the agitators 24/7 there should be free speech for one person to give their different perspective right?' (University of Melbourne academic)
- 'I think some of them [the students attending to support the Student Representative Council motion] have an element of hatred, but I just think that there's an element of misguidance, because they're just so brainwashed.' (University of Sydney affiliate)

BDS movement and cancellation of Israeli and Jewish academics and speakers

- 'So one of the most egregious [incidents] was an academic who had been invited to give a talk, a Dean of Engineering at the Technion. The students smeared him on social media as being genocidal and all that sort of stuff, and the university just capitulated and cancelled his lecture. And it's not the first time that that's happened, they claim that they didn't have time to arrange security or that sort of stuff. But since then, the students have just had their way every day...When this academic, this Dean of Engineering [was] removed from giving a talk, the reaction of [the] Vice Chancellor [was], what were people thinking inviting someone like that in this time?' (University of Melbourne academic)

APPENDIX 4: Efforts aimed at accountability at foreign universities for antisemitic discourse and incidents

The array of responses by foreign universities, tertiary education regulators and other key stakeholders to the rise in antisemitic incidents and discourse is too extensive to cover in this submission, however, some examples of positive interventions that have the potential to lead to meaningful change in this area are set out below.

(a) The United States of America

A Los Angeles district court judge's ruling that the University of California, Los Angeles, must not allow student activists to prevent their Jewish classmates from accessing campus buildings has clarified that universities have a 'moral responsibility' to fight campus antisemitism.[1]

On 19 August 2024, University of California President Michael V. Drake wrote to chancellors of all 10 campuses to enforce rules against encampments, protests and masking that shields identities. His letter covers:

- Camping or encampments: Policies must clarify that no person shall camp, set up or erect a campsite, or occupy a tent or other temporary housing structure on University property, unless specifically pre-approved.
- Unauthorized structures: Policies must clarify that no person shall erect, build, construct, set up, establish and/or maintain unauthorized structures on University property.
- Restricting free movement: Policies must clarify that no person shall restrict the movement of another person or persons by, among other means, blocking or obstructing their ingress or egress of roadways, walkways, buildings, parking structures, fire lanes, windows, doors or other passageways to university property, or otherwise denying a person access to a University facility or space.
- Masking to conceal identity: Policies must clarify that no person shall wear a mask or personal disguise or otherwise conceal their identity with the intent of intimidating any person or group, or for the purpose of evading or escaping discovery, recognition, or identification in the commission of violations of law or policy.
- Refusal to reveal identity: Policies must clarify that no person shall refuse to identify themselves while on University property to University officials who are acting in the performance of their duties in situations where assistance or intervention is needed."[2]

At New York University (NYU) the Anti-Harassment Policy was modified to include 'Code Words' for Jews like 'Zionist', and to clarify that 'Individuals associated with NYU would violate that policy "when discrimination or harassment is based in racism, colorism, antisemitism, Islamophobia, xenophobia, sexism, transphobia, ableism and other forms of bigotry involving protected characteristics covered by the policy."[3] NYU offered examples of when the use of a 'code word' for Jews like "Zionists" would violate the university's policies.[4] According to interpretations of the revised policy, excluding Zionists from an open event, applying a 'no Zionist' litmus test for participation in any NYU activity, or calling for the death of Zionists is prohibited.[5]

At the federal level, a Republican-led House Committee on Education and the Workforce continues to hold hearings into antisemitism on campuses across the USA since the October 7 massacre. These hearings have been widely broadcast and have featured leaders of prominent universities such as Claudine Gay of Harvard University, Elizabeth Magill of the University of Pennsylvania and Sally Kornbluth of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology testifying under oath. Following the hearings at which Claudine Gay, Elizabeth Magill and Sally Kornbluth were questioned, the Committee on Education and the Workforce called for the resignation of the presidents and announced a Congressional investigation "with the full force of subpoena power" into the same issues. To date, Claudine Gay and Elizabeth Magill have resigned, as have other presidents of universities implicated for creating a campus culture that permits the normalisation of antisemitism.

The hearings have helped to promote a culture of accountability for increased antisemitism on campuses among the leadership of many universities in the USA. Several universities have since acted to reduce the likelihood of their campuses being the venues for antisemitic incidents and discourse. For instance, George Washington University has suspended its chapter of Jewish Voice for Peace and Students for Justice in Palestine and has put six other pro-Palestinian student groups on probation.[6]

(b) The United Kingdom

According to the half-yearly report of antisemitic incidents by the Community Security Trust (CST) in the UK, in the first six months of 2024 there were 96 antisemitic incidents in which the victims or offenders were students or academics, or which involved student unions, societies or other representative bodies.[7] Of these, 44 took place on campus or university property and 45 were online. These figures are record highs and represent a sharp increase of 465% from the same period in 2023. Of the 96 antisemitic incidents to occur in the context of universities, 73% contained discourse relating to Israel, Palestine and the Middle East, disproportionately higher than the 52% of incidents that were not linked to the higher education sphere.[8]

Despite this significant increase, which echoes the phenomenon in Australia, the former and current prime ministers have consistently and strongly condemned antisemitism. On 9 May 2024, former Prime Minister Rishi Sunak and the Education Secretary, Communities Secretary and Security Minister called on university leaders to adopt across all campuses a zero-tolerance approach to antisemitic abuse.[9]

Some universities and stakeholders in the tertiary education sector have taken a proactive approach to addressing antisemitism. For instance, at the University of Reading, a Statement from the Vice-Chancellor was issued on 13 June 2024 stating: "We are now working with the Reading Students' Union to explore how we might provide more antisemitism awareness training to our community."[10] Universities UK published a strong letter of assurance for the Union of Jewish Students on 17 July 2024 exhibiting zero-tolerance for antisemitic incidents and outlining the actions of various universities to combat antisemitism. These have included notifying the police, suspending the academics or other individuals involved, and, in some cases, defunding societies that are failing to prevent harassment, hate crimes or racism.

The Office for Students, the equivalent English body to TEQSA, has a list of providers that have adopted the IHRA Working Definition of Antisemitism.[11] This would appear to be far more extensive than the proportion of Australian providers that have adopted the IHRA. Thie approach adopted by the Office for Students in this area is replicable by TEQSA and forms the basis of one of the recommendations in this submission (please see Appendix 5 – Summary of Recommendations).

Executive Summary

The demonstrations that roiled our campuses during the past academic year uncovered deep disagreements about the mission of our University. During those months, consensus around the University's formal rules and informal norms of behavior broke down, interfering with our charge to educate students and engage in research.

In addition, the testimonies of hundreds of Jewish and Israeli students have made clear that the University community has not treated them with the standards of civility, respect, and fairness it promises to all its students.

After October 7, many Jewish and Israeli students began to report multiple instances of harassment, verbal abuse and ostracism, and in some cases physical violence. Given the volume of these reports, the Task Force invited all students—not just Jewish and Israeli students—to tell us their stories. Over the course of the spring, nearly five hundred students offered testimonials, at over 20 listening sessions, which provided invaluable insights into the campus climate during these troubled times. These student stories are heartbreaking, and make clear that the University has an obligation to act.

This report recounts student experiences in a wide variety of venues—day-to-day encounters, including dorm life and social media; clubs; and the classroom. Unfortunately, some members of the Columbia community have been unwilling to acknowledge the antisemitism many students have experienced—the way repeated violations of University policy and norms have affected them, and the compliance issues this climate has created with respect to federal, state, and local anti-discrimination law. Many of the events reported in the testimonials took place well before the establishment of the encampments and the takeover of Hamilton Hall; the experiences reported during that period were even more extreme.

We heard about troubling incidents from a diverse group of Jewish students from across the political spectrum; and, even more pronouncedly, from Israeli students, whose national origin both make them members of a specifically protected class under federal law and frequently has caused them to be singled out for particularly terrible treatment.

Students also reported that their efforts to seek redress from the University for the hostility and bigotry they were encountering were often unsuccessful. Many students did not understand how to report these incidents. Although some faculty and staff responded with compassion and determination, others minimized the concerns of these students, reacting sluggishly and ineffectively even to the most clear-cut violations. Even students who had successfully reported an incident spoke of a recurring lack of enforcement of existing University rules and policies.

The experiences of these students demonstrated that there is an urgent need to reshape everyday social norms across the campuses of Columbia University. We need to promote a richer ethic of pluralism, which would encourage greater tolerance of and respect for differences in religion, culture, and national origin. If we were really to succeed in promoting tolerance, students would come to understand and value these differences.

But we are a long way from there. The problems we found are serious and pervasive. We recognize that the University is not monolithic, and the environment at some schools is especially challenging. A wide range of responses is needed—indeed, a broader range than we discuss in this report (which focuses on training, defining antisemitism, reporting, and rules for student groups) and in our last report (which focused on the rules governing protests). We do not want to give the impression that the recommendations here are all that is required. We will address other issues in future reports.

In this report we draw on the many accounts shared with us over the past several months to produce a working definition of antisemitism. Instead of relying on an existing definition, we crafted a working definition that is rooted in recent experiences at Columbia:

> Antisemitism is prejudice, discrimination, hate, or violence directed at Jews, including Jewish Israelis. Antisemitism can manifest in a range of ways, including as ethnic slurs, epithets, and caricatures; stereotypes; antisemitic tropes and symbols; Holocaust denial; targeting Jews or Israelis for violence or celebrating violence against them; exclusion or discrimination based on Jewish identity or ancestry or real or perceived ties to Israel; and certain double standards applied to Israel.

This working definition draws on experiences of many Jewish and Israeli students, who were on the receiving end of ethnic slurs, stereotypes about supposedly dangerous Israeli veterans, antisemitic tropes about Jewish wealth and hidden power, threats and physical assaults, exclusion of Zionists from student groups, and inconsistent standards. We propose this definition for use in training and education, not for discipline or as a means for limiting free speech or academic freedom.

This report also identifies significant problems in university policy and practice and makes recommendations for fixing flawed administrative systems, improving campus climate, and building consensus for a more inclusive and pluralistic university. Specifically, we recommend anti-bias and inclusion trainings for students, resident advisers, resident assistants, teaching assistants, student-facing staff, and faculty. In a community dedicated to freedom of speech and pluralism, we must prepare students with different views and backgrounds to engage with each other. We must encourage mutual respect, tolerance, civility, and an open learning environment.

We also recommend in-person workshops about antisemitism and Islamophobia, as well as a range of optional training and workshops for others in our community, including on implicit bias and stereotypes, bystander interventions, and having difficult conversations.

Given the urgent need to train administrators who play critical roles in responding to student needs, we also suggest a range of trainings in dispute resolution.

As part of this effort, we recommend that the Interim President and Provost establish a Cross-School Committee that includes all schools at Columbia, along with Barnard College and Teachers College, to share information and establish a baseline standard for trainings, workshops, and website information for all schools. The Committee should aim to overcome the problem of decentralization within Columbia, which is a barrier to maintaining common objectives across the many spaces shared by undergraduate and graduate students.

We also recommend that the University establish a repository for best practices in anti-bias and inclusion trainings and that it develop a plan for evaluating these programs.

Customized trainings aimed at specific constituencies are particularly important, including first year orientation and new student orientation for graduate programs—a recent area of focus for University Life—and new faculty orientation at all Columbia schools, including affiliate schools, Barnard College, and Teachers College. We recognize that University Life has been working to update and improve its training for student orientation.

We call attention to the need to train teaching assistants (TAs) in sensitivity to bias, exclusion, and antisemitism. Currently, the online course required for all Columbia TAs, available through the Equal Opportunity and Affirmative Action (EOAA) website, lacks guidelines on diversity, inclusion, and bias. TAs need guidance on how to respond to classroom scenarios that stray into discrimination and bias; currently, they are told that no single best practice exists. We recommend giving attention to topics related to race, religion, and national origin in all their complexity. We point to several excellent models offered by other universities in guiding TAs and first-time instructors.

Resident assistants and advisers (RAs) are another group in need of customized training; we offer suggestions for how RAs can foster better attention to inclusion, identification of bias, and elimination of harmful behavior signaling derision and hatred. RAs must fully understand their role as leaders in inclusion: they need to be prepared to listen with respect and to mediate conflicts.

In place of the confusing multiplicity of reporting structures that currently exist, we suggest ways of revamping procedures so that students are not discouraged from speaking with advisors and administrators about prejudicial treatment. Transparency and consistency in how we handle student reports of bias and exclusion are of the utmost importance if we want students to share their experiences. Our aim is for students to engage with faculty or staff who can resolve conflicts before situations rise to the level of legal violations. Antisemitism complaints deserve careful attention from deans and administrators, alongside all forms of bigotry and discrimination.

We also recommend ways to ensure that student groups contribute to the University's pluralist mission and comply with anti-discrimination law. Unfortunately, we have heard from many Jewish and Israeli students who have been excluded from student groups because of their Zionist beliefs. This is not acceptable. Student groups must be inclusive, with membership limited only for reasons connected to their mission. Student groups generally should not issue statements unrelated to their missions, so they can welcome students with diverse views and backgrounds. Groups also should have a robust consultation process before issuing statements or joining coalitions. To be clear, there should not be any limits on the free speech rights of a group's members. They must be free to speak about any issue as long as they are speaking for themselves, not for the group.

Introduction

The Antisemitism Task Force has heard the testimonies of hundreds of Jewish and Israeli students and it is clear that the University community has not treated them with the standards of civility, respect, and fairness it promises to all its students. As we reflect on the antisemitism revealed by their experiences, we realize that these interactions have affected the entire University community. The larger social compact is broken. University policy and individual practice must change if we are to fix the situation. Our research and the many testimonies of students point to a crucial need to alter the current campus climate.[2] That is the purpose of this Second Report of the Antisemitism Task Force.

We have gathered information according to the mandate we were given by Columbia's then-president, Minouche Shafik, Barnard's president Laura Rosenbury, and Teachers College president Thomas Bailey.[3] We are offering recommendations based upon the extensive work we have done to date and we fully expect our Interim President Katrina Armstrong to lead a robust discussion on the broader problem of campus climate. We found that administrative structures intended to ensure that all members of our community respect each other, engage in civil discourse, and receive fair treatment in a dispute resolution process are not working effectively for Jewish students (or do not exist at all).

Some of our recommendations are focused on the specific problems facing Jewish students. Other recommendations, especially those concerning training, process, and procedure, suggest more general improvements on behalf of all students, any of whom may, during their years on this campus, face bias, discrimination, exclusion, or intimidation. Certain recommendations are straightforward and should be implemented quickly; others will require more extensive consultation and discussion. We have clearly identified those proposals which call for the creation of a broadly representative faculty, student, and staff committee aimed at developing consistent, clear, and transparent procedures and policies supported by the entire Columbia community, including Barnard College and Teachers College.

Listening sessions, reports to the Task Force, and messages to individual Task Force members provided us with important information about where students are experiencing discrimination, intimidation, harassment, exclusion, targeting, isolation, and fear of violent rhetoric. Equally important, we learned that students may not know how to report these problems—and often they want a less formal channel where they can receive advice about where and how to express concerns that may not rise to the level of a legal complaint. In some cases, they may be interested in an unbiased mediation process.

In principle, the offices of the Deans of Students, the Ombuds, or the DEI offices should be the right places to go. But students reported uneven experiences when they went to these offices. Some administrators were uncertain about how to assign responsibility. Students were unsure of where to turn, and some felt that their concerns were not taken seriously. Indeed, we have heard that students have been referred to counseling and psychological services—which they correctly understood as implying that they just need to learn to accept and cope with antisemitic experiences.

In addition, if a student's complaint is about bias in a club or in the classroom, the student might feel uncomfortable pursuing the issue, especially if key players in the process (e.g., student activity boards, department chairs, deans of students, professors, teaching assistants, etc.) have taken public positions at odds with those of students who otherwise would complain. We recognize the complexity of these issues and we understand the imperative to protect academic freedom; but harassment that takes place in the classroom is still harassment. Students' efforts to defend themselves should not be handled differently in such settings. They should be mediated in processes that are free from bias. Moreover, when it comes to the matter of impartiality and fairness, we need to ensure that publicly expressed positions by a faculty advisor, program director, teaching assistant, or resident adviser do not obstruct the mediation or conflict resolution process. In our First Report[4], we focused on the legal obligations of the University to prevent discrimination and harassment under Title VI, as well as state and local anti-discrimination law. It is important that all parties understand the law and the legal protections afforded students. But reliance on the law would suggest that the University is failing to create an inclusive campus environment.

This report provides recommendations to the Interim President for improving policy and practice in accordance with our mandate. These recommendations draw directly from the research we have done on existing policies and practices in schools across the University and consultations with many administrators, faculty, and students. We have been encouraged by the fact that the administration is already making some changes in university policy and procedures to achieve the same goals as the Task Force.

The recommendations in this report focus on training and workshops; a definition of antisemitism for these educational programs; reporting mechanisms; and the rules governing student groups. As we noted above, the recommendations here and in our prior report, which analyzed the rules governing protests, are not intended to be comprehensive. We will address other issues in future reports.

[4] https://president.columbia.edu/content/report-1-task-force-antisemitism

It is our contention that we can improve campus climate by (1) addressing what our students are actually experiencing; (2) improving our understanding of where these experiences are happening; (3) addressing the adequacy of our procedures for reporting experiences of bias and exclusion that do not rise to the level of a legal violation; (4) improving our intra-judicial mediation and fair conflict resolution processes; (5) staying true to the University's pluralist values and encouraging interactions (and hopefully friendship) among people who disagree; (6) protecting all students from discrimination; (7) ensuring that student groups are governed in ways that are consistent with these aspirations; and (8) designing anti-bias trainings and procedures through a process that develops broad consensus among all members of the community, including students, faculty, and student-facing staff.

APPENDIX 5: Summary of Recommendations

Recommendation 1: That the Senate Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee recommends a Judicial Inquiry into antisemitism at Australian Universities be established.

Recommendation 2: That all universities work with the Special Envoy to adopt best practice policies which are fit for purpose in combatting antisemitism, and ensure that such policies are implemented.

Recommendation 3: Ensure that the terms of reference and resources and expertise of any National Student Ombudsman to improve student safety be amended to receive complaints regarding racism at universities, including antisemitism. The National Student Ombudsman should seek the input and expertise of the office of the Special Envoy for Combatting Antisemitism when considering a workable definition of antisemitism.

Recommendation 4: That TEQSA provide a list of Australian tertiary institutions that have adopted the IHRA Working Definition on Antisemitism.

Recommendation 5: That the Australian Government consider whether TEQSA needs greater powers to ensure that tertiary institutions comply with Threshold Standards and the law.

Recommendation 6: That TEQSA utilises existing powers to provide advice and make recommendations to the Commonwealth Minister for Education on the impact on the quality of education flowing from universities' failures to enforce their codes of conduct and policies, or to apply the law properly to instances of racism against Jews in order to make all students feel safe and give them the opportunity of attending campus.

Recommendation 7: That the Universities Accord's emphasis on recommendations and performance targets be applied in the area of addressing antisemitism in tertiary institutions.

Recommendation 8: That the Australian Government establish a repository for standardised and consistent reporting of racist incidents and hate crimes occurring in Australia (National Database of racist incidents and hate crimes).

Recommendation 9: That a national hotline be instituted for university students and staff so that data about racist incidents at universities can be captured and shared with the national database referred to in recommendation 8 (National Hotline for racist incidents and hate crimes) with appropriate measures for confidentiality and counselling.

Recommendation 10: That all universities that have not yet adopted the IHRA Working Definition work with the Special Envoy's office to adopt a working definition of antisemitism.

Recommendation 11: Given that the Government and Opposition have adopted the IHRA Working Definition, that the Australian Human Rights Commission (AHRC) adopts the IHRA Working Definition in order to guide its work.

Recommendation 12: That the AHRC consult with the Special Envoy in relation to educational materials on antisemitism so as to inform their complaints handling in this area.

Recommendation 13: That all the universities' leadership attend a series of workshops organised by the Special Envoy to put in place training to understand antisemitism and be equipped to deal with it; and consider a range of measures to change the culture of embedded antisemitism.

Such measures may include (many of these come from student testimony):

- Providing educational programs to staff who have been disciplined under the universities' code of conduct or other policies as a result of antisemitic conduct.
- Integrating with ombudsman complaints, establish a process for mediation.
- Working to establish procedures for broader learnings from antisemitic incidents and disciplinary proceedings.
- Providing to the office of the Special Envoy and TEQSA on an annual basis a brief report outlining how many antisemitic incidents or discourse were notified to its complaints body, and what the status of those complaints are, including measures taken to address the underlying issues.
- Auditing all recipients of external grants to ensure that their funded work complies with university codes of conduct and policies, including that such work does not contain antisemitic discourse.
- Creating opportunities for students to assess academics on an anonymous basis as to whether they succeeded in creating opportunities for balanced debates and safe spaces in their lectures, tutorials and other teaching fora.
- Ensuring that there are defined ways of measuring how universities are promoting social cohesion.

Recommendation 14: That universities work with the Special Envoy's office to establish training for students, staff and governance on antisemitism, similar to what has been established for sexual harassment. That such training extend to international students and visiting academics.

SUBMISSION – FREYA LEACH

My Grandmother fled the Holocaust as a German Jew in 1938. My Great-Grandfather fought for Germany in World War 1. They were totally secular, German citizens who happened to be Jewish. Something I could never understand about the Holocaust was that the most civilised and well-educated society could become so hateful, ultimately resulting in the butchering of 6 million Jews, and many millions of others.

In May, I traveled to Auschwitz, accompanied by two Australian Holocaust survivors, and many children of survivors. As we were driving out of the camp, I couldn't hold back the tears.

I said to the group, "I never understood how the Holocaust could happen, but now, after witnessing the rise of antisemitism on my university campus, I get it. My generation could be the first to repeat it."

My first-hand experience of antisemitism at the University of Sydney

I am a student at the University of Sydney and President of the Sydney University Conservative Club. I have been very active in student politics during my four years at Usyd. I chose to come to this university for the campus politics. Many of our nation's political leaders cut their teeth in the intense student politics scene at Sydney University.

Instead of finding rigorous debate, I have found students who only want to hate. This hatred of Israel started long before October 7. But the recent conflict has been its oxygen, allowing it to spread like wildfire. While many will appear before this Senate Inquiry claiming it is just "anti-Zionism", not anti-Semitism, what I have witnessed demonstrates this is false.

Physically intimidated – May 2023

My first experience of anti-Jewish hate was in an Student Representative Council (SRC) meeting in May 2023. I asked if the SRC would condemn Hamas's killing of several Israelis, the SRC refused.

I then spoke to a motion about the recent Federal Budget and was heckled, with someone yelling out that I was a "Neo-Nazi". I stopped speaking, taken aback and deeply offended. I told the room that that slur was extremely hurtful because my Grandma fled the Nazis.

Speaking against another motion for Palestine, I explained how "from the river to the sea" is a call for the genocide Jewish people. Multiple students giggled while I was speaking. All the students in the room (probably 50 or so) stood up to take a photo and starting chanting "From the River to the Sea, Palestine will be Free" while holding their fists in the air. After explaining the significance of the chant as a call for genocide, and that my Grandma fled the Nazis, the group began chanting. In response, I tried to display an Israeli flag on my laptop. A member of the SRC jumped onto the desk in front of me and physically intimidated me. He blocked me from displaying the flag and blocked me from being seen. If I tried to move, he would move in front of me. I genuinely feared for my safety. The whole room looked on and did nothing.

As I tried to walk away, they kept following me, continuing to scream. Frustrated and almost in tears, I turned to them and asked “do you condemn the rape of Israeli women?” The socialist responded saying “I will never condemn Palestinian resistance”.

Photo 4: Socialist following me and saying “I will never condemn Palestinian resistance”.

Photo 5: Israeli flag torn down and thrown into bin.

Culture of antisemitism top-down

Disturbingly, the culture of violent anti-Israel hatred starts from the top. The President of the NTEU has published many antisemitic tweets. For Jewish and pro-Israel students, it make you feel as though this culture is has infested the whole university. Even the staff, represented by head of their Union, are against you.

On October 7, Nick Riemer described the invasion and slaughter of 1400 innocent Israelis and taking hostage 250 others as an “anti-colonial operation” and tweeted “unconditional solidarity with Gazans”.

Riemer also tweeted that Hamas's cause is just and no one should feel the need to condemn them.

I have been to Kibbutz Be'eri. I have been to the Nova music festival site. I have spoken to survivors. I have sat with hostage families. For the President of the Sydney University Teachers Union to say he supports the choice of Hamas to systematically rape, murder, and kidnap innocent civilians shows the depth of antisemitism at Sydney University. He has dehumanised Jews to such an extent that he implores people to not condemn the largest massacre of Jewish people since the Holocaust.

Going to University and knowing this is the man your tutors and professors elected to represent them, feels like being stabbed in the gut every single day.

Sydney University Gaza Encampment

The encampment at Sydney University left many people, including myself, feeling like Jew hatred had conquered our campus. When I went to the encampment, none of my fellow students would engage with me. Clearly the goal of the encampment was not to build productive dialogue between students. The encampment was designed to occupy space in order to silence Jewish and pro-Israel voices. Their tactics of intimidation (wearing face coverings, occupying the main lawn and refusing to acknowledge students with diverse views) effectively shut Jewish students out of campus. The encampment proudly flew the Taliban flag.

Friday night hate marches

One of the most distressing aspects of the encampment that was barely covered by the media were the weekly Friday night prayers and marches. Men, many of whom were clearly not students, would descend on the campus, chanting “Allah Akbar” and flying threatening flags depicting the Shahada (often used in terrorist group flags). Sydney University became a “no go zone” for Jewish students every Friday night. The University seemingly did nothing to stop these men from coming onto campus and spreading hate. The intention behind these marches was clear; to conquer and intimidate the campus.

Student General Meeting – August 2024

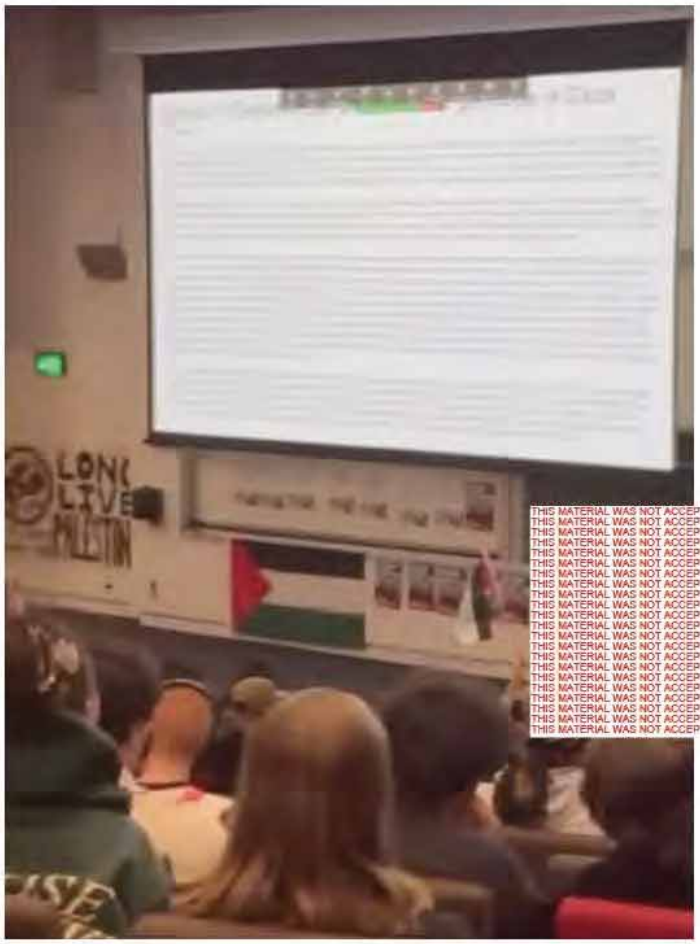
On August 7, 2024, a Student General Meeting was called. Over 800 students showed up to vote on two motions; one in support of BDS, and the second to call for one Palestinian state and affirm the right to armed resistance. A small contingent of pro-Israel students went along to defend Israel. A member of our group moved an amendment to the motion to condemn Hamas and condemn October 7. This amendment was voted down 800-8. In outrage, I got up and told them what they were supporting. As I told them about the rape of women, the murder and kidnapping of children, students in the room were jeering. I could barely get a word out before the meeting moderator would have to stop me and call the room to order.

THIS MATERIAL WAS NOT ACCEPTED BY THE COMMITTEE



This meeting demonstrated the true nature of the anti-Israel movement at Sydney University. It's not about Palestinian rights. It's not about peace or a two-state solution. It is about supporting the terrorisation and murder of Jews. They have dehumanised and demonised Jewish people so much that they couldn't help but laugh while I talked about the October 7 atrocity. The students in this room do not see Jewish people as human. They are obstacles standing in the way of Hamas's victory over Israel.

The open support of Hamas demonstrates the antisemitic nature of this student movement.

Statements by Hamas officials make clear the terrorist organisation's commitment to destroying Israel and killing Jews and Israelis around the world.

- Ismail Haniyeh in 2020: He said that Hamas rejects ceasefire agreements by which, "Gaza would become Singapore," preferring to remain at war with Israel until a Palestinian state is established: "We cannot, in exchange for money or projects, give up Palestine and our weapons. We will not give up the resistance... We will not recognize Israel, Palestine must stretch from the [Jordan] River to the [Mediterranean] Sea."

- Hamas official, Hamad Al-Regeb in an April sermon: He prayed for “annihilation” and “paralysis” of the Jews whom he described as filthy animals: “[Allah] transformed them into filthy, ugly animals like apes and pigs because of the injustice and evil they had brought about.” Al-Regeb also prayed for the ability to “get to the necks of the Jews.”
- Hamas Political Bureau Chairman Saleh Al-Arouri in an August 2023 interview: He expressed Hamas’ desire for “total war” with Israel: “Therefore, we are convinced that if a total conflict begins, the airspace and seaports of this entity will be shut down, and they will not be able to live without electricity, water, and communications.”
- Ahmad Abd Al-Hadi (Hamas representative in Lebanon) in an October 12, 2023 TV show laid out Hamas’ expectation that it would be Israel that would sue for peace and indicated that a ceasefire is part of Hamas’ overall strategy, but said that he was not at liberty to say what exactly Hamas has planned for the next step after a ceasefire. He also stated that October 7 had achieved its intended purpose of landing “a blow to the normalization (of relations between Israel and Arab countries).”
- Hamas member, Ghazi Hamad on October 24, 2023: “Israel is a country that has no place on our land […] because it constitutes a security, military, and political catastrophe to the Arab and Islamic nation.” He also vowed to repeat the October 7 attacks “time and again until Israel is annihilated,” and expressing a desire to “sacrifice martyrs” (referring to Gazan civilians) for Hamas’ ideological aim of destroying Israel.
- In a speech before the International Union of Muslim Scholars in Doha on January 9, 2024, Ismaeel Haniyeh, chairman of Hamas's political bureau, called the October 7 massacre the “advanced [battle] front of the Ummah.” Calling for “financial jihad” (donations to Hamas) and “jihad of the teeth” (physical jihad), he asked the international audience, “Who wishes to invest in building the jihadist generation to liberate Jerusalem and to unite the blood of the Ummah with the blood of the people of Gaza, Jerusalem, and Palestine on the land of Palestine for its liberation and the liberation of Jerusalem?”

Despite the clear genocidal intent of Hamas, and the fact that it is a listed terrorist organistion, students at Sydney University are able to support them without any consequences. The message this sends to Jewish students and supporters of liberal democracy is clear; you are not welcome here.

Where to next?

Urgent action is needed to stop the rising antisemitism on our campuses. I have given you a personal account of my experience at Sydney University, but I’m sure there are many students who have had similar experiences at other universities.

For Government:

- Legislation should be introduced to disallow the use of compulsory SSAF fees to fund student protests.
- Any international student that expresses support for a listed terror organisation should have their visa cancelled immediately (this includes voting for pro-Hamas motions).

- Open a judicial inquiry into antisemitism on campus.
- Compel Universities to introduce antisemitism training that includes a section on Middle Eastern history and the Holocaust.

For Universities:

- Any Student Representative Council's that express support for listed terror organisations should be disaffiliated, defunded and dissolved.
- Ban chants that incite violence such as;
    - "Takbir, Allahu Akbar"
    - "Intifada, intifada"
    - "All Zionists are terrorists"
    - "From the river to the sea, Palestine will be free"
- Take disciplinary action against all students who express support for listed terrorist organisations
- Take action against staff members, [redacted] who galvanise antisemitism and express support for listed terror organisations
- Immediately refer any student who expresses support for Hamas to the Ministry for Home Affairs. Specify whether they are an international student, so they can have their visa cancelled.

Conclusion

What will it take for our Government to act? Will it take the calls for genocide, for intifada, to translate into a terror attack? Words do become actions.

Jewish students and supporters of Australian values are sounding the alarm, but it's falling on deaf ears.

Please listen to us. Stand against hate. Stand against fear. Stand for love, tolerance and respect for all. For the sake of our country, I implore you.

Who are we?

The Jewish Council of Australia is a diverse coalition of Jewish academics, lawyers, writers and teachers. We bring expertise in antisemitism and racism.

We provide an independent expert Jewish voice supporting human rights and opposing antisemitism and racism.

We support Palestinian freedom and justice and are united in our opposition to Israel's continued policies aimed at the destruction of Palestinian life.

Learn More WHO WE ARE

Our core principles

We are proud Jewish people in Australia with diverse histories, traditions and politics. We are committed to the values of tikkun olam (repairing the world), calling out injustice, challenging assumptions and promoting debate.

We reject the assertion that Jews and the State of Israel are one and the same, or that all Jewish people support, without criticism, the actions of the Israeli government and military.

Pro-Israel Jewish organisations, that do not recognise the diversity of views among Australian Jews, do not speak for us.

While we have diverse views on many issues, we are united in our opposition to Israel's continued policies aimed at the destruction of Palestinian life. We are opposed to the Israeli occupation and the prioritisation of the rights of Jewish people over the rights of Palestinians.

Jewish safety is not at odds with Palestinian freedom. We support calls for freedom, equality and justice for all Palestinians and Israelis. We reject any claim that this call is racist or antisemitic, or that it is antisemitic to criticise Israel's conduct.

Racism and antisemitism are on the rise in Australia. The only way to effectively fight antisemitism is by committing to work in solidarity with other groups facing bigotry and discrimination to fight all forms of racism.

ADD YOUR VOICE AND SIGN ON TO OUR CORE PRINCIPLES HERE

> "The Jewish Council is an important initiative. The next generation of Australian Jews is resisting the pressure applied by the Jewish establishment to defend Israel and the Occupation. Refusing to toe the line comes at a real personal cost so I commend the individuals involved for their moral courage and commitment to peace and justice."
> Louise Adler AM

> "In the current environment of global political extremes and the relentless devastation in Gaza, the manipulation of language by those desperate to justify the indefensible, is perhaps an inevitable response. Amidst these distortions, many of them racist in character and impact, it is refreshing and essential to see the emergence of new voices committed to challenging and remedying crass and obsolete opinions. The establishment of the Council importantly seeks to reset the record and provide perspectives informed by principles of accuracy, transparency, and justice."

Structure of the Jewish Council

The Jewish Council of Australia is made up of executive members as well as an advisory committee. We are independent and are all volunteers.

We are all proud Jewish people. We include graduates of Jewish high schools, lifelong members of synagogues, and members of Jewish cultural institutions. Many of us are the descendants of Holocaust survivors, refugees and the survivors of pogroms.

We also have over 1000 Jewish people in Australia (and growing) who support our values and have signed on to our core principles. You can read their names or add your voice here.

What?

Report-Long Description

Multiple recent incidents have breached the university's duty to ensure a safe environment that is free from intimidation. Specifically, on 24th, 26th and 29th April along Eastern Ave and at the encampment on the quad lawn there have been distressing chants (including the use of megaphones) that call for intifada, including the chant "there is only one solution, intifada revolution". This (1) references Hitler's "final solution" and (2) calls for an intifada, which in the context of the Israel/Hamas conflict is a call for violence against Jews. Additionally, I have heard calls to "globalise the intifada" chanted throughout the past week on campus. This is a call for violence against Jews around the world, not just in Israel. Additionally, today the chant "Zionists are not welcome here" tells me (and 90% of the Australian Jewish community, and anyone else who believes in the right of Israel to exist) that I am not welcome at USYD. I feel threatened and unsafe to work in an environment where people are free to call for violence and exclusion against me and my family. Using words that describe me as being supportive of genocide and murder is equally distressing. As USYD is committed to providing a safe, welcoming and inclusive environment (Bullying, Harassment, Discrimination policy 4.a.1) these chants, posters and banners plastered across the university breach this. Prof Jagose's email from 30th April 2024 states "we have zero tolerance for any form of racism, threats to safety, hate speech, intimidation, threatening speech, bullying or unlawful harassment, including antisemitic or anti-Muslim language or behaviour." This is exactly what I have witnessed and experienced over the past week. Additionally, today posters that call for the return of Israeli hostages were placed on designated notice boards and were instantly ripped down. This limits the freedom of expression of other points of view in contravention of Prof Scott's all-staff email from 9.2.24

HealthSafety - Recommendations
To keep me and others safe the university needs to uphold its policies on ensuring a safe and inclusive environment, specifically as Prof Scott's email of 9.2.24 that freedom of expression "does not extend to harassing or intimidating staff and students who may hold a different view or simply do not wish to engage in protest or debate. It means not exercising freedom of expression in a way designed to limit others exercising their freedom of expression." To act against racism, threats to safety, hate speech, intimidation and threatening speech the university needs to
(1) be proactive in taking down posters in non-designated areas (not only after hours when everyone has gone home only to find new posters up the next morning)
(2) reassess whether calls for intifada and/or the exclusion of Zionists constitute a threat to Jewish staff and students. Usually the minority group being targeted is afforded the courtesy of defining what is threatening and discriminatory to them. This has not happened in this instance.

The Australian Academic Alliance Against Antisemitism (5A) is pleased to have the opportunity to make this submission to the NSW Legislative Council Parliamentary Inquiry into Antisemitism. As an academic body representing the tertiary sector of both Jewish and non-Jewish staff in New South Wales, we address in this submission only matters relevant to our mandate. Our responses draw on the expertise of our members in key areas, as well as the major survey 5A conducted from April to July 2024 concerning antisemitism on university campuses. The issues listed in the Terms of Reference which are addressed in this submission are as follows:

> (a) the causes underlying the increasing prevalence and severity of antisemitic incidents across the state.
> (b) record levels of antisemitism on university campuses and in schools undermining student safety.
> (c) the threat to social cohesion in New South Wales presented by antisemitism.
> (h) the role of the Sydney Jewish Museum in providing Holocaust education for students.

The submission concludes with seven recommendations.

Introduction

The Australian Academic Alliance Against Antisemitism is a non-profit organisation born in the aftermath of the brutal Hamas attack on 7 October 2023. The organisation has grown very quickly and today consists of academics and professional staff from across 32 Australian universities. 5A acts as the main body representing the voice of both Jewish and non-Jewish staff who are concerned with the emergence of antisemitism on their campus in the Australian tertiary sector.

Our functional structure, from individual universities to state and federal representatives, has enabled the executive to be informed quickly of incidents and to take appropriate action. The organisation's reach includes activities in education, academic advice and peer support, combating anti-Israeli and BDS activity, responding to the media and misinformation, supporting legal and medical professional educator groups, advocating for Jewish academics and education professionals with sector regulators and University executives as well as tertiary sector membership bodies, and supporting individual students across all levels in responding to their own adverse experiences of antisemitism and bias in the classroom, publishing and professional development.

Antisemitic incidents across NSW

The causes of the increasing prevalence and severity of antisemitic incidents across the state are manifold. They relate to both general societal issues and those specific to the virus of antisemitism.

Racism has a long history in Australia and has taken three major forms: discrimination against and repressive treatment of the Aboriginal population; fear of the "Asian hordes" or the "yellow peril"; and suspicion of separate ethno-cultural identity among immigrant or non-Anglo-Celtic groups, including Jews.[1] Within this broader picture, antisemitism in Australia has also manifested itself since the 1880s with the emergence of Australian nationalism.

Research into current antisemitism has demonstrated that it takes three principal forms. It begins with religious anti-Judaism, with different strands in both Christianity and Islam, then mutates into racial antisemitism, and, most recently, political antisemitism associated with anti-Israeli conflicts, in which ostensible criticisms of Israel can morph into an irrational hatred of Jews, as well as calling for the annihilation of the only Jewish country in the world. Often referred to as the "new antisemitism", this third manifestation constitutes a virulent strain in both high schools and universities. As will be discussed in answer to (b).

As in other parts of the world, antisemitism in Australia has been prevalent among those on the radical right, starting with the fears of Australia being flooded by foreign Russian Jews in the 1890s; the radical left, emerging within the Labor Party, starting with Labor figure Frank Anstey, for instance, who republished his anti-Jewish newspaper articles as a pamphlet in 1915 entitled 'The Kingdom of Shylock';[2] and later with extremist Islamic groups, beginning in the 1980s. Spikes in antisemitism have often been associated with events in the Middle East related to anti-Israel conflicts.

Since 2020, there have been three major factors which have contributed to the increasing antisemitism in NSW: the impact of the COVID-19 pandemic, which led to increased anti-Asian, anti-Arab sentiments, Islamophobia and antisemitism; The Voice referendum of 2023 which aimed to provide the Indigenous Australians constitutional status but was defeated, creating further fissures in Australian society that tended to escalate antisemitism; and the impact of anti-Israel conflicts, particularly the ongoing conflicts in Gaza since 2020.

COVID had a destabilising impact on Australian society and during this period antisemitism intensified.[3] The main area of increase in antisemitism due to COVID-19 was among right wing extremists who believe in conspiracy theories and mainly expressed their views on the social media site, GAB, a site favoured by extremists in both Melbourne and Sydney for its free speech policy. Their main theme is that 'the Jews are behind coronavirus.' As set out in an article in the Times of Israel, by Julie Nathan of the Executive Council of Australian Jewry, their messages focused on global antisemitic tropes and stereotypes, including negative images; the narrative that Jews or the Mossad

The extremists also targeted Josh Frydenberg, at the time the Melbourne-based Australian Federal Treasurer, especially in relation to his being Jewish. Some of the comments about Frydenberg on GAB mocked the Holocaust, a form of Holocaust distortion.[6]

These attacks were particularly distressing for Frydenberg whose mother is a Hungarian Holocaust survivor. As a result of the threats from the extreme right-wing fringe, he required 24/7 police protection.[7] The anti-vaccine campaign also had an antisemitic strand and for religious Christians in which divine punishment of Jews also featured.

Even though this extremist narrative did not gain significant mainstream traction, the threats by the extreme right wing kept communal organisations busy in both Melbourne and Sydney. Community security has been a top-order issue, and the Community Security Group (CSG) Victoria were vigilant in this, working closely with Victoria Police and the Jewish community.[8] Peter Wise, chairman CSG in Sydney explained in relation to these:

> ... keyboard warriors that hide behind a screen... It is very difficult to assess how much of it is real, how much of it is just rhetoric. But notwithstanding that, you still have to deal with it, and it is a very big part of what CSG does in anticipating future events. It's like being forewarned is forearmed.[9]

This antisemitism of the COVID period, 2020–2022, was further impacted on by the direct conflict between Hamas and Israel, with bursts of fighting in 2021, 2022 and 2023. This antisemitism manifested itself more on the left, particularly on university campuses and in the Labor movement. Since 1989, the Executive Council of Australian Jewry (ECAJ) has been producing an annual report of antisemitic incidences in Australia, with Julie Nathan assuming the role of writing the reports since 2013. In her 1 October 2023 executive summary (written before 7 October) she wrote:

> During the twelve-month period, from 1 October 2022 to 30 September 2023, there were 495 antisemitic incidents logged by volunteer Community Security Groups (CSGs), official Jewish state roof bodies, and the ECAJ. In the previous 12-month period, ending 30 September 2022, these same bodies logged 478 incidents. Accordingly, there was an increase of 3.5% in the overall number of reported antisemitic incidents compared to the previous year (2022).
> Overall, from 2022 to 2023, there were substantial increases in the number of reported incidents in three categories: assault (up 120% from 5 to 11), vandalism (up 100% from 11 to 22) and verbal abuse (up 36% from 138 to 188). There were significant decreases in two categories: messages (down 17% from 76 to 63) and posters (down 30% from 123 to 86). Graffiti remained the same at 125. Of note, most of the incidents of assault were generally mild, people throwing objects at Jews, slapping and pushing Jews rather than assault causing serious physical harm.
> The average number of reported antisemitic incidents each year from 2013 to 2022 was 316. As such, the total number of reported incidents in 2023 is above that average by 179 incidents.[10]

The different categories of antisemitism operate consistently, but increases are associated with the impact of Arab conflicts with Israel. This has been demonstrated as a historical trend, with rises in antisemitism associated with anti-Israel conflicts. In her 2023 report, Nathan noted that it was a product of the three forms of antisemitism discussed above:

> The members of these groups are sometimes an uneasy alliance of people of mainly Western background from secular far-Left groups, such as Socialist Alternative and Socialist Alliance, and those of Arab and/or Muslim background with purportedly religious and conservative views, as well as some coming from a purportedly Christian perspective.[11]

This antisemitism has intensified with an unprecedented upsurge in the post-7 October 2023 period at all levels of NSW society, manifesting itself on three fronts: extreme left, particularly on university campuses as discussed below, the extreme right with neo-Nazi activities, and among more radical Muslims. This has been exacerbated by weekly protests in the Sydney city centre, protests and encampments on university campuses, abuse on social media, cancelling of those who express support for Israel's existence, silence and denial of the reality and negative impact of the violence of Hamas's attacks on Southern Israel (with key influencers denying the rape, torture and beheadings, killing parents in front of their children and vice versa and setting homes on fire, resulting in those habitants still inside being burnt alive, as well as the vicious attacks on those attending the Nova music festival, on 7 October).

Antisemitism on NSW university campuses

Issues of antisemitism on university campuses and in schools have increased significantly since 7 October, although it is important to recognise that they already had reached a high bar before 7 October 2023.

The anti-Jewish attacks on university campuses, which manifested themselves both overseas and in Australia after October 7, did not suddenly emerge without a pre-history. They were part of a growing trend which increased after the UN World Conference Against Racism, Racial Discrimination, Xenophobia and Related Intolerance held in South Africa in 2001. Subsequently, the Boycott, Divestment and Sanctions (BDS) movement emerged, especially on university campuses. These developments occurred in the context of accusations of apartheid and settler-colonialism against Israel, with the theoretical constructs of intersectionality and critical race theory adding to the growth of campus antisemitism. In addition to protests by left-wing activists from groups such as Students for Justice in Palestine, right-wing antisemitism drew on conspiratorial beliefs increased both overseas and locally. This is shown by a 2015 protest at the University of Sydney opposed to a lecture delivered by Colonel Richard Kemp from England.[12]

Since 2021, there has been an increase in the anti-Zionist narrative on Australian campuses, with anti-Israel resolutions being passed and anti-Zionist articles being published in campus newspapers, together with the resultant increase of antisemitic incidents. This was demonstrated by the Jewish Student Experience of Antisemitism

Survey (2023) initiated by the Zionist Federation of Australia (ZFA) with the support of Australasian Union of Jewish Students (AUJS) and private foundations and conducted by the Social Research Centre.[13]

Surveys of Antisemitism on Australian University Campuses, 2024

The ZFA/ AUJS survey was conducted over a three-week period in early 2024 and included current and recent Jewish university students and achieved 563 responses. The survey found that 64% of Jewish university students experienced some form of antisemitism, with 88% of respondents reporting that this had occurred in the last 12 months. Of these, 47% described 'intimidation by people or events'; 37% relating to 'tropes of Jewish money, power or influence'; 37% 'comparing Israel to Nazi Germany'; 30% 'Holocaust denial or minimisation'; and 25% being 'singled out or excluded over Israel'. More than half (57%) respondents hid their Jewish identity.

The survey also found that Jewish students lack confidence in their university complaints processes, with 85% impacted by antisemitism deciding not to make a complaint. Of the minority who did complain, 61% were dissatisfied with the outcome. They felt that if the university adopted a definition of antisemitism, they would be more confident in making a complaint.[14]

As demonstrated by the 5A survey conducted in 2024, these issues were all exacerbated after 7 October 2023. The aim of the survey was to: (i) evaluate the extent of antisemitism in Australian universities as experienced by Jewish students and staff; and (ii) assess the extent to which universities in Australia are taking active measures to ensure their campuses are free from antisemitism. Data was collected through an online survey conducted between 16 April and 31 July 2024. The survey was comprised of five demographic questions, eight fixed choice (seven with multiple parts), and three open-ended questions. The questionnaire specifically requested that only people who identify as Jewish should complete the survey.

After data cleaning to mitigate the risk of fraudulent responses, the total number of valid participants was 548. The distribution of participants by role was as follows: 66% students, 25% staff, 6% administration or management, and 3% other. Data was collected from 30 Australian universities. Notably, 39.8% of the sample came from universities in NSW, making NSW the second state after Victoria (46%) in its percentage of contribution to the survey findings. This high level of representation suggests that the survey findings are highly applicable to NSW. Table 1 below presents the distribution of participants across NSW universities.

The survey did not define antisemitism, leaving respondents to interpret the term themselves in response to open-ended questions. The term campus was defined as: "University campuses' include both physical spaces (e.g. lecture rooms) and virtual spaces (e.g. social media). For the purposes of this survey, any space in which you interact in relation to your university affiliation is defined as 'campus'".

The findings reveal that the majority of students and staff do not feel safe on campus, with only 37% of participants reporting a sense of safety. Qualitative data further indicates that campuses are perceived as hostile environments for Jewish people.

The most frequently reported antisemitic experiences included "Graffiti, posters or flyers delegitimising the right of Israel to exist" and "Verbal or social media comments delegitimising the right of Israel to exist", each reported by 91% of participants. The significance of this finding is threefold:

> First, the findings suggest that the physical campus environment is just as hostile to Jewish people as the virtual campus.
> Secondly, the combined qualitative and quantitative data reveal that the majority of participants equate anti-Zionism with antisemitism. Consequently, the proliferation of posters across campuses delegitimising Israel and calling for its annihilation constitute antisemitic harassment, as perceived by the majority of participants.
> Finally, the findings suggest that simply enforcing campus rules and preventing the defacement of public spaces could lead to a marked improvement in Jewish students' and staff's campus experiences and significantly increase their sense of safety.

Another key finding is that 63% percent of participants reported "feeling ignored or excluded." A large majority of students (74%) reported hearing antisemitic comments in their presence, suggesting that antisemitic discourse has become normalised in campus environments. These findings demonstrate that the aftermath of 7 October had a profound social impact on Jewish people's relationships with both non-Jewish and Jewish individuals on campus, creating what can be described as a social earthquake or social reconfiguration. This is demonstrated by the findings that nearly half (49%) of participants reported a decrease in interactions with non-Jewish people, while 77% reported an increase in interactions with Jewish people.

A second rift occurred within the Jewish community itself, with 6% of participants reporting a decrease in interactions with other Jewish people and 11% reporting an increase in interactions with non-Jewish individuals.

Another key impact was that 45% of Jewish students reported staying off campus and avoiding classes. As well, 49% of participants reported decreases in both "publicly expressing political beliefs" and "publicly expressing connection to Israel," suggesting that Jewish people's freedom of speech has been suppressed on campus.

When asked about the source of the threat, 84% of participants indicated that the source is from the political left, whereas only 36% perceived the political right as the main threat. This finding reveals a progressive paradox, when left liberal ideals foster exclusion

The combined qualitative and quantitative data reveal that antisemitism is systemic across university systems. Antisemitism has been identified in policy enforcement, disciplinary procedures, administration, teaching and research practices, and coursework materials. Most respondents (60%) rated their university's actions against antisemitism between 0 and 3 on a scale of 0–10. Most staff (55%) considered their university's complaint procedures to be inadequate.

A summary of the main findings is as follows:

- Antisemitism is systemic across university systems.
- Virtual campuses increasingly merge with physical environments, with the boundaries between them becoming increasingly blurred. Participants report that both the physical campus and the virtual campus are equally hostile.
- Campus environments and imagery are among the most influential factors contributing to harassment and alienation of Jewish people
- Jewish people's freedom of speech has been silenced
- Antisemitism has become normalised. Regardless of the campus or the specific segment of the Jewish university population surveyed, findings consistently show that antisemitic culture has become pervasive and normalised across Australian universities.
- The majority of participants equate antisemitism with anti-Zionism.
- Responses are not uniform across universities. Qualitative data shows that Australian universities vary in their responses, with some being more effective than others in addressing antisemitism.

Overview of antisemitic agitation in NSW Universities

An overview of key incidents on two NSW campuses since 7 October 2023 is set out here. Macquarie and Sydney universities were selected due to the high media profiles of anti-Zionist and antisemitic academics or incidents there. Incidents occurred on other NSW campuses, particularly the University of Technology Sydney and the University of Wollongong, but less information about them was reported in the public domain.

To understand these incidents, it is essential to observe their uniqueness in Australian history. There has never been a national campaign of university disruption on this scale, not even during the widespread protests on university campuses against the Vietnam war in which Australia was directly engaged half a century ago. The Hamas-Israel war in Gaza was far less destructive than contemporaneous conflicts occurring in Congo, Ethiopia, Syria, Sudan, and Ukraine that have aroused no interest on campus. No foreign conflict ever enraged Australian academic staff and students more, no matter how much larger, deadlier or more geopolitically significant for Australia that the conflict has been.

Several notable incidents of anti-Israel activism epitomised antisemitic activity on campus. These have included protest camps on university grounds, published statements signed by staff expressing solidarity against Israel, National Tertiary Education Union adoption of a boycott of Israeli academia, and presence on campus of agitators external to university staff and students.

Less prominent features of anti-Israel activism include the weaponising student misconduct complaints against Zionist students. Activist students also disrupted lectures by forcing their way into lecture halls to announce protests, conduct impromptu surveys of student condemnation of Israel, and to photograph or film student responses to surveys without permission to do so. They abused academic staff and students who objected to these practices.

- Protest camps were established by university students, commencing at the University of Sydney about 23 April 2024,[15] and remained in place for most months during 2024. Other participating universities which had encampments included the Australian National University, Curtin University, Monash University, University of Melbourne, University of Queensland, and University of Wollongong. The protest camps occupied public spaces on Australian university grounds, such as central lawns or quadrangles, and occupied internal building space in some instances.[16]

- A nucleus of anti-Israel activist staff, often reinforced by their roles in the National Tertiary Education Union (NTEU), is usually essential to initiate and to snowball anti-Israel student activism. The staff are usually academic and located in the humanities and social sciences but can include the Health Sciences and Medicine and other faculties, where they focus research work on anti-Zionism. Statements were signed by academic staff expressing solidarity with Palestinian factions and against Israel and published online, especially in the journal

Overland. Signatories included: Australian academics,[17] historians,[18] and legal scholars.[19] Open letters were signed by staff at University of Sydney,[20] and University of Western Sydney.[21]

- External agitators participated in protests on some Australian university campuses. The two principal such organisations were the far-left Socialist Alliance, which is an Australian political party,[22] and the Hizb-ut-Tahrir, which is a Muslim Brotherhood-allied Islamist party proscribed as a terrorist organisation in the United Kingdom.[23] The activist group "Stand 4 Palestine" formed an Australian organisational core for many anti-Israel protests run by Hizb-ut-Tahrir.[24] Although not typically registered as university clubs or societies, the Socialist Alliance and Hizb-ut-Tahrir have access to university grounds as public spaces.[25]

- Foreign political influence on Australian university campuses is poorly understood and regulated. Sometimes this influence is exercised through major grants to academic centres for Arab, Islamic studies or Middle East studies. For example, Qatar has donated USD $5 billion to universities in the USA in the past 20 years.[26] Australian academic centres are not currently required to disclose and report upon the purposes or conditions of such grants.[27] However, there can be no doubt that similarly-sourced donations have been given to Australian academic centres dealing with Middle East. Studies in the USA demonstrate that antisemitic incidents are substantially higher on university campuses that receive such

Academic freedom or incitement to racial hatred?

Protestors focus on the issue of academic freedom to justify their activities. Freedom of speech stands as a cornerstone of democratic societies, facilitating the exchange of ideas, engagement in robust debate, and the accountability of governments. As John Stuart Mill argued, in "On Liberty," the unimpeded exchange of ideas is crucial for intellectual and social progress. Mill posited that even erroneous or unpopular opinions carry inherent value, as they challenge prevailing dogmas and stimulate critical thinking. By safeguarding freedom of speech, societies cultivate a marketplace of ideas where truth is discerned through rigorous discussion. This liberty underpins other fundamental rights, empowering citizens to advocate for social change and justice. Thus, erosion of free speech imperils the very foundation of democracy.

Despite its paramount importance, freedom of speech has never been unlimited. The classic example, articulated by Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes, posits that falsely shouting "fire" in a crowded theatre is not protected speech, as it poses a clear and present danger to public safety. This principle underscores that speech inciting violence or panic is justifiably restricted to prevent harm.

Permissible limits on speech unquestionably include the regulation of violence, of the threatening of violence and of serious vilification. Hate speech, which fosters discrimination and violence, presents a significant regulatory challenge. Regulating hate speech entails a delicate balance; excessive restrictions risk a chilling effect, deterring individuals from expressing legitimate views and stifling open discourse. In drafting regulations, there needs to be clear attention to the impact of the law. On the other hand, the victims of unregulated free speech are silenced if we do not regulate their detractors, as demonstrated by the findings of the 5A survey for a large proportion of both Jewish students and staff.

Academic freedom is an extension of freedom of speech within educational institutions. It allows scholars to pursue knowledge without interference or censorship. This freedom is vital for the advancement of knowledge, fostering an environment where ideas can be rigorously tested and debated. As set out in our mission statement, 5A champions academic freedom and honest enquiry.

The definition of academic freedom used in this submission is that adopted nationally in Australia, namely that set out in the Model Code proposed by former High Court Chief Justice Robert French as modified. It defines “academic freedom” in the following terms:

[28] ISGAP, The Corruption of the American Mind - How Foreign Funding of Higher Education in the United States Predicts the Erosion of Democratic Values and Antisemitic Sentiment on Campus, vol. 2, 2024, https://isgap.org/follow-the-money/.

- the freedom of academic staff to teach, discuss and research and to disseminate and publish the results of their research;
- the freedom of academic staff and students to engage in intellectual inquiry, to express their opinions and beliefs, and to contribute to public debate, in relation to their subjects of study and research;
- the freedom of academic staff and students to express their opinions in relation to the higher education provider in which they work or are enrolled;
- the freedom of academic staff to participate in professional or representative academic bodies;
- the freedom of students to participate in student societies and associations;
- the autonomy of the higher education provider in relation to the choice of academic courses and offerings, the ways in which these are taught and the choices of research activities and the ways in which they are conducted.

The Model Code also states that "Every member of the academic staff and every student enjoys academic freedom subject only to prohibitions, restrictions or conditions:

- imposed by law;
- imposed by the reasonable and proportionate regulation necessary to the discharge of the university's teaching and research activities;
- imposed by the reasonable and proportionate regulation necessary to discharge the university's duty to foster the wellbeing of students and staff;
- imposed by the reasonable and proportionate regulation to enable the university to give effect to its legal duties;
- imposed by the university by way of its reasonable requirements as to the courses to be delivered and the content and means of their delivery."

Thus, the Model Code indicates that Australian universities are not allowed by ruse of Academic Freedom to shirk legal their responsibilities. Implementation of the Model Code is reported in the annual reports of all Australian universities under a statutory obligation.

Prohibitions imposed by law, as referred to in the Model Code, are the first restraint upon exercise of academic freedom. When proscribed under criminal law, transgression of prohibitions can carry consequences of criminal sanctions. Under NSW law, the Crimes Amendment (Inciting Racial Hatred) Act 2025 makes it a crime to intentionally and publicly incite hatred towards another person, or group of people, on the grounds of race. Section 93ZAA of the Crimes Act 1900 requires that the act contain the following elements:

- It must be a public act;
- The public act must incite hatred;
- The incitement to hatred must be intentional; and
- The intentional incitement to hatred must be on the basis of race.

In contrast, civil law procedures that seek to prevent hate speech aim to reconcile the parties or award compensation. Under the Commonwealth Racial Discrimination Act, it is unlawful to say or do something reasonably likely to offend, insult, humiliate or intimidate another person or group if the thing is done because of the race, colour or national or ethnic origin of the person or group.

Conditions imposed by law, as referred to in the Model Code, include tertiary education quality standards that require universities to ensure a safe academic environment for staff and students. In terms of the matrix above, these comprise administrative and educational measures.

Governmental interventions in response to antisemitism on campus can be conceived of across a range of measures from criminal law to educational training, illustrated in the table below, setting out a hierarchy of legal consequences for incitement to racial hatred, from criminal penalties to remedial education. These legal consequences do not conflict with Academic Freedom as defined in Australia under the Model Code.

Safety and security failures

Federal Higher Education Threshold Standards adopted pursuant to the Tertiary Education Quality and Standards Agency Act, section 58, require that a higher education provider must meet Threshold Standards section 2.3.4: 'A safe environment is promoted and fostered'.

In the light of the findings of the 5A survey discussed above, we argue that the NSW universities have failed to ensure a safe environment. Some resorted to advising students and staff not to attend the campus, or parts of campus, or to work and study from home and have established safe rooms or spaces. Yet, we argue that the proposals to institute safe spaces or rooms for Jews are equivalent to ghettos.

The review of campus antisemitism at the University of Sydney was conducted by a legal specialist in workplace safety. The report, by Bruce Hodgkinson AM SC, addressed workplace safety obligations, psychosocial harm and relevant performance shortcomings at the University of Sydney. The report noted that the provision of security services was not appropriate to ensure the safety of visitors in some circumstances and that operational protocols and agreements with police were needed.

Most importantly, university executive management teams failed to use enforcement powers already available to them. University Council have the powers to mandate, and campus security services have powers to implement, safety measures that were neglected. For example, a university has full authority to remove trespassers and encampments, to curtail occupation of buildings, to prevent and punish office invasions, and to remove people and objects blocking access routes. Security services have the authority to request student and staff identification, to utilise surveillance cameras and to require that identities are not hidden by face masking. University premises are zoned under municipal laws as spaces for public access, subject to the discretion exercisable by executive management to exclude troublesome persons.[29]

A major feature across NSW university campuses with few exceptions, has been abject failure to implement existing University standards. These standards are comprised of binding rules and guidelines. Binding rules are typically termed Enterprise Agreements, Rules, and Codes of Conduct, and guidelines are typically termed Policies, Procedures, Plans, and Guidelines. Binding rules include obligations not to harass, bully, racially discriminate, or break criminal laws. Many antisemitic activities on NSW university campuses were breaches of binding rules that universities declined to enforce. We argue that these failures reflected choices to take the easiest paths of least resistance, least moral judgement, and least leadership.

The mismanagement of academic freedom and campus safety at Macquarie University and the University of Sydney illustrate the governance challenges in dealing with antisemitism on NSW university campuses.

Macquarie University

On 14 March 2024 a 5A member complaint was made to Macquarie University Vice Chancellor, Chancellor, and deputy vice chancellor, regarding antisemitism at Macquarie University and in social media posts by a Macquarie University academic. Examples of the social media posts include: in October 2023 celebrating Hamas terrorists arriving by paraglider to commit massacres in Israel; in February 2024 urging followers to ensure that Zionists have no culturally safe spaces in Australia; and, in December 2024, wishing for the end of Israel in the New Year. On 29 April 2024, the academic led small children to chant for intifada, a call for violent insurgency, at the University of Sydney encampment.

On 24 January 2025, the academic revealed at a symposium that she disregarded a condition of her Australian Research Council academic funding requiring the holding of a conference, that she bends the University rules when opportunity offers itself, and that she will not acknowledge the academic work of scholars who do not stand against Israel who do not stand against Israel.

University of Sydney

On 19 March 2024, the University of Sydney Abroad Fair was held at the Law School and in the Susan Wakil Health Building. Professor Milette Shamir (Vice President International) and Sharon Ziv Kafri were invited representatives from Tel Aviv University, to promote student exchanges. Anti-Israel demonstrators disrupted the exchange fair by invading the lobby where the representatives were positioned, just meters away from them, and yelled accusations, waved Palestinian flags and chanted antisemitic slogans. University of Sydney security personnel then locked the building doors, not allowing people to enter, but allowing people to leave. However, they did not intervene during the incident, thereby effectively supporting the intruders in silencing freedom of speech and academic freedom, as no students could come to the building and interact with the delegation. The incident arguably breached Higher Education Threshold Standards section 6.4.1: The governing body is to 'develop and maintain an institutional environment in which freedom of speech and academic freedom are upheld and protected'.

On 28 March 2024, a complaint was made by members of 5A about the incident to the Vice-Chancellor's chief of staff, Darren Goodsir. It was treated as a complaint about student conduct and was passed to the Student Affairs Unit (SAU) under the Student Complaints Procedure. The SAU decided that there was no evidence that the conduct of any specific student breached University policies. The SAU dismissed elements of the complaint made by the University of Sydney 5A staff. The Tel Aviv University President wrote to the Sydney University Vice Chancellor Mark Scott expressing his deep concern. No adequate apology was made by the Vice-Chancellor Mark Scott.

On 23 April 2024, an anti-Israel encampment was established upon the lawn in the University of Sydney quadrangle by student and staff activists.[30] The encampment was the site of anti-Israel rallies, chanting, flags and banners and symbols. The University negotiated with the students for several weeks to vacate the encampment and to allow other students to use the space and, on 14 June 2024, ordered them to vacate. The encampment was disbanded in late June 2024 following major concessions by the University, discussed below.

On 2 May 2024, Vice-Chancellor Mark Scott said that the slogan "from the river to the sea, Palestine shall be free" – widely understood as a call for the elimination of the Jewish state, did not breach the institution's code of conduct and its use was the "discomfort" of maintaining free speech. He said that calls for an intifada against Israel did not meet the threshold for disciplinary action under the university code. He requested legal advice from the Federal Attorney-General on this matter, but that request was declined. He said that explicit calls for violence and endorsements of terrorism were banned.

On 6 May 2024, Hizb ut-Tahrir, a radical Islamist organisation proscribed as a terrorist organisation in the United Kingdom due to its glorification of terrorism, marched around the University of Sydney campus.[31] Hizb ut-Tahrir is the organisation behind its front-facing group Stand for Palestine, which is responsible for organising anti-Israel protests.[32]

In late May, further complaints were made directly to the university's senior executive leadership by University of Sydney 5A staff, concerning broader aspects of the harmful campus situation. A non-comprehensive list of key issues included complaints about: protests calling for violence; encampment activities that are hateful and intimidating; hateful posters on campus; hate speech on internal electronic discussion boards and all-staff distribution emails; external professional agitators on campus; and threats to the safety of Jews on-campus. The University's senior executive engaged with 5A staff, but the outcomes are best described as placatory inaction.

On 25 July 2024, the University of Sydney Academic Senate commissioned a review of campus antisemitism.[33] Mr Hodgkinson's expertise in workplace safety produced useful recommendations on campus safety. The most useful recommendations pertained to prohibiting disruption of lectures and to imposing penalties on student organisations for engaging in prohibited activities, such as posting banners outside designated areas or displaying offensive posters. His report also recommended a new standard compulsory standard of civility in academic discourse and a naive requirement for clarity and context in discourse. On 26 November 2024, the University Senate accepted in principle the Hodgkinson report recommendations. The recommendations are set out at Annex 3.

On 22 June 2024, the University agreed to a concessional deal with the encampment, comprising the University of Sydney Muslim Students Association, a major faction among the encampment protesters, together with Stand 4 Palestine. The agreement capitulated to demands for review of University of Sydney in engagements with military research and for military divestments from Israel.[34] Chair of the NSW Jewish Board of Deputies, David Ossip, said that "The University's engagement with the Jewish community has been thoroughly deceptive and insulting. Despite assurances to the Jewish community that any offer to the encampment was off the table and that the University would be pursuing alternate options to clear the encampment, the University instead reopened negotiations with a group dominated by Hizb ut-Tahrir. When we found out about these negotiations on Wednesday and formally requested immediate crisis talks, Mark Scott ignored this request and has still not picked up the phone to us .... No amount of mealy-mouthed pro forma spin from the University should be allowed to distract from the utter shame of the University's behaviour or the pathetic terms they have agreed to."[35]

On 20 September 2024, during a parliamentary inquiry, the Vice-Chancellor, Mark Scott, admitted that he had failed Jewish students and staff in his handling of anti-Israel protests and personally apologised for that failure.[36]

Antisemitism in NSW Schools

As with universities, antisemitism manifesting itself in schools is not a new phenomenon. It has been increasing since early in the twenty-first century but has also increased in intensity since 7 October. A qualitative, ethnographic study of antisemitism in government schools, undertaken by Zehavit Gross and Suzanne D. Rutland from 2009–2015, revealed significant problems of antisemitism in both the classroom and playground. As demonstrated by the Brighton Secondary Case, in Victoria, with five student plaintiffs who experienced antisemitic incidents from 2011–2020, it is, indeed, a whole school and a wider departmental problem.[37]

In 2023, the Blueprint Institute undertook to carry out a study of the prevalence and nature of antisemitism in New South Wales government schools, both primary and high schools among both teachers and administrators, and commissioned MyGov to undertake the research. While the questions and the design of the research were developed before the 7 October attack, the actual survey was carried out in November 2023. A total of 510 teachers responded, with 31 per cent coming from NSW and, overall, two-thirds responding coming from the secondary sector. Of those who responded, overall 24 percent responded positively to one or more of the three questions relating to antisemitism. In a summation of their findings, the authors of the report stressed that:

> The notion that antisemitism is a narrow issue, only present in the few schools that have a Jewish community, is refuted by the data. By way of example, in New South Wales, 17% of respondents from a broad, representative sample of public schools reported witnessing antisemitism. That stands in stark contrast to the three percent of schools in New South Wales that have at least one Jewish student.[38]

Downey et al (2024) also pointed out that "Our research suggests little has improved" since the findings of the Gross and Rutland study (2014)[39] in terms of antisemitism in government schools. They referred to recent media reports from both the private and public school sectors which provide insight into the antisemitism students continue to experience. For example, in Sydney, students at Knox Grammar, on Sydney's North Shore praised Hitler in a private Discord server called "Gang Gang."[40] At the prestigious Cranbrook School in the Eastern Suburbs where the majority of Sydney's Jewish population live, Jewish students were subject to antisemitic slurs and Nazi salutes.[41] At the nearby Rose Bay Secondary College, a student was told by another student that he would go back in time and become Hitler to "hunt down his family and stop the bloodline."[42] Jewish students and teachers at Waverley College, as on the East reportedly felt it necessary to transfer to escape the school's "strong culture" of antisemitism. As Downey et al (2024) state, these are just a few examples of this broader phenomenon.[43]

These issues have been further highlighted by recent doctoral research undertaken by Greg Keith through an in-depth online survey of 71 history teachers in NSW, followed by individual follow-up interviews of 20 teachers who agreed to be interviewed in person. The original focus an in-depth study of Holocaust education in the state and there was no specific question relating to antisemitism. Yet, to the surprise of the researcher, in response to a general question asking the teachers about the challenges they faced in teaching the Holocaust, about a third responded with "antisemitism" being one of the major challenges they were facing. These interviews were carried out during and after the period of the COVID-19 epidemic, a time of increased antisemitism as discussed above.

In his survey, Greg Keith asked for schools' postcodes, so that all schools were deidentified, but he did ask if they were government or private schools and whether they were co-ed or single sex. As he wrote in his findings, he identified three broad strands of antisemitism:

> ... the Muslim antisemitism of the south-western suburbs that manifests in boys' and co-ed public high schools with large numbers of Arabic-speaking students; Anglo antisemitism of the north shore and eastern suburbs, predominantly linked to exclusive private boys' and co-ed schools but also found in boys' and co-ed public high schools; and finally a previously undocumented strand of antisemitism that exists in students from the Croatian community of western Sydney and can be traced to an influx of Croatian migration post-World War II..[44]

These three strands represent the different iterations of antisemitism discuss above, and to understand the intensification of antisemitism post 7 October, it is important to recognise the different ethnic and political factors contributing to this upsurge.

Sydney Jewish Museum Holocaust Education

Holocaust education has been seen as an important tool to counter antisemitism among members of the NSW community and visits to the Sydney Jewish Museum (SJM) have been strongly promoted by the Jewish community leadership. However, as with all educational endeavours it is not a panacea and without proper structure and professional development, it can even be counterproductive.

For many years the SJM has been running professional development programs for NSW Holocaust educators. Research into Holocaust education in NSW has found that student visits to the SJM have been very effective in the past because of the central role played in speaking to the students by Holocaust survivors who have been 'an indispensable part of museum visits for many years'. Students consistently report that meeting a survivor is a highlight of their excursion to Holocaust museums, but as the generation of survivors becomes smaller each year, educators will need to explore the alternative options'. These include the use of digital testimony – be it online video testimony or "holographic" images.

The SJM has recognised this challenge, and it has developed Holographs with six key survivor guides, including the well-known Eddie Jaku, who wrote the book, The Happiest Man on the Earth. While it is too early too to be definitive, SJM museum educators have found to their surprise that this new technology is very effective and that the students respond well to this new format, asking many questions which normally fit into the vast repertoire of questions which museum staff developed for this new technology.

Research, reinforced by the newest study by Greg Keith, has demonstrated that this a real danger of just teaching about the period of the Holocaust, rather than also including material on Jewish life before the Holocaust and, importantly the rebuilding of Jewish life after the Holocaust – both in the Diaspora and in Israel. If this is not done, students are only aware of 'dead Jews'. The SJM is currently undergoing a major renovation with the aim of significantly expanding its displays of contemporary Jewish life.

Another key issue is the need for teachers to have good knowledge of teaching and learning about the Holocaust, both in terms of good content knowledge and effective pedagogy. Without those elements, teaching of the Holocaust, including visits to the SJM, will be less effective. The problem of inadequate teaching and learning about the Holocaust was revealed during the Brighton Secondary College case in Melbourne. The teaching of the Holocaust memoir, Maus, presented in cartoon form by Art Spiegelman, whose family survived in hiding during the Holocaust was part of the Year 9 [Stage 5] English curriculum at the school. However, students did not take the topic seriously, misbehaving in class and laughing in class about the story, with the class teacher failing to respond in an appropriate fashion. The plaintiffs and their witnesses complained that after the teaching of Maus, antisemitic incidents increased in the school. Indeed, the Year 9 coordinator found 11 swastikas carved into the desks in one classroom, which for the Jewish students in that class, some of whom had Holocaust background, was highly offensive. When they reported this inappropriate behaviour, including complaints to the principal, no action was taken and complaints even ignored. As Chief Justice Mortimer wrote in her judgement in the Brighton Secondary College case: 'The irony of imposing the study of Maus on BSC students while this kind of behaviour went on, and was dealt with inadequately and sometimes not at all, is a stark one.'[45]

In the final chapter of his thesis, Greg Keith examined the impact of professional development on the teaching of Holocaust education through interviews with teachers who had participated in the Gandel Program at Yad Vashem, which is tailored to the needs of Australian Holocaust educators. He wrote:

> As will be seen, significant professional development has the potential to increase teachers' impacts on their students. Graduates from the Gandel program at Yad Vashem seem to be less likely to make some of the mistakes that have appeared elsewhere in this research, namely setting unrealistic classroom goals and failing to adjust their content to suit those goals. They are also more likely to recognise antisemitism in the classroom and respond appropriately to it.[46]

He argues that the efficacy of Holocaust-related professional development for teachers has been under-researched, but his analysis found that that it definitely has led to improvements in the approach of Gandel graduates teaching about the Holocaust as opposed to those teachers who had not undertaken the program. He also found that local professional development can lead to improvements in teaching and learning approaches and, here again, the SJM can play an important role in assisting to make Holocaust education more effective.

Threats to NSW social cohesion presented by antisemitism

Increased antisemitism at both university and school level clearly has a negative impact on social cohesion. As stated in the executive summary of the Blueprint Institute's survey:

> It is important to note that a rise in antisemitism—or indeed the vilification or dehumanisation of any minority group—have been shown to be leading indicators of democratic backsliding and dehumanising levels of social cohesion. (sic) These are issues of critical importance to all Australians, regardless of race, background, or religion.[47]

This threat is highlighted by the annual mapping of social cohesion by the Scanlon Foundation. The Scanlon Foundation's 2023 Mapping Social Cohesion found that nearly 90 per cent of those surveyed agreed that "multiculturalism has been good for Australia", while 86 per cent agreed that "immigrants are generally good for Australia's economy". At the same time, the report found that "social cohesion is under pressure and declining". The report commented:

> Australia has been faced with a challenging set of circumstances in recent years. Since the end of 2019, we have experienced severe bushfires, COVID-19, severe floods and a cost-of-living crisis to name but a few, with no respite between events and in the midst of a world struggling with geopolitical tensions and conflict.[48]

The report found that there was a continuous decline from 2022 "in our sense of national pride and belonging, increasing financial strains and a weakening sense of social inclusion and justice were warning signs of further weakening in our social fabric" (O'Donnell, 2023, pp. 12-15). These findings resulted in the lowest score, of 79, since the Scanlon Foundation began its annual surveys. There was a decline in the sense of trust in other people, from 52 percent in 2022 to 47 percent in 2023, with a significant increase in a sense of pessimism in Australia's future, from 24 to 41 percent, in the same period. The report stressed that the decline in sense of belonging, combined with these issues, impacts negatively on people's happiness and wellbeing, reinforcing previous results.[49]

In the conclusion of the 2023 Mapping Social Cohesion report, O'Donnell (2023) noted that:

> At a global level, geopolitical conflict and tension is a risk to Australian harmony, as while we are (usually) geographically distant, we are connected to all sides of current conflicts through our migrant and ancestral diversity, as well as the diversity of our values and ideas (p. 97).

These factors are particularly pertinent to the events of 7 October 2023. The Hamas attack on the Israeli communities abutting the Israeli-Gaza border, as well as on the Nova Music Festival in the same region, saw 1,200 Israelis murdered with 251 being taken hostage. This was followed by an Israeli military response that greatly intensified social divisions in Australia. The way each of these issues have played out over the year following the Hamas attack has had a negative impact on Australian society both because of migrant diversity and differing values and ideas.

Commenting on these ongoing tensions to the media, Dr Bulent Hass Dellal, executive director of Multicultural Australia stressed:

> Our challenge is to try and break that cycle of hate, learn from history and to move forward," he said. "And I think as a nation we have been prepared to face those challenges because we, as a community, are very much engaged in developing good social policies and engagement. The challenge is to break that cycle of > discrimination and hate and conflict and [to ensure] we do not pass it on to a new generation of Australians.[50]

Within that that 'cycle of hate', NSW antisemitism has played a central role. Different strata of NSW society each has its own variety of antisemitism, whether religious, racial or political. Because of the multi-causal nature of antisemitism, emanating from the different groups and political entities in our society, finding solutions also requires and multi-faceted approach, with a recognition of these complexities and nuances.

To mark fifty years since Labor Minister for Immigration, Al Grassby, wrote his policy document introducing the concept multiculturalism in 1973, the 2023 Labor government decided to conduct a review of Australian attitudes to multiculturalism. In addition, the Federation of Ethnic Communities' Council of Australia (FECCA) conducted its own study to mark the fiftieth anniversary. Their aim was to "undertake a comprehensive reflection on the current state of multiculturalism from the perspective of from culturally and linguistically diverse (CALD) backgrounds".[51]

The government review acknowledged the current challenges discussed above. Its executive summary stressed that:

> Australia has experienced substantial changes since Grassby's speech in 1973. We are now facing a new era of uncertainty, where the beliefs and concepts we previously counted on for stability are being put into question by changing circumstances. This Review is vital in steering through these changes and moulding a positive future for coming [52]generations.

Similarly, the FECCA survey revealed a sense that the respondents did not feel that the state and federal governments adequately represented their needs with the survey finding that there was a very low trust in government.

There are clearly challenges in terms of how to move ahead and improve the situation for multicultural Australia. The federal government review enumerated 29 specific steps that were required to improve the situation and ensure that Australia continued to be a successful multicultural society. These were framed around three main concepts:

1. Connection - setting the foundations of a multicultural Australia through leadership, planning, and accountability between three tiers of government and communities.
2. Identity and belonging - creating a welcoming Australia through English language programs, citizenship policy, and participation in arts, culture, sports, and media.

Recommendations

The Australian Academic Alliance Against Antisemitism makes the following recommendations recognising the important role that the State of New South Wales legislature and Parliament have in combating racial hatred. The Parliament has legislative jurisdiction to establish legally binding frameworks and the executive has powers to institute improved governance to combat antisemitism. Universities and schools in NSW are constituted pursuant to and are subject to all state laws.

Recommendation 1 – stop racist messaging

There must be strict prohibition of and enforcement against school and campus defacement. Schools and universities must enforce and expand existing policies that prohibit and penalise the defacement of public spaces. Campuses should be cleared of unauthorised posters, flyers, megaphone use during class hours, and other physical disruptions. Campuses failing to do so within 24 hours of reporting should be subject to automatic financial penalties.

Recommendation 2 – policies required for online spaces.

As online spaces increasingly merge with physical environments, the boundaries between them have become increasingly blurred. Policies must ensure safety not only on physical campuses but also within virtual spaces. Universities and schools need to develop policies that ensure the safety of Jewish students and people not only on their physical campuses but also within virtual spaces.

Recommendation 3 – free speech education

Schools and universities must implement explicit educational measures to restore and protect free speech and academic freedom as defined in the Model Code for Jewish staff and students. Effective actions may include public debates, compulsory educational modules for all students and staff, and a requirement that coursework materials related to the Middle East present all sides of the conflict fairly and equally. Action to challenge and reverse normalisation of antisemitic discourse requires education.

Recommendation 4 – educate the educators

Professional development is key for school and university leadership, as well as teachers in schools and lecturers and tutors at university. It is important to acknowledge that Holocaust education should be only part of the educative process since it does not assist educators and management to understand the more modern manifestations of antisemitism. Professional development needs to also include effective pedagogy, especially at school level for Holocaust education. Such programs need to be ongoing because one-off programs cannot shift attitudes.

[53] Australian Government, Multicultural framework review – Australian government response, Canberra: Department of Home Affairs, 2024 https://www.homeaffairs.gov.au/about-us/our-portfolios/multicultural-framework-review/australian-government-response, p. 3.

Recommendation 5 – use a local approach

Research indicates that levels of antisemitism can vary both at school level, depending on sociocultural factors and geography, and there can also be differences at university level. School and university leaderships contribute to these differences. It is important to concentrate efforts on those educational institutes which report the highest level of antisemitic incidents, described by the Blueprint Institute as 'hotspots'.

Recommendation 6 – ensure enforcement action

The persistent gap between rhetoric and action — where schools and universities profess zero tolerance for antisemitism but take little to no concrete action to prevent it — must be addressed. Institutions must demonstrate the same level of commitment to tackling antisemitism as they have shown in addressing sexual harassment on university campuses. Institutions that demonstrate a pattern of failure should be subject to external correction, such as by financial penalties and placing under external administration.

Recommendation 7 – shine a light on foreign influence

Foreign political influence should be discoverable and transparent. Annual reports setting out all donations should be tabled in Parliament as part of university annual reporting. The NSW Auditor-General should conduct an investigation of foreign political influence in NSW universities. A report should then be tabled in the NSW Parliament for information and discussion of follow-up action.

Australian
Academic Alliance
Against Antisemitism

Quality of governance at Australian higher education providers

5A Submission to the Senate Education and Employment Legislation Committee

The Australian Academic Alliance Against Antisemitism (5A) is pleased to make this submission to the Senate Education and Employment Legislation Committee in relation to the inquiry into the quality of governance at Australian higher education providers. Governance quality can in part be measured by its effectiveness. For the reasons set out below, effectiveness has been found wanting in several respects.

Our submission addresses Clauses (c) and (e):

- Providers' compliance with legislative requirements, including compliance with workplace laws and regulations; and
- Any related matters

In the context of these clauses, our submission will first provide background about issues relating to antisemitism on campuses from the expertise and research survey of undertake in the first half of 2024, and then focuses on the following key areas:

- The need for stronger policies and enforcement mechanisms to address antisemitism on campus. Particularly, we discuss the inadequacy of the current approach to subsume antisemitism under racial discrimination policies.
- The inadequacy of disciplinary and complaints processes relating to antisemitic expression on campus. Existing mechanisms are not fit for purpose and fail to provide Jewish staff and students with effective avenues for redress.
- Issues relating to TEQSA and its failure to fulfil its role regarding these issues and university governance.

In this submission we shall argue that:

1. The complaints process needs to be strengthened by

    - Allowing for complaints to be made anonymously as a standard practice across all universities

- Committing to responding to complaints with a specified time scale
- Publicizing the results of the complaints process, (even if collated and anonymized).
- Having specially trained staff dealing with antisemitism complaints.

2. Universities should be required to have a robust social media policy, that prioritizes online safety. Consideration should be given to policies successfully adopted by other organisations to moderate the online activities of their staff.

3. Antisemitism training and awareness should be separate from antiracism education. Trying to fit education against antisemitism into the antiracism rubric is likely to make things worse, not better.

1. 5A credentials for making this submission

The Australian Academic Alliance Against Antisemitism (5A) is a non-profit organisation born in the aftermath of the brutal Hamas attack on 7 October 2023. The organisation has grown rapidly and today consists of members from across 32 Australian universities and medical institutions. 5A acts as the main body representing the voice of both Jewish and non-Jewish staff who are concerned about the emergence of antisemitism in the Australian tertiary sector, and about how university management and governance are dealing with this upsurge on campuses. 5A adheres to political neutrality, with members united only by their opposition to antisemitism. We hold no political stance regarding the Middle East conflict.

Our functional structure, from individual universities to state and national representatives, has enabled 5A to be quickly informed of incidents and to take appropriate action. The organisation's activities include university policy advocacy, antisemitism education and awareness outreach, academic advisory support for impacted students, and peer support. We engage in consultation and dialogue with regulators, policymakers, and university leadership to ensure that campuses are safe and inclusive for Jewish people.

We also advocate for the adoption of political neutrality within universities and for safeguards against the boycotting of Israeli academia. Our work is informed by research, data collection, and analysis in relevant fields.

Our members are on campus every day and are actively immersed in the campus culture and academic life. 5A is in the box seat to observe and comment on antisemitism on campus from first-hand knowledge.

This submission has drawn on the expertise in the areas of law, understanding antisemitism and survey development of several of our members who have contributed to the submission. It highlights the results of the survey which 5A undertook between 16 April and 31 July 2024:

https://www.aaaaa.org.au/5a-publications-1/antisemitism-in-australian-universities-post-7-october-survey-by-australian-academic-alliance-against-antisemitism-2025.[1]

This survey found that two-thirds of Jewish students and staff do not feel safe on Australian campuses and that the high proportion also believe that the response of the university management is not meeting the statutory requirements in terms of the codes of conduct.

The situation on campus: Across all these areas, both state-based and federally, 5A has found that the extent of antisemitism in the tertiary sector is deep and has become normalised. The information in the next section on antisemitism on Australian campuses is drawn from 5A's repository of large amounts of data, primarily gathered through individual interventions of support, as well as its national survey (Markus, Eilam and Rutland, 2025).

2: Background: Antisemitism on Australian campuses

Antisemitism is a light sleeper which has awoken with a vengeance on Australian University campuses, often justified under the cover of ant-Zionism. Since the Gaza conflict in May 2021, there has been an increase in the anti-Israel narrative on Australian campuses, with anti-Israel resolutions being passed and anti-Israel articles being published in campuses newspapers, together with the resultant uptick of antisemitic incidents. This leaves Jewish university students feeling vulnerable and under attack because as the late Chief Rabbi Jonathan Sacks explained:

> Antisemitism is a virus that survives by mutating. In the Middle Ages, Jews were hated because of their religion. In the 19th and 20th centuries they were hated because of their race. Today they are hated because of their nation state, Israel. Anti-Zionism is the new antisemitism.[2]

These problems have been highlighted by the Riazaty and Anor court case against the Melbourne University Student Union (MUSU) Federal Court Case; the ZFA/AUJS survey of February 2023; and the most recent 5A survey of April–July 2024, which found that (84%) perceive the political left as the major source of antisemitism on campus compared to only 37% concerned and very concerned about the political right. These are discussed in the following sections.

2.1 Riazaty & Anor v UMSU Inc - S ECI 2023 01945

The federal court action undertaken by Justin Riazaty, first plaintiff, and Isabella Yusupov, second plaintiff, against the Melbourne University Student Union (MUSU) related to two motions passed by the MUSU in April and August 2022, advocating for support for the Boycott, Divestment and Sanctions Movement. The Plaintiffs maintained that the Defendant's conduct in relation to these motions contravened the Associations Incorporation Reform Act 2021 (Vic) (AIR Act) in relation to discrimination against members of the union and the Racial Discrimination Act 1975 (Cth) (RDA Act) in relation to antisemitism. In February 2024, this dispute was settled out of court with the MUSU agreeing to remove the pro-BDS motions and to pay costs for the court action.

Despite this settlement, Australian student unions and the NTEU (as discussed later in this submission) have continued to pass pro-BDS motions, with more extreme motions being passed since 7 October. The negative impact of this situation is demonstrated in two surveys discussed in the sections 2.2 and 2.3.

2.2 Recent ZFA/AUJS survey pre-7 October 2023

Since the heightening of the Gaza conflict in May 2021, there has been an increase in the anti-Israel narrative on Australian campuses, with anti-Israel resolutions being passed and anti-Israel articles being published in campuses newspapers, together with the resultant uptick of antisemitic incidents. This leaves Jewish university students feeling vulnerable and under attack.

This has been demonstrated clearly by the survey initiated by the ZFA [Zionist Federation of Australia] with the support of AUJS [Australasian Union of Jewish Students] and the Scanlon Foundation, which was conducted by The Social Research Centre, located in Melbourne. As the report of this survey noted: 'The aim of the survey was to understand Jewish students' experiences of antisemitism in Australian universities.'[3] Carlill, Bren, Director of Public Affairs, Zionist Federation of Australia, 'The Jewish University Experience Survey', May 2023, Social Research Centre.

This survey was conducted over a three-week period with all students on the AUJS database receiving an invitation and the ZFA using its own resources for further publicity. Current and recent Jewish university students were included with a total of 563 responses, 396 from the AUJS mail-out and 167 from the opt-in link via the ZFA website. In terms of the participants, there were slightly more female responses than males (56.1% vs 41.9% with 1.6% non-binary); 46.2% were between the ages of 16–21, with most of the remainder ranging from 22–34; 52.2% came from Victoria, where the highest proportion of Jews reside, but proportionally there were fewer from New South Wales, with 30.7% and more from the ACT, with 6.9%, even though it only has a tiny Jewish population; and understandably the highest proportion from the different strands of Judaism being the Modern Orthodox Jews with 40.3% who constitute a much smaller proportion of the Australian Jewish population but are more clearly visible and strongly Zionist, with only 20.1% of Reform and 19.4% of traditional Jews and 8.2% of secular Jews.[4]

This survey was the first of its kind to be conducted in Australia. The survey's findings demonstrated many elements for concern in terms of Jews feeling safe and the experiences of Jewish students on campus.

Briefly, the findings revealed that 64% of Jewish university students experienced some form of antisemitism, with 88% of respondents reporting that this had occurred in the last 12 months. Of these, 47% described 'intimidation by people or events'; 37% relating to 'tropes of Jewish money, power or influence'; 37% 'comparing Israel to Nazi Germany'; 30% 'Holocaust denial or minimisation'; and 25% being 'singled out or excluded over Israel'. The fact that some university staff, both academic and professional participated in these events, while others did not act to counter this antisemitism, remaining silent bystanders, is also important in terms of those staff who support BDS. The fact that the survey found that 57% of students have hidden their Jewish identity to avoid facing antisemitism and that this rises to 67% for those who already experienced antisemitism is also very relevant and matches research of what is happening in Australian high schools. Another key fact is that overall, 19% of male students and 24% of female students have 'stayed away from campus to avoid antisemitism' and that 27% of those who have experienced antisemitism have stayed away from campus.

Finally, the survey found that Jewish students have a lack of confidence in the complaints process with 85% deciding not to make a complaint after the incident and, for the minority who did complain, 61% were dissatisfied with the outcome. The survey provided various reasons why students decided not to complain, with 61% citing their sense that it 'wouldn't make a difference' and 48% feeling that 'the university wouldn't take it seriously' with other reasons provided as well. The students did feel that if the university adopted a definition of antisemitism, they would feel more confident in making a complaint'.[5]

These findings were promoted by the ZFA and produced concern from various politicians at the federal level. However, despite expressions of concerns, there was no follow up by politicians or by the leadership of universities in Australia, and no practical steps were taken to rectify the situation,

It is important to note that current Jewish students would have either experienced or heard from friends about antisemitism in high schools, including anti-Zionism. In 2022, two Melbourne high schools received wide media publicity highlighting this problem: Cheltenham College and Brighton Secondary College (BSC), with the latter leading to five Jewish students who attended BSC from 2013-2020 taking the principal, Mr Richard Minack, two teachers and the Victorian Department of Education to court for racial discrimination and a failure of duty of care. In her judgement, Justice Mortimer found that 'there was a distinction in the way the applicants were treated by Mr Minack and, through his failures in leadership, the teachers and staff at BSC, which in turn impaired the applicants' human rights to security of person and protection, to education, and to preservation of their Jewish identity.'[6]

Thus, as a minority in Australia, with the Jewish population constituting less than 0.5 percent of the overall population, Jewish students feel under attack, with many feeling that they have to hide their religious and cultural identity. These problems have been intensified since 7 October 2023 and have been revealed by the 5A survey of April to July 2024, discussed in the next section.

2.3 5A Survey, 2024

As outlined above, in April 2024, The Australian Academic Alliance Against Antisemitism (5A) undertook to survey the extent of antisemitism in Australian universities, as experienced by students and staff after Oct 7 and the extent to which universities are taking active measures to ensure that their campuses are free from antisemitism.

Respondents were asked 'how safe do you feel on the campus?', with a five-point response option ranging from 'feeling very unsafe' to 'feeling very safe'.

A minority of 34% of respondents reported feeling 'safe' and 'very safe' on the physical campus and 32% in the virtual campus. Among staff, 17% indicated they felt 'very safe' on the physical campus, compared to 8% of students.

Combining 'feeling very safe' and 'feeling safe' on the physical campus obtains only 38% of students and 36% of staff reporting a sense of safety. Similar results were obtained for the virtual campus, 36% of students and 30% of staff reporting sense of safety.

Table 2.3.1 presents the percentage distribution of responses. Figure 2.3.2 presents a comparison between students and staff.

Table 2.3. Percentage distribution of sense of safety levels, by physical and virtual campuses (See Markus, Eilam and Rutland, 2025, p. 47, Table 5.7)

| | 1 Feeli very unsa | 2 Feelir unsaf | 3 Feelin somew at | 4 Feeling safe | 5 Feeling very safe |
|---|---|---|---|---|---|
| Safety on the physical campus | 12.9 | 21.5% | 31.6% | 24.7% | 9.4% |
| Safety in the virtual campus | 17.9 | 21.1% | 29.3% | 21.1% | 10.6% |
| Total unsafe virtual campus | | | 68.3% | | |

Markus, Eilam and Rutland, 2025, p. 48, Figure 5.11.

To provide a context for these findings, a 2021 National Student Safety Survey (NSSS) was conducted.[7] The objective of the survey, which was completed by 43,819 students, was to inform 'ongoing efforts of Australian universities in building equitable, safe and inclusive learning experiences for their students', with specific reference to sexual harassment and sexual assault.

The 2021 survey asked students to indicate their ''perception of university culture.' It obtained 84% agreement by domestic students and 81% by international students with the statement 'I feel safe when at [my university]'. Even this high rate was considered unacceptable, with Professor Mark Scott (VC, University of Sydney) commenting:

> Frankly, one case is one too many. To every person who has experienced sexual harassment or sexual assault, we are deeply sorry. Every student has the right to feel safe and supported and to be treated with respect and dignity, whether on campus, online or offshore. Anything less is unacceptable.

This compares with the 34% of Jewish respondents who reported feeling 'safe' and 'very safe' on the physical campus and 32% in the virtual campus in the 5A survey. The comparison reveals that the rate of those who reported a lack of safety for Jewish people on Australian campuses since October 2023 is 3.47 times higher than the rate of reported a lack of safety due to sexual harassment measured in 2021.

The 5A survey makes it clear that Jewish students are not just 'uncomfortable'; they are in fact scared to come onto campus. Why does the statement that 'Every student has the* right to feel safe and supported *and to be treated with respect and dignity' not extend to the Jewish student population?

In summary, the findings suggest that only a third (34%) of Jewish students and staff feel safe on campus. The rate of sense of lack of safety for Jewish people is 3.47 higher than the rate of sense of lack of safety due to sexual harassment. Both the physical and virtual campus environments are perceived as equally unsafe. This is due to a range of factors and issues, as discussed in Appendix I.

3. Legal regulatory context: Universities are failing to meet their statutory obligations.

Australian universities operate within a highly complex regulatory environment. Federal and state laws apply to them, some legislated specifically to regulate their academic activities, and others applicable generally to them as employers, workplaces, public spaces, speech platforms and community actors.

Federal laws legislated specifically to regulate the academic activities of tertiary education providers include the Higher Education Support Act (HES Act) and Tertiary Education Quality and Standards Agency Act (TEQSA Act). Federal laws applicable generally to universities as workplaces include the Racial Discrimination Act 1975 and Criminal Code.

Under the federal TEQSA Act (Section 58), Threshold Standards can be adopted by the Minister to set out requirements that a higher education provider must meet. Among the Threshold Standards are obligations to ensure a 'safe environment is promoted and fostered' (section 2.3.4) and 'an institutional environment in which freedom of speech and academic freedom are upheld and protected' (section 6.4.1). Under the federal HES Act, academic freedom requirements are to be met (section 19.15), and the higher education provider is to comply with TEQSA standards.

Under the federal *Criminal Cod*e, it is prohibited to urge violence against groups (section 80.2A), advocate terrorism (section 80.2C), to display proscribed hate symbols (section 80.2E), or to harass, threaten or distribute violent extremist material via a carriage service (section 474). Cyber-bullying is prohibited under the federal *Online Safety A*ct (section 46). Racial vilification is sought to be restrained under civil law provisions in the federal *Racial Discrimination A*ct 1975, where vilification is defined as an act that is reasonably likely to 'offend, insult, humiliate or intimidate' someone because of their race or ethnicity.

Australian universities are usually constituted under state laws, other than those universities located and constituted within Australian federal territories. Generally, a dedicated constitutive law, such as the *University of Sydney A*ct enacted by the NSW parliament, established the University and its fundamental structure. Other state laws are generally applicable to universities, including legislation on racial discrimination, racial vilification and equal opportunity, workplace safety, employee rights as well as criminal laws.

To take NSW as an example, the NSW Crimes Act 1900 provides that 'a person who by a public act intentionally or recklessly threatens or incites violence towards another person or group of persons … is guilty of an offence' (section 93Z). The Crimes Act also prohibits display of Nazi symbols (section 93ZA). Racial vilification is also restrained under civil law provisions in the NSW Anti-Discrimination Act 1977 (Part 2 Division 3A). Furthermore, municipal by-laws typically zone university campuses as public spaces that are subject to powers vested in the university administration to permit or restrict entry and conditions of entry.

Under their constitutive legislation, Australian parliaments have delegated sufficient powers to university administrations to enable them to adopt regulatory and policy frameworks to implement each university's academic mission. Typically, each university Council or Senate adopts regulatory frameworks, variously described as rules, codes of conduct, bylaws, procedures, policies, guidelines or principles. Typically, every university has a Student Code of Conduct, a Staff Code of Conduct and Campus Access Rules.

It is the contention of 5A that several Australian universities have failed to utilise the powers available to them in order to comply with the required standards set out by federal, state and territory legislation.

Failures of principal concern to 5A are those where university administrations have failed to fulfil their statutory obligations to ensure a safe environment in which to learn and teach and have failed to protect academic freedom. Moreover, they have declined to act under the powers available to them to restrain racial vilification, threats of violence against groups, or distribution of violent extremist material.

4. The need to restructure the complaint and disciplinary system

Our survey revealed that many Jewish staff and students have no confidence in the university complaint system.

Students were asked whether they understood 'complaint procedures if you encounter antisemitic content in lectures or course materials.'
48% of students reported no knowledge of the complaint procedures, while 34% indicated understanding.

Staff were asked whether they understood the complaint procedures if they encountered 'antisemitic comments or behaviour by colleagues, students, or other staff members.' In a near reverse of student responses, 28% of staff reported no knowledge, while 56% indicated understanding.

4.1 Confidence in the Complaint System

The participants were asked:

- 'Do you consider that complaints procedures are adequate at your university?'
- 'Have you ever lodged a complaint?' and
- 'Are you confident that you can lodge a complaint without risking discrimination against you or other negative impacts?'

Concerning the adequacy of the complaint system, 45% responded that the system is not adequate, and only 16% considered it adequate.
In relation to lodging a complaint, a majority of 67% reported they had never lodged a complaint, and 32% had lodged a complaint.

Regarding confidence in the system, 51% reported no confidence and 27% reported confidence. This finding was benchmarked against the NSSS survey (Heywood et al., 2022), where students were asked about their confidence in reporting incidents of sexual harassment and assault. Only 23.5% reported a lack of confidence ('Not at all/Slightly'), which is less than half the proportion (51%) of Jewish participants reporting a lack of confidence in lodging a complaint without risking discrimination or other negative impacts.

Chi-square analysis was conducted to compare student and staff responses. Significant differences were found in response to the question: 'Do you consider that complaint procedures are adequate at your university?' A significantly higher number of staff rated the procedures as inadequate ($\chi^2 = 6.15$, $p = 0.0463$). Another significant difference was found in response to: 'Have you ever lodged a complaint?' A significantly higher number of students reported that they had never lodged a complaint ($\chi^2 = 11.75$, $p = 0.0028$). The Figure below presents the percentages of response distribution.

Australian
Academic Alliance
Against Antisemitism

Seventy-three per cent of students reported that universities fail to provide a definition of inappropriate political content in lectures and course materials; 47% of students and 28% of staff reported that they do not understand the complaint system; 45% of participants do not regard the complaint system as adequate; and 67% have never lodged a complaint.

A majority of 51% of participants reported having no confidence in the complaint system. This compares to only 23.5% who reported a lack of confidence in the complaint processes for incidents of sexual harassment and sexual assault (Heywood et al., 2022).

A comparison between students and staff revealed statistically significant differences, with a higher number of staff rating the complaint procedures as inadequate, and more staff having lodged complaints compared to students. These findings are expected, given that staff are employed by universities over many years, making them more familiar with administrative procedures and more likely to lodge complaints over the course of their careers.

Overall, the findings reveal a stark contrast between the level of antisemitism experienced by Jewish people on campus—67% reported hearing antisemitic comments and 93% reported witnessing antisemitic expressions delegitimising the right of Israel to exist—and their level of trust in their universities' systems to protect them, with only 27% reporting confidence that they could lodge a complaint without risking discrimination. Taken together, the findings indicate a system failure in preventing antisemitism. As highlighted in our recommendations discussed below, there figures reveal a lack of effectiveness relating to the quality of governance and management at Australian universities which need to be addressed.

In summary, there are several serious issues which need to be addressed:

- It is essential that there be the confidence that one can report anonymously. Many Jewish students are worried about the impact on their grades if they report incidents of antisemitism, and staff (especially junior staff) about what a report may do to their prospects of career advancement.
- Another crucial issue will be overcoming the lack of feedback in a reasonable time frame. Universities should publish a commitment to respond to a complaint within a specified timeframe
- It will take significant reform to overcome the lack of confidence that any action will be taken.

4.2 Online safety

It is recognised that Universities have taken action to reign in some of the unacceptable behaviour on campus such as encampments, occupation of buildings etc. However, as the survey makes clear, the online environment is not safe for Jewish students and staff. Universities do not have clear guidelines as to the use of social media by staff and students. Often lecturers post anti-Israel rhetoric that can slip into antisemitic tropes on their social media accounts and students become aware of their antipathy towards Israelis and Australian Jewish Zionists. This creates a sense of menace for Jewish students who may be interested in the taking the lecturer's course.

Some examples include a lecturer declaring that 'If you are a Zionist you have no claim or right to cultural safety'. Jewish (and non-Jewish!) students are entitled to subscribe to a Zionist ideology (and in fact surveys show that most Australian Jews do consider themselves Zionists in terms of Israel's right to exist). This declaration was not considered by a university as sufficient to disqualify that lecturer from teaching. Our interpretation of this is that because the declaration was made on social media not controlled by the university, that the university could not or would not take any action.

Other egregious examples are online intimidation, including threats to target individuals because of their Israeli nationality. Once again, universities claim that they have no control over the behaviour of staff and students on social media platforms outside of the university. This has allowed online hate to grow and become more extreme.

We note that students and staff do not have the luxury of simply ignoring the social media, as this has become an integral part of the teaching and learning environment and students who do not participate will miss out on important interactions.

We believe that the university sector needs to recognise that lecturers and teachers have special responsibility to ensure in their posts that they maintain civility and an awareness of the sensitives of their students. Many other professions restrict what people can post (such as journalists, judges, policeman etc). The online space needs to be policed much more closely. Lecturers should not feel free to post whatever they like on social media without considering how this may affect their interactions with fellow staff and students. Issues of free speech, of course, need to be respected, but being a university lecturer is a privilege which comes with added responsibilities.

We urge the inquiry to demand that each university develop and enforce a robust social media policy for its staff and students. It should apply whether the posts acknowledge their university affiliation or not, and it should put safety of students and staff as the top priority.

4.3 Antisemitism education and training

Most universities are now considering the introduction of some form of training for staff and students to combat antisemitism. Most commonly this is taking place under the rubric of an anti-racism policy and often without adequate involvement of Jewish staff and students with personal lived experience of campus antisemitism. As Professor Timothy Lynch of the University of Melbourne writes in The Australian (31 July 2025):

'The more anti-racist we are trained to be, the more anti-Semitic we seem to have become. Campuses that have prioritised '"cultural safety" find their Jewish staff and students have never felt less safe, culturally and physically.'

There is a misanthropic theme in the anti-Zionist narrative, which can transform into a simplistic understanding among both staff and students that: 'Zionism is a form of racism. Most Jews are Zionists. Therefore, most Jews are racist'. Despite the highly problematic nature of this attitude, it has increasing gained levels of currency within the Australian universities' culture. What is clear is that whatever the benefits of anti-racism education, it is proving ineffective at countering antisemitism.

5. TEQSA: inadequate responses

Need a definition of antisemitism

Both the Jewish student survey off the first half of 2023 conducted by the ZFA/AUJS and the 5A survey of the first half of 2024 found that there was a need for a clear definition of antisemitism. To date the only definition of antisemitism which has formal authority is the IHRA (International Holocaust Remembrance Alliance) definition, which was adopted by the IHRA in Bucharest in 2016. It has now been adopted by 37 countries, including Australia, and hundreds of NGOs, each with its own interpretation and policy. It is strongly supported by Jewish communities throughout the world, including Australia. The IHRA definition stresses that 'criticism of Israel similar to that levelled against any other country cannot be regarded as antisemitic'. While traditionally the Australian Jewish leadership view has been that Jews in the Diaspora have no right to criticise Israeli government policies, this has changed radically in recent years. In 2023, Australian Jewish leaders expressed criticism of the current Netanyahu government and the government's planned judicial reform. The responses to recent 'Crossroads23' survey of Australian Jews reflect this new trend in Australian Jewish relations with Israel. Thus, legitimate criticism of Israeli government policies is not antisemitic.

Anti-Israel activists on campus claim that the IHRA definition stifles free speech and have called for the Universities who have adopted the IHRA to reverse their policy. In response to these concerns, the leadership of the Go8 developed their own definition, which was accepted by Universities of Australia, known as the UA Definition of Australia.

However, any casual observer will report that the activists have been allowed to express themselves freely. Rarely have students been disciplined no matter how extreme or offensive their language. Many universities have allowed the activists free reign on campus, claiming 'freedom of speech' and only acting when their occupation of buildings and grounds became intolerable. Activists who oppose the IHRA have also opposed the alternative UA definition.

Thus far, TEQSA has failed to make a positive determination in relation to the UA Definition of Antisemitism. Nor has the regulator provided a guidance note on managing the complaints or activities that occur on campus because of the Middle East conflict. Academic integrity and the need for inclusive pedagogy and teaching quality have not been considered sufficiently by university management, although the survey did find that this differed across university campuses, depending on internal management policies.

Issues of concern regarding health and wellbeing have already been highlighted in the detailed responses of both Jewish staff and students discussed above, yet where concerns have been submitted, there has not been a response based on their cohort's specific needs and health and wellbeing issues. The same has applied to the newly established student ombudsman. Some moves have been made to identify Jewish students and staff as a cohort that requires additional support to feel safe and supported, but more needs to be done. As discussed above, the 5A survey has revealed that most do not feel comfortable to make complaints for fear of identification and adverse consequences. As well, the strong sense that even when they do complain, in some universities, management might express concern, but do not take positive action.

In early June 2025, 5A sent a letter of complaint regarding the University of Sydney and AIJAC (Australia/Israel Jewish Affairs Council) wrote a letter of complaint regarding the University of Melbourne without meaningful response. Recently the government has increased TEQSA's ability to act.

Much more action needs to be undertaken in this domain to improve the quality of university governance relating to issues of safety for Jewish students and staff on campuses and the role which TEQSA plays in terms of these issues.

6. Concluding recommendations

Antisemitism is a cancer. It erodes the fabric of our society and poisons social cohesion and tolerance. We naively believed that Australia was somehow vaccinated against this disease, but in the aftermath of Oct 7, with the outpouring of anti-Zionist and antisemitic sentiment we can no longer put our heads in the sand and assume that this is a problem that will go away without a concerted effort. Ground zero for the hearts and minds of our future leaders are on our campuses. There is no doubt that the rights of Jewish students to enjoy their education and those of Jewish staff to make a meaningful contribution to research and teaching is under threat.

Based on the survey's findings, 5A makes the following recommendations:

- Universities must demonstrate the same level of commitment to preventing antisemitism as they have shown in addressing sexual harassment.
- Adopt a definition of antisemitism, as understood by most Jewish people, treating this as non-negotiable.
- Establish a confidential and centralised antisemitism complaint system with trained staff.
- Create educational mandated modules on antisemitism for all stakeholders separate from the current compulsory anti-racism modules,
- Ensure the safety of Jewish people not only on physical campuses, but also within virtual spaces by adopting a clearer social-media policy.
- Restore and protect freedom of speech for Jewish students and staff, through initiatives such as university-led public debates.
- Undertake further research to systematically evaluate university actions and identify effective practices (see Markus, Eilam and Rutland, 2025, pp. 70-1 for a more detailed discussion)

These recommendations demonstrate that, despite some progress, much more needs to be done in terms of the quality of governance at Australian universities if all campuses are to be safe for Jewish students and staff. We cannot allow our campuses to be no-go zones for Jews.

Examples of academic experiences – national overview

Since 7 October 2023, the 5A has documented ongoing examples of antisemitism and discrimination against Jewish staff and students and multiple occasions in which the freedom of speech, and the academic freedom to use public academic spaces for their intended purposes have been forcefully denied. While academic freedom of speech for those who wish to express support of Israel's right to exist is being denied, no limits are put on antisemitic hate speech on campuses across Australia.

This hate speech takes different forms including:

- Pro-Palestinian posters which deny Israel's right to exist, accuse Israel of carrying out a genocide in Gaza and expressing support for Hamas;
- Interrupting classes for a pro-Palestinian harangue which often includes hatred to anyone who supports Israel's right to exist;
- Protests and marches calling for global intifada and that violent resistance is by Palestinians is justified.
- Refusal to condemn Hamas and indeed justifying its actions on 7 October.
- Encampments, which become excluded places for Israeli, Jews and supporters of Israel, preventing their freedom of movement on campus.
- Lecturers making emotive and political statements, rather than presenting information objectively, with balanced criticism of Israel rather than vilification.
- Both Jewish staff and students being affected by the 'deafening silence' after 7 October, the cancelling of friendships, exclusion of Jews, and doxxing, not only through the well-known academics and creatives WhatsApp group in February 2024, but also in the case of individual academics at one university.
- In some cases, both staff and students have been physically attacked, and while physical abuse is (fortunately) rare, it is the knowledge of such cases combined with the verbal abuse and threats that creates fear of Jews on campus, whether they are staff or students.

All these actions are prejudicial to safety and well-being of Jewish staff and students, so that many do not feel safe on campus, as has been so clearly revealed by the 5A Survey of 2024, as well as the earlier ZFA/AUJS survey.

Below is an outline of some of the key issues that 5A has been dealing with since its formation. These include providing academic advice to students affected by antisemitism, dealing with boycotts of visiting academics, and lecturers making political and unfounded statements.

We present below some examples of what has been happening on campus which have been clearly demonstrated in both the quantitative and qualitative findings of the 5A survey.

Reports from Academic Advisors

5A works to advise and support students and staff affected by antisemitism on campus. We voice their stories here so that there is no doubt that we are facing a very serious problem and we request the current inquiry take this into consideration when considering university governance and management procedures. There is also no doubt that the current situation post 7 October 2023 poses a mental health threat to Jewish students. This was recognised by Dr Grant Blashki, GP, Associate Professor at the University of Melbourne who developed a mental health guide for Jewish students.

Reports from advisors reveal a new form of antisemitism which is taking its toll on the mental health of Jewish students, characterised by high levels of microaggression, and exclusion from social media and student associations.

One prominent example is the Australian Medical Students Association (AMSA). These groups are set up with the intention of exchanging relevant information to the discipline, and not for political purposes. However, time and time again, we find that the platforms are hijacked by members and used not for their intended purposes. Very quickly they turn into a megaphone for antisemitic anti-Zionist propaganda. In all instances, the posts on these sites are highly offensive to Jews and exhibit a complete lack of empathy for the suffering of Israelis. This is an obvious microaggression, as it assumes that the feelings of Jewish students in the group should not be considered. To make the point clear, this behaviour is equivalent to posting a critique against Ukraine, knowing that there is a Ukrainian in the group, or the opposite, critiquing Russia, knowing that there is a Russian in the group. In most professional groups, no one would dream of displaying such microaggression, particularly not in relation to minorities such as the Indigenous Australians (consisting 3.8% of Australia's population compared to 0.4% Jews). However, to use David Baddiel's terminology, when it comes to Jewish members in the group, they simply 'don't count.'

In addition to direct aggression against students, one common form of harassment is conducted through the weaponizing of the Disciplinary Complaint system to silence Jews.

One particularly insidious expression of this comes about through a ping-pong exchange where the aggressors perform an aggressive act against Jews, and when the victims respond, the aggressors turn the tables around, accusing the initial victim and instead claiming to be the victim. Consequently, Jewish students or staff are attacked twice, first through microaggression, and secondly by the aggressors presenting themselves as the victims of the Jewish students or staff, accusing them of aggression. The next stage in this scenario is when Jewish persons try to defend themselves, either by answering back or asking to remove some posts. This is usually followed by a herd reaction of accusing the Jewish student(s). Often, these exchanges end with the aggressors submitting a complaint against Jewish student(s) for being 'aggressive.' University disciplinary processes tend to side with the provocateurs, so that the pro-Palestinians are free to condemn Israel without fear of challenge.

For example, when a Jewish student walked through the lawn where the Monash pro-Palestinian students were encamped, he was verbally attacked, screaming in his ear with a megaphone causing him tinnitus. He then received a disciplinary complaint from the university, based on the protesters' complaint, accusing him of causing the protesters distress and discomfort. True, after watching the videos of the incident, the complaint was eventually dismissed by the university investigators, and the university initiated a complaint against the student protesters; however, the student had to endure the stress of the disciplinary process and seek legal advice as to how to defend himself.

In another instance a Jewish student at Monash confronted another student wearing a shirt and a necklace effectively calling for the destruction of Israel. In this case the University found that the Jewish student had breached rules by challenging the content of the tee shirt. It seems that Israel and Jews can be smeared and insulted with impunity and if Jewish students challenge their critics, the University apparatus moves against them.

The harassment is not limited to the University campus but extends to hospital medical training facilities. Student reports:

> As someone who is Israeli, sure you can say that anti-Zionism is not antisemitism but being Israeli and seeing someone posting a picture of the Israeli flag being crossed out, to me it reads that I don't have the right to exist, or I am cancelled.
> A few days after the 7 October massacre, I had the courage to post a few things on Instagram… I received condemning messages from someone from the Medical School telling me that it is misinformation that Hamas kidnapped people to Gaza and that I don't have empathy to Palestinians (I didn't post anything against Palestinians. It is actually important to me that Palestinians will have good life). She told me that I think that every Muslim person is a terrorist. There is > a problem with me calling people terrorists (I haven't used the word 'terrorist'). She also told me that when I become a medical doctor, I need to register conflict of interest, and to make sure that my patients to which I have no empathy, know what my political stances are*. This was said even though I did not disclose my political stances, apart from my grief over the 7 October massacre.*

> They would tell me I have been brainwashed, that I have no empathy and that me in any way opposing the Palestine movement is extremely Offensive to them. They will put a complaint in to [sic] the Medical School against me because they would be worried about my competency as a doctor.

The coping mechanism, understandably, involves making oneself a small target:

> Firstly, I lie, and I don't tell anyone I'm Israeli and I don't tell anyone that I'm Jewish. If the topic does come out, I pretend to have opinions that I don't necessarily have. I try to say what people would accept as the right thing to say, and try to avoid the conversation all together, and also avoid socialising. So, I am far less social than I used to be, just in case the conversation does come up. This all comes with a high price. I cry a lot. I feel scared and very unwell…
> Even though I don't disclose my views, I know that some students who know that I am Jewish, have distanced themselves from me…

This interview and the many others held by us, as well as the detailed comments by participants of the 5A survey (see part 3 of the 5A submission), speak volumes about the isolation and discrimination experienced by Jewish students. In the case of the Jewish and Israeli medical students, their distress is exacerbated by the fear that any Disciplinary Complaints against them could adversely affect their future in the medical profession.

As well, Universities have struggled with their responsibilities regarding maintenance of student privacy and confidentiality on the one hand and the maintenance of staff and student safety on the other, and in many instances, it is the privacy concerns that trump actions that would ensure a safe campus. This was made clear for example in the case of students who invaded private spaces while masked being able claim that their privacy had been violated in the use of computer records to identify them for the purposes of disciplinary action, with some regulatory agencies siding with the students. It is not possible for universities to ensure freedom from intimidation of their staff if they are unable to remove aggressive students and staff following a proper investigation. Freedom of speech cannot be allowed to morph into the freedom to intimidate, harass or make it impossible for staff to carry out their regular duties without fear. TEQSA needs to take the principled stance that it expects Universities to prioritize staff and student safety and expects Universities to resist attempts to misuse the concerns about privacy to allow students to intimidate without fear of any consequences.

The negative impact of academic boycott and BDS (Boycott, Divestment and Sanctions)

Both student and staff motions that have been passed since 7 October at several universities promote the Boycott, Divestment and Sanctions (BDS) movement,[8] which advocates for the one Palestinian state through its slogan 'From the River to the Sea, Palestine shall be free' and the right of return for all Palestinian refugees. The BDS website sets out its goals as follows:

- Ending its occupation and colonization of all Arab lands and dismantling the Wall.
- Recognizing the fundamental rights of the Arab Palestinian citizens of Israel to full equality.
- Respecting, protecting, and promoting the rights of Palestinian refugees to return to their homes and properties as stipulated in UN Resolution 194.[9]

As Cary Nelson explains:

> The entire arc of Middle East history confirms fear of that outcome and its antisemitic consequences. The BDS movement's third demand is thus one to which no imaginable Israeli government would agree. Despite the BDS movement's claim to nonviolence, only Israel's defeat in war could lead to a single state with a Jewish minority.[10]

Omar Barghouti, the founder of the BDS movement, has declared that 'accepting Israel as a 'Jewish State' on our land is impossible' and that the only solution is 'euthanasia' for Israel'.[11] Together with statements of other key figures, the movement makes it quite clear that its aim is the eradication of Israel. The UMSU Motions, with their promotion of BDS, support this aim of the 'destruction of the Zionist entity'. Given that 45.8% of world Jewry now live in Israel,[12] this goal could only be achieved through violence and militarism. Most Jews would be aware of this threat.

It is entirely understandable Jewish students or staff in the room where motions in support of BDS would feel threatened both physically and psychologically at this message. They certainly cannot feel welcome in the student union which passes motions supporting the BDS.

The ferocity of the BDS campaign, and its accusations of racism, colonialism, apartheid, ongoing crimes, ethnic cleansing, massacres, and expulsions are extreme and one-sided. This ferocity led the German Bundestag to define the BDS as an 'antisemitic enterprise' in 2019. Several state governments in the US have also passed anti-BDS laws, and BDS has been criticised in the UK. Australia has not introduced anti-BDS legislation but governments on both sides of the aisle have stated that they do not support BDS.

This background needs to be born in mind in the discussion of 4.3, where some specific cases which the 5A has become aware of are outlined.

Perceptions of Universities' Policies and Procedures

To gain insights into universities' actions against antisemitism, a series of questions were presented. Participants were asked to rank their universities' actions and indicate: the provision of relevant information; their understanding and assessment of the complaint system; whether they had lodged a complaint; and their level of trust in the system.

The participants were asked: 'Do you think that your university's management is taking sufficient actions against antisemitism and ensuring that campuses are safe and inclusive for Jews?' Participants were asked to rank their universities' actions on a scale ranging from 0= Not taking any actions against antisemitism to 10= Taking sufficient actions against antisemitism.

The findings revealed that 60% of participants rated their universities' actions between 0 and 3, indicating insufficient action taking by their universities. At the other end of the scale, only 17% ranked their universities between 7 and 10, indicating sufficient action taking.

This result was benchmarked against the NSSS survey, where students responded to the statement: '[My university] is trying hard to protect the safety of all students.' A combined 74.5% indicated 'strong agreement' or 'agreement', and another 9.9% indicated 'strongly disagree' or 'disagree' with this statement (Heywood et al., 2022, p. 74). The comparison suggests that students were 4.4 times more likely to report that university management takes sufficient action to protect against sexual harassment than to protect the safety of Jewish people on campus.

However, as noted by Markus, Eilam and Rutland, 'Overall, the findings suggest that while in general, universities in Australia rank low on their actions against antisemitism, they are not homogenous in their responses, as perceived by the participants' (p. 52).

Understanding Anti-Zionism

Australian Zionists include most Australian Jews, with surveys indicating between 80[13] and 91%[14]. This proportion is similar to that which is found in the Jewish diaspora throughout the world. Moreover, Israelis as a national group are overwhelmingly Zionist, and they comprise almost half the global Jewish population.

Zionism is the belief, grounded in centuries old Jewish prayer, as well as being held by many people not of the Jewish faith, in the Jewish right to self-determination in their own indigenous land just like all other peoples on earth. That right is embedded in the UN Charter. But over three thousand years ago, well before the UN was conceived, the Children of Israel lived in the land. Clearly, the State of Israel today plays a very important part in Jewish identity generally.

Anti-Zionism is the belief that all peoples, but not the Jewish people, are entitled to self-determination in their own indigenous land.

Singling the Jewish people out as alone not having a right to self-determination, a theme that has been normalised in the academy, and now in the public square, makes Jewish citizens unsafe.[15]

1. Summary

The Australian Academic Alliance Against Antisemitism (5A) is pleased to have the opportunity to make this submission to the 2024 Senate Inquiry into the Bill for an amendment to the hate crimes provisions of the Commonwealth Criminal Code.

This submission argues for a new federal crime of incitement to racial hatred, in addition to the currently proposed amendments. Part 1 of this submission provides background to our organization and seeks to share our knowledge of antisemitic hate crime on campus. Part 2 argues that our proposed changes are consistent with norms on freedom of speech and academic freedom. Part 3 outlines the approach and scope of this submission, including distinctions between hatred, incitement to hatred, incitement to violence, and expressions of academic freedom. Part 4 sets out the 5A proposal for incitement to racial hatred as a new provision in the Criminal Code. Part 5 comments on amendments currently proposed in the Bill, suggesting points of clarification. Part 6 suggests additional amendments to hate crimes provisions in the Criminal Code, particularly the removal of good faith defences and the expansion of the prohibition on terrorist act advocacy to include prohibition of glorification of terrorism. Part 7 summarizes this submission's conclusions.

5A is keen to see improvements in Australian hate crimes legislation that will clarify its application. However, there is no need to improve laws that are never implemented. Excellent legislation can often be found in dark illiberal places, where it is ignored. In Australia, the recent rapid breakdown of social cohesion has been facilitated by a concerning decline in the rule of law concerning hate crimes. Rigorous, consistent and predictable enforcement of the law is necessary to ensure that law can help to prevent hateful behavior. The neglect of enforcement against recent hate crimes is a cause for anxiety not only among members of 5A but also all members of the Australian community reliant upon the rule of law and social cohesion.

2. Who we are and credentials for making this submission

The Australian Academic Alliance Against Antisemitism (5A) is a non-profit organisation born in the aftermath of the brutal Hamas attack on Israel on 7 October 2023. The organisation has grown very quickly, and today consists of 290 academics and professional staff from across 29 Australian universities. 5A acts as the main body representing the voice of both Jewish and non-Jewish staff who are concerned with the emergence of antisemitism on their campus in the Australian tertiary sector.

Our functional structure, from individual universities to state and federal representatives, has enabled the executive to be informed quickly of incidents and to take appropriate action. The organization's reach includes activities in education, outreach, academic advisor and peer support, anti-Israeli and BDS activity, responding to the media, supporting the legal and medical groups, advocating for Jewish academics and professionals in their sectors, responding to media misinformation, strategy and policy, including advocating with the sector regulators and individual University executives, as well as tertiary sector membership bodies, and supporting individual students across all levels in responding to their own adverse experiences of antisemitism and bias in the classroom, publications and professional trajectories.

Our members are on campus every day and are actively immersed in the campus culture and understanding of the intersections between academic freedom and hate crimes. 5A is in the box seat to comment on antisemitic hate crimes on campus from first-hand expert knowledge. Among our members are legal academics, some of whom are also legal practitioners with professional experience in drafting or litigating hate laws in Australia (under the federal Racial Discrimination Act section 18C, and in Australian state jurisdictions).

3. Approach and scope of submission

In accordance with the 5A mission, our focus in this submission is on the hatred of Jews (antisemitism) as experienced in academia. Therefore, this submission does not address proposed changes to the Criminal Code on issues other than antisemitism.

Antisemitism

The definition of antisemitism used in this submission is that adopted by the Commonwealth of Australia, namely the International Holocaust Remembrance Association (IHRA) working definition, which states that:

> "Antisemitism is a certain perception of Jews, which may be expressed as hatred toward Jews. Rhetorical and physical manifestations of antisemitism are directed toward Jewish or non-Jewish individuals and/or their property, toward Jewish community institutions and religious facilities."

The IHRA working definition has been adopted by Australia. The IHRA engaged in far-reaching negotiation and consultation to develop the working definition, which is accepted by the vast majority of Jews and by many of the world's democracies. It would be desirable to incorporate this into the law in Australia, such that cases do not deteriorate into debates about whether the action in question is in fact antisemitism.

This working definition provides relevant contemporary examples to assist in its application. While it is clear that it is not antisemitic to criticise the state of Israel, its government or policies, criticism easily becomes hatred in the public domain. The simplest litmus test for antisemitic responses to Israel is to consider if the same standard that is being used to judge Israel is used to judge other states. If our condemnation of Israel is based on our belief that Jews are money-hungry, then this is not fair criticism. If we proclaim as facts only that information provided by Palestinians, or ignore the legitimate right of a state to defend itself, we are engaging in antisemitism.

Antisemitism has been called "the longest hatred" because Jews have been singled out for unsavoury treatment throughout time. Not that long ago, Jews were victims of genocide in the Nazi Holocaust. Many Australians still suffer from trauma and PTSD from the embedded experience. This means that Jews are very attuned to calls for their genocide ("From the River to the Sea" and "Palestine will be Free [of Jews]". They know that slogans do not take long to turn into violence. Allowing these statements at universities and elsewhere, poses a clear threat of violence directed at a specific target – Australian Jews.

The recent events in the Middle East, particularly the pogrom on Jews on October 7th 2023, saw an unprecedented level of brutality in its killing, raping, maiming of over 1200 Israeli civilians (peaceniks, babies, children, the elderly and others in between) and the taking of over 250 hostages, 101 of whom are held in custody today. Instead of garnering the support and sympathy that one would expect that the Jewish community would be in need of, in some quarters the terrorists were cheered. People at Sydney Opera House heard "gas the Jews" or "where are the Jews". Threatening to kill Jews, as well as others, or seeking them out for special mistreatment, is a clear example of race hatred.

Conforming to the scope of the inquiry concerning changes to provisions of the federal Criminal Code, our submission does not address other legal provisions against racial hatred beyond those encompassed in the Criminal Code. Therefore, it does not address police failures to implement existing federal criminal laws. Nor does it address non-criminal breaches of federal legal obligations by universities failing to discharge their administrative and educational duties, other than in relation to their duties to prevent crime.

An area of hate crime law included in the Criminal Code but not addressed in this submission is online hate crime. The power of online platforms lies in their reach - a single piece of harmful content can quickly circulate to thousands, inciting mass harassment or targeted attacks. It can have immediate, tangible consequences, disrupting individuals' daily lives and sense of security, inciting actual violence, affecting livelihoods, reputations, and loved ones. Thus, online hate can have the same damaging effects as advocacy, incitement or threats made in person. Nevertheless, Australian law in this space is fragmented, complex and confused. Therefore we have not addressed its relationship to the currently proposed Hate Crimes Bill.

Antisemitic hate in academia

As this committee noted in its report on 4 October 2024, upon concluding its inquiry into antisemitism on university campuses, Australian universities are experiencing a steep rise in antisemitism. This was exacerbated by the anti-Israel university encampments. People at university encampments argued that their acts were not intended to do harm towards Jews but, nonetheless, those who urged exclusion of Jews were inciting hatred. They forced many students and staff to stay away from the universities because they did not feel safe. Barging into classrooms and addressing students, or harassing Jewish staff as they are lecturing, is extremely threatening behaviour. Many reported feeling that they were being forced out of the university or that they were unable to perform properly as students or staff. Although the quantum of actual violence was low, the incidents were of sufficient frequency that every Jewish person and many non-Jewish students and staff felt unprotected and that they could be a serious victim of violence at any point.

Governmental interventions in response to antisemitism on campus can be conceived of across a range of measures from criminal law to educational training, illustrated in the Table 1 according to a hierarchy of legal consequences, from criminal penalties to remedial education. Australian federal law does not yet include criminal consequences.

Table 1. Matrix of hate speech legal categories and consequences.

| Category | Criminal | Civil | Administrative | Educational |
|---|---|---|---|---|
| | | | | |
| Consequence | Sanction incitement | Reconcile parties | Resolve complaints | Train to understand |
| Legislation | - | Racial Discrimination Act | Institutional standards | Institutional policies |

Each of these interventions could be applicable within academia. However, in accordance with the constraints of this inquiry's focus on the Federal Criminal Code, our submission deals only with the first intervention, i.e. criminal prohibitions and sanctions upon incitement to antisemitism as a form of racial hatred.

Limits on free speech

Freedom of speech stands as a cornerstone of democratic societies, facilitating the exchange of ideas, engagement in robust debate, and the accountability of governments. As John Stuart Mill argued, in "On Liberty," the unimpeded exchange of ideas is crucial for intellectual and social progress. Mill posited that even erroneous or unpopular opinions carry inherent value, as they challenge prevailing dogmas and stimulate critical thinking. By safeguarding freedom of speech, societies cultivate a marketplace of ideas where truth is discerned through rigorous discussion. This liberty underpins other fundamental rights, empowering citizens to advocate for social change and justice. Thus, erosion of free speech imperils the very foundation of democracy.

Despite its paramount importance, freedom of speech has never been unlimited. The classic example, articulated by Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes, posits that falsely shouting "fire" in a crowded theatre is not protected speech, as it poses a clear and present danger to public safety. This principle underscores that speech inciting violence or panic is justifiably restricted in order to prevent harm.

Hate speech, which fosters discrimination and violence, presents a significant regulatory challenge. Regulating hate speech entails a delicate balance; excessive restrictions risk a chilling effect, deterring individuals from expressing legitimate views and stifling open discourse. In drafting regulation there needs to be clear attention to the impact of the law. There is a risk that prosecuting an individual will turn that person into a martyr – a hero of the cause. The greatest haters have claimed simultaneously through multiple platforms that they are constantly prosecuted by the target group. They do so to gain sympathy and additional followers. They and their cause become far more significant than they would have been without prosecution. On the other hand, the victims of unregulated free speech are silenced if we do not regulate their detractors.

Permissible limits on speech unquestionably include the regulation of violence, of the threatening of violence and of serious vilification. It is our view that the proposed Bill will enhance not detract from freedom of speech.

Legal limits on academic freedom

Academic freedom is an extension of freedom of speech within educational institutions. It allows scholars to pursue knowledge without interference or censorship. This freedom is vital for the advancement of knowledge, fostering an environment where ideas can be rigorously tested and debated. As set out in our mission statement, 5A champions academic freedom and honest enquiry.

The definition of academic freedom used in this submission is that adopted by the Commonwealth also, namely that set out in the Model Code proposed by former High Court Chief Justice Robert French as modified. It defines “academic freedom” in the following terms:

- the freedom of academic staff to teach, discuss and research and to disseminate and publish the results of their research;
- the freedom of academic staff and students to engage in intellectual inquiry, to express their opinions and beliefs, and to contribute to public debate, in relation to their subjects of study and research;
- the freedom of academic staff and students to express their opinions in relation to the higher education provider in which they work or are enrolled;

- the freedom of academic staff to participate in professional or representative academic bodies;
- the freedom of students to participate in student societies and associations;
- the autonomy of the higher education provider in relation to the choice of academic courses and offerings, the ways in which these are taught and the choices of research activities and the ways in which they are conducted.

The Model Code also states that "Every member of the academic staff and every student enjoys academic freedom subject only to prohibitions, restrictions or conditions:

- imposed by law;
- imposed by the reasonable and proportionate regulation necessary to the discharge of the university's teaching and research activities;
- imposed by the reasonable and proportionate regulation necessary to discharge the university's duty to foster the wellbeing of students and staff;
- imposed by the reasonable and proportionate regulation to enable the university to give effect to its legal duties;
- imposed by the university by way of its reasonable requirements as to the courses to be delivered and the content and means of their delivery."

Thus, the Model Code indicates that Australian universities are not allowed by ruse of Academic Freedom to shirk legal responsibility. Implementation of the Model Code is reported in the annual reports of all Australian universities under a statutory obligation.

Prohibitions imposed by law, as referred to in the Model Code, are the first restraint upon exercise of academic freedom. When proscribed under criminal law, transgression of prohibitions can carry consequences of criminal sanctions. They would fall within the scope of this Committee's enquiry.

Restrictions imposed by law, as referred to in the Model Code, that are not criminal in nature, are beyond the scope of the Criminal Code. Under the Racial Discrimination Act, it is unlawful to say or do something reasonably likely to offend, insult, humiliate or intimidate another person or group if the thing is done because of the race, colour or national or ethnic origin of the person or group. The consequences of doing so entail civil law procedures seeking to reconcile the parties or award civil compensation.

Conditions imposed by law, as referred to in the Model Code, would include tertiary education quality standards that require universities to ensure a safe academic environment for staff and students. In terms of the matrix above, these comprise administrative and educational measures.

Inciting hatred on campus as a criminal act

Returning to the issue of prohibitions on incitement under criminal law, there is an unfortunate gap in Commonwealth law. There is nothing in the Criminal Code that prohibits incitement to antisemitism or other forms of racial or group hatred. Within Australian universities, harms caused by teaching, communications or statements based on antisemitic lies, fabrications or distortions carry no criminal responsibility. 5A notes that universities are public places and that acts of incitement to hatred within university spaces are acts that occur in public.

Legal or policy restraints on antisemitism are sometimes posed as contradictory to academic freedom. However, like free speech, academic freedom is justifiably subject to limitations to prevent harm. Incitement of antisemitic hatred is one such harm to be prevented by appropriate limits to academic freedom.

Antisemitic acts can be identified by reference to the IHRA working definition. Its intersection with academic freedom sets the limits of purported exercises of academic freedom. The identification of individual cases of incitement to antisemitism under Commonwealth jurisdiction can be guided by application of the IHRA working definition, as adopted by the Commonwealth.

Most Australian universities have not adopted the IHRA working definition, although some have done so autonomously, in whole or in part (inc. Latrobe, Macquarie, Melbourne, Monash, UNSW, Wollongong). Publication of a Commonwealth guidance document on academic freedom and antisemitism would assist Australian university managers to understand the intersection of these concepts.

We recognise that a distinction must be drawn between legitimate academic discussion on controversial topics, and speech that constitutes incitement of hatred or violence. 5A understands that the IHRA is about to produce a document on academic freedom and antisemitism. Examples of specific incidents on Australian university campuses that could constitute incitement to hatred are discussed below, as examples of antisemitism and hate crimes over the past 13 months since 7 October 2023.

CAMPUS CASE STUDY 1 - Gaza Genocide

A class on Genocide in Gaza could entail an examination of the meaning of genocide, an assessment of the various elements of genocide and a discussion of whether this is an appropriate way to describe Gaza. That would be unproblematic. Equally, if we taught about governance, or economy or culture in Gaza, with reference to specific Israeli policies and well as Arab ones, this would be quite acceptable.

However, were the discussion to centre around the false accusations about genocide in the public arena, of a famine and the wholesale murder of thousands of babies, without examining these claims, then this would constitute hatred of Jews. If we teach or write about Gaza relying only on revisionist histories, with the objective of recruiting students to our cause, this would be antisemitic.

Another way of understanding whether a matter is antisemitic is to consider how people in the room are made to feel. Do they all equally feel empowered to question the lecturer or are some students silenced? Do some students feel like they are being accused of misconduct or even treachery even if they have never been overseas? Are some students scared to submit work for fear that it won't be marked fairly?

CAMPUS CASE STUDY 2 - Zionism is Nazism

Take the example of a situation of a professor who believes that the Israel government is equivalent to a Nazi regime, as in the case of Dr Tim Anderson, a former academic at the University of Sydney. The University of Sydney dismissed Dr Anderson after he attended an online seminar where he shared PowerPoint slides with an Israeli flag, which was torn apart to reveal a Nazi flag with a swastika on it. Israel is, of course, the Jewish state, and the Nazi regime killed over 6 million Jews in the Holocaust, so many Jewish people found the image offensive. They became aware of the image because Dr Anderson shared it on his publicly accessible Facebook page. At first instance, the trial judge found Dr Anderson was unfairly dismissed,[1] but on appeal, a majority of the Full Federal Court found that Dr Anderson's conduct was not in accordance with the highest ethical, professional and legal standards.[2]

Suppose that Dr Anderson was showing a shocking and provocative image to demonstrate the psychological effect of shocking images, not to express any view about Israel. This would be entirely different to a situation where he showed the image and then said, "all Israelis are Nazis." In between those two extremes, there are a range of possibilities.

If Dr Anderson attended rallies on the weekend in which he expressed anti-Israel sentiments, his right to freedom of speech and political communication would entitle him to do so (as long as he did not break any other laws).

If Dr Anderson gave a reasoned academic talk in a conference setting in which he argued that certain aspects of Israeli government policy shared commonalities some policies of the National Socialist regime, as long as he provided clear and adequate justification for that argument, and he engaged in reasoned scholarly discussion not polemics, he would be within his academic freedom to do this, notwithstanding that others may disagree strongly or find his views offensive. Academic freedom requires other scholars to rebut his views in an academic manner, using evidence and scholarly method, rather than to silence him.

A more difficult question would arise if Dr Anderson were teaching a class on genocide and chose to show the image of the Israeli flag and the swastika juxtaposed. The question would arise as to whether Dr Anderson could put aside his biases and teach this material in an objective and fair way. It is always possible for teachers to have strong private views, but to teach material in an objective and fair way which allows for differing opinions. However, the presence of such a polemical image would perhaps suggest to students that he was incapable of being objective and fair on this topic, or of allowing different opinions to be discussed.

We have been told by students of classes where the lecturer has told the students that it is entirely clear that genocide is being committed in Gaza, and that Israel is a rogue regime which should be ostracised, and that no other views can be accepted. This can easily turn into, "Anyone who supports the existence of Israel in any way is therefore evil," and constitute an incitement to hatred or violence. This is because many Australians support the existence of Israel and there are religious obligations that cannot be performed outside of the land of Israel. For some Jews, this is an important religious precept. Therefore, to suggest that Jews are not allowed to have a state is often regarded as antisemitic.

CAMPUS CASE STUDY 3 - Boycott Divestment and Sanctions (BDS)

The campaign of various anti-Israel groups to boycott, divest from and sanction Israel (BDS) can in some circumstances constitute incitement to racial hatred. Professor Steven Prawer of the University of Melbourne seems to have been targeted on the basis of his ethnicity and religion. The stated reason for the campaign against him was Prof Prawer's

[1] University of Sydney v National Tertiary Education Industry Union [2020] FCA 1709.
[2] University of Sydney v National Tertiary Education Industry Union [2024] FCAFC 57.

participation in a joint PhD program between the University of Melbourne and Hebrew University of Jerusalem. It was alleged that this made him "complicit in genocide."

Prof Prawer was one of eight to ten academics who participated in the joint program, but the only visibly observant Jewish person, because he wears a kippah, or skullcap. Over a series of a few months, protesters put up posters deriding him as a participant in genocide, rallied specifically against him, massed outside his office, and then finally "occupied" his office space and intimidated and harassed him when he came in to work. The university has said it was difficult to identify the protesters and the initial response of the police is that no crime was committed because the protestors vacated Professor Prawer's office when police demanded that they do so. While we question whether this is the case, there is a clear need to deter and deal with incidents such as that which affected Professor Prawer. Privacy provisions have been used as a cover for not taking steps to identify the masked protestors or to demand that they identify themselves. If it was clear that an offense may have been committed, then there would be more justification for police to demand names and addresses which may, in and of itself, have a deterrent effect.

These three case studies illustrate of the complexities involved in describing where academic freedom intersects with hateful antisemitic behaviour. The contours of hatred can be mapped out across various recurring academic scenarios. For each academic scenario, specific guidance can be prepared, drawing upon the Model Code on academic freedom and IHRA working definition of antisemitism, to distinguish incitement to hatred from bona fide academic activity. If it had been a criminal offence to engage in public incitement to racial hatred, the police might at least have had a reason to take names and addresses of the students who insulted vilified and harassed Prof Prawer Case Study 3, for example.

4. In in the street the complexities racial hatred as a new Commonwealth offence

The amendments to the Criminal Code as currently proposed and published do not proscribe race hatred as such as a crime. Instead, they proscribe incitement to violence. In this sense, the amendments go no further than the existing provisions. The title of the Bill is a misnomer that should instead specify incitement to violence, which is the necessary element of the incitement.

The proposed amendments to the Criminal Code do not address the lacuna in Commonwealth law around crimes of incitement to racial hatred. There is a need for new federal criminal legislation to address contemporary antisemitism issues on campus. Many university campuses have been places where Jewish and Israeli students and staff have felt unwelcome, or unsafe. Some students and staff have been unable to come on campus. This is inappropriate in the context of a desire to host a diverse student body with diverse beliefs and backgrounds.

5A submits that the Criminal Code should be amended to introduce a new crime of such incitement to racial hatred, encompassing incitement to antisemitism. The legislation could introduce examples to reduce ambiguity and illustrate proper application, as is increasingly common in legislative drafting practice.

Section 18C of the Racial Discrimination Act 1975 does not fill the void. Limitations of relying on 18C include the high burden on victims. For example, two separate, representative complaints were filed with the Australian Human Rights Commission (AHRC) on behalf of a group of Complainants who are Jewish students and academics at the University of Sydney on 1 November 2024. The two complaints allege racial discrimination and racial vilification (i.e. antisemitism) against Jewish students and academics by Professor John Keane and the University of Sydney, and by Dr Nick Riemer and the University of Sydney, respectively. The two complaints have taken almost a year to prepare and will be considered by the President of the AHRC, who will seek conciliation between the parties. The AHRC has not demonstrated sensitivity to antisemitism and, following the likely failure of the conciliation process, the Complainants have 60 days to commence proceedings in the Federal Court of Australia. The full onus of responsibility to correct a public wrong therefore rests upon private individuals who must undertake their own defence at great expense and cost of time. The introduction into the Criminal Code of a crime of inciting hatred would shift this burden to the public prosecutor.

Criminal penalties for breaches of prohibitions on incitement to racial hate already exist within some Australian state jurisdictions, cp: WA, SA, Vic. In Western Australia, the Western Australian Criminal Code, section 77, provides that:

> [a] person who engages in any conduct, other than in private, by which the person intends to create, promote or increase animosity towards or harassment of a racial group or a person as a member of a racial group, is guilty of a crime....

(Animosity is defined as "hatred or serious contempt", without the need for intending actual violence.) This prohibition has been tested, although with limited success.

Table 2. Criminalisation of hate speech by Australian jurisdictions.

5A recommends that the lacuna in the Commonwealth Criminal Code be filled by proscribing incitement to hatred. This could send a public message signaling discouragement of the inciting of hate on campus and the creation of hostile campus environments.

It is widely recognised that university administrators have failed to handle these issues through internal management. 5A recommends that university failures to prevent hate crime, in circumstances where the management clearly had knowledge of the intended or continuing offences and where the management held powers and capabilities to prevent hate crimes, should attract vicarious criminal liability and be subject to penalties.

5. Amendments to the Criminal Code proposed by the Commonwealth

Hate crime amendments to the Criminal Code set out in the current legislative proposal concern adjustments to the existing crimes of the urging of violence against a group or a member thereof, and the introduction of new crimes of threats of force or violence against a group or member thereof.

Urging violence

In relation to existing offences in the Criminal Code of urging violence, 5A supports the amendments proposed to reduce the intention element, mens rea, to recklessness and to remove the good faith defence. These amendments are proposed in section 80.2A of the Criminal Code, criminalising the urging of violence against groups, and in section 80.2B criminalising the urging of violence against members of groups.

The reason that 5A supports the mens rea amendment is that the thresholds of proof for intention are too high to be proved in almost any conceivable circumstances. Intention in this context requires that a person means to bring about a result and is aware that it will occur in the ordinary course of events (Criminal Code section 5.2). There will always be doubt present as to the potential effects of urging an action in the minds of others. Intentionally urging (80.2A(1)(c)) and intending that force or violence will occur (80.2A(2)(c)) tend to be impossible to prove. Therefore, recklessness is the more appropriate threshold for proving mens rea in a prosecution for urging violence.

The reason that 5A supports removal of the good faith defence is that there is no good faith possible in inciting hatred or violence; it is oxymoronic. The defence merely adds uncertainty, confusion and obfuscation.

We note that the current existing prohibition on incitement to violence lacks a clear definition of incitement itself. A strict "immediate and likely consequences" test is used in the USA, which limits the potential circumstances for prosecution of incitement to violence. 5A suggests that a broader definition of incitement to violence would be useful to clarify potential circumstances for prosecution.

Threats of force or violence

5A supports other amendments before the Senate Committee that create offences in the Criminal Code concerning threats of force or violence against groups or members thereof. Threats of force or violence against groups proposed section 80.2BA, on threatening force or violence against groups, and in section 80.2BB, on threatening force or violence against members of groups are related to incitement to hatred and to violence but entail circumstances distinct from either, (despite having some overlapping elements). The distinct circumstances are the nature of threats, targeting specific individuals or clearly identified groups. In contrast, urging violence has less specific targets and less specific intended outcomes. As noted in the Explanatory Memorandum, it criminalises conduct that involves a direct threat from one person to another.

A particular issue that requires clarification in the proposed introduction of crimes of threats of force or violence concerns whether they capture threats against property of the targeted person or group. Refugees who have a well-founded fear for their safety are often victims of property damage. History shows that destroying property — such as synagogues, mosques, Black-owned businesses, or Indigenous cultural sites — has been a recurring tactic in racist practices and genocidal campaigns. For example, during Kristallnacht (the "Night of Broken Glass") in Nazi Germany, the destruction of Jewish homes, businesses, and places of worship signalled to Jewish communities that their lives and identities were under severe threat, creating a climate of fear that triggered mass emigration and, later, enabled mass deportation and genocide. Destroying property such as a business on the internet, can be more harmful than smashing a window. Recent incidents of arson, vandalism, graffiti and doxxing in Australian cities are often directed against Jewish property such as synagogues and schools, homes and businesses.

Recognizing this kind of threat, some national hate crime laws now encompass property damage. For instance, the United Kingdom's hate crime statutes include provisions on racially or religiously aggravated criminal damage. By encompassing such acts within hate crime laws, societies can acknowledge that violence isn't just physical harm to the body but includes attacks on the symbols and places that embody a community's identity, and the personal property and business property owned by members of the target group. Similarly, within several Australian state jurisdictions, motivation by racial, religious or other forms of prejudice is considered an aggravating factor during sentencing for property damage.[3]

5A therefore recommends that sections 80.2BA and 80.2BB be expanded to encompass threats to property of the group or its members.

6. Additional amendments proposed by 5A

5A recommends additional amendments to the Criminal Code that concern terrorism and genocide. Concerning terrorism, 5A recommends the insertion of a new offence of glorification of terrorism as section 80.2CA of the Criminal Code, or by an expansion of section 80.2C.

Glorification of terrorism

Under the Criminal Code Section 80.2C as currently enacted, advocating specific terrorist acts is proscribed but general glorifying of terrorist acts is not. The Islamist movement Hizb ut Tahrir has earned notoriety in Australia for its glorification of terrorism at the University of Sydney in 2024. It is a proscribed terrorist group in the United Kingdom, where it falls afoul of the proscription of glorification of terrorism under the UK Terrorism Act 2006 section 1(3). Nevertheless, glorification of terrorism is not a crime under Australian law and Hizb ut Tahrir has not been listed as a proscribed terrorist group in Australia although various federal governments have scrutinised its activities for evidence of illegal advocacy of terrorist acts. The fact is that advocacy of specific acts of terrorism is currently required under the Criminal Code. Hizb ut Tahrir is careful not to advocate specific terrorist acts but can and does advocate for terrorism generally. Hizb ut Tahrir can and does also incite hatred without constraint in Australia. It could be

[3] 1. New South Wales (NSW): C*rimes Act* 1900 (NSW): While there isn't a specific section for racially motivated property damage, Section 195 deals with "Destroying or damaging property", and racial motivation can be considered under Section 21A(2)(h) of the Crimes (Sentencing Procedure) Act 1999 (NSW), which states that offenses motivated by racial, religious, or other forms of prejudice are considered aggravating factors during sentencing.
2. Victoria: Crimes Act 1958 (Vic): Section 197 covers "Criminal damage", but motivation by hate (racial or religious) can be considered under Section 5(2)(daaa) of the Sentencing Act 1991 (Vic), which allows the court to consider racial or religious motivation as an aggravating factor during sentencing.
3. Queensland: Criminal Code Act 1899 (Qld): Section 469 deals with "Wilful damage", but racial or religious motivations can be used as an aggravating factor under general sentencing provisions outlined in the Penalties and Sentences Act 1992 (Qld), particularly Section 9(4), which considers offenses motivated by hate as aggravating circumstances.
4. Australian Capital Territory (ACT): Crimes Act 1900 (ACT): Section 116 deals with "Destroying or damaging property", and racial or religious motivations can be considered under Section 33(1)(o) of the Crimes (Sentencing) Act 2005 (ACT), where racial hatred is regarded as an aggravating factor in sentencing.

constrained if glorification of terrorism was introduced as a new category of terrorist crime in the Criminal Code.

Good faith defences removal

More bizarrely, the Criminal Code section 80.3 currently permits persons charged with advocating terrorist acts to raise a defence of good faith. The availability of this defence merely adds uncertainty, confusion and obfuscation to the law as the mens rea element of advocating terrorism itself negates good faith. There can be no good faith when advocating terrorism. Accordingly, no good faith defence should be available to persons charged with advocating terrorist acts and, similarly, no defence of good faith should be available to persons charged with glorifying terrorism.

There are intersections between inciting hatred or violence, threatening force or violence, advocacy or glorification of terrorist acts, and advocating genocide. Each of these is a speech act with potential effects of causing hatred and violence against groups or members of groups. For each, the defence of good faith is circular, introducing uncertainty and obfuscation. In this context, we note that Section 80.2D of the Criminal Code also bizarrely allows a good faith defence against prosecution for advocating genocide. As we have suggested, no defence of good faith should be available in a prosecution for advocating genocide, as the mens rea element of incitement itself negates good faith.

7. Conclusion

This submission has argued for the introduction into the Criminal Code of a new crime against incitement to racial hatred. This is consistent with accepted norms on freedom of speech and academic freedom as set out in the Robert French Model Code adopted by Australian universities.

The International Holocaust Remembrance Association (IHRA) working definition of antisemitism can be used to navigate the boundaries of freedom of speech and academic freedom to guide administrative authorities as to where they intersect with racial hatred against Jews. The IHRA working definition has been adopted by Australian governments and 5A recommends that it be required by law to be incorporated into Australian University regulatory and administrative suites. Australian university teachings that Gaza is experiencing genocide, Zionism is Nazism, and that Israel must be subject to boycotts divestment and sanctions were discussed in this submission, as case studies concerning where the boundaries between good-faith exercises of academic freedom and of incitement to racial hatred lie.

This submission has also commented on amendments currently proposed in the Bill, to the existing crimes of the urging of violence against a group or a member thereof, and on the introduction of new crimes of threats of force or violence against a group or member thereof. We commend the lowering of the mens rea element to recklessness and removal of the good faith defence for existing crimes of the urging of violence. 5A also recommends removal of the good faith defence and suggests that further clarification of the cause-and-effect relationship between incitement and violence, particularly the temporal gap between them, might be helpful.

We support other amendments proposed in the Bill that would create new offences of threats of force or violence against groups or members thereof and recommend that the threats extend beyond those of force or violence against the group or person to include their property.

5A recommends additional amendments to the Criminal Code that concern terrorism. These would insert a new offence of glorification of terrorism, either as section 80.2CA of the Criminal Code or by an expansion of section 80.2C. Concerning good faith defences to crimes of inciting hatred or violence, threatening force or violence, advocacy or glorification of terrorist acts, and advocating genocide, we suggest that the defence of good faith is circular, as the intention element of the crimes negate conduct in good faith, and the good faith defence therefore merely generates uncertainty.

As noted in the introduction to this submission, a concerning decline in the rule of law concerning hate crimes has facilitated and hastened the recent rapid breakdown of social cohesion in Australia. 5A is keen to see improvements in Australian hate crimes legislation that clarify application of the Criminal Code, but we stress the need for rigorous, consistent and predictable public sector enforcement. Should the neglect of public sector enforcement against hate crimes continue, it may be helpful to introduce private prosecutions to try to prevent hateful behavior, although private prosecutions would be only a minor impediment to accelerating social decline. This is a cause for anxiety not only among members of 5A but also all members of the Australian community reliant upon the rule of law and social cohesion.

5A Submission to Senate Inquiry - Part 1

The Australian Academic Alliance Against Antisemitism (5A) is pleased to have the opportunity to make this submission to the Senate Inquiry into the bill for an Act to establish a Commission of Inquiry into Antisemitism at Australian Universities.

This submission is in three parts. Part 1 (this document) provides background to our organization and seeks to share our knowledge of antisemitism on campus. Part 2 outlines why 5A strongly supports the bill and outlines why nothing short of a judicial inquiry is needed to uncover the true extent of the problem and part 3 provides the preliminary results of a survey that we have commissioned to investigate the lived experience of Jewish students and staff on campus.

1. Introduction

Who we are and Credentials for making this submission: The Australian Academic Alliance Against Antisemitism (5A) is a non-profit organisation born in the aftermath of the brutal Hamas attack on 7 October 2023. The organisation has grown very quickly, and today consists of 290 academics and professional staff from across 29 Australian universities. 5A acts as the main body representing the voice of both Jewish and non-Jewish staff who are concerned with the emergence of antisemitism on their campus in the Australian tertiary sector.

Our functional structure, from individual universities to state and federal representatives, has enabled the executive to be informed quickly of incidents and to take appropriate action. The organisation's reach includes activities in education, outreach, academic advisor and peer support, anti-Israeli and BDS activity, responding to the media, supporting the legal and medical groups, advocating for Jewish academics and professionals in their sectors, responding to media misinformation, strategy and policy, including advocating with the sector regulators and individual University executives, as well as tertiary sector membership bodies, and supporting individual students across all levels in responding to their own adverse experiences of antisemitism and bias in the classroom, publications and professional trajectories.

Our members are on campus every day and are actively immersed in the campus culture and academic life. 5A is in the box seat to observe and comment on antisemitism on campus from first hand knowledge.

The situation on campus: Across all these areas, both state based and federally, 5A has found that the extent of antisemitism in the tertiary sector is deep, and largely unearthed. 5A is also the repository for large amounts of data, primarily gathered through individual interventions of support, as well as a national survey, which will constitute the subject matter of a separate submission (see part 3)

Many students and staff are frightened to share their experiences of antisemitism. Staff are often dependent on the income and fear they may lose their positions if they complain. They also fear the reaction of colleagues. Students are frightened that if they reveal their Jewish identity, they will be 'cancelled', and if they complain about statements of lecturers they will fail the course. Thus, what we know is only the tip of the iceberg, and only a judicial inquiry will uncover the depth of the problem.

Our submission will focus on the legal context, and argue that universities are not meeting their statutory obligations to keep students safe in view of survey data documenting antisemitism on campuses from both before and after Hamas's brutal attack of 7 October. We provide an overview of antisemitic incidents on campus, and the woefully inadequate university administrative responses, . We note that the information in the submission does include both staff and students, but that the Australasian Union of Jewish Studies (AUJS) is writing its own submission.

We argue that, due to under-reporting, the information presented in this submission is just the tip of the iceberg. We conclude with a summary of why, after consulting with our membership, we believe there is an urgent need for the judicial inquiry. This submission has drawn on the expertise in the areas of law, understanding antisemitism and survey development of a number of our members who have contributed to the submission.

2. Legal regulatory context: Universities are failing to meet their statutory obligations.

Australian universities operate within a highly complex regulatory environment. Federal and state laws apply to them, some legislated specifically to regulate their academic activities, and others applicable generally to them as employers, workplaces, public spaces, speech platforms and community actors.

Federal laws legislated specifically to regulate the academic activities of tertiary education providers include the Higher Education Support Act (HES Act) and Tertiary Education Quality and Standards Agency Act (TEQSA Act). Federal laws applicable generally to universities as workplaces include the Racial Discrimination Act 1975 and Criminal Code.

Under the federal TEQSA Act (Section 58), Threshold Standards can be adopted by the Minister to set out requirements that a higher education provider must meet. Among the Threshold Standards are obligations to ensure a 'safe environment is promoted and fostered' (section 2.3.4) and 'an institutional environment in which freedom of speech and academic freedom are upheld and protected' (section 6.4.1). Under the federal HES Act, academic freedom requirements are to be met (section 19.15) and the higher education provider is to comply with TEQSA standards.

Under the federal Criminal Code, it is prohibited to urge violence against groups (section 80.2A), advocate terrorism (section 80.2C), to display proscribed hate symbols (section 80.2E), or to harass, threaten or distribute violent extremist material via a carriage service

(section 474). Cyber-bullying is prohibited under the federal *Online Safety A*ct (section 46). Racial vilification is sought to be restrained under civil law provisions in the federal *Racial Discrimination Ac*t 1975, where vilification is defined as an act that is reasonably likely to "offend, insult, humiliate or intimidate" someone because of their race or ethnicity. Australian universities are usually constituted under state laws, other than those universities located and constituted within Australian federal territories. Generally, a dedicated constitutive law, such as the *University of Sydney A*ct enacted by the NSW parliament, established the University and its fundamental structure. Other state laws are generally applicable to universities, including legislation on racial discrimination, racial vilification and equal opportunity, workplace safety, employee rights as well as criminal laws.

To take NSW as an example, the NSW Crimes Act 1900 provides that "a person who by a public act intentionally or recklessly threatens or incites violence towards another person or group of persons … is guilty of an offence" (section 93Z). The Crimes Act also prohibits display of Nazi symbols (section 93ZA). Racial vilification is also restrained under civil law provisions in the NSW Anti-Discrimination Act 1977 (Part 2 Division 3A). Furthermore, municipal by-laws typically zone university campuses as public spaces that are subject to powers vested in the university administration to permit or restrict entry and conditions of entry.

Under their constitutive legislation, Australian parliaments have delegated sufficient powers to university administrations to enable them to adopt regulatory and policy frameworks to implement each university's academic mission. Typically, each particular university Council or Senate adopts regulatory frameworks, variously described as rules, codes of conduct, bylaws, procedures, policies, guidelines or principles. Typically, every university has a Student Code of Conduct, a Staff Code of Conduct and Campus Access Rules.

It is the contention of 5A that several Australian universities have failed to utilise the powers available to them in order to comply with the required standards set out by federal, state and territory legislation. Failures of principal concern to 5A are those where university administrations have failed to fulfil their statutory obligations to ensure a safe environment in which to learn and teach and have failed to protect academic freedom. Moreover, they have declined to take action under the powers available to them to restrain racial vilification, threats of violence against groups, or distribution of violent extremist material.

We strongly believe that a judicial inquiry is needed to verify our contention, and to gain a better understanding of how and why different universities have failed to respond to the significant upsurge of antisemitism since 7 October. In the next section we discuss surveys undertaken which demonstrate the problem for Jewish students and staff of antisemitism as it has emerged in the last two years.

3: Antisemitism on Australian campuses: Antisemitism is a light sleeper which has awoken with a vengeance on Australian University campuses, often justified under the cover of ant-Zionism.

Left-wing demonisation of Israel, which is portrayed as the victimiser, with the Palestinians the victims, together with the use of world conspiracy theories, contributes to an atmosphere of hatred against all Jews and helps to justify violence against them. This is an ongoing problem, intensified with the Israel Gaza conflict in May 2021, April and August 2022 and in October 2023. Whilst there were tensions on Australian campuses in the 1970s, following the 1967 war and the reformation of the Palestine Liberation Organisation (PLO) under Arafat's leadership in 1968, these did not reach the point where students and staff were frightened to come onto campus.

It is important to stress that such antisemitism manifests itself on university campuses on the extreme right, drawing on typical racist stereotypes and driven by neo-Nazi ideology, as well as from the so-called progressive left, which draws on the anti-Israel narrative. However, as Rutland and Allington (2023) have demonstrated, university management tends to act much more strongly with right-wing antisemitism than it does with left-wing antisemitism.

Since the Gaza conflict in May 2021, there has been an increase in the anti-Israel narrative on Australian campuses, with anti-Israel resolutions being passed and anti-Israel articles being published in campuses newspapers, together with the resultant uptick of antisemitic incidents. This leaves Jewish university students feeling vulnerable and under attack. These problems have been highlighted by the Riazaty and Anor court case against the Melbourne University Student Union (MUSU) Federal Court Case; the ZFA/AUJS survey of February 2023; and the most recent 5A survey of April–July 2024. These are discussed in the following sections.

The federal court action undertaken by Justin Riazaty, first plaintiff, and Isabella Yusupov, second plaintiff, against the Melbourne University Student Union (MUSU) related to two motions passed by the MUSU in APril and August 2022, advocating for support for the Boycott, Divestment and Sanctions Movement. The Plaintiffs maintained that the Defendant's conduct in relation to these motions contravened the Associations Incorporation Reform Act 2021 (Vic) (AIR Act) in relation to discrimination against members of the union and the Racial Discrimination Act 1975 (Cth) (RDA Act) in relation to antisemitism. In February 2024, this dispute was settled out of court with the MUSU agreeing to remove the pro-BDS motions and to pay costs for the court action.

Despite this settlement, Australian student unions and also the NTEU (as discussed later in this submission) have continued to pass pro-BDS motions, with more extreme motions being passed since 7 October. The negative impact of this situation is demonstrated in two surveys discussed in the sections 3.2 and 3.3.

3.2 Recent ZFA/AUJS survey pre-7 October 2023:

Since the Gaza conflict in May 2021, there has been an increase in the anti-Israel narrative on Australian campuses, with anti-Israel resolutions being passed and anti-Israel articles being published in campuses newspapers, together with the resultant uptick of antisemitic incidents. This leaves Jewish university students feeling vulnerable and under attack.

This has been demonstrated clearly by the survey initiated by the ZFA [Zionist Federation of Australia] with the support of AUJS [Australasian Union of Jewish Students] and the Scanlon Foundation was conducted by The Social Research Centre, located in Melbourne. As the report of this survey noted: 'The aim of the survey was to understand Jewish students' experiences of antisemitism in Australian universities.'[1] Carlill, Bren, Director of Public Affairs, Zionist Federation of Australia, 'The Jewish University Experience Survey', May 2023, Social Research Centre.

This survey was conducted over a three-week period with all students on the AUJS database receiving an invitation and the ZFA using its own resources for further publicity. Current and recent Jewish university students were included with a total of 563 responses, 396 from the AUJS mail-out and 167 from the opt-in link via the ZFA website. In terms of the participants, there were slightly more female responses than males (56.1% vs 41.9% with 1.6% non-binary); 46.2% were between the ages of 16–21, with most of the remainder ranging from 22–34; 52.2% came from Victoria, where the highest proportion of Jews reside, but proportionally there were fewer from New South Wales, with 30.7% and more from the ACT, with 6.9%, even though it only has a tiny Jewish population; and understandably the highest proportion from the different strands of Judaism being the Modern Orthodox Jews with 40.3% who constitute a much smaller proportion of the Australian Jewish population but are more clearly visible and strongly Zionist, with only 20.1% of Reform and 19.4% of traditional Jews and only 8.2% of secular Jews.[2] Appendix I, 'The Jewish University Experience'.

This survey was the first of its kind to be conducted in Australia. The survey's findings demonstrated many elements for concern in terms of Jews feeling safe and the experiences of Jewish students on campus.

Briefly, the findings revealed that 64% of Jewish university students experienced some form of antisemitism, with 88% of respondents reporting that this had occurred in the last 12 months. Of these, 47% described 'intimidation by people or events'; 37% relating to 'tropes of Jewish money, power or influence'; 37% 'comparing Israel to Nazi Germany'; 30% 'Holocaust denial or minimisation'; and 25% being 'singled out or excluded over Israel'. The fact that staff participated in these events, or that they did not take action is also important in terms of those staff who support BDS. As well, the fact that the survey found that 57% of students have hidden their Jewish identity to avoid facing antisemitism and that this rises to 67% for those who already experienced antisemitism is also very relevant and matches research of what is happening in high schools. Another key fact is that overall, 19% of male students and 24% of female students have 'stayed away from campus to avoid antisemitism' and that 27% of those who have actually experienced antisemitism have stayed away from campus.

Finally, the survey found that Jewish students have a lack of confidence in the complaints process with 85% deciding not to make a complaint after the incident and, for the minority who did complain, 61% were dissatisfied with the outcome. The survey provided various reasons why students decided not to complain, with 61% citing their sense that it 'wouldn't make a difference' and 48% feeling that 'the university wouldn't take it seriously' with other reasons provided as well. The students did feel that if the university adopted a definition of antisemitism, they would feel more confident in making a complaint'.[3] (ZFA Survey Summary', September 2023, https://www.zfa.com.au/survey/. Accessed 22 September 2023.)

These findings were promoted by the ZFA and produced concern from various politicians at the federal level. However, despite expressions of concerns, there was no follow up by politicians and no practical steps were taken to rectify the situation, which was only exacerbated

It is important to note that current Jewish students would have either experienced or heard from friends about antisemitism in high schools, including anti-Zionism. In 2022, two Melbourne high schools received wide media publicity highlighting this problem: Cheltenham College and Brighton Secondary College (BSC), with the latter leading to five Jewish students who attended BSC from 2013-2020 taking the principal, Mr Richard Minack, two teachers and the Victorian Department of Education to court for racial discrimination and a failure of duty of care. In her judgement, Justice Mortimer found that 'there was a distinction in the way the applicants were treated by Mr Minack and, through his failures in leadership, the teachers and staff at BSC, which in turn impaired the applicants' human rights to security of person and protection, to education, and to preservation of their Jewish identity.'[4] (Kaplan v State of Victoria (No 8) [2023] FCA 1092 at [9].)

Thus, as a minority in Australia, with the Jewish population constituting less than 0.5 percent of the overall population, Jewish students feel under attack, with many feeling that they have to hide their religious and cultural identity. These problems have been intensified since 7 October 2023, and have been revealed by the 5A survey of April to July 2024 discussed in the next section.

3.3 5A Survey, 2024

In April 2024, The Australian Academic Alliance Against Antisemitism (5A) undertook to survey the extent of antisemitism in Australian universities, as experienced by students and staff after Oct 7 and the extent to which universities are taking active measures to ensure that their campuses are free from antisemitism. The preliminary results are summarized in part 3 of our submission. The headline result of the survey is that

> Only one-in-three Jewish undergraduate student respondents reported feeling safe on campus.

This result needs to be placed into context: The 2021 National Student Safety Survey (NSSS) found that 84% of students strongly agreed/agreed with the statement 'I feel safe on campus'. Even this high rate was considered unacceptable , with Professor Mark Scott (VC, University of Sydney) commenting:

> Frankly, one case is one too many. To every person who has experienced sexual harassment or sexual assault, we are deeply sorry. Every student has the right to feel safe and supported and to be treated with respect and dignity, whether on campus, online or offshore. Anything less is unacceptable.

And yet Professor Scott says Jewish students will have to tough out "discomfort" with anti-Israel slogans, defending the response of Australian universities to pro-Palestine protest camps. The 5A survey makes it clear that Jewish students are not just 'uncomfortable'; they are in fact scared to come onto campus. Why does the statement that 'Every student has the right to feel safe and supported and to be treated with respect and dignity' not extend to the Jewish student population? Hopefully a judicial inquiry will uncover why Jewish students are not afforded the same consideration as other minority groups on campus.

4. Academic experiences – national overview

Since 7 October 2023, the 5A has documented ongoing examples of antisemitism and discrimination against Jewish staff and students and multiple occasions in which the freedom of speech, and the academic freedom to use public academic spaces for their intended purposes have been forcefully denied. While academic freedom of speech for those who wish to express support of Israel's right to exist is being denied, no limits are put on antisemitic hate speech on campuses across Australia.

This hate speech takes different forms including:

- Pro-Palestinian posters which deny Israel's right to exist, accuse Israel of carrying out a genocide in Gaza and expressing support for Hamas;
- Interrupting classes for a pro-Palestinian harrange which often includes hatred to anyone who supports Israel's right to exist;
- Protests and marches calling for global intifada and that violent resistance is by Palestinians is justified;
- Refusal to condemn Hamas and indeed justifying its actions on 7 October;
- Encampments, which become excluded places for Israeli, Jews and supporters of Israel, preventing their freedom of movement on campus;
- Lecturers making emotive and political statements, rather than presenting information objectively, with balanced criticism of Israel rather than vilification;
- Both Jewish staff and students being affected by the 'deafening silence' after 7 October, the cancelling of friendships, exclusion of Jews, and doxxing, not only through the well-known academics and creatives WhatsApp group in February 2024, but also in the case of individual academics at one university;
- In some cases, both staff and students have been physically attacked, and while physical abuse is (fortunately) rare, it is the knowledge of such cases combined with the verbal abuse and threats that creates fear of Jews on campus, whether they are staff or students.

All of these actions are prejudicial to safety and well-being of Jewish staff and students, so that many do not feel safe on campus, as has been so clearly revealed by the 5A Survey of 2024, as well as the earlier ZFA/AUJS survey.

5A is an entirely voluntary, grass roots, not for profit, harm minimization organization. The Alliance is composed of honorary workers who are giving of their time on a voluntary basis, in addition to their full-time positions. Below is an outline of some of the key issues that the Alliance has been dealing with since its formation. These include providing academic advice to students affected by antisemitism, dealing with boycotts of visiting academics, and lecturers making political and unfounded statements.

We present below some examples of what has been happening on campus, but given our limited resources we do not pretend that we have captured the full extent of the problem. This is another reason why we need a judicial inquiry to shine the spotlight on campus antisemitism in a comprehensive and systematic manner.

4.1 Reports from Academic Advisors

5A works to advise and support students and staff affected by antisemitism on campus. We summarize some of their experiences here as many of them feel too threatened to make a public submission to the Senate inquiry. We voice their stories here so that there is no doubt that we are facing a very serious problem that justifies the commissioning of a judicial enquiry. There is also no doubt that the current situation post 7 October 2023 poses a mental health threat to Jewish students. This was recognised by Dr Grant Blashki, GP, Associate Professor at the University of Melbourne who developed a mental health guide for Jewish students.

Reports from advisors reveal a new form of antisemitism which is taking its toll on the mental health of Jewish students, characterised by high levels of microaggression, and exclusion from social media and student associations.

One prominent example is the Australian Medical Students Association (AMSA). These groups are set up with the intention of exchanging relevant information to the discipline, and not for political purposes. However, time and time again, we find that the platforms are hijacked by members and used not for their intended purposes. Very quickly they turn into a megaphone for antisemitic anti-Zionist propaganda. In all instances, the posts on these sites are highly offensive to Jews due to their one-sided support of Palestinians and complete lack of empathy for the suffering of Israelis. This is an obvious microaggression, as it assumes that the feelings of Jewish students in the group should not be considered. To make the point clear, this behaviour is equivalent to posting a critique against Ukraine, knowing that there is a Ukrainian in the group, or the opposite, critiquing Russia, knowing that there is a Russian in the group. In most professional groups, no one would dream of displaying such microaggression, particularly not in relation to minorities such as the Indigenous Australians (consisting 3.8% of Australia's population compared to 0.4% Jews). However, to use David Baddiel's terminology, when it comes to Jewish members in the group, they simply "don't count."

In addition to direct aggression against students, one common form of harassment is conducted through the weaponizing of the Disciplinary Complaint system to silence Jews. One particularly insidious expression of this comes about through a ping-pong exchange where the aggressors perform an aggressive act against Jews, and when the victims respond, the aggressors turn the tables around, accusing the initial victim and instead claiming to be the victim. Consequently, Jewish students or staff are attacked twice, first through microaggression, and secondly by the aggressors presenting themselves as the victims of the Jewish students or staff, accusing them of aggression. The next stage in this scenario is when Jewish persons try to defend themselves, either by answering back or asking to remove some posts. This is usually followed by a herd reaction of accusing the Jewish student(s). Often, these exchanges end with the aggressors submitting a complaint against Jewish student(s) for being "aggressive." University disciplinary processes tend to side with the provocateurs, so that the pro-Palestinians are free to condem Israel without fear of challenge.

For example, when a Jewish student walked through the lawn where the Monash pro-Palestinian students were encamped, he was verbally attacked , screaming in his ear with a megaphone causing him tinnitus. He then received a disciplinary complaint from the university, based on the protesters' complaint, accusing him of causing the protesters distress and discomfort. True, after watching the videos of the incident, the complaint was eventually dismissed by the university investigators, and the university initiated a complaint against the student protesters; however, the student had to endure the stress of the disciplinary process and seek legal advice as to how to defend himself.

In another instance a Jewish student at Monash confronted another student wearing a shirt and a necklace effectively calling for the destruction of Israel. In this case the University found that the Jewish student had breached rules by challenging the content of the tee shirt. It seems that Israel and Jews can be smeared and insulted with impunity and if they challenge their critics, the University apparatus moves against them.

The harassment is not limited to the University campus but extends to hospital medical training facilities. Student reports:

> As someone who is Israeli, sure you can say that anti-Zionism is not antisemitism but being Israeli and seeing someone posting a picture of the Israeli flag being crossed out, to me it reads that I don't have the right to exist or I am cancelled.
> A few days after the 7 October massacre, I had the courage to post a few things on Instagram… I received condemning messages from someone from the Medical School telling me that it is misinformation that Hamas kidnapped people to Gaza and that I don't have empathy to Palestinians (I didn't post anything against Palestinians. It is actually important to me that Palestinians will have good life). She told me that I think that every Muslim person is a terrorist. There is a problem with me calling people terrorists (I haven't used the word "terrorist"). She also told me that when I become a medical doctor, I need to register conflict of interest, and to make sure that my patients to which I have no empathy, know what my political stances are*. This was said even though I did not disclose my political stances, apart from my grief over the 7 October massacre.*
> They would tell me I have been brainwashed, that I have no empathy and that me in any way opposing the Palestine movement is extremely Offensive to them. They will put a complaint in to [sic] the Medical School against me because they would be worried about my competency as a doctor.

The coping mechanism, understandably, involves making oneself a small target:

> Firstly I lie and I don't tell anyone I'm Israeli and I don't tell anyone that I'm Jewish. If the topic does come out I pretend to have opinions that I don't necessarily have. I try to say what people would accept as the right thing to say, and try to avoid the conversation all together, and also avoid socialising. So I am far less social than I used to be, just in case the conversation does come up. This all comes with a high price. I cry a lot. I feel scared and very unwell…
> Even though I don't disclose my views, I know that some students who know that I am Jewish, have distanced themselves from me…

This interview and the many others held by us, as well as the detailed comments by participants of the 5A survey (see part 3 of the 5A submission), speak volumes about the isolation and discrimination experienced by Jewish students. In the case of the Jewish and Israeli medical students, their distress is exacerbated by the fear that any Disciplinary Complaints against them could adversely affect their future in the medical profession.

4.2 The negative impact of academic boycott and BDS (Boycott, Divestment and Sanctions)

Both student and staff motions that have been passed since 7 October at several universities promote the Boycott, Divestment and Sanctions (BDS) movement,[1] which advocates for the one Palestinian state through its slogan 'From the River to the Sea, Palestine shall be free' and the right of return for all Palestinian refugees. The BDS website sets out its goals as follows:

- Ending its occupation and colonization of all Arab lands and dismantling the Wall.
- Recognizing the fundamental rights of the Arab-Palestinian citizens of Israel to full equality.
- Respecting, protecting, and promoting the rights of Palestinian refugees to return to their homes and properties as stipulated in UN Resolution 194.

As Cary Nelson explains:

> The entire arc of Middle East history confirms fear of that outcome and its antisemitic consequences. The BDS movement's third demand is thus one to which no imaginable Israeli government would agree. Despite the BDS movement's claim to nonviolence, only Israel's defeat in war could lead to a single state with a Jewish minority.[3]

Omar Barghouti, the founder of the BDS movement, has declared that 'accepting Israel as a "Jewish State" on our land is impossible' and that the only solution is 'euthanasia' for Israel'.[4] Together with statements of other key figures, the movement makes it quite clear that its aim is the eradication of Israel. The UMSU Motions, with their promotion of BDS, support this aim of the 'destruction of the Zionist entity'. Given that 45.8% of world Jewry now live in Israel,[5] this goal could only be achieved through violence and militarism. Based on my research, most Jews would be aware of this threat.

It is entirely understandable Jewish students or staff in the room where motions in support of BDS would feel threatened both physically and psychologically at this message. They certainly cannot feel welcome in the student union which passes motions supporting the BDS.

The ferocity of the BDS campaign, and its accusations of racism, colonialism, apartheid, ongoing crimes, ethnic cleansing, massacres, and expulsions are extreme and one-sided. This ferocity led the German Bundestag to define the BDS as an "antisemitic enterprise" in 2019. Several state governments in the US have also passed anti-BDS laws, and BDS has been criticised in the UK. Australia has not introduced anti-BDS legislation but governments on both sides of the aisle have stated that they do not support BDS.

This background needs to be born in mind in the discussion of 4.3, where some specific cases which the 5A has become aware of are outlined.

4.3 Visiting Israeli academics: specific cases of academic boycott

The Alliance has found that since 7 October 2023 several attempts by an Israeli speaker to present their research, or a researcher who is known to support Israel (including non-Jews), or a speaker who has collaborative relationships with Israel, has been met with cancellations, denying the speakers' freedom of speech, due to universities caving into protesters.

This is in clear breach of the universities' statutory duties. The TEQSA Act Section 59 allows TEQSA to review compliance to assess whether a University continues to meet with the standards to operate in Australia. The Threshold Standards adopted pursuant to the Tertiary Education Quality and Standards Agency Act, section 58 require that a higher education provider must meet:

· Threshold Standards section 6.4.1: The governing body is to 'develop and maintain an institutional environment in which freedom of speech and academic freedom are upheld and protected' but also an institutional environment where 'the wellbeing of students and staff is fostered.'
· Threshold Standards section 2.3.4: 'A safe environment is promoted and fostered'.

Consequently, Australian universities are harming their reputation by deterring scholars who could contribute to the enhancement of the Australian scholarship, from coming to Australia.

Since 7 October 2023 the number of Israeli academics coming to Australia has been reduced substantially, due to Australian universities sending the message that Israelis are not welcome. Some Israeli academics who travelled to Australia, were forced to turn around and return to Israel, having experienced the hostility against them first-hand on campuses. The cancelling of Israelis is occurring both on campuses and in professional associations affiliated with academic institutions. Below is a small selection of exemplars:

- March 2024: Frontline Mental Health Conference (FMHC) 2024, organised by Australian & New Zealand Mental Health Association (ANZMH).

Dr Moshe Farchi, a leading expert on Trauma treatment was invited to give a keynote address concerning his research. After his arrival in Australia, the conference committee cancelled his participation and his hotel booking. The reason given was that the committee received request letters and signatories to a petition to cancel Dr Farchi due to his Israeli nationality. They immediately caved in and cancelled him, regardless of Dr Farchi already being in Australia after travelling for 24 hours from Israel, and regardless of the talk having nothing to do with the current conflict. Dr Farchi was cancelled because he is Jewish and Israeli (See Appendix 1).

- March 2024: Cancelling Prof. Milette Shamir, Tel Aviv University's VP for international academic relations, and Ms. Sharon Ziv-Kafri from the Lowy International School, Israel, participation in an international fair at the University of Sydney and at Monash University

On Tuesday 19 March 2024 a high-level Israeli academic delegation, led by Professor Milette Shamir, encountered abuse and intimidation during their visit to the University of Sydney campus. They had been invited to showcase Tel Aviv University as a potential overseas exchange option for students during the University of Sydney's Study Abroad Fair. The university's security team failed to remove the protesters who occupied the building or to obtain their details for disciplinary action. They had been instructed to intervene only if there was violence. Due to the noise and the fact that students could not easily enter the building due to security after two hours, Professor Shamir decided that they should pack up and leave. The irony was that instead of accompanying the protesters outside of the University of Sydney building, the university's security accompanied the victims outside of the campus. This event was covered in the media.

Consequently, this harassment led to the delegation canceling their participation at the Monash Study Abroad Fair as well. Both universities did nothing to protect the freedom of academic pursuit on their campuses .

- April 2024: On 11 April 2024, protesters shut down a lecture to be delivered by an Israeli professor of aeronautics.

A distinguished professor was scheduled to speak to a closed forum of a research group seminar at the University of Melbourne. In response to minimal pressure by pro-Palestinian students, the Dean canceled the lecture a day before it was scheduled, having taken no measures whatsoever to secure the event and to allow it to proceed. This was done with the support of the vice chancellor of the university. Once again, the university conveyed the message that the freedom of speech of Jews did not count, and that student activists are running the university and determining its agenda, who can and who cannot speak on campus and what topics are permitted. Resulting from this experience, the Professor also cancelled his planned his sabbatical at the School of Engineering at the Australian National University.

A few days later, a similar cancellation of a guest lecture by an engineer from Amazon occurred due to the company's supposed collaboration with Israel. The University of Melbourne's engineering staff and students were prevented from engaging in intellectual enquiry about or discussing research in world-class aeronautics and information technology research, in clear breaches of the legal obligations of the university for freedom of speech. Here once again the university acted to diminish its scholarly value by giving a hand to the interruption of academic pursuits.

- May 24: 2024 Australian and New Zealand College of Anaesthetists (ANZCA) Annual Scientific Meeting (ASM)

Prof. Carolyn Weiniger, a highly distinguished scholar was invited to give a keynote at the conference. Following pressures to cancel her, the conference committee sent her an email letting her know that they are unable to ensure her safety, effectively withdrawing from their responsibility to ensure a safe environment for all speakers. A quick intervention by 5A allowed the presentation to go ahead despite the organisers' refusal to ensure Weiniger's safety, thereby depriving her of freedom of speech through their lack of willingness to protect her (see Appendix 3).

In summary, since 7 October 2023 Australian universities have done little to protect the freedom of speech of Jews, in violation of their statutory obligation. In doing so, Australian universities are not only reinforcing the antisemitic behaviour of the protesters by discriminating against Israeli presenters; they are also actively participating in diminishing the possibility of collaborative research projects and the exchange of knowledge which would be to the benefit of Australia.

5. Why a judicial inquiry is needed/Advantages to holding a judicial inquiry

Part 2 of this submission presents the specific case for a judicial inquiry. 5A considers a judicial inquiry into antisemitism on campus, empowered with the authority of a Royal Commission, is essential for several reasons:

1. Compelling Evidence and Accountability: Such an inquiry can compel the submission of evidence, ensuring that key individuals, such as Vice Chancellors and university management, are held accountable. This is critical in revealing systemic issues and fostering transparency.

2. Protection for Vulnerable Witnesses: The inquiry can conduct interviews in camera (in private) to protect staff who might fear retaliation or loss of employment for speaking out. This creates a safe space for truth-telling without the risk of adverse consequences.
3. Expertise and Independence: The inquiry would be chaired by an independent federal judge with expertise in handling complex matters, ideally those dealing with racism and its impacts. This ensures that the process is impartial and informed by a deep understanding of antisemitism and its unique challenges.
4. Privilege of Evidence: Any evidence provided during the inquiry is privileged, protecting witnesses from defamation claims. This legal safeguard encourages the submission of candid and comprehensive evidence, critical for uncovering the full extent of the issue.

6. Concluding recommendations

Antisemitism is a cancer. It erodes the fabric of our society and poisons social cohesion and tolerance. We naively believed that Australia was somehow vaccinated against this disease, but in the aftermath of Oct 7, with the outpouring of anti-Zionist and anti-semitic sentiment we can no longer put our heads in the sand and assume that this is a problem that will go away without a concerted effort. Ground zero for the hearts and minds of our future leaders are on our campuses. There is no doubt that the rights of Jewish students to enjoy their education and those of Jewish staff to make a meaningful contribution to research and teaching is under threat. We cannot allow our campuses to be no-go zones for Jews. We submit that a judicial inquiry as proposed by the bill is the best way to expose the extent of the problem and to propose solutions.

Appendix:

Related Considerations that may be relevant to the judicial inquiry.

A. The Role of NTEU in spreading antisemitism on campuses

The National Tertiary Education Union (NTEU) across its Australian university branches, as well as through its national policy, has become a driver of academic boycotts and antisemitism on university campuses. The NTEU has become intensely involved in political activism against Israel, in many cases forcing Jewish members out of the union, and actively creating a hostile environment for Jewish staff where they feel unsafe. Furthermore, much of this activism uses members' fees for political purposes that oppose the beliefs of Jewish members in the union and intentionally humiliates them (please see Image 1 below). Rather than defending workers' rights which is the NTEU's raison d'etre, Jewish university staff members increasingly feel that they cannot be represented by the union and there is no alternative union that can represent them in their dealings with management.

We have many examples of this discriminatory conduct by the NTEU. For example, a Jewish academic wrote in their resignation letter from the union that they are resigning due to the union's perceived complicity in antisemitic rhetoric and failure to differentiate between legitimate criticism of Israel and hate speech against Jews and Israelis. This academic and other Jewish staff believe the union's support of certain pro-Palestinian activities has created a hostile environment for Jewish and Israeli staff, making universities and the broader Australian society less safe for the Jewish community at large.

Another member who resigned from the union wrote:

> By late October 2023, for the first time in my life, I felt genuinely afraid and unwelcome on university campus. Some colleagues had publicly expressed the view that I was a supporter of genocide or apartheid because I had openly spoken out against the National Tertiary Education Union's (NTEU) hardline stance on the Gaza conflict and its refusal to recognise that people of many backgrounds had been killed in this conflict. For the avoidance of doubt, I do not support genocide, and I do not want innocent civilians of any race, religion or background to be killed.
> I joined soon after starting my academic career. When there was strike action (some years ago), I donated to a fund to cover the salaries of those who were going to be unpaid as a result of strike action. Apparently, they raised more money than was needed. However, rather than going back to donors, or even putting the money aside for future possible strike action, they donated the excess to the Greens. I felt this was wrong because I don't support the Greens and, if I did, I could have donated to them directly not have the decision made for me when I was supporting something completely different.

However, I stayed in the union as I was assured that this was a "one-off" thing. I didn't quit until the more recent statements around Israel. There is absolutely no connection between a union to support (diverse) academic staff and an international war. Like the Greens situation, people can speak for themselves, they don't need a random voice to purport to speak on their behalf (inevitably in line with the views of only some, even if a majority, of members). When I quit, I had to give a reason but the character length was very short so I explained as best as I could. No reply

The union has taken up a position of extreme hostility to Israel, the only country in its region with an independent, active union movement, one that accepts Israelis of all national and religious backgrounds and one in which university staff are very active. It sides instead, unquestioningly, with the Palestinians' fake unions that are mere ideological conveyor belts of the dominant party-regimes in Gaza (Hamas) and the West Bank (PLO).

I could go on ... including to ask why this matter continually captures the attention of the NTEU to the degree that it does whereas the union is reliably absent when our education union colleagues in eg Iran sit on death row just for being union activists? In anger and in sorrow at feeling I have no choice but to be a non-unionist when we need more not fewer active unionists.

In summary, NTEU has been actively contributing to the spreading of hate against Jewish people on Australian campuses. By their anti-Israel and anti-Jewish rhetoric, and support for BDS, the union has been forcing Jewish members out, leaving them with no alternative representation. The quantity of material distributed by NTEU branches since 7 October and the extent of organised protests suggest that a substantial proportion of members' fees are directed to political activism against Israel, including using Jewish members' fees against their will in ways that directly harm the mental health of these members.

B. University responses to antisemitism on campuses

Need a definition of antisemitism

To date the only definition of antisemitism which has formal authority is the IHRA (International Holocaust Remembrance Alliance) definition, which was adopted by the IHRA in Bucharest in 2016. It has now been adopted by 37 countries, including Australia, and hundreds of NGOs, each with its own interpretation and policy. It is strongly supported by Jewish communities throughout the world, including Australia. The IHRA definition stresses that 'criticism of Israel similar to that levelled against any other country cannot be regarded as antisemitic'. While traditionally the Australian Jewish leadership view has been that Jews in the Diaspora have no right to criticise Israeli government policies, this has changed radically in recent years. In 2023, Australian Jewish leaders expressed criticism of the current Netanyahu government and the government's planned judicial reform. The responses to recent 'Crossroads23' survey of Australian Jews reflect this new trend in Australian Jewish relations with Israel. Thus, legitimate criticism of Israeli government policies is definitely not antisemitic.

Anti-Israel activists on campus claim that the IHRA definition stifles free speech and have called for the Universities who have adopted the IHRA to reverse their policy. However, any casual observer will report that the activists have been allowed to express themselves freely. Rarely have students been disciplined no matter how extreme or offensive their language. Universities have bent over backwards to allow the activists free reign on campus, only taking action when their occupation of buildings and grounds became intolerable. Activists who oppose the IHRA have not proposed an alternative definition.

C. TEQSA: inadequate responses

Thus far, TEQSA has failed to make a positive determination in relation to the management of antisemitism on campus and the impact of management decisions on Jewish students and staff. Nor has there been the development by the regulator of a Jewish specific approach to cultural training for university staff or a guidance note on managing the complaints or activities that occur on campus as a result of the Middle East conflict. Academic integrity and the need for inclusive pedagogy and teaching quality has not been considered by university management. A judicial inquiry has the power to compel TEQSA to take regulatory leadership in this regard.

Issues of concern in regard to health and wellbeing have already been highlighted in the detailed responses of both Jewish staff and students, yet where concerns have been submitted, there has not been a response based on their cohort's specific needs and health and wellbeing issues. In addition, Jewish students and staff have not been identified as a cohort that requires additional support to feel safe and supported. As the 5A survey revealed, most do not feel comfortable to make complaints for fear of identification and adverse consequences.

Australian
Academic Alliance
Against Antisemitism

Why do we need a judicial enquiry:

5A submission to the Senate Inquiry Part 2

Given the volume of evidence of increasing antisemitic discourse and incidents in the Australian Tertiary Sector already presented by us and others, one might ask why a judicial enquiry is justified, especially given the appointment of Jillian Segal as the special envoy to combat antisemitism.

The Australian Academic Alliance Against Antisemitism ('5A') considers the Universities to be 'Ground Zero' in the emergence of a culture that normalises antisemitism that is likely to affect Australia for generations to come. Today's student leaders will become the politicians and leaders of tomorrow and if we continue to allow antisemitic attitudes and acts to become normalized on campus, the future will be very bleak.

Discrimination and vilification of Jews or Israelis is not only unlawful but also represents a threat to our society as a whole, eroding hard-fought for protections that we value and recognise as essential for the functioning of democracy and for the fostering of a meritocratic environment which is inclusive of all individuals irrespective of their identities. It is this environment which is a necessary precursor to the development of creative and innovative ideas that sit at the heart of academia. If individuals at universities are offended, insulted, intimidated or humiliated, or receive less favourable treatment than others in a similar situation on account of being Jewish or Israeli, then they are less likely to be able to focus on their work and make their academic institutions the global leaders that they seek to be.

In the view of 5A, the reported instances of antisemitic discourse and incidents are a drastic under-representation of the true pervasiveness of the problem on Australian campuses. We believe that antisemitism is a light sleeper and has been awakened and emboldened by the events in the Middle East, and that many students, academics and professional staff at universities across Australia are not reporting antisemitic discourse and incidents when these occur. We believe this because we are these people. We experience these incidents and discourse, and we often do not report them to our universities because:

- We fear the consequences for our career progression, remuneration, awards, recognition in our fields and tenure (or, in the case of our students, they fear being graded poorly and passed up for opportunities and awards)
- We fear the social fallout in our close-knit work environments and being further ostracised and excluded to the detriment of our psychosocial well-being and our professional development
- We fear the very real threats to our physical safety that have been clearly expressed in events such as the motion by the Student Representative Council at the University of Sydney endorsing the atrocities carried out by proscribed terror organisation Hamas on October 7 as "resistance".

We believe that there must be a judicial enquiry because:

- Australian universities do not fully appreciate the extent of the problem in terms of attitudes that are becoming normalized in academia and we cannot find this out without the power of a judicial enquiry. Witness, for example, the attitudes revealed by the three Deans at Columbia who were recently dismissed after damming text messages were uncovered that:

  > revealed behavior and sentiments that were not only unprofessional, but also, disturbingly touched on ancient antisemitic tropes,"
  > "Whether intended as such or not, these sentiments are unacceptable and deeply upsetting, conveying a lack of seriousness about the concerns and the experiences of members of our Jewish community that is antithetical to our University's values and the standards we must uphold in our community".
  > Minouche Shafik, President, Columbia University

Had these text messages not come to light almost by accident, these Deans would still be in their positions. If these are the attitudes held by senior academics, we have an even deeper problem than student encampments and loud protestors. How do these attitudes filter down, for example, to selection panels for coveted placements in areas such as medicine where one-on-one interviews are an integral part of the selection process? Are we seeing a return to attempts to limit the number of Jewish students and staff on campus as was the case for so many years in the US?

One Associate Dean at the University of Melbourne found it appropriate to put posters of 'From the River to the Sea, Palestine will be free' on the front door of her office and others in that block devoted to student welfare did the same. They were unperturbed by the potential of these signs to cause distress to Jewish students who needed to consult with them, and either were ignorant to the fact that this phrase is a call for the ethnic cleansing of Jews and other Israelis from the region, or even worse condoned such calls.

- We do not know how or if University administrations are really dealing with this problem or even if they understand what the problem is. The tip of the iceberg is that the actions that the Universities are taking to discipline students and staff who have been found guilty of misconduct are shrouded in secrecy under the cover of confidentiality and privacy. Universities are not obligated to provide reports on antisemitic incidents or discourse or to document how they addressed such instances, in contrast to the way they are required to report incidences of sexual harassment.

  There is widespread disagreement by universities over whether to adopt the International Holocaust Remembrance Alliance working definition of antisemitism despite both the Government and Opposition endorsing it, meaning that there is not even basic consensus at universities about what antisemitism is. There remains a pervasive view among university administrations that non-Jews can and should define what antisemitism is in total disregard to the lived experience of Jews, a position that is at odds with how every other persecuted group is able to define what racism against it looks like. Only a judicial enquiry can bring this out into the open so that the actual nature and full extent of the problem and how or if it is currently being addressed becomes known.

  Importantly, we do not know how Universities are tackling or planning to address the growth of antisemitism amongst academic and professional staff. Academic and professional staff are given extensive training in diversity, equality and inclusion, and cultural awareness of, for example, Indigenous sensitivities or the sensitivities of non-binary students. No such training exists about the scourge of antisemitism anywhere in the tertiary sector (to the best of our knowledge). There is little awareness that for most Jewish students, anti-Zionism (i.e the denial of the right of Jews to self-determination in their ancestral homeland in Israel) is antisemitism. Even those academics who oppose Israel's actions in the Middle East have a responsibility to be culturally sensitive to a minority group on campus, whose only perceived 'crime' is that they believe in the right of Jews to self-determination, a right which is protected under international law.

- We do not know the extent to which entrenched 'anti-Zionist' attitudes have infiltrated academia and whether these views have compromised academic outcomes. Indeed, our own experience is that such views are affecting the quality of and delivery of courses and are resulting in students being exposed to course materials and teachings which are one-sided, lack academic rigour and have become heavily politicised at the expense of encouraging independent thinking. While 'academic freedom' and 'freedom of speech' are frequently used to justify the creation of a permissive environment for antisemitism, we know from our own lived experiences that ironically there is zero academic freedom or freedom of speech afforded to those who wish to present a contrary view to the 'anti-Zionist' view being propagated. Some lecturers are using their academic power to present as incontrovertible truths, 'data' which is disputed, and to deny facts that are well-documented and established. There is no doubt that some lecturers discriminate against Jewish and Israeli students who raise details about the discrimination they are suffering.

- We do not know the extent to which foreign and proscribed actors have been seeking to infiltrate and influence students and staff on campus and to promote support for terrorist organizations. We do not know the degree to which students on campus are being supported and guided by outside agitators. We do know that investigations have revealed disturbing links between organisations such as Hizb ut-Tahrir – an organisation proscribed in many countries including the UK and Germany – and the encampment and anti-Israel movement in Australia. We also know that in recent years the amount of investment from foreign regimes including Qatar in our tertiary sector has increased significantly, as it has in foreign tertiary sectors such as in the US.

- We do not know the extent to which antisemitic occurrences on campus are underreported because of fears of adverse consequences for staff and students reporting these incidents. We are not confident that the University administrators are able to keep the identity of complainants confidential and avoid them being attacked, vilified, discriminated against or excluded. We do know that prominent academics with prestigious academic credentials are being targeted, discriminated against and vilified. We also know that many students and university staff have zero confidence in attaining positive outcomes from the reporting of antisemitic incidents and discourse and this will be driving a trend to avoid reporting such incidents and discourse given the perceived harms outweigh any potential perceived benefits.

- We do not know whether University administrations are capitulating in private to the demands of the agitators to cut off ties with Israel, or what impact this is having on national security and innovation. We do know that University administrations are giving an out of sized voice to anti-Israel agitators (eg see Memorandum of Understanding between the student guild and Curtin University: https://www.curtin.edu.au/news/wp-content/uploads/2024/06/Signed-MOU-Curtin-Student-Guild-23052024_2.pdf) and failing to recognise the net gain to Australia from cooperation with Israeli institutions. 5A considers a blanket ban on interactions with Israeli universities to be antisemitic because it targets academics based solely on their citizenship and not their academic credentials. Such an approach is manifestly racist. The academics in Israel are among the most progressive in the world and comprise Jews, Palestinian and Arab citizens of Israel, and individuals of many nationalities, religions and walks of life. Many freely and frequently express views that are critical of their government. There is worrying evidence that Universities are opting for expediency over principle and whilst not publicly agreeing to a boycott, are nevertheless agreeing to a de-facto boycott by cancelling or indefinitely postponing academic exchange programs and not entering into joint research agreements.

Jewish academics have become fearful that their research projects will not receive fair treatment if they propose to collaborate with Israeli colleagues. This 'backdoor Boycott Divestment Strategy' is subtle, hard to expose and even harder to prove, but it is clearly detrimental to positive academic outcomes. A judicial enquiry is the only way we will uncover the extent to which Universities are taking the 'easy way out' and just avoiding conflict by giving in to the demands of the agitators to the detriment of advancements across academia.

- We do not know the extent to which antisemitism has become embedded in the National Tertiary Education Union (NTEU), and whether it is possible for Jewish academics to have a union that can represent their workplace interests without compromising their core beliefs. The virulence and obsession of the NTEU in attacking Israel and Zionism raises the question about whether the NTEU has been taken over by those whose antisemitic attitudes dominate over their core responsibility to improve working conditions for academics. The singular obsession with one conflict overseas is hard to understand if it does not indicate underlying antisemitic attitudes. In the UK, an enquiry was needed to rid the Labour party of such influences. Is the NTEU fulfilling its obligations? Does the government need to step in here to protect the right of Jewish and Israeli academics to have a union that will protect their interests while not passing motion after motion attacking their core beliefs.

- Finally we need an enquiry because we don't know how to best tackle the problem of the growing normalization of antisemitic attitudes in academia. We need to adopt an empirical approach to this and properly review data from other countries and other eras in order to assess what can be done to roll back the antisemitism that has been unleashed. We do not know if the Universities in Australia are accessing best practice from overseas institutions, some of which have navigated the current conflict much more effectively than others. We do not know if Universities are themselves willing and able to tackle this problem or if Government intervention is needed. We do know that to date agencies such as AHRC and TEQSA have proven to be unwilling and/or unable to tackle the issues and that we need the independence of a suitable judge to get to the bottom of the issues.

- What we do know is that if left unchecked we are looking at a future in which Jews will be excluded in practice from the higher education scene. Instead of receiving an education in which they learn to appreciate complexity, students will leave the university with unchecked antisemitic attitudes that will pollute the Australian political and social environment for many years to come.

As with any type of racism, antisemitism is a scourge on society and is inimical to the positive development of Australia. Universities are meant to be environments that prioritise truth, the pursuit of knowledge and learning, the freedom to pursue ideas and to think creatively. They are the not ideological factories where othering and marginalisation should occur and where people should be excluded simply because of their protected identity. We must have a judicial enquiry so that we can get at the truth of what is happening in universities across Australia, hold those who are responsible to account, and eliminate antisemitism from our tertiary education sector.

Yours truly

Steven Prawer on behalf of the Australian Academic Alliance Against Antisemitism.

Preliminary Results of Survey of Antisemitism in Tertiary Institutions

5A Submission to the Senate Inquiry

Background

In 2024 a survey of antisemitism on Australian campuses was conducted by a research team led by Professor Andrew Markus, at Monash University and Associate Professor Efrat Eilam, at Victoria University. The research team are all members of 5A.

The survey aimed to assess the extent of antisemitism in Australian universities, as experienced by students and staff, and the extent to which universities in Australia are taking active measures to ensure that their campuses are free from antisemitism.

The survey comprised a small number of questions, 4 demographic, 8 fixed-choice (some with multiple parts) and 3 open-ended. A feature of the survey findings is the extent of detail provided by respondents to the open-ended questions.

The survey was conducted online from April to July 2024 and was promoted by 5A to its members and by various Jewish organisations, including the Australian Union of Jewish Students. 80% of the questionnaires were completed in April and May and 17% in July when there was a final promotion with advice that the survey would close at the end of the month.

Undergraduates from 24 universities responded, with the largest numbers from Monash University, the University of Sydney, the University of New South Wales and the University of Melbourne, comprising nearly 60% of the achieved sample.

Close to 600 questionnaires were completed, by 390 students (some 300 studying at the Bachelor's level) and 200 university staff (130 academic). Analysis of the survey is currently underway. The focus of this submission is on the experience of Jewish students, as expressed in their own words. 5A considers the results of this survey to be highly relevant to the work of the senate committee. Here we provide preliminary findings in advance of a full analysis which will be published in due course.

Results:

The preliminary analysis of the raw data discloses that a majority of respondents indicate that they do not feel safe in the university environment.

- Only one-in-three Jewish undergraduate student respondents reported feeling safe on campus, with an even lower proportion among women and at some universities
- One in five students reported a decrease in their participation in classes held on campus
- When asked "To what extent do you think that your university's management is taking sufficient action against antisemitism and ensuring that campuses are safe and inclusive for Jews", only one quarter of Jewish undergraduate students indicated a positive view of the response of management.

Context and benchmarking:

What is the acceptable level for sense of safety in a university environment?

An important benchmark is provided the 2021 National Student Safety Survey (NSSS) on the prevalence of sexual harassment and sexual assault, funded by Universities Australia through the Respect. Now. Always. initiative. Its objective was to "inform ongoing efforts of Australian universities in building equitable, safe and inclusive learning experiences for their students". The 2021 NSSS Survey included questions comparable to the 5A survey, of direct relevance the findings for two questions:

- "I feel safe when at university" – Strongly agree/ agree – 84%
- "My university is trying hard to protect the safety of all students" – Strongly agree/ agree – 75% (NSSS, p. 74, at https://universitiesaustralia.edu.au/project/2021-nsss/)

On the release of these findings, Sex Discrimination Commissioner Kate Jenkins commented that "all students deserve a safe and respectful education, and failure to provide this reflects badly on all us". (https://humanrights.gov.au/about/news/media-statement-release-2021-national-student-safety-survey-report)

Professor Mark Scott, the Vice-Chancellor and Principal of the University of Sydney, committed his university to "renewed and targeted action to create a safer and more supporting environment".

He noted that since 2018 the university had required > all new students to complete a Consent Matters module and consent workshops are held twice a year for all student leaders and first year students living in student accommodation and residential colleges. We've also created a mandatory module for all executive office > holders in our many clubs and societies about the drivers of sexual assault and sexual harassment.

Despite the progress that had been made, Professor Scott commented with regard to ongoing incidents:

> Frankly, one case is one too many. To every person who has experienced sexual harassment or sexual assault, we are deeply sorry. Every student has the right to feel safe and supported and to be treated with respect and dignity, whether on campus, online or offshore. Anything less is unacceptable. (https://www.sydney.edu.au/news-opinion/news/2022/03/23/university-of-sydney-responds-to-national-student-safety-survey.html)

Programs to ensure that all are treated with "respect and dignity" – to change attitudes – have been established at all Australian universities. Thus, in 2023 Victorian universities joined forces to simultaneously hold Respect at Uni Week at all campuses and in online spaces. At the University of Melbourne, a bystander awareness email campaign was delivered to all students and staff to encourage bystander action against sexism and sexual harassment. At the Australian National University, a minimum of $3 million a year was committed to the ANU Student Safety and Wellbeing Plan.

This bench-marking exercise demonstrates that Universities have adopted a zero tolerance policy regarding sexual harassment on campus and insist that all students have the right to feel safe on campus. We hope that a judicial inquiry will establish why Jewish students not afforded this same level of protection and whether government action is needed to force the universities to confront the problem and take action in the same way that they were forced to take action re sexual harassment.

Impact of Antisemitism on Jewish Student Well Being.

In an open-ended question, respondents to the 5A survey were asked: "If you encountered antisemitism, please describe the most impactful experiences of antisemitism that you have encountered on campus since 7 October 2023. More than 190 students described antisemitic incidents, over 80% of those who responded to the question. To provide insight into the student campus experience since 7 October, extracts from responses are provided below, classified under five headings; there have been minor changes where necessary to maintain anonymity.

1. Tone and extent of protests, posters and flyers
2. Behaviour of protestors
3. Behaviour of academics
4. Racism, legitimisation of hate speech
5. Impact of the campus experience

1. TONE AND EXTENT OF PROTESTS, POSTERS AND FLYERS

- Constant rallies and posters everywhere accusing the Jewish people of genocide.
- Loud, aggressive weekly protests on campus. Calling for intifada, telling lies about Israel and spreading antisemitic propaganda by way of posters and leaflets on campus.
- There are posters and stickers everywhere and every day.
- You cannot walk anywhere on campus without going past blatantly anti-Israeli and antisemitic posters and stickers – on every pole, wall and building. Additionally, there are constantly groups of students under different group names spreading antisemitic ideals.
- Seeing flyers; protesters approaching me; people trying to give flyers.
- Have pro-Palestinian encampments on campus, have to walk past them and see these students calling for intifada while on my way to classes.
- Nearly every week there are protests in which the staff and students decry "Zionists scum" and "genocidal Zionists ".
- Encouraging students to go to antisemitic marches and putting in student newspapers and welcome booklets pages upon pages of horrifyingly antisemitic content.
- Pro-Palestine activists entered my lecture and forced everyone to participate in a vote, they split the classroom into who was pro-Israel and who was anti-Israel. They took a photo of the results.
- A huge banner across campus saying “every Jew on the planet must be attacked”.
- Palestine flags everywhere, groups of protesters trying to speak to you, posts, posters around uni, videos.
- Constant barrage of people or posters calling for a stop to Israel's campaign, which would not be antisemitic, if it were not accompanied by lies, or disproven/unproven facts, such as "Israel is committing genocide”, and is “only interested in murdering Palestinians".

2. BEHAVIOUR OF PROTESTORS

- My lecture theatre was outside the encampment and I had to walk through it to get to the theatre. On my way out I saw a group of protestors linking arms preventing Jewish students from entering, most notably those who told the protestors to do so were Arab men who didn't even attend the university ... That day I felt like the university failed me, my sense of safety on campus and the safety of all other students, to allow this man to ... spread hate speech and to restrict the movement of Jewish students.
- Constantly and incessantly asked to sign fliers to “free Palestine from the Israeli occupation”.

- I have been bombarded by pro-Palestinian parties asking me if I support Palestine and wish to join their movement.
- ... Islamic society handing out sweets and playing music the days following October 7.
- The continuous marches calling for Palestine to be free from the river to the sea. Some people came into a lecture theatre and started yelling at everyone.
- At the meeting a resolution for the annihilation of Israel and Israeli people passed ... Everyone erupted in cheers and applause.
- All these people ... disrupt and cause problems, spewing hate. Classes got cancelled right before exams because of them.
- People walking into my lectures shouting pro-Palestinian chants and antisemitic things.

3. BEHAVIOUR OF ACADEMICS

- Discussions about Israel's "genocide" regularly in every class where the tutor commended the encampment and anti-Israel rap. General attitude of anti-Israel sentiment pervaded.
- Students were allowed to go inside the lecture hall, just before the lecture (professors present) to call on the students to join the rally, again calling the war a "genocide".
- Multiple professors referring to Hamas' actions as resistance to occupation and that Israel is committing genocide.
- Professors and laboratory demonstrators who are not Arab, let alone Palestinian, wearing keffiyehs to class.
- Former dean ... continuously posting online under his title ... outrageous anti-Israel posts.
- My lecturers, subject coordinators and tutors all impose their personal opinion of the Israel-Gaza conflict on the class and don't encourage debate or a balanced discussion.
- I have had tutors, lecturers and students make comments about Palestine or the "genocide" or antisemitic stereotype comments in front of the whole class.
- My subject coordinators publishing information which is really hurtful to Jewish people.
- Refusal to talk about any circumstances where Jews might be the victims.

4. RACISM, LEGITIMISATION OF HATE SPEECH

- At a meeting ... when we tried to express the suffering and pain our people have faced, we were laughed at and blatantly ignored.
- Heard students talking about anyone who supports Israel as not being human.
- At a rally, a man came up to us saying we should all die, and "F*ck the Jews" and "Heil Hitler".

- Being told I'm complicit in genocide and I'm a baby killer after saying I support Israel.
- Hearing people at my uni chant "Fuck Off Zionists".
- Hearing students wanting to work out who is Jewish and talking about how they might do so, such as asking where their name comes from, like it's a witch hunt.
- I have regularly been called "Jew Boy" or "Jew".
- I was approached by pro-Palestinian students who called me names such as a "Pig", a "Genocide Supporter" and a "Nazi". They tried to intimidate and harass me whilst I was waiting to attend a class.
- I was called a "Genocidal Fuckwit" who had no place on the University campus and was told to fuck off.
- Someone came up to me and shouted "Fuck you Zionazi" in my ear.
- The protestors were also promoting books on the intifada that were terrifying and blatantly antisemitic, calling for attacks on Jews and Israelis. Protestors were also handing out horrible stickers with a stereotypical Jew on the front ...
- I was sitting next to a group of uni students when I heard "If Hitler had done his job properly, the Israel and Palestine war wouldn't be happening".
- The hateful posters are very triggering. I have been tearing them down. Once, someone saw me tearing them down and started videoing without my permission. I was terrified that I was going to be a target and attacked.
- Mr lecturer announced that our class would not be held due to the encampment and encouraged everyone to follow what was happening in Gaza. I later saw him at the protest, actively participating.
- My tutors wear a Palestinian flag on their shirts every day.
- My tutor walked into class wearing a keffiyeh and, unprompted by any student, began to explain his reasons.
- Tweets by a law lecturer celebrating October 7.
- Within a lecture, the lecturer held a specific session to discuss his issues with Israel (in relation the current war that is occurring). Personally, I felt very isolated as all my fellow peers seemed to be engaging in the discussion and blindly accepting.
- I have encountered teachers saying "Free Palestine from the river to the sea", making me so uncomfortable during class, being told by fellow students who knew I was Jewish to shut up when I had not said anything.

5. IMPACT OF THE CAMPUS EXPERIENCE

- The presence of the encampment as well as the antisemitic chants have drastically affected me. While on campus I was constantly checking these groups' social medias in an attempt to avoid going anywhere near them, even taking much longer indirect routes to avoid even passing them. Their presence had a significant impact on my mental health. The last few weeks I felt as though I couldn't attend my university, feeling unsafe to represent my Jewish culture, I tried to avoid looking "too Jewish" to avoid being the victim of racial vilification.
- ... felt incredibly isolated and shocked that this was allowed in a classroom setting ...
- The way they said Jewish with such venom was quite terrifying.
- Afraid to talk about my experiences in Israel and as a Jew, for fear of doxing, harassment, isolation.
- I don't feel like I can go to uni and not encounter people pushing fliers in my face.
- All of the posters feel sinister, all of them feel like an attack, and all of them make me feel alienated, alone, and in the worst cases, unsafe.
- The vile chants shouted at the recent protest were quite unnerving. While I was sitting in class it was impossible to focus while people outside were chanting intifada, calling for the death of Jews and Israelis. It is incredibly scary to walk around campus knowing that these people are around you.
- To be honest, I haven't been on campus since October 7. I did my exams remotely.
- My tutor and unit coordinator made me feel distressed and scared and alienated.
- I wear a kippa, so I am and have always been acutely aware that I am a likely target for harassment / violence, and so I had never felt settled on campus, especially since 7/10. All day there had been discussions on group chats about the different pro Palestine posters, so I was looking, curious what I'd see, as campus security was ostensibly removing some of them. I was leaving campus and in response to one poster I immediately felt intense rage and fear, I drank some water to try to stop myself from vomiting. My smart watch showed my heart rate spike ... I then saw protestors putting up more posters, smiling and joking. After all the discussions that day about campus security allegedly removing posters, and free speech, and calm political discussions, it really hammered home that no one really gives a shit about us and our concerns are not valid. It entirely broke my already wavering faith in the administration.
- Very hard to focus when being attacked at the university from the pro-Palestine protesters. Being called disgusting names, abused, harassed and threatened.
- The Gaza-protest encampment invited young children to shout 'intifada' through megaphones, right in front of the university's main quadrangle and lawn. Hearing this call is a reminder to all Jews and Israelis of the terror, murders, bombings, bus attacks and killing that characterised the period of 'intifada' in the early 2000's. It is not something that is fit to be shouted by anyone, but let alone by children who know not what they are saying. It was shameful and chilled me to the bone.

CONCLUSION:

1. A majority of Jewish students have been robbed of their right to feel safe on campus. Their distress is real and debilitating. They are fearful and intimidated. Their sense of well-being and belonging has been eliminated.

2. University actions to date have not been effective in reversing this trend. It is unclear if this is because they are unwilling or unable to do so and whether government actions are needed to force them to confront this issue in the same way that they were forced to confront the issue of sexual harassment.
